THE marshal duke de Biron, at his return from Switzerland, retired into his government of Burgundy, having put into most of the strong places governors upon whom he thought he might depend. The king, who could no longer bear that state of uncertainty in which <sup>d</sup> he lived, sent him an order to come to court, which he declined, under pretence that the Spaniards intending to march a great body of troops through Franche Comte into the Low Countries, his presence was absolutely necessary in Burgundy <sup>5</sup>. The king, disliking this excuse, sent to him the president Jeanin, and the baron de Lux, who was in his secrets and in his interest, whom the king had taken pains to deceive, by throwing out kind expressions of the marshal in his hearing. At the request of these two persons the marshal resolved to go to Fontainebleau, through a persuasion that the king held him innocent, or at least had only suspicions <sup>6</sup>. One circumstance that had great weight with him, was the finding his fortresses defenceless, through the dexterity of Rhosny, who, in quality of master of the ordnance, had concerted with him the recasting all the artillery in those places, and had desired <sup>e</sup> that he would send his agent to Lyons to see the new pieces embarked the same day the old ones were sent out of Burgundy ; but causing the former to be stopped on the road, the marshal found himself disarmed, for which he swore revenge against Rhosny <sup>7</sup>. When he drew near the court he was met by a person of confidence from the duke of Espernon, who told him that it was his master's advice, if he knew himself faulty, to have recourse to the king's clemency. He looked upon this as a reproach, laid his hand upon his sword, and threatened destruction to his accusers. He arrived on the 13th of June at Fontainebleau. He was received in appearance very kindly by the king, who pressed him thrice that day to deal ingenuously with him, and sent the baron de Rhosny and the count de Soissons, but to no purpose <sup>8</sup>. Henry was extremely unwilling to make a person who had served him so well and so lately the victim of these intrigues : but the marshal insisting on his innocence, demanding the names of his accusers, and at length mingling threats with his protestations, determined, after he had laid his proofs before his council, to cause him and the count d'Auvergne to be arrested. At their last conference he said to the marshal, " You know what I have told you ; adieu baron de Biron." As he retired out of the king's cabinet he was arrested by Vitry captain of the king's guard, as the count de Auvergne was in another part of the palace, both being prepared to make their escape, that night, in consequence of repeated hints from their friends of the danger they were in <sup>9</sup>.

<sup>7</sup> Marshal Biron comes to court and is arrested.

<sup>1</sup> P. MATTH. J. THUAN.

<sup>2</sup> Histoire de Duc d'Espernon. P. DAN.

<sup>3</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. i. p. 403—421.

<sup>4</sup> J. THUANI. P. MATTH. DUPL. MEZ. P. DAN.

<sup>5</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD's

Memorials, vol. i. p. 407—409. P. DAN.

<sup>6</sup> DUPLEIX, tom. v. MEZ.

<sup>7</sup> Memoires de SULLI. LE

GENDRE.

<sup>8</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon, tom. ii.

MEMOIRES DE SULLI. P. DANIEL.

<sup>9</sup> PREFIXE Histoire du Roy Henry IV. DUPLEIX, tom. v. P. MATTH.

His process formed before the parliament, is condemned and executed.

THEY were immediately conveyed by water to the Bastile, and the king came to Paris <sup>a</sup> the same day. On the 18th of July the king directed a commission to the parliament to make the marshal's process. He behaved wildly before the committee that examined him, sometimes denying all, sometimes acknowledging more than could be proved. When the Sieur de la Fin was first produced, he acknowledged him for a man of honour, his friend, and his relation; but when he heard his deposition, he charged him, truly enough, with crimes the most infamous <sup>a</sup>. He said, however, that if the secretary of this man had been living, whom the old duke of Savoy had seized, and, as he thought, put to death, he would have justified his innocence and La Fin's guilt. Upon this that very secretary, who had made his escape out of a dungeon, was produced, which disconcerted the marshal extremely, who concluded from thence that he was betrayed by the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy <sup>b</sup>. His own secretary Atte- b bert, and a multitude of papers in his own hand-writing were also produced. On the 27th of the same month he appeared before all the chambers of the parliament assembled, of whom there were an hundred and twenty judges present; but, tho' they had been twice summoned, yet none of the peers would assist. The marshal had now recollected himself, and behaved quite otherwise than he had hitherto done. He made a long and eloquent speech, in which he set forth his services, insisted that these were realities, whereas what he was charged with were only hasty expressions, ambitious dreams, and political vapours, that had never manifested themselves in facts <sup>c</sup>. His discourse was so moving, that the first president and many of the judges wept. If they had proceeded to the vote that evening, many believe that his life would have been saved; but, being late, it was deferred, and on the 29th, which was the next sitting, because Sunday intervened, they unanimously adjudged him to death <sup>d</sup>. He suffered on the last day of the month, within the Bastile, in great confusion, and without shewing any thing of that intrepidity for which he had been so highly and so justly famous <sup>e</sup> (E). The baron de Fon- tenelle

<sup>a</sup> CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. DUPL. tom. v. Memoires de SULLI. <sup>b</sup> P. MATTH. <sup>c</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. i. p. 423, & seq. CAYET, Chronologie Septenaire. DUPL. <sup>d</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. i. p. 427. CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. P. MATTH. <sup>e</sup> PEREFIXE Histoire du Roi Henry IV. Suite de la Chronique du Sieur DU TILLET. DUPLEIX, tom. v.

(E) It may, probably, gratify the curiosity, and, at the same time, communicate some necessary information to the reader, if we enter here into the personal history of a man so remarkable both in prosperous and adverse fortune. Charles de Gontaut, baron de Biron, was the eldest son of Armand de Biron, marshal of France, descended from an antient and noble, though not a very illustrious or princely family. In his person he was by no means agreeable; he was not tall, but very fat; his head little, his eyes sunk deep, and something very piercing and malignant in his look. It is not true that he was illiterate, though it is owned that he was no great friend to letters. He had read, and was well acquainted not only with French and Latin, but with the Greek historians. Yet, though naturally vain, he chose rather to dissemble than to display his knowledge. He was a great officer in all respects, and as much distinguished by his judicious conduct as for his amazing intrepidity. He had served Henry since his accession to the throne with equal spirit and success, more especially at the siege of Amiens, where he surpassed all that he had before done, and all that his master expected of him. As his honours were the effects of Henry's gratitude, so that gratitude proved Biron's destruction. When the king returned in triumph to Paris, after raising the siege of Amiens, he said to some persons about him, "There is a great general," pointing to Biron, "this is the man I present to my friends and to my enemies." The king did not reward him only with praise, he made him marshal, duke, and peer of France, gave him estates, pensions, occasional gratifications, the important government of Burgundy, with large appointments. But it was impossible to content him, because it was impossible to keep him out of necessity. His foible was play, at which he lost five hundred thousand crowns within the compass of one year. His vanity was so extreme, that the whole tenor of his discourse was either the abuse of others or the praise of himself; so that, except amongst his creatures or his confederates, he was universally hated. He was, however, very sober, slept little, attended closely to affairs, managed them with great dexterity, and, in general, with great success. The king looked upon his worst qualities rather as foibles than vices, had a sincere affection for, and spoke extremely well of, him upon all occasions. On the contrary, Biron treated the king with the utmost disrespect; and, not content with magnifying his own services, which might have been spared, since, by the king's command, they were enumerated in his patent (in which it was said he had thirty five scars visible upon his body), he spoke of the king with distaste and contempt. He said that he was pitifully narrow in things that were absolutely necessary, and scandalously profuse in his amours. He taxed him with negligence in his affairs, want of steadiness in his resolutions, and forgetting the services of his friends. After being pardoned by the king, he said publicly, "Let him take care how he offends me; I know how to make kings, and emperors too, feel my resentment." The king, notwithstanding all this, was very desirous of saving him, and would rather have had any other victim. The marshal talked in this strain himself, when it was too late; he said often to those who saw him, "There are many as guilty, though there are none so miserable, as I." He was strangely addicted to astrology, and yet did not desist from his intrigues, though his ruin was foretold him, rather from the sagacity of his diviners than from their fallacious science. He behaved meanly under his misfortunes, beseeching the chancellor and every body that came near him to intercede with the king, desiring to be immured between four walls, and to pass the remainder of his days in chains, so he might live. But after all he accused nobody, only endeavoured to shift his crimes upon La Fin, who he said was a forcerer, and had bewitched him. At his death he was under forty. In suffering the severity of the law to pass upon Biron the king did an act of justice against his will, and lost the advantage he proposed, of drawing a full account of the conspiracy from that unfortunate nobleman. But this was repaired by the coming in of the baron de Lux, who was master of the whole detail of the conspiracy, and who was two full hours in relating it to the king. He certainly justified what Biron had advanced, that there were many as guilty as he. But it put all thoughts of punishing out of the king's head; for the number and the quality of

- a tenelle was broke alive upon the wheel as his accomplice: the count d'Auvergne, through the intreaties of his sister, madam d'Entragues, and on account of his being the last male of the house of Valois, was pardoned and restored to favour. The baron de Lux, who was in all Biron's secrets, surrendered after his death, and made such discoveries as the king took care to conceal, that the number of those who had tampered with the courts of Spain and Savoy might not be rendered desperate <sup>f</sup>. The queen of England and the king of Scots sent ambassadors to compliment the king on his escape from so dangerous a conspiracy. The king of Spain and the duke of Savoy did the like, but their ambassadors met with a very different reception. The king took all the precautions necessary for his own safety, and sent a body of troops, under the command of marshal Laverdin, into Burgundy, of which province he appointed the Dauphin governor, and made the duke de Bellegarde his lieutenant <sup>g</sup>.

- In the month of September arrived a solemn embassy from the Swiss cantons, and the league of the Grisons; it was composed of forty-two deputies, who were received with the utmost respect, and treated with all the kindness and esteem possible: they made three demands; first the augmentation of their annual subsidy of four hundred thousand crowns; next the renewal of their privileges; and lastly, two declarations that had been promised them, one permitting the five lesser cantons to execute their treaty with Milan and Savoy, and the second importing, that the levies made in the Protestant cantons should never be constrained to act against the Protestants in France. The king excused himself as to the first, on account of the low state of his finances; the two last were granted <sup>h</sup>. On the 20th of October the treaties were solemnly sworn to in the church of Notre Dame, first by the deputies, then by the king. At their departure they were each of them presented with a gold chain, with a large medal of the same metal, out of a mine that had been discovered in la Bresse <sup>i</sup>. This A. D. 1602.
- c year there were many edicts made for the public benefit, and amongst the rest one against duels, by which all disputes of honour were referred to the judgment of the constable and marshals of France, at the marble table; and those who, in contempt of this edict, attempted to do themselves justice, were declared guilty of high treason <sup>k</sup>. It was more than time, certainly, that such a law should be made, since, in one year, more than four thousand gentlemen had fallen in such quarrels. But after all it had little effect, for which the king was deservedly blamed, as having spoke with some slight of such as had refused challenges after it was made <sup>l</sup>.

- d THE duke of Savoy having made an attempt to surprize the city of Geneva, in which he was assisted by the count de Fuentes, governor of Milan, in which, however, he was disappointed, by the presence of mind and intrepidity of the inhabitants. Henry found himself obliged to take some share in the quarrel, and he acted therein with such spirit and success, that the pope was forced to interpose, to prevent the king of Spain's taking part on the other side, and exciting thereby a new war in Italy; so that a negotiation ensued, which ended in a peace <sup>m</sup>. At the opening of the year the king took the first steps in favour of settling the silk trade in his dominions; and, to his immortal honour, this was entirely due to his own judgment and penetration, his great minister Rhosny having opposed it with the utmost vehemence, by arguments worthy of that ignorance which will be always the fruit of a limited education, even of the best kind, and altogether unworthy of a true genius and an extensive capacity <sup>n</sup>. The king's love for his people in general rendered him a superior politician. He did not restrain his cares to this or that body of his subjects, but made the happiness of them all his capital study. His argument to the baron de Rhosny was, that the

<sup>f</sup> CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. P. MATTH. Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. i. p. 445.

<sup>g</sup> CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. DUPL. tom. v. Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. i. p. 441. DUPL. tom. v.

<sup>h</sup> CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. PÉREFIXE l'Histoire du Roi Henry IV. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron, tom. ii. Suite de la Chronique du Sieur DU TILLET. <sup>k</sup> CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. DUPL. tom. v. P. MATTH.

<sup>i</sup> Suite de la Chronique du Sieur DU TILLET. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron. P. DAN. <sup>m</sup> Memoires de SULLI. CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. <sup>n</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron. Sir G. CARRW's Relation of the State of France under King Henry IV.

of the malecontents were so great, that even Sulli durst not commit their names to paper; and the king, not knowing in whom to confide, did not barely think it prudent, but found it absolutely necessary to dissemble. Our statesmen were unacquainted with this secret, when they taxed Henry with irresolution and timidity, except the baron de Rhosny, and he too was accused; the king had not, perhaps, a thorough friend in his court and in his council: no wonder if, in such a situation, he was irresolute. It was on this foundation that the king founded his aversion to the house of Austria, and, as we shall see hereafter, he met with many incidents, in the course of his reign, to confirm him in that aversion (2). He found they were his irreconcilable enemies; that they pursued steadily their scheme of debauching the nobility, in order to divide his dominions; and therefore he very wisely determined to destroy that exorbitant power, in the neighbourhood of which it was impossible for any other power to be safe; but it was necessary for him to conceal this scheme as much as he possibly could, that he might acquire the means of carrying it into execution. This was the issue of Biron's conspiracy, and the turn it gave to the policy of Henry the Great; and attending to this will render what remains very intelligible.

(2) See a multitude of curious letters on this subject in Winwood's Memorials.

common people in France were idle, and therefore miserable; he thought it his duty, therefore, to introduce industry, and that particular kind of industry that was likely to reward them most effectually; for Henry was one of those few princes that desired to see all his subjects live at their ease, or, as he expressed it himself with great warmth, he wished to see the day when every peasant in France could have a capon on his spit or in his pot. Henry's honest intentions were crowned with success; and he had the satisfaction of seeing the silk manufacture, in his own time, bring more money into his kingdom, than almost all that were stiled staple commodities put together <sup>a</sup>.

His journey to Metz, alliance with Great Britain, recalls the Jesuits, promotes commerce and manufactures.

In the spring the king made a tour to Metz, of which the duke of Espernon was governor, and had put in two lieutenants, one of the citadel, and the other of the city, who miserably oppressed the people, and were equally wanting in gratitude to the duke and in duty to the king. Henry removed them both, and substituted officers of his own, which seemed to be the principal point he had in view. He was visited there by several German princes, whom he treated with great kindness and respect, omitting nothing that was requisite to gain their confidence <sup>b</sup>. It was in this journey that he received the Jesuits into his favour, and promised to procure their return into France, though that was not so easily brought about. He went from Metz to Nancy in Lorraine, to visit his sister the duchess of Bar: he had remained longer in those parts, but for the news of the death of queen Elizabeth, which affected him extremely. He was very near following her, for, in the beginning of the month of May, he was seized with a retention of urine, which reduced him to the last extremity; however, by the strength of nature, and the skill of his physicians, he happily recovered <sup>c</sup>. He sent over his great minister the baron, now marquis, de Rhosny, to negotiate with king James, which he did very effectually, since, in the space of a very few weeks, he settled a treaty, which was signed at Hampton Court on the 30th of July, for the succour of the states as well as for the reciprocal assistance of the two kings, in case either of their dominions should be attacked <sup>d</sup>. At his return Rhosny found his conduct arraigned by the count de Soissons, but the king defended him, and was extremely pleased with the issue of his negotiations <sup>e</sup>. In order to shew his attachment to the church, and even to the court, of Rome, of which, however, many doubted, he procured two great things; the first was the striking out of the article in the Protestants confession of faith, declaring the pope antichrist, which was obtained in a synod held at Gap, not without difficulty <sup>f</sup>. The other was the return of the Jesuits, warmly solicited by the pope, which the king himself had promised to the order, but which some of his ministers, and even the parliament of Paris, strongly opposed; but the king, who had a mind, not so much, perhaps, out of affection as apprehension, to be well with that powerful society, at length, but not without exerting his royal authority, brought it to bear <sup>g</sup>. This year he granted letters patent for the establishment of Canada, in which he again differed with Rhosny, who declared roundly that all settlements above the fortieth degree of latitude could be of no utility, and that all the pretended advantages insisted upon in their favour were but so many commercial chimeras <sup>h</sup>. Here again the monarch was right and the minister wrong, as we know by experience. The canal of Briare was likewise begun this year for uniting the Loire with the Seine <sup>i</sup>. It is really amazing how, in the midst of so many great and perplexing affairs, Henry could turn his thoughts to things of this nature, discern their utility, and resolve to break in upon his great scheme of saving, not for his own pleasure or conveniency, but for the common benefit of his subjects <sup>j</sup>. Upon this principle likewise the necessary assistance was given for setting on foot a manufacture of chrystal glass, and for encouraging strangers, who were to be employed in this and other works of the same kind <sup>k</sup>.

A secretary of Villeroy's betrays all the secrets of the court to the Spaniards.

CATHERINE duchess of Bar, the king's sister, died at the beginning of this year, after passing her days very uncomfortably with her husband. The king expressed great concern upon this occasion, and his Protestant subjects still more, for she remained firm to her religion, and they were sure of an advocate in her so long as she lived. The pope had just granted a dispensation to the duke her husband to live with her, tho' of a different religion; but it did not arrive till after her decease <sup>a</sup>. This was the last service performed at Rome by cardinal d'Ossat, whom most of the French historians commend as a person of wonderful talents and incorruptible integrity; the former raised him to, and the latter above his dignity. Some, however, have insinuated, that this cardinal was so thorough an ecclesiastic, that he laboured to the utmost to revive in the council of Henry the fourth the sentiments of the league, that is, he sought to appease the king with respect to the Spaniards, to render him submissive to

<sup>a</sup> Sir G. CAREW's Relation of the State of France, &c. P. MATTH. P. DAN. P. CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. Suite de la Chronique du Sieur DU TILLET. DUPL. tom. v. <sup>q</sup> Memoires de SULLI. CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. P. MATTH. <sup>r</sup> PEREFIXE Histoire du Roi Henry IV. DUPL. tom. v. Memoires de SULLI. P. DAN. tom. x. <sup>s</sup> Memoires de SULLI. CAYET. DUPL. tom. v. <sup>t</sup> Memoires de SULLI. MEZ. P. DAN. <sup>u</sup> CAYET. Memoires de SULLI. DUPL. tom. ii. <sup>w</sup> PEREFIXE Histoire du Roi Henry IV. DUPL. tom. v. P. DAN. <sup>x</sup> Memoires de SULLI. PEREFIXE. MEZ. <sup>y</sup> Memoires de SULLI. Sir G. CAREW's Relation of the State of France, &c. DUPL. tom. v. <sup>z</sup> PEREFIXE. CAYET. Sir G. CAREW's Relation, &c. <sup>a</sup> JACOB. THUAN. DUPL. tom. v. MEZERAY.

- a the court of Rome, and to lead him, by slow and imperceptible degrees, back to the old system of the house of Valois; the fundamental maxim of which was the extinction of heresy, or, in plain terms, the extirpation of the Hugonots <sup>b</sup>. But, in case these softer methods did not succeed, those of another nature were not absolutely laid aside, as appeared by the discovery made by the king's ambassador at the court of Madrid, who found that the Spanish ministers were sooner acquainted than he with the most secret resolutions of the court of France; neither was he long in the dark, as to the manner in which this was brought about. One Rasis, of the faction of the sixteen, who had taken shelter at Madrid, offered, if he might have a pardon and a reward, to let him into the secret of the whole business. This being agreed, he assured him, that one Nicholas Hote, who had the confidence of Monf. Villeroy, secretary of state, transmitted all papers of any consequence to the Spanish court, in consequence of a pension paid him of twelve hundred crowns a year. Upon this Rasis was sent home with the secretary of the embassy; but the Spanish court, having some suspicions, letters were immediately sent to the Spanish minister at the court of France to put Hote upon his guard, and they came in so good time, that he had escaped from Monf. de Villeroy at the time the king's orders came to arrest him <sup>c</sup>. However, being pursued, and hoping to ford the river Marne in the night, he was drowned <sup>d</sup>. Some <sup>e</sup> say this happened through accident, some <sup>f</sup> attribute it to despair, whereas some <sup>g</sup> believe that his guides carried him to a proper place for depositing all his secrets. However it was, common fame accused Villeroy, and, if we believe his antagonist Rhosny, this imputation was no calumny. Villeroy himself wrote an apology, which was afterwards published; but he could never extinguish the suspicion, tho' the state of the king's affairs, and possibly his inclinations, for he had gained a great ascendancy over Henry, brought him back to the council, and reinstated him in as high confidence as ever <sup>h</sup>.

- It had been found expedient, in the preceding year, for the king to procure, by some extraordinary step, such as gratifying those who had the reversion of it, the province of Poitou for the marquis de Rhosny, not so much for his own sake as the king's; and this year he was sent to take possession of that government, in order to keep the Protestants quiet, and to balance the power of the duke de la Tremouille, and some other persons of great rank, who, in conjunction with the duke of Bouillon, were desirous of rendering themselves formidable, by an appearance of great zeal in the cause of religion <sup>i</sup>. In this Monf. de Rhosny succeeded, by making the more understanding ministers sensible, that a factious disposition served only to estrange the king, and to do the work of the papists, who were continually insinuating that the principles of the reformed religion led them to cabal, whereas, in truth, they could not be good Protestants without being good subjects. Spain, in the mean time, had concluded a treaty with Great Britain, but king James took care that this should be without prejudice to the defensive league with France <sup>k</sup>. However, the Spaniards, deviating from their ordinary maxims, and perceiving that they were losers by the French trade took a very bold step, and imposed a duty of thirty per cent. on all French commodities at once. Henry was so much piqued at this, that, notwithstanding his affairs were not yet in the best posture, the public debts having been estimated at three hundred and thirty millions, he made no scruple of expressing his resentment by prohibiting all commerce with Spain, which was more than that court expected; and as a war was by no means their aim, they had recourse to their usual method of procuring the pope's interposition, and, in consequence of that, a negotiation, which ended in removing the new duty, and recalling the prohibition which that had occasioned <sup>l</sup>. In the mean time, the king's domestic affairs gave him at least as much trouble as those of his government: in that the jealousies of the papists created continual perplexities; in this he was equally disturbed by the resentments of the queen and the humours of his mistress, so that he might be truly said never to enjoy a quiet moment. As to the queen, she not only made him unhappy by fits of jealousy, starts of passion, and whole days of ill humour, but the Italians she had about her were perpetually putting new demands in her head, turning every thing to profit, and, amongst the rest, selling whatever secrets they could hear to the emissaries of Spain <sup>m</sup>. As for madame d'Entragues, now become marchioness de Verneuil, she was grown infinitely more insupportable; she treated Henry with insolence, the queen with contempt, mimicked her awkward air, her broken pronunciation, and every little foible to the king's face. Sometimes she gave broad hints that her own children were as well born as the queen's; sometimes she told the king he was grown old and suspicious; and sometimes her conscience was so troublesome, that she could not think of living any longer with him in this manner. At length Henry, quite tired out, took this arrogant woman at her word, resolved to part with her, and, to gratify the queen, purchased

<sup>b</sup> P. DAN. LE GEND.

<sup>c</sup> P. MATTH. J. THUAN. Memoires de SULLI.

<sup>d</sup> P. DAN.

<sup>e</sup> DU

TILLET. MEZ.

<sup>f</sup> DUPL. LE GEND.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires de SULLI. CHALONS.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires de

SULLI.

<sup>i</sup> DUPL. tom. v. MEZ.

<sup>k</sup> Memoires de SULLI. Suite de la Chronique du Sieur DU TILLET.

LE GEND.

<sup>l</sup> PEREFIXE. DUPL. tom. v. P. MATTH.

<sup>m</sup> Memoires de SULLI. P. D. N. tom. x.

that promise of marriage, which had been the source of much discord, by the payment of a twenty thousand crowns in ready money, and the promise of the staff of marshal of France to Monf. d'Entragues her father, who had never been in the field <sup>a</sup>.

A new conspiracy discovered.

WHILE things were in this situation, a new scene of treason was discovered, in which the mistress and her whole family were engaged. The first opening was by some intercepted letter to the count d'Auvergne, who, when pardoned for the share he had in Biron's conspiracy, voluntarily undertook to act as a spy on the court of Spain, and, under colour of carrying on a correspondence for this purpose, betrayed the secrets of the court of France. His own suspicions induced him to fly into Auvergne, where he endeavoured to avoid being seized; but his precautions failed, and, being apprehended at a review, he was sent prisoner to the Bastile, and placed in the same room where marshal Biron had been confined <sup>b</sup>. It quickly appeared that his sister had a share in his correspondencies; that, under pretence of breaking with the king, she meant to retire into England with her children, having held a correspondence there with the Spanish ambassador: upon this her father and mother were sent to prison, and she was confined to her own house <sup>c</sup>. The king seemed to be extremely irritated, and fully determined to leave the criminals to the severity of the law, and, with this view, ordered the parliament to form their process. He continued in the mean time, in the midst of these perplexities, to pursue steadily, and with unwearied application, the schemes that had been formed for discharging the debts of the crown, restoring order and justice in the provinces, and increasing that mass of wealth which he kept in reserve, in the prosecution of which purposes he had recourse to some methods that were not universally approved. The necessities of state were great; but, in raising money, a spirit of accumulating grew too much on the king and his minister.

A. D. 1604.

The criminals are condemned by the parliament, but are gently treated.

THE parliament very quickly dispatched the process of the great criminals. The count d'Auvergne threw all upon his sister, and she, in return, threw it back upon him. Old Entragues acted with great firmness and dignity, taking every thing upon himself, that the load might fall lighter elsewhere. On the 1st of February this great cause was decided, the count, Monsieur d'Entragues, and one Mr. Morgan an Englishman, who had been embarked in these affairs, were condemned to lose their heads; as for the marchioness, her sentence was, to pass the remainder of her days in a monastery <sup>d</sup>. After all this stir, none of these judgments were executed; the king commuted the punishment of the count d'Auvergne into imprisonment for life, for various reasons, but, amongst the rest, one was the delivering up the original association between himself, marshal Biron, and the marshal duke de Bouillon, which shewed the insincerity of his former discoveries: as to this last treason he peremptorily denied his having entered into any treaty with Spain, which was, nevertheless, true; and thought himself very hardly used, that he was not set at liberty to plot again <sup>e</sup>. Old Entragues was ordered to retire to his own estate, the marchioness confined to her house at Verneuil, and Morgan banished the kingdom <sup>f</sup>. These disturbances were no sooner over than they were succeeded by others: the king was now convinced, and, which was of greater consequence, had it in his power to convince the world, that the duke de Bouillon had formed designs against his government; but he was unwilling to proceed till he was secure with respect to the Protestants, who had a very high esteem for, and very close connections with, that duke: for this reason the king sent the marquis de Rhosny to their general assembly at Chatelleraud, where things were to be considered of the last importance. If we may believe that great man, a scheme had been formed for establishing a kind of commonwealth, or at least a body apart from the rest of the kingdom, by an association amongst the Protestants, which he attributes to the duke de Bouillon, Lesdiguieres, du Plessis, D'Aubigne, and some others. The body of the Protestants did not see the thing in this light; when they did they disapproved it. Those who were most sanguine protested, that, if Henry had been immortal, nothing of this kind would have entered their minds; but that their apprehensions for the future, and a just care for their posterity, had induced them to countenance this scheme: however, upon their strong places being left them for three years more, and the strong assurances given them of the king's good intentions, every thing was conducted to his satisfaction, and, amongst many, it was none of the least services that the marquis de Rhosny rendered his master <sup>f</sup>.

A new conspiracy in the provinces discovered by queen Margaret of Valois.

WHILE Henry and his council were in some doubt as to the advices they received of some intrigues in Perigord, Querci, and Guienne, queen Margaret of Valois furnished all the lights they could desire, which gave great satisfaction to the court and to the king, who bestowed upon her the greatest part of the count d'Auvergne's forfeiture, and gave her leave to reside at Paris, which she had much at heart <sup>a</sup>. These commotions, in which the Spaniards had also

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de SULLI. P. DAN.

<sup>b</sup> P. MATTH. DUPL. tom. v. MEZ.

<sup>c</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD'S

Memorials, vol. i. p. 42. Memoires de SULLI. P. DAN.

<sup>d</sup> P. MATTH. DUPL. tom. v. LE GENDRE.

<sup>e</sup> CAYET Chronologie Septenaire. PEREFIXE. P. DAN. tom. x.

<sup>f</sup> Memoires de SULLI. MEZ.

MOIRES de SULLI. PEREFIXE. LE GENDRE.

<sup>a</sup> P. MATTH. DUPLEIX. tom. v. Memoires de SULLI.

a share,

- a a share, and for promoting which they had advanced some money, cost some gentlemen their lives, and would have been more fatal, if they had not had recourse, of their own accord, to the king's clemency, to whom they applied, told him the truth, and obtained his pardon. Henry, however, thought it necessary to advance with a corps of troops and some judges into the provinces beyond the Loire, in order to reduce the places belonging to the duke of Bouillon, and to make examples of such as had entered into engagements with Spain: and he did both without trouble; for the duke having withdrawn his principal confidants out of his country of Turenne, directed the governors of all his places to surrender upon the king's summons, and, at the same time, wrote the king letters so full of duty and submission, that he scarce knew what to think of his conduct<sup>w</sup>. In his progress he passed near the town of Rochelle, who sent deputies to compliment him. They were introduced by the marquis de Rhosny, and, after presenting the keys of the place, they told his majesty, that, tho' at the head of a catholic army, his presence would be no less welcome to the inhabitants than when they had the honour to be in arms for his service; and that, if their gates were too narrow, they were ready to beat down their walls to give him entrance. The king was struck with this unexpected compliment, went thither, was extremely pleased with his reception, and left the people of Rochelle perfectly well satisfied with the testimonies he gave them of his affection<sup>x</sup>.
- b

THE care of doing justice was left, in a great measure, to the marquis de Rhosny. Two brothers, of the name of Luquise, gentlemen of good families, in Provence, lost their heads for having sold Narbonne to the Spaniards, and ten or twelve more had the same fate for offences of the like kind<sup>y</sup>. Upon the whole, it appeared that they had discovered traitors rather than the treason, for those who were guilty could tell nothing more than the particular causes which had drawn in themselves; some being persuaded that the Catholic religion was in danger; others that they were to promote the Protestant cause by taking arms; and not a few were drawn in to revenge the late marshal Biron. A galley-slave at Marseilles informed the duke of Guise, that one Mr. Mariargues, a person of rank, and who, the next year, was to be viguer, or prime magistrate, had communicated to him a design of betraying it to the Spaniards. The rank of the accuser, and the condition of the accused, rendered it very improbable. The states of Provence meeting soon after, Mariargues was deputed to carry their resolutions to the court, and being there carefully watched, it was very soon found that he had in reality a close correspondence with Zuniga the Spanish ambassador. Soon after he was arrested in his own lodgings, in close conference with Bruneau the ambassador's secretary, in whose stocking a memorial was found, containing the services expected from Mariargues, who was beheaded on the 19th of December, and his body quartered for this offence<sup>z</sup>. The same day, as the king was passing over Pont Neuf, a man slipped between the guards, caught hold of his arm, and pulled him backward on his horse, having a dagger drawn in the other hand, with which he would have dispatched him, but he was presently seized by the king's servants, and appeared to be one John de Lisle. When he came to be examined, he said he was king of the whole world, and Henry kept a part of his territories from him. Upon enquiry, he was found to have been many years mad, upon which the king ordered him to be maintained and confined<sup>a</sup>. The king, under pretence of his great age, took the seals from the chancellor, and gave them to Monf. de Sillery, not much to the satisfaction of the old man, who could not help saying, "That a chancellor without the seals was like a body without a soul<sup>b</sup>." The desire the king expressed to see his debts paid induced Rhosny to make some enquiry into the rents of the town house at Paris; but Monf. Miron, the provost of the merchants, opposing it with great vigour, the king thought fit to let the matter fall<sup>c</sup>. There were three popes this year, Clement the eighth, who died in March, cardinal de Medicis, A. D. 1605, who took the name of Leo the eleventh, who survived but twenty-five days, and cardinal Borgeſe, who assumed the name of Paul the fifth, and who was not at all disagreeable to the king<sup>d</sup>, who, from the time of his conversion, had a great deference for the court of Rome, whether out of respect or through fear has not been determined.

c

d e

f

THE king, determined to restore the peace of the kingdom, and to put an end to that Henry marches to Sedan, and reduces marshal Bouillon. spirit of independency and intrigue which was the source of his own and the nation's troubles, resolved, if his health permitted, for he was now much troubled with the gout, to march directly to Sedan, in order to convince the duke of Bouillon that he was but a subject. He judged it however, necessary, to raise the marquis de Rhosny, who he intended should command the army, in case he found it inexpedient to go in person, to a superior rank, and accordingly created him duke and peer of France, by the title of duke of Sulli, the name of

<sup>w</sup> P. MATTH. Memoires de SULLI. MEZ.

tom. v. PEREFIXE. Memoires de SULLI.

Memorials, vol. ii. p. 182. J. THUAN.

p. 182.

P. DAN.

<sup>x</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Epemon, tom. ii. DUPLEIX.

<sup>y</sup> P. MATTH. Memoires de SULLI.

<sup>z</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD's

<sup>a</sup> P. MATTH. J. THUAN. Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. ii.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires de SULLI.

<sup>d</sup> DUPLEIX.

one of his estates, in which quality he was received by the parliament at the end of February <sup>a</sup>. The king immediately after declared his intention to employ his arms against Sedan, and ordered Sulli to prepare a competent train of artillery for that enterprize. It was four years since that prince had been at court, and during this time he had contracted close engagements with several of the princes of Germany, whose intercession, he hoped, would have had some weight with the king; but Henry having rejected something of the like nature from the Swiss cantons, the duke did not find it easy to get other potentates to interpose. He wanted not, however, mediators at court; the queen and Villeroy interceded for him; and when the king, with his army of twenty-five thousand men, was advanced within a league of Sedan, the duke demanded a treaty, which was concluded on the last of April <sup>b</sup>. By this the duke consented that the king should put a garrison into Sedan for four years; and on the other hand, the king granted him an abolition of whatever he might have said or done, which was to be verified in parliament <sup>c</sup>. The treaty was no sooner concluded than the duke came to pay his respects to the king, who afterwards made his public entry into Sedan, remained there a few days, and then returned in triumph to Paris. The duke of Bouillon, soon after, followed him thither, and, to the surprize of all the world, was not only very kindly received, but entered so far into the king's good graces, that, in a month's time, the king withdrew his garrison out of Sedan, and left the duke in the very same situation in which he found him <sup>d</sup>.

He runs an imminent hazard of his life, and falls into new amours.

QUEEN Margaret instituted a suit before the parliament of Paris, against the count d'Auvergne, who was still a prisoner, as he continued during the remainder of this reign, for that county which he enjoyed in virtue of the will of queen Catherine de Medicis; but queen Margaret insisted, that, by the queen's contract of marriage with Henry the second, the lands settled upon her, upon default of issue male, were to pass to females. She had already had a suit before the parliament of Thoulouse for the county of Lauragois, and had recovered it, and the parliament of Paris did her like justice <sup>e</sup>. After she was put into possession, she conveyed it, by a deed of gift, after her own demise, to the Dauphin, and some time after, accepted a pension instead of the revenues <sup>f</sup>. In the midst of these felicities, and when the king seemed more at ease than at any time during his reign, an unlucky accident was very near putting an end to his life; for, in returning from St. Germain, where he had been to see his children, having with him in the coach the queen, the duke of Vendosme, the duke de Montpensier, and the princess of Conti, the horses, in going into the ferry-boat, fell into the water, and pulled in the coach, by which they were all in peril of their lives. The king delivered himself by swimming; the Sieur de Chasteneraye, with great difficulty, drew out the queen by the hair, and all the rest were likewise saved, for which, besides a present in jewels and an annual pension, he had soon after a company of the guards <sup>g</sup>. A new chamber was erected to enquire into the forgeries of the financiers, for that crime was excepted in the abolition granted after the former enquiry. These chambers were the dishonour of this reign and of the minister: the richest and the most guilty saved themselves by paying six hundred thousand crowns, and were permitted to tax their under officers, upon whom they raised twice as much <sup>h</sup>. The marchioness was now in as high favour as ever, and yet the king had a new mistress, to whom he gave the title of countess de Moret. His foibles in this respect were highly prejudicial to his character, and hindered him from having that absolute authority, which, otherwise, his great qualities would certainly have gained; for he who cannot command himself, will never be well obeyed.

Birth of the duke of Orleans, an inquiry into the conduct of the financiers, and other occurrences.

POPE Paul the fifth having quarrelled with the state of Venice, and proceeded, without any great cause, to an excommunication, the king sent the cardinal de Joyeuse to Rome, to accommodate matters, or, at least, to put them in a way of accommodation, in which, to the great satisfaction of the king, he succeeded. The birth of the duke of Orleans, on the 16th of April <sup>i</sup>, gave the king great satisfaction, as it fortified the succession, and contributed, as he conceived, to his ease and safety, from a persuasion that the Spaniards would be less inclined to enter into intrigues, when they saw his family daily increase. It relieved him also from some other inquietudes, and made it less necessary for him to dissemble with the princes of the blood, who were none of them much in his favour; the prince of Conti, who was the eldest, was far from being a man of great parts, and besides was almost deaf. The prince of Condé his nephew, and who, till the birth of the Dauphin, had been looked upon as the presumptive successor, was young and wild. The count de Soissons, brother to the prince of Conti, did not want understanding, but he had a kind of Spanish gravity, and was so extremely sensible of his high quality, that the king, who was quite of a different temper, had never any affection for him, though, upon some occasions, that prince had rendered him ser-

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de SULLI. <sup>f</sup> P. MATTH. DUPL. tom. v. Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. ii. p. 182.
<sup>b</sup> J. THUAN. P. DAN. tom. x. <sup>h</sup> Memoires de SULLI. P. MATTH. MEZ. LE GENDRE. <sup>i</sup> DUPL.
tom. v. <sup>k</sup> P. DAN. tom. x. <sup>l</sup> P. MATTH. MEZ. P. DAN. <sup>m</sup> DUPL. tom. v. <sup>n</sup> Mea vice °. The disputes in his councils ran sometimes very high; the keeper of the seals, Sillery, and the secretary Villeroy, were always on one side, and the duke of Sulli on the other. The latter considered the former as creatures of the court of Rome, and no great enemies to the Spaniards. On the other hand, they sometimes made the king acquainted with the murmurs of his people against the taxes, and were not always favourable to Sulli's projects for squeezing the financiers, which he did almost every year; notwithstanding which it appeared, that many of them, after having passed several of these purgations, died immensely rich, which shews, to how great a degree the poor people must have suffered, since the king was also in possession of a greater treasure than any of his predecessors <sup>p</sup>. The Protestants held this year a synod at Rockelle, where the duke de Sulli rendered the king great service; for, b though many of the Protestants thought him too little attached to their party, yet they seldom heard his apologies without being convinced; knowing, at the same time, that he was thoroughly hated by all the zealots of the popish party, and by the remains of the Spanish faction <sup>q</sup>, who were now in too great credit at court.
moires de SULLI. MEZ. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. p. 237.

In the month of July the king, by an edict, united his patrimonial estates, the principality of Bearn excepted, to the crown of France <sup>r</sup>. He had once designed to have given them to his sister, which had been opposed, as incompatible with his dignity: the death of that princefs put an end to that dispute. The affairs of the Low Countries created him great embarrassment, for the states, notwithstanding the continual supplies they had received, declared themselves in such distress, that they were no longer in a condition to carry on the war. On c the other hand, their making peace was not at all consistent with the views of Henry at that juncture; some propositions there were of the states putting themselves under the protection of this crown, which were received in such a manner, as induced the Dutch politicians to believe this was the thing aimed at. Their best patriots considered this in a very indifferent light; they remembered that, in their greatest distresses, queen Elizabeth had supplied them with men and money, and refused the offers of the sovereignty of their provinces which were made her. They considered a great part of the supplies which they received from France, as arising, in reality, from England, in consequence of the treaty which Henry had made with king James, and remembering the succours they had given this monarch in the time of the league, they thought there was something very self-interesting in these new proposals <sup>s</sup>. They d thought, therefore, in earnest of treating with the archdukes, but of treating with them as a free state; and we shall see hereafter what share the king took in this negotiation. At present he was busy in establishing two manufactures, one of tapestry, for which he drew his workmen from the Spanish Netherlands, and the other of linen, the principal artists of which came from the territories of the United Provinces. He gave high wages and good settlements to all <sup>t</sup>. Sulli acknowledges very frankly, that he was no great judge of these things; that he thought them in some measure unnecessary, and very expensive, and sent the king word so, who had directed him to examine the first fruits of his manufactures. But Henry, according to his custom, differed from him in his judgment, and, when he had considered them attentively, sent him word in his turn they were wonderfully fine, and excessively e cheap <sup>u</sup>. The king's conduct in these matters was highly applauded by foreigners <sup>v</sup>, in his own time, as well as by posterity; and it must be acknowledged to his honour, that, as no prince had ever warmer views of this kind, so scarce any hath carried them on with so great steadiness and with so much success, which was owing to his contempt of expence; for though he loved money, and was in some things very frugal, yet, in matters of this kind, his notions were perfectly just. He knew that, without the temptation of great profit, people would not leave their native countries; and that, when they had done so, they would be inclined to return, if they were not fixed by such gratifications as over-balanced those desires. The duke d'Epemon, under pretence of sickness, had procured leave to enter the court of the palace in his coach; and, when the king saw in what light this honour was considered, he f immediately granted it to the duke de Sulli <sup>x</sup>: it was before restrained only to the princes of the blood, but has been, in succeeding reigns, extended to all dukes and peers, and to the great officers of the crown.

THE great affair now upon the carpet was the negotiation in Holland, not only with regard to the powers immediately concerned, but in respect to France, England, and more remotely to all Europe. There is a natural propensity in all states, and in the historians of them, to justify their own conduct, at the expence of all the world, whence the French, the English, and the Dutch accounts of this matter, are very different. In this place it becomes us to take our accounts from the French, who say that the king and his ministers were at first averse

Henry unites his patrimony to the crown, affixes the Dutch, and encourages trade at home:

A. D. 1607:

Alcague offensive and defensive concluded with Holland.

° DUPLEIX, tom. v. Sir G. CAREW's Relation of the Court of France, &c. P. P. MATTH. MEZ. P. D. N. Sir G. CAREW's Relation, &c. <sup>q</sup> Memoires de SULLI. DUPL tom. v. <sup>r</sup> Suit de la Chronique du Sieur DU TILLET. <sup>s</sup> DUPL. tom. v. Memoires de SULLI. Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. ii. <sup>t</sup> P. MATTH. PEREFIXE. P. DAN. tom. x. <sup>u</sup> Memoires de SULLI. <sup>v</sup> Sir G. CAREW's Relation of the Court of France, &c. <sup>x</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Epemon, tom. ii.

to a peace; but finding that Barneveldt, and the patriots in Holland were bent upon it, they held it advantageous for them that it should be treated under their mediation, in conjunction with the king of Great Britain. The ministers charged with the management of this important affair on the part of France, were the president Jeanin and monsieur Buzenval, the former one of the best negotiators in France, and the latter a man of great abilities. But the states, believing it highly necessary to convince the Spaniards that they had not either tired out or disobliged their friends, were very desirous of concluding a new defensive alliance with France and England, that it might appear they had something to trust to in case the negotiation should fail, or should be ill observed on the part of Spain, in case it took effect. This affair was drawn into a great length, but, in the beginning of the year, his Britannic majesty not being yet ready, such an alliance was concluded between the crown of France and the states general, being indeed very suitable to both their interests; for, though the Spanish power was much declined, and Philip the third had not either the spirit or the application of his father, yet, so long as any of the generals or statesmen of the old court remained, the Spanish power was still formidable to its neighbours<sup>y</sup>. Henry, therefore, very wisely chose to have the dominions of the states for his barrier, and, by this act of complaisance, to attach them the more strongly to his alliance, which was so much the more necessary, as their naval power was becoming every day the more considerable, in which point (though Sulli was thoroughly informed of its importance), France was still very deficient. The schemes of the king, and the discharge of the crown debts, would not admit of such an expence.

On the 25th of April, the queen was delivered of a third son, stiled, for the present, duke of Anjou<sup>z</sup>, but who became afterwards, by the death of his brother, duke of Orleans. A little before died Henry de Bourbon, duke of Montpensier<sup>a</sup>, who, by his wife, the heiress of the rich family of Joyeuse, left only one daughter, who afterwards espoused the duke of Orleans last-mentioned. His Catholic majesty, under colour of sending an ambassador to the princes of Germany, directed Don Pedro de Toledo to pass through France, and to make some proposals to the king. These were a double match between the Dauphin and the Infanta, and a daughter of France with the prince of Spain; he likewise added a hint of a catholic league, by which the king might be enabled to compel his protestant subjects to change either their religion or their habitations. There was a party in the French council not at all averse to these projects, and it was believed the double marriage was a thing no way displeasing to the queen; but Henry, and those who had his confidence, rejected both<sup>b</sup>. The truth is, the king was never easy while he remained at Paris, having a strange apprehension, not without reason, of the Spanish contrivances, which was not a little fortified by the popular rumour of plots and conspiracies against the king's person, which went so far, that some were executed for attempting his life by magic. At length Don Pedro took his leave, and returned home, by which it plainly appeared that his business, whatever it was, lay in France and not in Germany<sup>c</sup>. The king's domestic disquiets rather increased than diminished; the marchioness de Verneuil was sometimes in as high favour as ever, which the queen bore very ill, though when she was out she bore it worse, because this produced still stronger proofs of the king's affection; who, though he could forgive the prejudice done to his crown, and the insults offered to his person, by the house of Lorraine, yet lost all patience when they interfered with his amours, and shewed such resentment as was equally irreconcilable to his natural temper and to his dignity<sup>d</sup>. This behaviour in the king was not like to produce any good effect on his court, or on his subjects; so that their manners grew more and more corrupt, and this chiefly by his example: gaming ran higher than ever; people of all ranks were dissolute beyond expression; duels were as frequent as ever, and superstition and atheism clouded the aspect of religion. This is the character the writers of this age give it<sup>e</sup>, and it is necessary it should appear in this place, because we shall speedily come to transactions that, these circumstances duly considered, will appear natural, and for which no tolerable, at least no credible, account could be given any other way.

He rejects the submissive application of the Morelcoes, on their being expelled Spain.

HENRY, as he grew old, grew suspicious, and was more apprehensive, now his affairs were in so good order, than when he was surrounded by enemies abroad, and in the midst of factions at home. He entertained doubts even of the duke of Sulli, not so much for his own times, as for those that might come after, and therefore, to bind that noble lord to him the faster, he offered him one of his natural daughters for his son, the marquis of Rhosny, with an immense fortune, two of the best governments, and the constable's sword for himself, on the death of old Montmorency, on condition however, that he and his son became Catholics. This Sulli, with great humility, refused, and as occasion offered, prevented the king from listening to the calumnies that were continually whispered to him of the Protestants; sometimes

<sup>y</sup> DUPL. tom. v. MEZ. tom. vi. P. DAN. tom. x. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Hollande, par LOUIS AUBERY MAURIER. <sup>z</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. p. 250. <sup>a</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron, tom. ii. p. 133. DUPL. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de SULLI. MEZERAY. P. DAN. <sup>c</sup> DUPL. PEREFIXE. CHALONS. <sup>d</sup> Memoires de SULLI. DUPL. tom. v. <sup>e</sup> P. MATTH. MEZ.

- a hindered him from marching forces to stifle insurrections that never happened, and sometimes enabled him, by very small courtesies, to keep the Protestants in good humour <sup>f</sup>. It was with this view that he assisted at the assembly they held this year at Gergeau, where every thing passed quietly, and to the king's satisfaction, though there wanted not some very warm hot-headed men, who were disposed to set up demands that might have created a great deal of trouble <sup>g</sup>. The truth is, this jealousy of the Protestants, however ill-founded, hindered Henry, otherwise a prince of great penetration, from giving a mortal wound to Spain, and rendering his own more flourishing than any other kingdom in Europe. About three years before the Morescoes, who were miserably oppressed, and who sighed under the apprehension of greater evils than they had yet suffered, applied to him for support, and offered
- b to raise twenty-thousand men, if he would countenance their taking arms. Upon this proposition, one captain Pannissant, a Gascon, and a Hugonot, was sent into that country to gain an exact knowledge of their force and condition. This man found them ready to accept of any terms the king would prescribe; and though, from their aversion to the priests, they were at that time very bad Christians, yet he found there would have been no difficulty in making them good Protestants, their dislike to Christianity being, in truth, no more than an abhorrence of the idolatry and superstition of the Papists. His report was not at all pleasing to Henry, or at least to his ministers; and thereupon captain Clavarie, a Gascon Catholic, was sent on the same errand, and Pannissant recalled; and from the account given by him, the king thanked the Morescoes for their offer, but absolutely declined either supporting them in
- c Spain, or giving them any settlements in his own territories when expelled. This the most impartial of the French writers <sup>h</sup> acknowledge to have been a great error in politics; and confess that, if they had been suffered to seat themselves in the marshy country about Bordeaux, a supply of six hundred thousand industrious persons had been as great an acquisition to his power, as it was a loss to the Spaniards. This was distinguished in France by the name of A. D. 1608. the hard winter, and the effects of it were very severely felt; insomuch, that the people in many provinces were disabled from paying their taxes, and, upon their applications for relief, the king himself wrote to the duke of Sully, requiring that all possible regard might be had to their distresses, not only, as he expressed it, from the tenderness he owed to his subjects, but as an act of humanity, that could not but be acceptable in the eyes of his and their creator <sup>i</sup>.
- d We find in the works of an inquisitive writer <sup>k</sup> of these times, that the net revenues of this year were computed at sixteen millions of livres.

THE opening of this year was distinguished by two marriages, which the king had very much at heart; the first was that of his natural son Cæsar, duke of Vendosme, with the daughter of the deceased duke of Mercoeur, which, though in appearance long ago settled, yet the duchess dowager laboured all in her power to prevent, and had carried things sometimes so high and so far, that the king was extremely perplexed; but at length, by the interposition of Father Cotton his confessor, and a jesuit, all things were adjusted, the marriage celebrated with great pomp, and the young couple sent soon after into the duke's government of Bretagne. The other was that of the prince of Condé with the daughter of the constable Montmorenci, an event that ought by no means to find a place here, if it had not been the source of others that cannot be omitted <sup>l</sup>. This prince's had been promised to Bassompierre, the prince of Condé was on the point of marrying the daughter of the duke of Mayenne; the king broke both these matches, and was the author of this, which was attended with so many circumstances of extraordinary favour for the young prince's, that the clear-sighted courtiers began to suspect that there was something more. This was presently carried to the ears of the queen, as it had been before obvious to the eyes of the marchioness de Verneuil; so that the king was exposed to the most violent reproaches on one side, and to the most severe railleries on the other <sup>m</sup>. It is not our purpose, and not at all our design, to report either; we are not writing the history of an amorous adventure, but pointing out to the reader the true causes of some great and terrible events. But, before we enter into these, it is necessary to resume the account we have given of the negotiations in Holland, under the mediation of this monarch, which were conducted with equal sagacity and success.

WE have before observed, that Henry had at first opposed this peace, and afterwards promoted it. He had his reasons for both. If the states had continued the war with vigour, and had conducted it according to his views, it would have corresponded perfectly with his interests; but, when he found that Barneveldt, who was the oracle of the states, and that potent party of which he was at the head, otherways inclined, he changed his measures; and, since he could not direct a war, sent his ministers to manage a peace, in which they acted with great dignity and discretion, till, finding it absolutely impracticable, they made another turn, and negotiated a truce for twelve years, which they brought to bear almost against the senti-

He brings on himself fresh uneasiness by giving way to his passions.

A truce between the Dutch and the archduk.

<sup>f</sup> Memoires de SULLY.

<sup>g</sup> DUPL. tom. v. PERRE. P. DAN.

<sup>h</sup> DUPL. tom. v. MEZ. LE GEND.

<sup>i</sup> Memoires de SULLY.

<sup>k</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii.

<sup>l</sup> DUPL. tom. v.

MEZ. P. DAN.

<sup>m</sup> Memoires de SULLY. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France.

ments of both parties <sup>a</sup>. Maurice prince of Orange, who had very quick parts, temporized as long as he thought the negotiation impracticable; but, as soon as he saw it was likely to be brought to a conclusion, he opposed it vehemently, and, in the course of that opposition, expressed himself with such vivacity, that he disoblige both the French monarch and the king of Great Britain, and this too, without being able to carry his point. After all, the truce was concluded upon terms which the archdukes were glad to accept, which were highly advantageous to the states, their sovereignty being clearly acknowledged, very honourable for the French ministers, more especially the president Jeanin, and very acceptable to the court of Great Britain, as it gave hopes of obtaining part at least of that immense debt which was due from the states <sup>b</sup>. If we may have leave to look into the secrets of princes, it should seem that Henry, who was all this time meditating an attack on the house of Austria, was at first desirous that the states should continue the war, till it was in his power to act; but finding he could not succeed in this without disclosing to them his designs, to which he was not at all disposed, he struck into the scheme, with a view to render it subservient to his own; first by persuading the Spaniards that he had no thoughts of entering into a war, and next to engage them, by the conclusion of this long truce, to disarm in the Netherlands; but in these, tho' well contrived, he did not, as we shall see hereafter, gain his ends, partly from accidents which he could not foresee, but chiefly by suffering his politics to be directed by his passions.

A Spanish
faction in the king's council gives him
great disquiet.

An earnest desire the king had to enjoy domestic tranquillity, at the same time that his manner of living rendered it almost impracticable, had drawn him, upon particular occasions, to do and suffer such things, as were by no means compatible with his understanding as a man, or with his dignity as a monarch, at the same time that they proved mere temporary expedients, and after a calm of a few days, produced storms of a much longer continuance; storms from all quarters, storms that affected his subjects as well as himself, and storms which it was not in the reach of his skill or of his power to appease <sup>c</sup>. There was a Catholic faction in his council, composed of able and of active men, who could not bear to see the Protestants enjoy the public profession of their religion, and in the person of Sulli the peculiar confidence of the king. These people had insinuated to the queen, who, like all Italians, was a bigot to her religion, that she could expect no safety to herself or to her children, but by putting herself at the head of the Catholics, engaging the king to change his system, and unite in a close alliance with Rome and Spain <sup>d</sup>. It may be the queen was the more ready to fall in with these sentiments, from the knowledge of the intrigues between the marchioness and the court of Madrid, and a desire of detaching the Catholic king from the support of that lady and her family, as well as to unite the views of that court to her own; but, whatever the motives were, the fact is certain, that the queen had her agents at the court of Spain, and that the ambassadors of the great duke seemed as well or better informed of what passed in his most Christian majesty's cabinet, than the minister who represented his person at that court, which, when it came to Henry's knowledge, and it could not be long concealed, affected him exceedingly, more especially when he saw what an influence it had upon his own subjects, and that a Jesuit, who preached before him, had the assurance, under colour of refuting the position held by many Protestants that the pope is anti-christ, to cry out, in his pulpit, "If the pope be truly anti-christ, what becomes of your abjuration and absolution? What validity in the dissolution of your marriage? What of the legality of your second espousals? Or what will be thought of the legitimacy of the Dauphin?" The double marriage was the common topic of discourse at both courts, and yet it was the farthest of any thing from the king's inclinations, who feared the friendship of Spain more than the resentment of any other power. These circumstances did not only disturb and distract him in the management of his own affairs, but likewise affected him with regard to his allies, by raising great jealousies in England and Holland, and by exciting a suspicion of a doubleness in his conduct, which very much lessened that confidence with which he had been hitherto treated by both nations, and which was absolutely necessary to the success of his own measures. Than such a suspicion nothing could be more contrary to these, as will fully appear by giving a succinct account of those designs <sup>e</sup>.

Henry's schemes for reducing the power of Austria.

At the time that Henry made the peace of Vervins, he made the strongest professions to queen Elizabeth, and to the states, of inviolable friendship, and of the deep sense he had of the assistance he had received from both. These were understood at that time as words of course; and the more pains that Henry took to impress them, the less meaning in reality there was supposed to be in them. It was to remove this coldness, and, as far as possible, to give a true idea of his system, that certain communications were made to queen Elizabeth the year

<sup>a</sup> DUPL. tom. v. MEZ. AUBERY MAURIERE Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. ii.
pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. Memoires de SULLI. WINWOOD's Memorials.

SULLI. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. P. DAN.

<sup>b</sup> Memoires de SULLI. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France. MEZ.
moires pour servir à l'Histoire de France.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires

<sup>d</sup> Memoires de

<sup>e</sup> DUPL. P. MATTH. MEZ.

<sup>f</sup> DUPL. P. MATTH. Me-

- a before her death, and in a clearer and much stronger manner to king James, who seemed to be very well satisfied with, and to have a much better opinion of, the then marquis de Rhosny's scheme than any of his ministers<sup>1</sup>. The states also, from the hints they had received, made no scruple of giving him to understand, that the truce which had been concluded under his mediation should last no longer than was consistent with his convenience. Henry was persuaded that the house of Austria meant nothing less than universal monarchy; and, if he had entertained any doubts of it before, the projects they concerted with marshal Biron, the count d' Auvergne, and marshal Bouillon, appeared to him in the light of certain evidence: he resolved therefore to return by all means the usage he had received, to lay the very foundation of this house's greatness, to emancipate the German princes, to restore the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary to their entire right of election, to circumscribe the imperial authority, while it remained in the princes of this family, to restore the electors to their freedom, and to prescribe to Spain the bounds which nature seemed to have intended<sup>2</sup>. But he knew very well that this was not to be done while France remained in that broken, weak, and embarrassed condition, exhausted in strength, her coffers empty, and her people more than ever prone to discord and disaffection. He laboured, therefore, to remove all these difficulties, and he laboured with great success; he actually discharged a great part of the crown debt, he pacified intestine disorders, he gave the strongest assurances to his Protestant subjects, he omitted nothing that might attach the honestest of the Leaguers to his service, and, with equal application and spirit, he cherished agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, that his subjects might be in a condition to exert their strength, whenever a proper occasion offered: he had accumulated treasure, and he had renewed his alliance with the Swiss<sup>3</sup>. His amours and the consequences of them had, in the mean time, exceedingly lessened his character; and the eagerness he shewed in amassing money, together with the harsh and severe disposition of Sulli, were the principal obstacles to that political influence which he laboured to attain.

- THE ministers of the popish faction made all the use they could of these, and that was not a little<sup>4</sup>. Marshal Ornano, who was much addicted to them, but withal a man of honour, and sincerely attached to the king, took the liberty of addressing himself to him about this time, and of telling him plainly his sentiments. He assured him that in Guienne the people were infinitely more discontented than under the last reign; the king upon this, talked high, but the marshal talked higher; he said that the people had reason; that then they were pillaged of thousands for a few minions, who spent what was given them as soon as they got it; but that now they were plundered of millions, without knowing which way it went. He said that the love of his subjects was the strength of a prince, and not his treasures or his armies; that he remembered the barricades of Paris, and trembled to think that what had once happened might happen again. The courtiers were astonished at the marshal's insolence; the king said that he had spoke like an honest man; that his rough zeal was preferable to servile complaisance; and that it was time his people should know to what end money raised upon them was to be employed<sup>5</sup>. A very favourable opportunity offered itself for carrying his design into action, and he resolved not to let it slip unimproved, though scarce seconded therein by any of his ministers, except the duke of Sulli, who had been the confident of all his councils, and had incurred much hatred by his endeavours to promote them<sup>6</sup>.

- THIS great event was the death of John William duke of Cleves and Juliers, without issue, by which his sisters and their representatives all pretended to the succession; besides these there were two pretenders of another kind, the elector of Saxony, who claimed the whole as devolved to him by a family compact in case the house of Cleves came to be without heirs male, and the emperor, who insisted that they were fiefs, and consequently either belonged to him, or at least ought to be sequestered into his hands, till it should be evident to whom else they belonged<sup>7</sup>. Amongst the other claimants, ten or twelve in number, there were two princes who seemed to have clearer titles than any of the rest. These were the elector of Brandenburgh and the duke of Newburgh, the one in quality of son-in-law to the eldest sister of the last duke, and the other as husband to the second sister. These two princes thought it better to enter into an amicable agreement than to run the hazard of a dispute; and, having once settled this point between themselves, they next agreed to demand the protection of Henry, more especially against the violence of the emperor, who had sent the archduke Leopold to surprize Juliers, a thing of no great difficulty, the governor of the city having been long a creature of Spain<sup>8</sup>. The king readily accepted the proposition, promised the princes all they could desire, and began instantly to put in motion all the instruments that he had been preparing in the space of so many years, for the humiliation of the house of Austria; and all the powers to whom he applied were so well disposed, the offers he made were so acceptable, and the plan of execution so admirably contrived, that history can scarce afford us an instance of a confederacy so quickly formed, and into which all the parties ran with so much alacrity and spirit <sup>a</sup>. That it was not simply the securing the succession of Cleves which induced the king to depart so suddenly from that pacific disposition, in which he had so long remained, is very little, if at all, disputed; and that he aimed at achieving this great project, as we have described it, is, by the ablest historians, held probable; but that there was still a greater, though infinitely a less practicable design, is affirmed by one who, if it really existed, had the best title to be thought the author of it, with the substance of which, as is highly requisite, the reader will be made acquainted at the bottom of page <sup>d</sup> (F). A scheme, which, how singular soever, with a speculative politician, will be found not only curious but useful. <sup>b</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Memoires de SULLI. Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials. Memoires Historiq. & Politiques, de AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAYE.

<sup>2</sup> P. MATTH. P. DAN. MEZ. <sup>3</sup> Memoires de SULLI. Sir G. CAREW's Account of the Court of France, addressed to King James. DUPLEIX. <sup>4</sup> Memoires du SULLI. <sup>5</sup> Vide auct sup. citat.

<sup>6</sup> P. MATTH. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France. DUPLEIX. <sup>7</sup> Suite de la Chronique du Sieur DU TILLET. P. MATTH. DUPLEIX. <sup>8</sup> Decade de Henry le Grand, par M. LE GRAIN.

An additional motive arises from the prince of Condé's retiring into the Low Countries.

BUT, in the midst of these negotiations and preparations, another incident fell out, which, it is likely, might quicken the king's motions, and which, thro' the noise it occasioned, many of the writers of those times make their principal source. The king's passion for the princess of Condé, which he pursued with all the vehemence and indiscretion of a young man, had very much changed the face of affairs at court; for the queen and the marchioness de Verneuil, who, in the spring of the year, were more embroiled than ever, being equally provoked, either began to hate one another less, or at least seemed to do so, and bent their endeavours to defeat the progress of the king's new amour <sup>c</sup>. The prince of Condé, whose jealousy distracted him, that he might have a pretence for withdrawing the princess from court, went into Picardy in the autumn, and left her at Breteuil, where the king going to make her a visit in disguise, and his folly, by accident, becoming publickly known, grew the common <sup>c</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de SULLI. PREFIXE. P. MATTH. de SULLI. PREFIXE.

<sup>d</sup> Suite de la Chronique du Sieur DU TIL. Memoires par P. ETOILLE. LE GRAIN. DUPLÉIX.

(F) This grand design, for so it is generally stiled, and so it seems to have been stiled by himself, was, if we may yield credit to the duke of Sulli, and if not on him, in a case of this nature, on what writer can we ever rely, was entirely the work of the king's own genius, and the object of his perpetual meditation. We are further told by the same author, that, when the king first mentioned it, he took it for a political sketch, that manifested rather the vivacity of his fancy than the solidity of his judgment; but that afterwards, when the king came to explain himself more fully, to exhibit his reasons, to answer objections, and to propound the means of accomplishing this great design, Sulli entered into it more deeply, and saw it in quite another light. After all, however, this grand design has, even with politicians, passed only for a royal Utopia, and as such we shall briefly describe it (1). The king conceived that the powers of Europe might be reduced into a kind of Christian commonwealth, by rendering them as near as possible of equal strength; and that this republic might be maintained in perpetual peace, by bringing all their differences to be decided before a senate of wise, able, and disinterested judges; and then he conceived it would be no difficult thing to overturn the Othman empire. The number of these powers was to be fifteen; viz. The papacy, the empire of Germany, France, Spain, Hungary, Great Britain, Bohemia, Lombardy, Poland, Sweden, Denmark, the republic of Venice, the states general, the Swiss cantons, and the Italian commonwealth, which was to comprehend the states of Florence, Genoa, Lucca, Modena, Parma, Mantua, and Monaco. In order to render the states equal, the empire was to be given to the duke of Bavaria, the kingdom of Naples to the pope, that of Sicily to the Venetians, Milan to the duke of Savoy, who, by this acquisition, was to become king of Lombardy; the Austrian Low Countries were to be added to the Dutch republic; Franche Compté, Alsace, and the country of Trent, were to be given to the Swiss. By this distribution, Henry reserved nothing to himself, but the glory resulting from so great an action, and the satisfaction of seeing Europe, or rather Christendom, freed, for the future, from discord and from war. It was in consequence of this alliance, if it had ever taken effect, that those prodigious armaments by sea and land, mentioned in the text, were to have been made. Statesmen of a cooler turn have conceived this in the light of an agreeable vision, contrived by the king to recommend this serious and single scheme of pulling down the house of Austria, by uniting in it princes of every rank and every part of Europe, and of all the religions which held the fundamentals of Christianity, and which he thought might be reduced to the three capital denominations. The duke of Savoy, though the greatest politician of his time, became enamoured of this beautiful phantom, and paid for it dearly upon the death of the king, when he was left to the mercy of Spain. It may, however, be safely collected from hence, that Henry adhered to his original sentiment, and despaired of either peace or safety so long as the house of Austria possessed the power of hurting him. It was this that gave him an absolute dislike of the double marriage, which appeared so desirable a thing to the queen and some of his council, whereas he intended to marry the dauphin to the heiress of Lorraine, and to have given a daughter of his to the prince of Piedmont (2). We cannot conclude this note better than by explaining what were called the ten wishes of Henry the fourth (3), which he so often mentioned, that the phrase became proverbial, whereas the project before-mentioned was hardly so much as guessed at in his own time. He said he had earnestly desired of God, 1. His grace and spiritual assistance. 2. The preservation of his sense and strength to the hour of his death. 3. To see the Protestant religion, though he had quitted it, placed on a secure basis. 4. To be separated from his first wife, and to be joined in marriage with some other, with whom he might live in peace, and educate his children himself. 5. To restore France to its antient splendor. 6. To recover from Spain either Navarre or Flanders and Artois. 7. To gain a battle in person against the king of Spain, and another against the grand signor. 8. To reduce his Protestant subjects to his obedience without recurring to force. 9. To see the dukes of Espernon, Bouillon, and Tremouille reduced to implore his clemency. 10. To be enabled to execute his great design, the only wish he concealed.

(1) In the new edition of the duke of Sulli's memoirs, what before was scattered through the whole work is collected into what is stiled the thirteenth book, according to the manner in which they are ranged in order of time. (2) Prefixe. Dupléix. P. Matthieu. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France. (3) Memoires de Sulli, liv. xxviii.

a topic of discourse at Paris. The prince returning soon after was given to understand, that, in order to put an end to these injurious reports, it was expected he should bring back the princess to court<sup>f</sup>. He seemed to listen to the arguments offered on this head, and having taken all the precautions necessary, he, under pretence of going to fetch her, took her from the place where she was, and, on the last day of November, carried her to Landrecy, in the territories of the archduke. At this the king was so much alarmed and provoked, that he instantly dispatched Monf. Prasslin, captain of his guard, with so rough a message to the archduke Albert, that he began to doubt whether he should give them protection, and had probably declined it, but that the marquis Spinola, who had the confidence of the Spanish court, determined him to change his conduct, and to send for them to Brussels<sup>g</sup>. Upon this the king sent the marquis de Cœuvres, who was a great favourite with the prince, to try if he could persuade him to return, and, if he failed in that, to carry away the princess. The scheme for this, which was given out to be by her father the constable's command in order to put her into the hands of madame d'Angoulesme, with whom she was brought up, was so well laid, that the king thought it impossible to fail; and, in the joy of his heart, most unaccountably told it to the queen, who was just risen from her lying-in of Henrietta Maria, afterwards consort to our Charles the first. The queen seemed to be very well pleased with the news, and certainly was so with the discovery, which she immediately communicated to the nuncio Ubal dini, and pressed him to send a courier immediately, with advice of it to the marquis Spinola. This courier arrived at Brussels a little before noon on the very day in the evening of which the princess was to be carried away, and the only expedient that could be found to prevent it was for the archduchess to take her immediately under her own care, and lodge her in the palace<sup>h</sup>. The king bore this disappointment with great impatience; and as his military preparations were carried on with extraordinary vigour in the midst of these transactions, it is no great wonder that, at the time, the world in general, and the populace more especially, should attribute to this amour a war, the reasons of which they did not understand, or that this should be countenanced, after the king's death, by such as were wise enough to penetrate the real motives<sup>i</sup>. In the midst of these confusions, which fixed the eyes of all Europe on the court of France, ended the present year.

THE new year discovered the grandeur of the king's project, and the means taken to carry it into execution; he had an army of forty thousand men, composed, for the most part, of old troops, and commanded by officers of great experience, exclusive of six thousand Swiss who were to join them on the frontiers, and four thousand of the noblesse, who were to attend the king to the army, which was to assemble at Chalons, about the middle of May<sup>k</sup>. The negotiations requisite for the general league were conducted with so much silence, that the first news that transpired to the public of them was their conclusion<sup>l</sup>. Monf. de Lesdiguières was chosen to treat with his old antagonist the duke of Savoy, and upon his proposing the conquest of the duchy of Milan, upon condition that France should enjoy Savoy, the duke made no difficulty of entering into the king's views<sup>m</sup>. The princes of Germany held an assembly in spite of the emperor, in which they approved the king's proposal for restoring the liberty of the empire<sup>n</sup>. In England his minister met with no less success, and the Italian princes<sup>o</sup> shewed a strong inclination to accept the offers that were made them, to concur in his design. According to some computations the forces of the allies were to have amounted to two thousand foot, and fifty thousand horse, together with a fleet of one hundred and twenty sail. It is much more certain that Sulli assured him he had more than forty millions ready for this service, and that, all the expences of his government defrayed, seven millions annually entered into his treasure of reserve. The train of artillery that was to attend the army consisted of fifty pieces of brass cannon, which, though not very extraordinary now, was what had not been seen till then. As the king was to command in person, the queen was appointed regent, and a council assigned her, besides which, there was a particular council fixed for the management of every one of the great governments in France, that, during the execution of these mighty schemes abroad, provision might be made for preventing any untoward accidents at home<sup>p</sup>. All these dispositions being made, the king, by a short letter, expressed in very strong terms, demanded of the archduke Albert a passage for his forces through his territories, in order to march into the duchy of Fuliers, in order to expel the archduke Leopold; which was granted, because it could not well be refused<sup>q</sup>. In the mean time the prince of Condé, doubting of his own safety in the Low Countries, retired first <sup>a</sup> into Germany, and from thence to Milan, where the conde Fuentes, the king's old determined enemy, under colour of doing him honour, and providing for his safety, placed a numerous guard of horse and foot about his person<sup>r</sup>; to colour which, he spread a report that 200,000 crowns were set upon his head: and, at the same time, it was whispered, by the emissaries of Spain, that for many reasons, none of which were new, the king's marriage to Mary de Medicis was absolutely null, and therefore the prince of Condé ought to be considered as the presumptive heir of the crown. A very poor device; and yet upon this the Spaniards seemed to rely; and, to the amazement of all the world, while such vast preparations were making against them, the house of Austria scarce seemed to take any precautions for its own defence.

<sup>f</sup> D'AUBIGNY, Histoire Universelle. Mercure Francois, Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials. <sup>g</sup> Memoires de SULLI. <sup>h</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, P. DAN. <sup>i</sup> PEREFIXE, Histoire de Roy Henry IV. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. Decade de Henry le Grand, par LE GRAIN. <sup>j</sup> D'AUBIGNY Histoire Universelle. P. DAN. MEZ. CHALONS. Pr. Henault. <sup>k</sup> P. MATTH. DUPL. MEZ. <sup>l</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 120. P. DAN. <sup>m</sup> Memoires de SULLI. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France. MEZ. tom. vi. LE GEND. <sup>n</sup> DUPLEIX, tom. v. Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. iii. Memoires de SULLI. <sup>o</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France. DUPLEIX. tom. v. Memoires de SULLI. <sup>p</sup> P. MATTHIEU. DUPL. tom. v. PEREFIXE, P. DAN. <sup>q</sup> Memoires de SULLI. MEZ. PIERRE DE L'ESTOILLE.

The king's apprehension from the ceremony of the queen's coronation.

As the season of action drew nearer, the king spent a great part of his time in conferences with the duke of Sulli at the arsenal, where every thing was digested that regarded this great expedition, or the settlement of the administration in the king's absence<sup>s</sup>: but with these there was intermixed another affair that gave the king infinite concern, and disturbed him more than all the mighty projects that were now upon the carpet. This was the earnest desire the queen had to be solemnly crowned. Whence this desire arose cannot, with any certainty, be determined; but that she used many plausible pretences to support it cannot be denied. She was a princess not easily dissuaded from any thing she had once resolved upon, and the king was not of a disposition to refuse her any thing, though it was ever so much against his own sense of things. There were besides many other persons to whom a ceremony of this kind was very displeasing, particularly queen Margaret, who could not refuse to assist thereat, without injuring the queen's character, or be present without debasing her own<sup>t</sup>. The count de Soissons had his discontents, which affected him to such a degree, that he retired from court. However, nothing came up to the king's disquiet, more especially after he had given his orders in consequence of the queen's importunity, when the day was fixed. If we may credit the duke of Sulli, the king was more distressed and disordered with the thoughts of this coronation, than with any thing that had happened to him through his whole life. He went so far as to presage he should not survive it, that he should never live to get out of Paris, where he thought himself less safe than at the head of his army, and yet he could not bring himself to countermand the orders he had given, or to resolve not to take a share in that idle pomp, of which he had such a dread<sup>u</sup>. It was supposed that this arose from the rumours that were spread of conspiracies formed against his person<sup>v</sup>, of which, as there had been many, there was the greater probability; and, as a great historian says<sup>x</sup>, they had at this time advices from more than twenty places, that such a one was then in agitation. As to these rumours, and a variety of prognostics, many of which, very possibly, were invented after the tragedy of the king's death, we shall say nothing, since they make a great part of a voluminous work<sup>y</sup>. But, with respect to the king's apprehensions and the public rumours, they are facts that cannot be denied, and therefore it was necessary to mention them, though they are matters for which we can give no rational account. As to what the duke of Sulli tells us, and which seems yet more unaccountable, that the king expressly told him he had been forewarned that he should be killed in some public ceremony in a coach, and that it was this circumstance that made him so much abhor the thoughts of this cursed coronation, it is in some measure explained by Sulli's answer, that he from thence collected the reason of his majesty's starting and being so much alarmed even at the slightest jolting in a coach, though he had the greatest steadiness and presence of mind in the midst of the most imminent dangers<sup>z</sup>. This shews that the prediction, whatever it was, did not regard any ceremony, but was barely confined to a coach, and the king had applied it twice before, once to a great risk he ran in going to visit the duchess of Beaufort, and next to his narrow escape from drowning, when his coach fell with him into the river at Neuilly. It was therefore his dislike to the coronation that dictated this new prediction, and associated the ideas of his peril in assisting at this ceremony with the apprehensions he had been accustomed to have in a coach; and yet this was not exactly fulfilled; for, though he was slain in a coach, yet not in the procession, or in any thing that regarded the coronation. His fears therefore, were confused, and served only to trouble his mind, and suggested nothing towards his preservation.

This solemnity is celebrated with prodigious magnificence.

ON the twelfth of May, through the extreme importunity of the queen, notwithstanding the duke de Sulli had once prevailed to have the preparations countermanded, solemn proclamation was made that the next day, which was Thursday, the queen would be publicly

<sup>r</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 149. Memoires de Marechal de Bassompierre, tom. i. Memoires du Cardinal Bentivoglio. Histoire de Louis XIII. par LE VASSOR, tom. i. p. 19—21. <sup>s</sup> Memoires de SULLI. <sup>t</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. Memoires de SULLI. DUPL. P. DAN. <sup>u</sup> Memoires de SULLI. <sup>v</sup> P. MATTH. <sup>x</sup> MEZ. tom. vi. <sup>y</sup> P. MATTH. Histoire de la Mort déplorable de Henry IV. <sup>z</sup> Memoires de SULLI.

crowned

a crowned at St. Denis: the ceremony was accordingly performed by cardinal Joyeuse, with all possible order and magnificence; the queen appearing extremely gay and well pleased<sup>a</sup>. The Sunday following was fixed for her public entry into Paris, for which vast preparations were made, many triumphal arches erected, and all those circumstances of parade which Henry the fourteenth, the king was observed to pray longer than usual. When he came out of his closet, he sent to the duke of Sully, to desire he would come and speak with him in the garden of the Thuilleries; but being informed that the duke was ill, and that the person he sent had found him in the bath, he sent him another message to come to him the next morning, but in his night-gown and cap, that he might not catch cold<sup>c</sup>. He conferred in the morning with b Villeroy, Nerestan, and d'Escoures, who had been sent to reconnoitre the passages into the duchy of Juliers, and who assured him they were much better than they had been represented, which intelligence the king seemed to receive with great satisfaction<sup>d</sup>. He went next to hear mass at the Feuillans, followed by Ravilliac, who confessed his intention to have stabbed him there, but said the duke of Vendosme hindered him. After dinner, the king conversed some time with the president Jeanin, and Monf. Arnaud, intendant of the finances, about the reformatations he intended to make after the war was over, the reduction of the officers employed in the revenue, and the suppressing such taxes as were most burthensome to the people. After they left him he grew extremely uneasy, went to a window, and leaning his head upon his arm, was heard to say softly, "My God, what is this within me, that will not suffer me to be quiet<sup>e</sup>?" About four o'clock he ordered his coach, in which having seated himself, he placed the duke of Espernon next him on the right hand; at the boot on that side set Messieurs de Ravardin and Roquelaure; opposite to them sat the duke of Monthazon and the marquis de la Force; Monf. de Liencourt and the marquis de Mirebeau sat forwards. The coachman asking where he was to go, the king answered, "Drive me from hence." Ravilliac followed the coach, intending to have struck him between the two gates, but was hindered by finding the duke of Espernon where the king used to sit<sup>f</sup>.

When the coach was without the court of the king's palace, the king cried, "Drive to the Extraordi-
"cross of Tiroy:" when he came thither, he said, "To St. Innocent's church-yard." Turning nary circuminto the Rue de la Ferroniere, which was then a very narrow street, by reason of the shops built stances pred against the wall of St. Innocent's church yard, there was a stop occasioned by two carts, one ceding the loaded with wine, the other with hay<sup>g</sup>. The king had before sent away his guards, and or- king's death, dered the coach to be opened, that he might see the preparations for the queen's entry, in- who is stabbed tending afterwards to have driven to the arsenal to discourse with the duke of Sully on the in his own intelligence he had received from d'Escoures. The pages who followed the coach went coach.
round by the church yard, except two, one who went before to get the way clear, and the other stopped behind to garter up his stocking; Ravilliac took this opportunity, mounted on the wheel, and, with a long knife, which cut with both sides, struck the king over the duke of Espernon's shoulder, while that monarch listened to a letter the duke was reading<sup>h</sup>, or, as others<sup>i</sup> say, was whispering something to the marquis de Lavardin. The king, as most e writers affirm, said, "I am wounded;" upon which the assassin struck him again with greater force, so that the knife, penetrating into his chest, divided the vena cava, and immediately deprived him of life<sup>k</sup>. Some<sup>l</sup> say, that he made a third stroke, and that one of the lords caught it upon his arm; but this is liable to great doubt. They were, on the contrary, so little acquainted how the thing was done, that they did not so much as see the murderer; so that, if he had thrown the knife under the coach, he might have passed on: but he stood on the wheel like a statue, with the knife bloody in his hand; till a gentleman who followed the coach came up, seized him, and was going to put him to death; but the duke of Espernon prevented him, crying out, "Save him on your life<sup>m</sup>." He then directed that the coach windows should be drawn up, and the coachman to drive back to the Louvre, giving out that f the king was wounded, but not dangerously<sup>n</sup> (G).

As

<sup>a</sup> DUPLEIX, tom. v. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. p. 304.
SULLY. PIERRE D'ESTOILLE, tom. ii. p. 302.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires de SULLY. MEZERAY, P. DAN.

<sup>d</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. p. 305, & seq. P. DAN.

<sup>e</sup> Memorials, vol. iii. p. 158. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron. MEZ.

<sup>f</sup> Winwood's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 158. DUPLEIX. P. DANIEL.

<sup>g</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron, tom. ii. P. MATTH.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires de

<sup>i</sup> P. MATTH. DUPL.

<sup>j</sup> P. MATTH. DUPLEIX. LE GEND.

<sup>k</sup> Sir R. WINWOOD'S

<sup>l</sup> P. MATTH.

<sup>m</sup> Sir

<sup>n</sup> PREFIXE. MEZERAY.

<sup>o</sup> P. DANIEL.

(G) Henry was of a middle stature, rather tall than short, his eyes lively, his nose aquiline, his complexion ruddy, his hair brown in his youth, but began to turn grey at thirty-three. He had an excellent constitution, and, notwithstanding his free manner of living, enjoyed a good state of health, except that he was attacked sometimes by the gout. He was very gallant, and an exceeding good officer. He was naturally familiar, but, when it was necessary, could put on a very majestic air. Upon great occasions he shewed that he understood

What follows
upon this occasion.

As soon as the coach came to the palace, the king was carried into his cabinet, and laid a upon a bed, where, if we may believe Mezeray, he was quickly left by the great <sup>o</sup>; so that those who had a mind to see him met with no interruption, only Monf. le Grand Bassompierre and the duke of Guise, instead of going to pay their court, went to weep over their dead master <sup>p</sup>, the duke of Guise embracing him passionately. When his body was opened, it appeared that he had two wounds, one slight and the other mortal; but there is some doubt which was the first or the second. All the surgeons and physicians, and there were upwards of twenty present, gave it as their opinion, from the soundness of the vital parts, that the king might have lived many years <sup>q</sup>. His entrails were immediately sent to St. Denis, and interred without ceremony; his heart was delivered to the Jesuits, and deposited, according to his desire, in their college at la Fleche <sup>r</sup>, which he had founded; the body was embalmed, in order to be interred with the accustomed ceremonies. This melancholy scene put the dukes of Espernon and Bellegarde in mind that their old master Henry the third was yet uninterred; upon which they went to the church of St. Cornelia, at Compeigne, and having brought away the coffin from thence, caused his remains to be buried, with great honour, at St. Denis <sup>s</sup>, eight days before those of his successor, by which a prediction was verified, made, in all probability, after the fact. On the 29th of June the king's body was interred with the accustomed ceremonies at the same place <sup>t</sup>, with the highest demonstrations of sorrow amongst the people, and with the universal concern of those in foreign nations who wished well to the liberties of Europe, and the Protestant interest.

Thus ended the life of Henry, the fourth of that name, and the first of the house of Bourbon, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, the thirty-eighth of his reign over Navarre, and the twenty-first since his accession to the crown of France, to whom strangers as well as his own subjects gave the surname of great, which was certainly due to him as a monarch, tho' not as a man. What he was in his person appears from the fine equestrian statue in brass of him on the Pont Neuf at Paris, which was cast by the order of the grand dukes Ferdinand and Cosmo de Medicis, and on which all good Frenchmen still look with an eye of reverence.

<sup>o</sup> Abrege Chronologique de l'Histoire de France, tom. vi. p. 388.

<sup>p</sup> Dupl. tom. v. Memoires de

Marechal Bassompierre.

<sup>q</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. P. DAN.

<sup>r</sup> P.

MATTH.

<sup>s</sup> Dupleix, tom. v.

<sup>t</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon.

magnificence, though he did not love it. In general, his speech was frank, and his habit plain. He was naturally eloquent, wrote well, and with great ease. He rallied very agreeably, and he bore not only that but even reproofs without impatience, provided he thought they were well meant. His fortitude enabled him to overcome, and by his dexterity he often avoided, danger. He loved his subjects, and did many things for their advantage: amongst others he encouraged manufactures and commerce, countenanced by his authority the sending ships to the west, and granted letters patent for establishing an East-India company. With these great qualities he had also great failings, amongst which his passion for women was certainly the greatest. However, he did not suffer them to govern him, to recommend or discard his ministers. He was likewise too favourable in regard to duels, against which, though he made laws, yet he treated with contempt such as paid respect to them. He had a great passion for play, which had terrible consequences, as it rendered this destructive vice fashionable, which is alone sufficient to throw a kingdom into confusion. He also loved money, but then he knew how to use it; and having observed how much his predecessors suffered from the want of it, he was desirous of avoiding their misfortunes by a contrary conduct. He had, besides these failings, a mixture of levity and vanity in his temper, but it appears from his letters, that he knew his own foibles as well as any body, and that, how ill soever he succeeded, he studied to mend them. He affected popularity, and he acquired it; he dissembled without malice; on the contrary, he pardoned so readily and so sincerely, that his bitterest enemies, at the time of his death, were become his firmest friends. By his first queen Margaret of Valois he had never any issue; by his second Mary de Medicis he left three sons, the dauphin, the duke of Orleans, who died the year after him, and John Baptist Gaston, who bore the same title. He had also three daughters, Elizabeth, who became the consort of Philip the fourth king of Spain; Christina, who espoused Victor Amadeus duke of Savoy; and Henrietta-Maria, who became queen of England by her marriage with Charles the first. We have mentioned his natural children by the duchess of Beaufort and the marchioness of Verneuil; he had also by Jaqueline de Beuil, countess of Moret, a son, Anthony de Bourbon, count of Moret, supposed to be killed in the battle of Castelnaudary, in 1632, though others say that he lived as a hermit in Anjou to the year 1693; and by Charlotte des Effarts, countess of Romarin, he had two daughters, one of which was abbess of Fontevrault, and the other of Chelles.

S E C T. XI.

The reign of Lewis the Thirteenth, surnamed the Just, from his accession to the Throne to the putting to death the marshal d'Ancre, and the banishment of the queen-mother to Blois.

- <sup>a</sup> THE first news of the king's death threw the queen into tears; but the chancellor Sillery made use of some very singular arguments to soften the violence of her grief: he told her that the king of France never died, that there were enough to weep for her and themselves too, and therefore it became her to think for herself and them too <sup>a</sup>: he added, that councils and not tears were requisite at that juncture. His advice was taken: the parliament was assembled that very evening at the convent of the Augustins, and the queen declared regent by the management and menaces of the duke of Espernon <sup>b</sup>. The duke de Sully, going from the arsenal to the Louvre, received such advices as engaged him to retire into the Bastile, to carry into it what bread he could collect, as if he intended to keep it at all events. He was, however, afterwards prevailed upon to go to court, where, in all appearance, he was so well received, that he desisted from the measures he had taken <sup>c</sup>. The very next day the king went to the parliament to hold his bed of justice, and there the tutelage and the regency were confirmed to the queen, who promised that the young king should have special regard to the advice of that illustrious body. The prince of Condé and the count de Soissons being absent, rendered these measures less difficult than they would have been. The latter arrived the very next day, and began to talk in a very high strain, but it was too late; and, tho' he wanted not either friends or parts, yet the affability and the promises of the queen put it out of his power to make any great disturbance, and he was afterwards prevailed upon to unite himself to the court, though this was upon his own terms <sup>d</sup>. On the 22d of May the edict of Nants was confirmed, and a proclamation published to quiet the Protestants. These provisions being made for the benefit of the living, they were more at leisure to consider what was due to the dead; so that on the 27th that assassin, by whose desperate hand Henry the Great had been dispatched, was put to a death as severe as such cruelty deserved (A). He declared

The queen-mother entrusted with the regency and tutelage of Lewis XIII. by the parliament.

<sup>a</sup> Mercuré François. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. P. MATTH.

<sup>b</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron, tom. ii. p. 164. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. Decade contenant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. depuis l'ann. 1610, jusqu'an. 1617, par BAPTISTE LE GRAIN, Maître de Requêtes de l'Hôtel de Marie de Medicis, fol. Paris, 1619.

<sup>c</sup> Mercuré François. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>d</sup> Histoire de la Mere & du Fils. P. MATTHIEU Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN.

(A) This infamous assassin, Francis Ravilliac, was a native of Angoulême, and, at the time of his execution, about one or two and thirty years of age. He was the son of parents who lived upon alms. His father was that sort of inferior retainer to the law, to which the vulgar give the name of a pettifogger, and his son had been bred up in the same way. He had set up a claim to an estate, but the cause went against him: this affected his mind deeply. He afterwards taught a school, and, as himself said, received charitable gifts, though but of a very small value, from the parents of those whom he taught; and yet his distress was so great, that he had much ado to live. He once proposed to enter himself amongst the Feuillans; but the superior, understanding that he pretended to visions and revelations, which he committed to writing, turned him out. He had been likewise in prison, and some say condemned for an assassination; but, upon an appeal to the parliament, the sentence, as to capital punishment, was reversed, and he was condemned only to make submission, and to testify his grief and concern (1). When he was seized for the king's murder, he was very loosely guarded, that is, all were permitted to speak with him who pleased; and it was thought very remarkable that a jesuit should say to him, "My friend, take care, whatever you do, that you don't charge honest people (2)." He was removed the next day from the house of Espéron, to the Conciergerie, which is the proper prison of the parliament of Paris. When he was first interrogated, he answered with great boldness, "That he had done it, and would do it, if it were to do again." When he was told that the king, tho' dangerously wounded, was living, and might recover, he treated it with derision; he said, that he had struck him home, and that he was sure he was dead (3). In his subsequent examinations, he owned, that he had long had an intention to kill the king, because he suffered two religions in his kingdom; and that he endeavoured to obtain an audience of him, that he might admonish him. He also said, that he understood the king's great armament to be against the pope, and that, in his opinion, to make war against the pope was to make war against God (4). He talked very idly and simply of revelations that he had had. He pretended to have spoken to, and received the sacrament from, Father Aubigne, a Jesuit, but, when confronted with him, that Father told him he was an impudent liar, and that he never saw his face till that moment. We have no distinct account of the three last examinations; but he is said to have persisted, in the most solemn asseverations, that he had no accomplices; that nobody had persuaded him to the fact; that he had but three quarters of a crown and a few halfpence in his pocket, and that, if he had missed of doing the fact as he did, he must have gone

(1) Dupleix Histoire de Louis XIII.

pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. p. 321.

(2) Matthieu. Dupleix. Mercuré François.

(4) Matth. Dupl. & al.

(3) Memoires

declared to the last that he had no accomplices; that no body had persuaded it; and that he had never acquainted any one with his intention to kill the king; which, however, from a variety of circumstances, has been doubted, though the truth of that execrable act was never yet known<sup>e</sup> (B).

As

<sup>e</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France, tom. ii. p. 321, & seq. MALINGRE Histoire de Louis XIII. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. Sir R. WINWOOD'S Memorials, vol. iii. p. 170—174.

back into his own country for want of subsistence (5). He appeared surprized at nothing so much as at the universal abhorrence of the people, which, it seems, he did not expect. They were forced to guard him strictly from his fellow prisoners, who would otherwise have murdered him. The butchers of Paris desired to have him put into their hands, affirming that they would slay him alive, and that he should still live twelve days. When he was put to the torture, he broke out into horrid execrations, and always insisted that he did the fact from his own motive, and that he could accuse nobody (6). On the day of his execution, after he had made the amende honourable before the church of Notre Dame, he was carried to the Greve; and, being brought upon a scaffold, was tied to a wooden engine in the shape of a St. Andrew's cross. The knife with which he did the murder being fastened in his right hand, it was first burnt in a slow fire; then the fleshy parts of his body, such as breasts, arms, thighs, &c. were torn with red-hot pincers, and melted lead, oil, pitch, and rosin, poured into the wounds, and through a clay funnel, into his bowels, by the navel. The people refused to pray for him; and when, last of all, according to the sentence pronounced upon him, he came to be dragged to pieces by four horses, one of those that was brought appearing to be but weak, one of the spectators offered his own, with which the criminal was much moved: he is said to have then made a confession, which was so written by the greffier Vaisin, that not so much as one word of it could ever be read (7). He was very earnest for absolution, which his confessor refused, unless he would reveal his accomplices; "Give it me conditionally," said he, "upon condition that I have told the truth," which they did. His body was so robust, that it resisted the force of the horses; and the executioner was at length obliged to cut him into quarters, which the people dragged through the streets (8). The house in which he was born was demolished, and a column of infamy erected; his father and mother were banished from Angoulesme, and ordered to quit the kingdom, upon pain of being hanged if they returned, without any form of process; his brothers, sisters, uncles, and other relations, were commanded to lay aside the name of Ravilliac, and to assume some other, on the like pain (9). Such was the fate of this execrable monster, who, according to his own account, suffered himself to be impelled to such a fact, by the seditious sermons and books of the Jesuits, whom Henry, rather out of fear than love, had recalled and caressed, and to whom he had bequeathed his heart.

(B) It is certain that, in those days, the world did not credit the dying words of Ravilliac, or so much of his process as was published. An eminent prelate, who wrote the life of Henry the fourth (10), speaking of Ravilliac, says, "If it be demanded who were the demons and furies who inspired him with so damnable a thought, and who pushed him on to so iniquitous a resolution, history answers, that she knows nothing, and that it is a thing so important, that it is by no means allowable to impose suspicions and conjectures

"on the world, as if they were certain truths. The very judges themselves, who interrogated him, durst not open their mouths, or explain their sentiments otherwise than by heaving up their shoulders." Another eminent historian (11) says, that there were in those days two different opinions concerning this assassination, the one that it was conducted by some grandees, who sacrificed that monarch to their old resentments; the other that it was done by the emissaries of the Spaniards. In proof of this he mentioned what many other writers have asserted, that letters from Brussels, Antwerp, Mechlin, and other places, were received before the 15th of May, with a report of the king's death. There has been a third opinion (12), that a very deep design was laid, which fell not very short of another St. Bartholomew, but when the first step, which was the death of the king, had taken place, it was not thought necessary to push it any farther, and it might be that which astonished Ravilliac: the universal abhorrence of the people might also astonish them, and incline them rather to turn what was done to the best accounts they could, than to risk the discovery of that and their own safety, by pushing things farther. We must also observe, that though nothing occurs in the examinations of Ravilliac that were first published, in reference to his journeys to Naples, and other places, yet as these are set down as certain truths by good authors, so there are probable grounds to believe that they were not fictitious (13). There is one circumstance preserved in a very curious and authentic work, published in our own language, which is not to be found in any French writer, which is, that Ravilliac had been not long before at Brussels (14). Amongst other circumstances that created a very great doubt, whether the assassin spoke truth, were the things found in his pocket at the time he was seized, amongst which was a chaplet, the figure of a heart made in cotton, in the centre of which he said there was a bit of the true cross, but when cut there was none, which he affirmed was given him by a canon at Angoulesme, a piece of paper with the arms of France painted upon it, another full of characters, and a third containing verses for the meditation of a criminal going to execution (15). Soon after he was put to death, a boy of thirteen years of age, who lived with a weaver, declared, that, if he had Ravilliac's knife and his papers, he would do as much for the young king as that regicide had done for the old one. For speaking these words he was condemned to be hanged by the provost of Paris, but whether he was executed or not does not appear (16). But the case of the provost of Pluviers, or Petiviers, in Beauce, about six miles from Paris, was much more extraordinary; he had said openly on the day that Henry the fourth was murdered, "This day the king is either slain or dangerously wounded;" for which, after the king's death was known, he was seized and sent prisoner to Paris; but, before he was examined, he was found hanged in the strings drawn out of his drawers. His body was, notwithstanding, hung up by the heels on the common gibbet, on the 19th of June (17). What increased the suspicions grounded on this man's end, was his having two

(5) Interrogatoire de Ravilliac, Mercure Francois, Le Grain, Dupleix, Malingre.

(6) Dupleix Histoire de Louis XIII. P. d'Esfoille Journal de Henry IV.

(7) Mercure Francois, Journal d'Esfoille, Matthieu Hist.

(8) Arret contre Ravilliac, Dupleix, Histoire de Louis XIII. Malingre.

(9) Memoires de la Regence, Dupleix, P. Matthieu, Le Grain.

(10) Nic. Rigalt, ann. 1610, tom. vi. p. 492.

(11) Note marked XVII. to the new Edition of the Memoires of Sulli, tom. vii. p. 393.

(12) Dupleix Histoire de Louis XIII.

(13) Mercure Francois, ann. 1610, fol. 193.

(6) Dupleix Histoire de Louis XIII.

(7) Mercure Francois, Journal d'Esfoille, Matthieu Hist.

(8) Arret contre Ravilliac, Dupleix, Histoire de Louis XIII. Malingre.

(9) Memoires de la Regence, Dupleix, P. Matthieu, Le Grain.

(10) Nic. Rigalt, ann. 1610, tom. vi. p. 492.

(11) Note marked XVII. to the new Edition of the Memoires of Sulli, tom. vii. p. 393.

(12) Dupleix Histoire de Louis XIII.

(13) Mercure Francois, ann. 1610, fol. 193.

(14) Mercure Francois, ann. 1610, fol. 193.

(15) Mercure Francois, ann. 1610, fol. 193.

(16) Mercure Francois, ann. 1610, fol. 193.

(17) Mercure Francois, ann. 1610, fol. 193.

- a As soon as the news arrived at Milan of the death of the king, the conde Fuentes left no method untried to induce the prince of Condé to think of turning it to his own advantage; but he resisted all temptations with great firmness, and resolved to return into France, as he did. He arrived at Paris on the 1st of July, and had a long conference with the duke of Sully before he went to court, and was far from being pleased with the measures that had been taken: but, for a person of his rank, his circumstances were narrow, and this induced him the more readily to accept the offers that were made him of a convenient palace, a large sum of money, a pension, and the first government worth his acceptance<sup>f</sup>. A council of regency was established, which was very numerous, and composed of all who could pretend any reasonable title to enter it; but there was a cabinet council composed of a very small number, in whom the queen, or Conchini, in whom she trusted every thing, could confide. A body of twelve thousand men, under the command of marshal de la Chatre, was sent to the assistance of the German princes, to whom the city of Juliers surrendered on the second of September. As for the duke of Savoy, he was left to make his peace with Spain as well as he could, and he was forced to send his son prince Philibert to demand pardon of his catholic majesty, a circumstance less dishonourable to him than to the court of France<sup>g</sup>. On the 17th of October the young king was solemnly crowned at Rheims by the cardinal Joyeuse. The face of the court was, by this time, intirely changed, the faithful servants of the late king being coldly received, and the partizans of Spain having the ear of the queen-regent. The direction of public affairs, honours, governments, survivances, pensions, and immense sums of money, were distributed amongst those who were most likely to create trouble<sup>h</sup>. As to the duke of Espernon, who was above every thing of this kind, he had an apartment given him in the Louvre, that the queen might have it always in her power to ask his advice, and the secretaries of state reported to him the contents of the dispatches they received. Amongst the solemn embassies that were sent to condole with the queen, and to congratulate the young king, the public was best pleased with the arrival of the lord Wootton from England<sup>i</sup>, and testified the greatest dislike of the duke de Feria, who came with a like commission from Spain, because he was the son of that duke de Feria who had commanded the Spanish garrison in Paris, during the time of the league<sup>k</sup>. A. D. 1610.
- d quiet, and no less disturbance to the state; but, in the midst of these misunderstandings amongst themselves, they could agree well enough in pushing a very bad measure, when they apprehended it to be for their common benefit. The duke de Sully had tried every method possible to give the queen a right idea of the state of her affairs, and to prevail upon her to govern with moderation and steadiness. His advices were sometimes extremely well received, and at others but coldly. His differences with the princes, with many great lords, and the principal favourites, openly in council, his opposing warmly the dissipation of the money with which he had been intrusted, and the counsels he gave the queen not to put herself into the hands of any party, raised a very strong one against himself<sup>l</sup>. The chancellor, the secretary Villeroy, and the president Jeanin, who had never been his friends, now placed themselves at the head of his enemies, and his known aversion to that dissipation, which was become the sons Jesuits, and his being a dependent on the family of Monsieur d'Entragues. But after all, perhaps a better account will scarce be found, than occurs in a late writer of our own, to whom the world is much obliged for his judicious and laborious collection; his words are these (18), "I shall insert a remark which I transcribed from the original memorandums, occasionally noted down by Robert Sidney, the second earl of Leicester, who was ambassador in France from the year 1636 to 1641. Monsieur de Bouillon, says he, at Paris, in 1636, and I, discoursing of many things of the king, Henry IV. and his death, I said, I thought that blow came out of Spain. He said he believed the Spaniards had no more hand in it than you or I. That came some other way; insinuating, as I imagined, the queen-mother, with the help of le petit collet, that "is, the Jesuits. And I know something of this, for the president Jeanin and I were the two appointed to examine the villain Ravilliac, and to take orders for all things in that business, but he would confess nothing; only we observed this, which was very true, that though he was sol, that is, in a manner mad in all things else, yet, in defence of what he had done, he used all the subtle arguments that any doctor amongst the Jesuits could allege, and would never be put out from the opinion that the king was a heretic in his heart, and so out of the church, and therefore might lawfully, and ought to be, killed. It seems, said Bouillon, he had been taught his lesson well." It seems, however, that he had been taught another lesson, how to keep a secret, still better.

<sup>f</sup> Memoires de la Regence de Marie de Medicis, MALINGRE. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>g</sup> Histoire de la Mere & du Fils, P. MATTHIEU Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. <sup>h</sup> WINWOOD'S Memorials, vol. iii. p. 227. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. MALINGRE. <sup>i</sup> Negotiations of Sir Thomas Edmondes, by Dr. BIRCH, p. 325. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. <sup>k</sup> P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. Mercure Francois. Journal de l'ESTOILE. <sup>l</sup> Mercure Francois. Journal de l'ESTOILE. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII.

(18) Dr. Birch's Negotiations of Sir Thomas Edmondes, p. 312. See also the Letter from Mr. Colvert to Mr. Trumbull, in Winwood's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 181.

ruling maxim, left him no resources: he made the best terms he could; and, having surrendered his important employments of sur-intendant of the finances, and captain of the Basilie, he, in the month of February, retired to his own house of Sulli<sup>m</sup>. Upon this the treasury was put into commission, though, in effect, this department fell into the hands of the president Jeanin, with the title of comptroller-general. The duke de Bouillon, not satisfied with the disgrace, aimed at the destruction of Sulli; and, with this view, persuaded the queen to permit the Protestants to hold an assembly at Chastellerault, where he undertook to engage them to abandon the duke of Sulli<sup>n</sup>. Afterwards, pretending that this place was within the government of that duke, he got the assembly transferred to Saumur, where, notwithstanding all his intrigues, he failed in the very first instance; for, instead of being chosen, as he expected, president of that assembly, this honour was conferred on Monsieur du Plessis Mornay; nor was he more fortunate in the rest of his proceedings, since the assembly first exhorted the duke de Sulli not to resign either his government of Poitou, or his post of master of the ordnance, and next, by a solemn act, recommended the duke to the queen's favour, as an able minister, and faithful servant to the crown: the only remarkable event it produced was continuing to them their places of surety for five years<sup>o</sup>; for, though the queen-mother and her favourites hated, yet they feared them exceedingly<sup>p</sup>.

Attempts to discover the authors of the late king's murder.

WHILE the court was intirely taken up with private intrigues, and the greatest man in France was no Frenchman but an Italian, Conchini, now styled marquis d'Ancre, from an estate of that name which he had bought soon after the king's death, there wanted not some affairs of an unpleasant nature, that disturbed that air of gaiety which was very improperly affected by the great at this time. These were the proceedings in parliament upon discoveries said to be made of the true authors of the late king's murder, which, however, turned upon the discoverer; and those who had been charged being either free from fault, or too great to be declared guilty, were dismissed without punishment<sup>q</sup> (C). On the third of October died the duke

<sup>m</sup> Memoires de SULLI. Memoires de la Regence. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>n</sup> Memoires de Henry Duc de Rohan, Mercure Francois, DUPLEIX, Histoire de Louis XIII. Journal de l'ESTOILE, MALINGRE. <sup>o</sup> DUPLEIX. Histoire de Louis XIII. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. <sup>p</sup> Memoires de Rohan, Memoires de la Regence, Negociations of Sir Thomas Edmondes. <sup>q</sup> Memoires de SULLI, Journal de l'ESTOILE, Mercure Francois.

(C) The discoverer mentioned in the text was Jaqueline le Voyer, of the village of Orsin, between Epernon and Ablis, the wife of Isaac de Varennes, Sieur de Coman, or d'Escoman, or, as some write it, d'Escouman, a woman of a loose and infamous life, who had been often in prison, and who was then in the deepest distress, circumstances that highly discredited any evidence she could give: she framed a memoir in writing, in which she pretended to give a distinct account of the whole conspiracy, which ended in the death of Henry the fourth; and the persons upon whom she charged it were the duke d'Espernon and the marchioness de Verneuil. This memoir she presented to the king and queen, and to several other great personages, who treated her as a person out of her wits, and would not condescend so much as to hear her story. At length she addressed herself to queen Margaret, who, tho' she knew the profligate life this woman had led, yet thought the relation she gave was a thing of too great importance to be stifled; she sent, therefore, for some persons of quality, to hear this woman's story, who repeated it again punctually, and with great firmness. Upon this she was taken into custody, and, upon her examination before the parliament, several persons were taken up and confronted with her. The queen-mother, while this prosecution was going on, is said to have spoke of her as a very vile woman, who accused all the world, and who, for any thing she knew, might, in the end, accuse herself. Amongst the persons she named, and who were confronted with her, were la Villers-Hotman, the wife of the president St. Andre, and Charlotte Du Tillet her sister. On Sunday the 30th of January, the marchioness de Verneuil was examined four hours, but not taken into custody. On the 5th of March judgment in this cause was adjourned, but at the same time, such persons as had been committed were set at liberty, and, on the 30th of July, the parliament, by an arret, declared the marchioness de Verneuil and madame du Tillet, Gaudin, who was valet de chambre to Monsieur d'Entragues, the father of the marchioness, and Savage, innocent, and condemned Jaqueline d'Escoman to be immured between four walls; and the proceedings to be suppressed. A writer of those times, however, mentions several circumstances to prove that this was a false and wicked accusation; and particularly insists on this, that the discoverer was a prisoner in the Conciergerie, when Ravilliac was brought in there, which put her upon this invention; and that all who were confronted with her convicted her of many falsehoods; and that, amongst the rest, she gave a very bad description of Ravilliac (1); which, however, is not very reconcilable to what he had before said of her being in the same prison with him, where, it is certain, he was but indifferently guarded. But it happens unfortunately for those, who would represent the whole of this discovery as a calumny, that the duke de Sulli treats it in another light, from circumstances consistent with his own knowledge; he says that, some time before the death of Henry the fourth, Monsr. Schomberg being at his house, a page delivered him secretly a billet, which he shewed him, from Mrs. de Gournai, desiring to see him immediately, upon an affair of importance. He went to her; returned in half an hour, and reported, that a woman, who was this very Mrs. d'Escoman, had discovered a conspiracy against the king's life, the authors of which she charged to be the marchioness of Verneuil, and Monsieur—for whose name a blank is left, probably Monsieur d'Espernon, with some others. The king was actually informed of this by Monsieur Schomberg. The duke de Sulli adds, that Escoman continued firm in the assertion of all she had advanced as long as she lived, and even at the point of death (2). Besides this, there is an account given by one captain de la Garde, who saw Ravilliac at Naples, who told him that he brought a letter from the duke d'Espernon to the viceroy, of which the captain gave immediate notice to the French minister at Venice, so that it

(1) Mercure Francois, l'ann. 1611, p. 14.

(2) Memoires de Sulli.

- a duke de Mayenne, who had made so great a figure at the head of the league, which was looked upon as a great misfortune to France; for he had not only shewn himself extremely faithful to Henry the fourth, but under the present reign had behaved himself with equal honour and integrity, declaring openly in council, that it little became princes and great men to act intirely from motives of interest, and upon his death-bed he charged his son to remain firm in his principles of religion and loyalty, and on that condition, and not otherwise, gave him his blessing<sup>r</sup>. Soon after died the duke of Orleans, the king's brother, who was but four years and a half old; and yet this had a great effect on the situation of things at court, his younger brother Gaston, who had hitherto borne the title of Anjou, succeeding to that of Orleans, and being regarded as the presumptive heir of the crown; the queen had shewn a remarkable coldness for the deceased prince, and as remarkable a fondness for him who succeeded to his title<sup>s</sup>. The Jesuits, who were in great credit at court, were far from being in the same situation with respect either to the parliament or the people; Mariana's book had been burnt in the most infamous manner, for teaching those principles upon which Ravilliac had acted; another piece of cardinal Bellarmin was seized and suppressed, as being injurious to the power of the civil magistrate: on the other hand, Dr. Richer, a member of the Sorbonne, wrote a celebrated treatise on the subject of ecclesiastical and political power, in which he treated the exorbitant claims of the pope to a superiority over kings with great freedom, at which the clergy were extremely nettled, and, as we shall see hereafter, the court of Rome could not rest, till, many years after, they found means to force that learned person to make a submission<sup>t</sup>. At the close of the year, the Jesuits presented a petition for leave to open their college for the instruction of youth, which the parliament refused, upon the application of the university of Paris. The Jesuits, finding it was impossible to prevail any other way, subscribed and promised obedience to those statutes: but the parliament, however, could not be brought to grant their request; so that the opening their college was suspended for some years<sup>u</sup>. A. D. 1611.

At length the great change that had happened in the councils of France since the death of the king became public, by the declaring of the double marriage with the court of Spain, which had been chiefly negotiated by the pope and the duke of Florence, and, for this reason, was less acceptable to many; but the queen flattered herself, that it would give a permanent support to her power, and a stable security to her family. In order to give this measure all the lustre possible, the duke of Mayenne was sent ambassador extraordinary to Madrid, where he signed the contract of marriage with the Infanta; and, on the other hand, the duke of Pastrana came with the like pomp to Paris, to sign the contract between Philip prince of Asturias and the princess Elizabeth<sup>w</sup>. It was thought necessary to send over the duke of Bouillon to England, to pacify king James, and to propose a marriage for the princess Christina with the prince of Wales: he was also charged with other affairs of great importance, in all of which, though he succeeded but indifferently, yet he did his own business very effectually, for what he had chiefly in view was proposing a marriage between his nephew the elector Palatine and the princess Elizabeth, the king's eldest daughter, which was well re-arrived time enough in France to be communicated to the king, who saw the captain after his return, thanked him for this service, told him he had taken measures for his own security, and sent him with a commission into Germany, on his return from which he met with the news of the king's death, and upon his entry into France was attacked himself, and left for dead. Afterwards he was put into prison, he knew not for what; and when the judges were on the point of setting him at liberty for want of prosecution, an exempt of the guards came and took him out of confinement, made him a present of an order, by which he received an annuity of six hundred livres, and of a commission which fixed him in a good office in the excise; besides, though the last examinations of Ravilliac are suppressed, yet the minutes of them remain in the French king's library, and we are from thence told, that it appears he endeavoured to amuse his judges, and that on the other hand his judges were afraid to ask him how he came to be known to the duke of Effernon. It seems, however, that he positively denied his having been in Italy. We are also told that the marchioness de Ferneuil and the duke d'Effernon had several meetings, in which things fell from their mouths that sufficiently indicated a design against the king's life, which were overheard and reported to Henry the fourth, who either through insaturation or an excess of clemency, took no notice of it (3). We are never like to have this matter entirely cleared up, if the advice given by the editor of the late edition of Sulli's memoirs, that a veil ought to be drawn over this mystery of iniquity, should be taken, and he is pleased to press this very strongly in the following words; "We ought even to take this method, even if it should be true, as some people seem to be persuaded it is, that there are a few cabinets in Paris from whence new lights might be furnished. Those who have such sort of pieces in their custody are very commendable in keeping them secret, and ought to prevail upon themselves to commit them to the flames." We should have been obliged to this writer, if he had furnished us with his reasons for being of this opinion, since the want of these lights may leave the memories of innocent persons under heavy imputations, which the publication of them might remove.

<sup>r</sup> Memoires de la Regence, DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>s</sup> Journal de l'Estoile, P. MATTHIEU Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. <sup>t</sup> Journal de l'Estoile, <sup>u</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. <sup>w</sup> Memoires de la Regence, Mercure Francois, MALINGRE.

(3) Pieces Justificatives à la Suite du Journal de l'Estoile, vol. iv.

ceived, and afterwards took effect *. At home as well as abroad the double match was very far from being universally applauded; on the contrary, in the autumn, the prince of Condé and the count of Soissons left the court<sup>y</sup>, and published their reasons, which were very strong: they said that the queen communicated her counsels to them for form sake only, and not to receive or follow their opinions; that the double marriage was concluded without their advice; that her majesty listened to foreigners, who were ignorant in, and disaffected to, the true interests of France; that the treasure collected by the late king had been sacrificed to base purposes; and that governments were given to persons without merit, and almost unknown; while the ancient and faithful servants of the crown were left without recompence. All this was true; but they seemed to forget that they were, in a great measure, authors of these mischiefs themselves, and therefore had the less right to complain<sup>z</sup>. In reality, the complaint itself, though founded in truth, was a mere amusement, not at all calculated for amendment, but rather to increase the evil, by obtaining fresh favours and gratifications for themselves, as appeared from their speedy reconciliation afterwards; for the marquis d'Ancre, having hitherto governed by trimming between the ministers and the princes, but being privately united to the latter, began now to steer another course, and to flatter the princes, who, upon the hopes he gave them, returned, though not thoroughly satisfied; but the count of Soissons dying at his house of Blandi, made things easier to the favourite, who began then to incline to the prince of Condé. These were not all the troubles of that year; for the feuds amongst the Protestants were productive of new disturbances<sup>a</sup>.

Disturbances
amongst the Reformed; extraordinary
edict.

If we speak impartially, we must acknowledge, that, even amongst the Reformed, political were rather stronger than religious motives, and that the public frequently gave way to private interest. They had at their head at this juncture some of the greatest men in France, and perhaps in Europe, such as the duke of Bouillon, the duke of Tremouille, marshal de Lesdiguières, the duke of Sully, the duke of Rohan, and Monsieur du Plessis Mornay<sup>b</sup>. But they were extremely divided in their sentiments, which rendered them very troublesome to the court, and much more so to themselves. The duke of Rohan, who was a man of great fire, upon some plausible pretences, seized the town of St. John de Angeli, which some have regarded as the first act of hostility in this reign, though probably that was what the duke did not intend, and the matter was afterwards compromised. But the marshal duke de Bouillon, who now sided with the court, and gave them hopes of a marriage with England, till prince Henry died, and even then revived the proposition, with respect to his successor Charles, gave the queen and her ministers great lights into the affairs of the Reformed, and made his court at their expence, representing their assemblies at Privas and Rochelle as seditious meetings<sup>c</sup>. As for the general situation of things, and the state of the common people, though immediately after the king's death some heavy taxes were taken off, yet, by the example of the court, luxury and idleness were every-where so generally diffused, that universal poverty ensued; which produced a singular edict, forbidding all persons, upon severe penalties, to give alms in the streets, or to relieve common beggars; as if the shutting up mens bowels for the miseries of their fellow creatures, could in any degree lessen their distress. It might, indeed, oblige such unhappy creatures to leave Paris, and thereby remove from the eyes of the ministers a sight that continually reproached them with want of capacity and want of concern<sup>d</sup>.

The chevalier de Guise kills the two barons de Lux, father and son, in the space of a month.

It was very difficult, even for the wisest and most expert person embarked in the intrigues of the court, to pursue his journey long through these labyrinths of dissimulation and deceit with any tolerable safety. The baron de Lux, esteemed in that respect one of the ablest men in France, having quitted the party of the Guises, then attached to the ministers, in order to join himself to the princes, this so provoked that family, that the chevalier de Guise (to whom the people of Paris gave the name of their city, on his being baptized there, soon after the execution of his father at Blois), attacked the baron in the streets, though an old man, who shewed great unwillingness to fight, and, before he was well in a posture of defence, killed him on the spot<sup>e</sup>. The queen shewed herself very much, as indeed she was very justly, displeased; ordered the prosecution of the chevalier before the parliament, and dispersed, by her authority, the meetings that were held at the house of the duke of Guise; but the chancellor was so dilatory and timid, and the prosecution was drawn into such a length, that the queen's anger began to cool. However, a fresh accident, one would have thought, must have kindled it again: the young baron de Lux, perceiving that the high quality of his father's murderer would secure him against the stroke of justice, notwithstanding the ample promises made him

* DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. Journal de l'ESTOILE. Negociations of Sir Thomas Edmondes. y Memoires de la Regence, MALINGRE, Memoires de Rohan. z DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. MALINGRE, LE GRAIN. a Vie de du Plessis Mornay, Memoires de la Regence. b Memoires du Duc de Rohan, Vie de du Plessis Mornay, WINWOOD'S Memorials, vol. iii. c Memoires de la Regence, Memoires du Duc de Rohan, Mercure Francois. d MALINGRE, Memoires de la Regence, WINWOOD'S Memorials, vol. iii. e DUPLEIX, Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN.

- a by the queen when he went to throw himself at her feet, resolved to follow the mode of the times, and to seek justice himself. Accordingly he challenged the chevalier de Guise, and met with the same fate from his hand that his father had done<sup>f</sup>. Instead of regarding with horror a man who had killed a father and son, both highly in her favour, in the compass of a month the queen concurred in the judgment of her court, that it was a high act of generosity for a person of the chevalier de Guise's quality to fight a gentleman, and not only granted him his pardon, but made him the king's lieutenant-general in Provence; after this, to make the inconsistency complete, issued a severe edict against duels<sup>g</sup>. The chevalier de Guise did not triumph long; for, about two months after, as he was firing a cannon, it burst, and he was killed by a splinter<sup>h</sup>.
- b THE marquis d'Ancre continued still very closely united with the princes, and gave them all the assistance that was in his power to ruin the ministers; but in this he failed, for they found means to have an audience of the queen, in which they made her sensible that her favourite preferred his own interest to her's; that, by abandoning them, and resigning himself into the hands of the princes, she must necessarily have ministers of their appointing, and, in a very short time, lose all her power, and preserve only the empty title of regent<sup>i</sup>. The queen, fully convinced of this, withdrew her favour from the marquis, to whom it had been extended, not for his sake, but for his wife Galigai's, who had such an amazing influence over this princess, that the vulgar, and, in complaisance to them, as we shall see hereafter, the parliament, ascribed it to witchcraft<sup>k</sup>. In this situation the marquis found himself extremely embarrassed, and at length advised the princes to have recourse to the old expedient of quitting the court, promising to watch every opportunity to render them service in their absence. They took this advice; and the prince of Condé, the duke of Mayenne, the duke of Bouillon, and the duke of Nevers, quitted the court at the instigation of a man, with whom, ten years before, they would scarce have conversed<sup>l</sup>. This measure not taking the effect they expected, the marquis had recourse to another; treated with Mr. de Villeroy for the union of their interests, by the marriage of his daughter into Villeroy's family, in consequence of which he proposed to reconcile the ministers to the princes, of which new conjunction the duke d'Espèron and the house of Guise were to be the victims<sup>m</sup>. By this short turn he recovered his credit with the queen, and, towards the close of the year, upon the death of marshal de Fervaques, his bâton, being first offered to Monsieur de Souvre, the king's governor, for form sake, was at length bestowed, to the amazement of all France, on d'Ancre, who now thought himself too great to marry his daughter into the family of Villeroy, and therefore, without much ceremony broke that negociation<sup>n</sup>. As a proof of the luxury and spirit of dissipation that now prevailed, an edict was published to forbid the wearing of gold and silver, and a new court of justice erected for reforming the abuses in hospitals, infirmaries, and other charitable foundations, which are always most liable to misapplication in a season of general distress<sup>o</sup>. A. D. 1613.
- ON the last turn of affairs, the duke of Espèron, who understood the intrigues of a court as well as any man of his time, retired to Metz, full of discontent. But the breach between the marshal d'Ancre and Monsr. de Villeroy having again changed the face of things, the princes, without consulting the marshal d'Ancre, resolved to retire from court, to assemble in a body, and to threaten a civil war, if the queen did not comply with their terms. The pretence for taking this measure was respect to the public good, and a desire of restoring the laws to their ancient vigour. The genuine motive was the near approach of the king's majority, when actions of this kind might become less safe<sup>p</sup>. The prince of Condé retired first, after him the duke of Mayenne, then the duke of Nevers and the duke of Luxembourg, and, lastly, the duke of Bouillon, who had kept a correspondence all the while with the court, and, at his departure, promised to use his good offices in order to prevent the princes from departing from their duty. As for the duke de Vendôme, he had gone too, but that the queen caused him to be arrested<sup>q</sup>. It was not long before the princes assembled at Mezieres, from whence the prince of Condé sent the queen a manifesto, in form of a letter, in which the old griefs were dressed in a new form, and represented with all the solemnity possible. The queen, by the advice of the ministers, published an ample answer to this manifesto, in which she declared her intention to call an assembly of the states, when the king her son came of age, denied most of the facts charged in the letter, and turned the artifice of profusion, which could not be

<sup>f</sup> Memoires de la Regence, Mercure Francois, WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. iii.

moires de la Regence, DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII.

Louis XIII. MALINGRE.

morials, vol. iii.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires de la Regence, DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. MALINGRE.

Bascompiere, Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

<sup>h</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN, Mercure Francois.

WINWOOD's Memorials, vol. iii.

<sup>i</sup> MALINGRE, Me-

<sup>j</sup> Mercure Francois, DUPLEIX Histoire de

Histoire de Mere & du Fils, Memoires de la Regence, WINWOOD's Me-

Histoire de Mere & du Fils, Memoires de la Regence, WINWOOD's Me-

Histoire de Mere & du Fils, Memoires de la Regence, WINWOOD's Me-

Histoire de Mere & du Fils, Memoires de la Regence, WINWOOD's Me-

Histoire de Mere & du Fils, Memoires de la Regence, WINWOOD's Me-

Histoire de Mere & du Fils, Memoires de la Regence, WINWOOD's Me-

denied, upon themselves, on whom the greatest part of those profusions had fallen<sup>r</sup>. But a things did not go long at this rate, the queen's council being divided. The duke de Espernon, who had been recalled from Metz, the duke of Guise, and Monsieur de Villeroy, were for supporting the queen's manifesto by arms, the rather, because none of the parliaments in the kingdom, to all of whom the princes manifesto had been sent, had returned them any answer; and many of the nobility had brought their packets, sealed as they were, to the queen. But the chancellor and the marshal d'Ancre were for a negociation; the former through the natural timidity of his temper, and the latter that he might gratify the princes<sup>s</sup>. This last counsel, though certainly not the best, prevailed; and the duke de Ventadour was dispatched to enter into a treaty, which was first begun at Soissons, and afterwards concluded at St. Menehould, and the Sieur de Bouillon sent with it to the queen. By this treaty it was stipulated, that an assembly b of the states should be called, and other grievances redressed; but the principal articles were of a private nature. The prince of Condé was to have the town of Amboise, as a place of surety, and four hundred and fifty thousand livres in ready money; the duke de Mayenne three hundred thousand livres, and the sur vivance of the government of Paris; the duke de Longueville a pension of one hundred thousand livres; and the rest, in like manner, what they thought fit; and, besides all this, an approbation of their conduct from the government<sup>t</sup>.

The treaty of St. Menehould confirmed. THIS treaty was but ill relished at court. The princes had but a small force, and the queen had, by this time, assembled a considerable body of troops, and, by giving the duke of Rohan an equivalent in money, had obtained the resignation of his post of colonel general of the Swiss, which was bestowed upon Monsieur Bassompier<sup>u</sup>. The dukes of Guise, Espernon, and Bellegarde, cardinal Joyeuse, and secretary Villeroy, were for rejecting the treaty, as derogatory to the royal authority, for the support of which they professed themselves extremely zealous. The chancellor, marshal d'Ancre, and president Jeanin, who had been one of the queen's commissioners, were for peace, to which, at first, the queen herself was not inclined; though, on the first breaking out of those disturbances, she was so much alarmed at the scandals that were given out by the malcontents, that she had thoughts of going to the parliament and resigning the regency. Barbin, steward of her household, after all her ministers failed, prevailed upon her to lay aside this scheme, by remonstrating that she was about to sacrifice her ease, her reputation, and her son's safety, to gratify her enemies<sup>v</sup>. But now, having superior forces, and hearing every day the sentiments of Espernon, who in these matters was looked upon as an d oracle, she expressed a firmness suitable to her dignity. Her inclinations were, however, quickly altered; the chancellor, who saw it was the postponing the double marriage that she regretted most, suggested that this might be qualified to her satisfaction: marshal d'Ancre let her into the secret, that, though they spoke exactly the same language, the dukes of Espernon and Guise hated each other mortally; and that all their loyalty proceeded from their desire of having the constable's sword, Montmorenci being just dead; but the president Jeanin had greatest weight with her<sup>x</sup>. He observed that the princes had many secret friends; that the duke of Rohan would infallibly engage the Protestants to favour them; that the princes of Germany, the duke of Lorraine, and even his Catholic majesty, had offered them assistance; so that it was better to pacify things, till the king was of age, more especially as that was so c near<sup>y</sup>. After all, it is doubtful what turn things might have taken, if Villeroy had not altered his sentiments: he had broke of late with the chancellor, and had endeavoured to get him removed; but, finding this was not relished, he struck in again with the other party, and, in consequence of the arguments he used, the queen, after the modification of the article as to the marriage, consented to the treaty, which was signed, concluded, and published, about the middle of May<sup>z</sup>.

Troubles in Bretagne, by the endeavours of the duke of Vendosme. THE troubles of France were not yet at an end: the duke of Vendosme, who, as we have observed, had been confined to the Louvre about the middle of February, made his escape from thence, about the end of the month, and went directly into Bretagne, where he found the whole country in arms against him, the duke of Montbazon vested with the king's authority, and the parliament inclined to support it. He wanted not friends however, or, to speak with greater propriety, he found so many well affected to the house of Merceur, that he made himself master of Blavet, and began to fortify it, and, by degrees, his power increased so much, that he took no manner of notice of the treaty of St. Menehould, though expressly included in it by the princes<sup>a</sup>. It also appeared in the space of a few weeks, that the prince of Condé, though in possession of Amboise, was labouring also to seize Poitiers. The queen then, for the first time, listened to wiser counsels; and, having assembled a small army of f

<sup>r</sup> Histoire de Mere & du Fils, DUP. Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN.

DUP. Histoire de Louis XIII. Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

de Louis XIII. Memoires de la Regence.

<sup>s</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre, Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

<sup>t</sup> Histoire de Mere & du Fils, Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon, Memoires de la Regence, LE GRAIN.

<sup>u</sup> P. MATTHIEU Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>v</sup> Mercure Francois.

<sup>x</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon, Memoires de la Regence. Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

<sup>y</sup> Memoires de la Regence,

<sup>z</sup> Mercure Francois, P. MATTH. Histoire

a good troops, conducted her son first to Poitiers, and then into Bretagne, the consequence of which convinced her that the presence of the king at the head of his troops was the shortest and the safest way of appeasing commotions. The prince of Condé, who but a little before had complained of the bishop and mayor of Poitiers for their insolence in keeping that town for the king, now submitted, and demanded letters of abolition<sup>b</sup>. The duke of Vendosme he had so lately treated with contempt. The queen, having caused the fortrefs of Blavet to be demolished, returned to Paris about the middle of September, and the king, being entered into his fourteenth year, went to the parliament, and, as the first act of his majority, expected a declaration, confirming the edict of Nantes, the laws against blasphemers, and against duels<sup>c</sup>. The next day he went with great solemnity to the parliament, and, by a short speech, declared that he took upon himself the government of his dominions, and decided that the cardinals should take place of the ecclesiastical peers, upon which the latter retired. According to the late treaty the states were assembled at Sens, and from thence transferred to Paris, where they sat long and did little. The queen-mother was now much more at her ease than she had hitherto been, for, though the king did nothing but by her advice, yet all was done in his name, and by his authority<sup>d</sup>. A. D. 1614.

THE true design of the princes, in their insisting so much on the assembly of the states; was their firm persuasion that they would enter into the capital points couched in the prince of Condé's letter. But the ministers understood them better; they left them intirely free to act at their pleasure, convinced that the three corps would embarrass one another, as they actually did, and separated about the 23d of February, without performing any thing worth mentioning. One thing was thought very extraordinary; tho' they had complained loudly of the multiplicity of officers, yet the marshal d'Ancre created three treasurers of pensions, while they were sitting, and, for that favour, exacted from them a very large sum of money<sup>e</sup>. The princes then turned their eyes towards the parliament, who, having been grossly affronted by the duke of Espernon, listened the more readily to their insinuations, and gave some trouble to the ministers by their remonstrances<sup>f</sup>. The prince, as a mark of his cordiality, delivered up Anboise, which had been accorded him only to the sitting of the states. Marshal d'Ancre, who had nothing so much in view as the preservation of his own power, now raised to a degree of wonder, even against her will prevailed upon the queen to bestow this government upon a young man, who seemed to be rising in the king's favour<sup>g</sup>. This was Monsieur de Luynes, whom he endeavoured to attach to his interests by this favour, not without hopes of obliging the king at the same time (D). The parliament went on with their deliberations, notwithstanding they knew with what eye

<sup>b</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. MALINGRE. LE GRAIN. <sup>c</sup> Mercure Francois. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. <sup>d</sup> Memoires de la Regence. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>e</sup> Histoire de Mere & du Fils. Memoires de la Regence. MALINGRE. <sup>f</sup> DUPLEIX, Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>g</sup> Mercure Francois. LE GRAIN. <sup>h</sup> Memoires de la Regence. MALINGRE. Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

(D) If we may credit those who had reason to be well acquainted with the history of those times, they assure us that the king's favourite, in point of birth, was rather inferior to his mother's. His grandfather was one Mr. William Segur, who was a canon of the church of Mar-seilles; he had a housekeeper or chambermaid, whose name was Albert, by whom he had a son, to whom he gave the name of Luynes, from a little house he had between Aix and Mar-seilles (1). He had also a second son, who became a soldier, and having acquired some reputation, was known to the world by the name of captain Luynes; he acquired, in the course of his life, a small fortune, not exceeding twelve hundred livres a year, arising from a meadow called Brante, and a little island in the Rhone called Cadenet. His eldest son was page to the count de Lude, and he quickly brought his two brothers into the same family, where, by their affability and diligence, they rendered themselves respected, and were, in process of time, recommended by Monf. de la Varenne to Henry the fourth, who gave the eldest a pension of four hundred crowns, upon which, however, all the three brothers lived till they were put about the Dauphin, and then the appointments of the eldest were advanced to twelve hundred crowns. The likeness of the two names Albert and Albret, made Monf. de Luynes assume the airs of a person of high quality, and induced him to give his brothers the titles of Monf. de Cadenet and Monf. de Brante. He had so fine a person, that it was a common answer in France, when any body asked how he came to rise so soon and so high, "You never saw him;" as if the sight of him was sufficient to have justified the favour of his master. Monf. de Luynes meddled at first only with his master's pleasures; and the first marks of distinction that were shewn him arose from his presenting the king with a couple of magpies, that he had trained to strike little birds in the same manner as hawks. It was by services of this nature that he gained the good graces of Lewis, and it was by the shew he made of studying nothing beyond boyish plays, that he wrought himself into the confidence of those who otherwise would have taken immediate umbrage at his favour; but, believing that he was capable of nothing beyond what he made a shew to affect, and, not dreaming that this young falconer had a spirit to fly at higher game, they were the dupes of their own refinements, and of his dexterous artifice. This is very elegantly painted by a noble Venetian (2); but then the beauty of the colouring depends so much upon the expression, that there is

(1) Histoire de Mere & du Fils, tom. i. p. 282. Bernard Histoire de Louis XIII. liv. iv. Le Labcureux Additions aux Memoires de Castelnau, liv. vi. p. 455.
liv. iii. (2) Historia della Repubblica di Veneta, par Batt. Nani.

eye they were looked upon at court, and that the king had forbid the prince of Condé to assist a at their debates, and, in the end published an arret, which was suppressed by another of the council of state. But notwithstanding this, the reverence to the parliament by the people held the court in awe <sup>h</sup>.

The prince of Condé revolts afresh, and lays open the ill conduct of the regent.

ALL the time these disputes subsisted, the prince of Condé remained in a kind of retreat, but soon after he began to give fresh marks of discontent. He was at that time in Picardy, where marshal d'Ancre had lately taken possession of his government of Amiens, caused the mayor of the town, upon some slight dislike, to be assassinated, and ordered the provost marshal to be hanged, without any form of process; but, upon the officers of the garrison protesting that they would quit the place, if he persisted in his design, he ordered the man to be dismissed, though the rope was about his neck <sup>i</sup>. The prince of Condé, upon this, published a b manifesto, assigning the causes of his fresh discontent, at the head of which were the insolences of this marshal, the dissipation of the royal treasure, the little care taken to discover the authors of the late king's murder, the introduction of Jews, sorcerers, and magicians, the disregard of the natural allies of France, and the violation of the edicts in favour of the Hugonots, were likewise specified; and, in the conclusion, he desired that the king would postpone his marriage till the domestic affairs of his government were settled <sup>k</sup>. The king, or rather the queen his mother, persisting in her design of accomplishing the double marriage, and of marching with an army to the frontiers for that purpose, engaged the young monarch to go in person to the Bastile, in order to take out two millions and a half, which he did, and at the same time made a visit to the count d'Auvergne, to whom he promised his liberty, c tho' he did not obtain it till some years after. The princes who followed Condé were the dukes of Longueville, Mayenne and Bouillon, and many of the nobility; on the other hand, the king had about him the dukes of Guise, Elbæuf, Espernon, and Uzes; and, having provided in the best manner he was able for the security of Paris, he began his journey, or rather his march, towards the frontiers, about the middle of August, escorted by twelve hundred horse and four thousand foot <sup>l</sup>.

Civil war carried on without much effusion of blood on either side.

THE army of the crown that was to oppose the princes, while the king marched to the frontiers, was commanded by the marshal Bois Dauphin, and consisted of about twenty thousand men; notwithstanding which the discontents of the people were so strong, and the pretences of the malecontents so plausible, if they had really intended what their manifestoes contained, d that their forces increased every day, several advantages were gained over the king's army, and the dukes of Nevers and Vendosme having at length ventured to own their cause, and the duke of Bouillon having procured a reinforcement of German horse, the prince of Condé resolved to pass the Loire, in order to join the protestant army, commanded by the duke of Rohan <sup>m</sup>. In the heat of the civil war, the exchange of the two princesses was made in the island of Pheasants; and the king, with his bride, having made their solemn entry into the city of Bordeaux, received the nuptial benediction in that city, on the 27th of November. The remainder of the year was spent on one side in the conclusion of a treaty between the princes and the Protestants, notwithstanding the king had declared the former rebels, and specified the acts which he stiled high treason <sup>n</sup>. On the other hand, the king prosecuted his e march from Bordeaux, escorted by a small force, commanded by the duke of Guise, which was so much the smaller, as all the Protestant Swiss had quitted the king's service, and retired home; which conduct of theirs is highly exclaimed against by some historians, tho' it was clearly consistent with their capitulation, since they did not retire till after the Protestants in France had taken a part in the war; and consequently, if they had acted at all, they must have acted against their brethren of the same religion. At the entrance of these troubles died queen Margaret of Valois, who, during this reign, had lived upon extreme good terms with the court <sup>o</sup> (E), and never took any share in the factions or intrigues of state.

It

<sup>h</sup> MALINGRE. Mercure Francois. DUPLEIX, Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>i</sup> Mercure Francois. Memoires de la Regence. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>k</sup> MALING. Memoires de la Regence. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>l</sup> Memoires de la Regence. MALINGRE. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. <sup>m</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. DUPLEIX, Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>n</sup> Mercure Francois. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. <sup>o</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN.

no translating it: Prevaleva, il Signor de Luines, gentil-huomo d'Avignon, di non alti natali, appunto introdotto appresso il re, accioche con le caccie, non gli uccelli, e con altri minuti piaceri lo trattenessse. Ma egli con questi l'iretti, in modo tale, che face presto tutto il regno sua preda. Fortune was no less fond of him than she had been of Conchini, raised him much sooner and much higher, and, when she could soar with him no farther, killed him at a very critical conjuncture, as if she had studied to prevent his fall.

(E) We have spoken so often and so largely of this princess, considered in her public character, that here we are to confine ourselves to her private life. In her person the historians of those times are unanimous, that her rank as the daughter, the sister, and the wife of a king, did not raise her higher above the rest of her sex than her

- a It has seldom happened that a prince so young, having his kingdom so embroiled, should be able to put an end to such domestic troubles without injury to the royal authority, and therefore we ought to be the less surprized at the issue of this war, which was, indeed, no other than what might well be expected. There were some about their majesties who pressed them to prosecute the war with vigour, and, once for all, establish the royal authority on the ruin of whatever opposed it<sup>p</sup>. But others represented that the ruin of the whole or of any part of France could never be advantageous to the king; that the issue of war was always uncertain; that the Protestants would have recourse to foreign assistance; that a conquest would elevate the power of certain persons to a dangerous height: and that, after all, a pacification, even upon indifferent terms, was better than a long and ruinous war. On the other hand, the prince of Condé, the duke of Bouillon, and some others, as the French writers say, were desirous of peace, for the sake of private advantages; but the dukes of Rohan, Sully, and Tremouille, latter acted with wisdom and spirit: they told the prince of Condé, that, having gone so far, he could never trust the court any more; that, having drawn his sword against his master, there was no sheathing it, but by procuring such terms as left him nothing to fear, and living for the future in his government, where, being surrounded by the Protestants, it would be no easy matter to force him<sup>q</sup>. But, perceiving that he was inclined to a negotiation, they insisted upon prescribing such terms as might conduce to a solid peace.
- b Some on the court side, and the Protestants on the other, are averse to peace.
- c In the beginning of the year the king came to his army, as if he meant to signalize his first campaign by a battle, and yet, soon after, consented that some overtures of accommodation should be made by the interposition of Sir Thomas Edmonds, the British minister. Upon this occasion a meeting of the princes was necessary, and a very deep scheme was laid for surprizing them when together, the execution of which was committed to the duke of Guise; and, because it failed, it is supposed that he gave them notice, in which, if he did, he shewed more honour than those who, under colour of a treaty, would have done what they despaired of doing by open war. At length London was fixed for the place of treaty, and a suspension of arms agreed upon<sup>r</sup>. The duke of Vendosme, who had affected a kind of neutrality, and had obtained some supplies of money from the court, upon professions of service, took no notice of the suspension, upon which the king sent a body of forces to attack him, which forced him to throw off the mask, and to declare on the side of the princes, that he might enjoy their protection. It
- d A treaty concluded at London.

<sup>p</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espèron. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. Histoire de Mere & du Fils.
<sup>q</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. MALINGRE. LE GRAIN. <sup>r</sup> Mercure Francois. Memoires de la Regence.
 Histoire de Mere & du Fils. WINWOOD'S Memorials, vol. iii. Negotiations of Sir Thomas Edmonds.

her beauty, or that than her accomplishments. The vivacity of her wit, the sweetness of her voice, the affability of her manners, the facility of her address, the grandeur of her air, and that distinguishing dignity which accompanied all her actions, and attended her to her grave, made her esteemed incomparable, notwithstanding all the errors in her conduct. Her brother Henry the third, who hated her, made her gallantries so public, that it was impossible for her husband to continue so much as the exterior marks of a fair correspondence. She was sent to the castle of Usson, in Auvergne, where she was under the care of the marquis de Cannillac, who quickly became her prisoner, and is said to have lost his liberty by looking too long on the arms of this Venus; she resided there many years, and passed her time in a manner that history does not oblige us to relate. She gave her consent to the declaring her marriage with the king null in terms that did her honour; "It is fit," said she, "that my will should submit to his, who has even subdued fortune by his valour." After the birth of the Dauphin she came to Paris, and lived at first in the Hotel de Sens, till one of her favourites was stabbed at her coach door, and she would never enter the house afterwards. She removed to the suburb of St. Germain, where she built a new house, and kept her little court in more magnificence than order. She was the last of the royal house of Valois, and possessed the distinguishing quality of that house, beneficence, in a supreme degree. She never gave but she excused the meanness of the gift, which, however large, how much soever surpassing the expectation of the person upon whom it was bestowed, never satisfied herself, or left her unwilling to give more. It is true, she often gave improperly; but that proceeded from her established maxim, that it was better to gratify appearances often, than to disappoint merit once. Her palace was the sanctuary of the learned; and, by conversing constantly with men of parts and letters, she attained a facility and correctness in speaking, to which few women have attained. Her poems are incontestable proofs of her genius; her memoirs, in point of elegance and delicacy, have not been equalled; and, if she had not been deficient in one virtue, she might have been, with propriety, stiled either a muse or a grace. It was amazing with how much spirit and constancy she bore her misfortunes, or rather her change of fortunes, in which, if her condition was singular, she sustained that singularity of station in a manner altogether extraordinary. The duchess of Valois drew all the duty and respect that could have been paid to a queen of France. Instead of shunning the king, the queen, or the court, she secured their esteem, and even conciliated their affection. By making the Dauphin her heir, he became, in some measure, her son: she visited him and the rest of the king's children constantly, regularly, and with a decent degree of tenderness. In return, Henry sometimes visited her, the queen more frequently, and, after the king's death, they lived like sisters. She was unequal in her temper to the last, mingling pleasures with devotion, the love of letters with that of vanity, a high spirit of charity with not a little injustice; for though she visited churches frequently, bestowed more or less upon almost every religious house in Paris, and directed her remains to be interred in the chapel of a monastery of her own foundation, yet she left her debts unpaid. She expired the 27th of March, 1615, when she was upwards of threescore (9).

(9) Dupleix. P. Daniel. Le Gendre.

is unnecessary to enter into a long detail of these negotiations : it is sufficient to say, that the princes prevailed in almost all their demands; the redress of public grievances was promised, the most ample security given to the reformed, the government of Amiens taken from the marshal d'Ancre, and all the edicts and declarations, by which those in arms had been stigmatized as rebels, were recalled<sup>a</sup>. What pleased the prince of Condé best was his being placed at the head of the council, which he took to be placing him at the head of the government, but which those who prevailed upon the queen to pass this article placed in quite another light. This treaty was concluded in the beginning of May; and, what was very extraordinary, exclusive of fifty-seven articles, contained in the edict which was sent to the parliament of Paris, in order to confirm it, there was a schedule of secret articles, which contained the private gratifications that were sent to them sealed up. The parliament were very unwilling to grant their verification to they knew not what, but upon assurances given them that they contained nothing beyond the secret articles of the edict of Nantes, and, for the sake of restoring peace to the kingdom, they at length consented to let them pass<sup>b</sup>. The prince of Condé was in reality the dupe of this negotiation, and that through his own fault, since he parted with his government of Guienne for that of Berri and Touraine, and a gratification of a million and a half of livres.

Marshal
d'Ancre receives a severe check from the parliament of Paris.

ON the conclusion of the treaty the prince did not come immediately to court, where some considerable changes were made. The chancellor had formerly done the secretary Villeroy some prejudice, and the secretary, in conjunction with the president Jeanin, had taken so much pains to expose his timidity and want of general knowledge, that the queen resolved to be rid of him<sup>c</sup>. The chancellor no sooner perceived this, than he addressed himself to Villeroy and Jeanin; he told them they were mistaken in respect to themselves, to him, and the person they intended for his successor, and that his disgrace would only prove a prelude to their own. They laboured upon this to preserve him, but to no purpose; the queen took the seals from him, and gave them to William du Vair, president of the parliament of Aix, a man of great abilities in his profession, and who would have been thought superior to the dignity, if he had never enjoyed it. Marshal d'Ancre met with a great mortification from the parliament; during the absence of the court he had resided at Paris, and attempting to go out of town one day, with a great retinue, he was stopped at one of the gates by the city guard, commanded by a shoemaker, who told him that he could not go out without a proper passport, pursuant to the king's orders: the marshal had recourse to offers of money and threats, but all in vain, upon which he returned. Now seeing the peace made, he ordered two of his footmen to take an opportunity of chastising the shoemaker, and they did it so severely that they left him for dead; the people assembling upon his cries, seized them, and carried them to prison; but the upper servant who delivered them the orders made his escape. By due course of law the footmen were brought to the gallows by sentence from the parliament; and though the marshal and his wife spared no pains to save them, it was to no purpose, and served only to increase the violence of that hatred which was borne them<sup>d</sup>. The dukes of Mayenne and Bouillon, by their intrigues, hindered the prince of Condé from coming to court, that they might have the greater power, which piqued the marshal d'Ancre, who had a fond reliance on the prince of Condé without any just grounds. At length the prince arrived, and chiefly by the influence of the marshal, had almost the sole direction of affairs, to which they both proved themselves very unequal; for the marshal, proud of the prince's protection, first slighted his new friends, the dukes of Mayenne and Bouillon, and then, with a view of making court to the prince of Condé, broke with his old friends the dukes of Guise and Espernon<sup>e</sup>. The duke of Bouillon, who absolutely governed the prince, obliged him to send marshal d'Ancre a message that he was no longer his friend, which so frightened that favourite that he retired immediately into Normandy, and his wife fell sick<sup>f</sup>.

Condé arrested, and the ministry
changed.

THE prince, who had it in his power to do every thing, did nothing; he affected to shew that he had separated from the Protestants, and yet remained as much as ever in the hands of Bouillon, who, in some of their consultations, hinted the possibility of the prince's being placed upon the throne, provided he would have recourse to Biron's old scheme, and canton out the kingdom into independent governments. This coming to the ears of the court, the queen-mother caused the prince of Condé to be arrested in the Louvre, by Monf. Themmis, who, for this service, was made marshal of France<sup>g</sup>. At this time lord Hay, afterwards earl of Carlisle, was ambassador extraordinary from king James, to compliment the king on his marriage, and he demanded an audience upon this occasion, to know the reasons of treating in this manner the first prince of the blood; and being not pleased with his answer, for the

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de la Regence. DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN.

Rohan. Memoires de Bassompierre. Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

de Mere & du Fils. Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>b</sup> MALINGRE. Memoires de la Regence. Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

Histoire de Mere & du Fils. MALINGRE.

Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires du Duc de

<sup>d</sup> Memoires de la Regence. Histoire

<sup>e</sup> Mercure Francois. DUPLEX. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>f</sup> Memoires de la Regence.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. Memoires de la Regence.

- a court had a suspicion of his having some intelligence with the prince of Condé, obtained leave from his own court to return home<sup>a</sup>. The prince of Condé's imprisonment alarmed several great men to such a degree, that the dukes of Vendosme, Guise, Mayenne, Nevers, Rohan, Sulli, la Tremouille, Candale, the eldest son of the duke of Espernon, the marshal de Bouillon, the marquis de Cœuvres, and Nicholas le Jay, president of the parliament of Paris, retired from court. After some weeks confinement, the prince was transferred to the Bastile, and some farther changes were made in the ministry; Du Vair was removed from being keeper of the seals for speaking his mind too freely, and was replaced by Mangot, who had been made secretary of state in the room of Villeroy, who was now succeeded by the bishop of Lucon; afterwards the famous cardinal de Richlieu; and Barbin who had been steward of the queen's household, was made comptroller of the finances<sup>b</sup>. These were all brought in by marshal d'Ancre, whose house, with that of his secretary, was pulled down to the ground by the mob of Paris, on the first news of the prince's confinement, of which there is no doubt that he was extremely glad, and of which, for that reason, he was presumed to be the author. His vanity made him not unwilling to be thought so, and, forgetting how lately he was deceived when he fancied himself absolutely secure, and under the protection of the prince of Condé, he fell into the same error again, believing that the princes being retired from court, and having the seals, the pen, and the treasure in the hands of those to whom he had confided them, his fortune was secure, seeing the queen-regent, in whom he had so great an interest, was, for the present, triumphant, and the detaching the duke and family of Guise from the confederate princes confirmed him so strongly in this sentiment, that he no longer preserved any measures, but spoke and acted as if all was at his command<sup>c</sup>. His A. D. 1616.

- THE queen mother, who, though she really loved Galigai, and for her sake suffered the impertinencies of the marshal, took, in all affairs of importance, the advice of abler heads, and more especially of Barbin and the bishop of Lucon: by their counsel she caused a declaration to be published in the king's name, in which, after setting forth all the compliances that had been used to quiet the princes, there was a specific account of what had been paid them in ready money, that the people of France might apprehend clearly the motives and merits of these patriots. This step was taken for restoring domestic quiet. In regard to foreign affairs the baron de Tour was sent to London, to satisfy king James, who had a great regard for the prince and for the duke of Bouillon<sup>d</sup>. M. de la Noue was sent into Holland, to prevent the republic from interesting themselves in these disputes, and the count de Schomberg was sent to the elector Palatine, and other princes of Germany, not barely to acquaint them with the motives of the king's conduct, but also to raise a small corps of horse and a great body of foot. Lastly, three potent armies were formed and received orders to act against the princes, in the king's name, and with the utmost vigour; the first, which marched into Champagne, was composed of twelve thousand foot and two thousand horse, commanded by the duke of Guise, and the marshals Themmis and Praslin: they took the field about the middle of February, and reduced several places belonging to the duke of Nevers, and particularly Chateau Porcin and Rethel, which occupied them till towards the end of March. The second, which acted in the Nivernois, was composed of about nine thousand men, and was commanded by the marshal de Montigne, who proceeded with the like success, having made the second son of the duke of Nevers prisoner, and reduced the duchess to capitulate<sup>e</sup>. The third army was commanded by the count d'Auvergne, whom the queen had taken out of the Bastile, after his long confinement, and placed at the head of an army of about fourteen thousand men; with which, having first cleared the Isle of France, he at length blocked up the duke of Mayenne in Soissons. Having received a train of artillery from the Bastile, he battered the place; and, having made a sufficient breach, was on the point of making a general assault, when the face of affairs changed in so extraordinary a manner, that those who had hitherto been considered as rebels, were, all of a sudden, owned for the king's friends and his best subjects; but some of the wisest heads in France saw not the necessity of making this short turn<sup>f</sup>.

WE have already mentioned the strange conduct of the marshal d'Ancre, who was every day soliciting and hastening his own ruin, by the very methods he took to divert and prevent it. He had raised Barbin and the bishop of Lucon to the great employments they held; he became suspicious of them, traduced and did them so many private injuries, that, for the sake of peace, they were desirous of laying down their employments<sup>g</sup>. He could not but know how much he was hated by the common people, and yet he was remarkably busy in pushing whatever might exasperate them: he procured the baron de Huertevan to be beheaded for high treason, for corresponding with the princes who were in arms, tho' he had often done the same thing, and interfered more warmly to procure the like fate to one Stuart, a perfect youth, esteemed one of the handsomest men of his time, who had been extremely well received at court <sup>b</sup>. At the same time he was upon very ill terms with Luynes, who had entirely engrossed the king's favour, and who had offered to match his brother with the marshal's niece, which was hindered by his wife, who was jealous of his having any interest in the king's court, for fear he would be then less dependent on her. Luynes, who took it in quite another sense, and apprehended that the marshal rejected his alliance because he intended to remove him, whispered all his suspicions to the king, who, tho' but fifteen years of age, began to discover that jealousy which was the predominant quality in his constitution <sup>i</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de la Regence. Mercure Francois. Negotiations of Sir Thomas Edmondes. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. <sup>c</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. <sup>d</sup> Negotiations of Sir Thomas Edmondes. <sup>e</sup> Mercure Francois. Memoires de la Regence. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>f</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

The Sieur Luynes contrives the marshal's destruction.

He told him that this Italian, whom his father hated, but could never remove, now governed his kingdom; that the ministers were all of his choice or recommendation; that the princes were persecuted only because they would not tamely submit to this arrogant stranger; that, not contented with being at the head of the government, and disposing of great employments at his pleasure, he was on the point of removing his majesty's own servants, and surrounding him with his own creatures. When he saw what impression this made on the young monarch, he went farther, and threw out hints of the queen's exorbitant love of power, of the little share that she allowed him to take even in the placing of his own servants, and her extraordinary fondness for the duke of Orleans. What, though in itself a trivial and accidental thing, seemed to give a colour of truth to these reports, was the queen's stopping a troop of horse, that bore her name, in their march to the camp before Soissons, to remain about her own and the king's person, as they had then no cavalry to cover the little excursions of pleasure which the king now and then made into the country, and to this Luynes gave the malicious turn of her making use of them to secure his royal person <sup>k</sup>. The first expedient devised by this young prince for delivering himself out of what was now stiled a captivity, was to put himself at the head of this troop of horse, to go in person to the siege of Soissons, and finding means to get into that place, to declare the duke of Mayenne his lieutenant general against marshal d'Ancre and his adherents. This, upon examination, was found to be impracticable. In the mean time some overtures were made to the queen-mother by her faithful servants, to part with the marshal and his wife, as persons grown absolutely insupportable, to which she shewed herself very inclinable <sup>l</sup>. Some of the friends of Galigai insinuated to her the prudence of a retreat, to which she willingly consented, and immediately begun to order her most valuable effects to be sent to Italy. But when this matter came to be mentioned to the marshal, he was so far from hearing it with any tolerable patience, that he is said to have made this strange answer; "I have hitherto been the minion of fortune, who has never deserted me, nor will I desert her, but, following where-ever she conducts, will let the world see to what height a man may be raised, who has the courage to pursue her <sup>m</sup>." It is not impossible but he might have been brought in time to alter his sentiments: but Luynes, who had the same ambition, did not leave him that time; he was continually pushing his master to rid himself of all restraints, and at length pointed out the means by which it was effected.

Marshal
d'Ancre is arrested and slain.

He proposed to the king giving his orders to have the marshal either dispatched or delivered to the parliament, that they might have no more trouble with him; the king chose the latter, and his favourite immediately proposed that Vitri, who was captain of the guards, should arrest him, to which the king assented <sup>n</sup>. Luynes spoke to Vitri, and asked him if he had the courage to execute whatever the king commanded; Vitri made no scruple of promising, even upon oath; upon which Luynes told him that there might be danger in their holding a long conversation, but that, at such an hour of the night, in such a place, he should meet with certain men, and directed him to receive and follow their orders, as if they were given by the mouth of the king, Vitri was punctual to the appointment, and saw with amazement Tronson, a man of a very indifferent character, Marillac, who had betrayed the prince of Condé, Deagen, who was clerk to the comptroller-general Barbin, and a gardener of the Tuilleries. However, he was embarked, and of them he learned what was expected from him. The thing was three weeks in agitation, during which it was communicated to a great many persons, without ever being divulged. At length the 24th of April was fixed, and Vitri caused several gentlemen of determined courage to be introduced, under various pretences, into the Louvre <sup>o</sup>. Amongst these was his brother Hellier, his brother-in-law Persan, Bournonville, Persan's brother-in-law, Guichaumont and Rigaud, exempts of the guard, and some others. About ten in the morning the marshal came to the Louvre, preceded by about forty gentlemen, to whom he gave pensions, and followed at a distance by as many more, but the gates of the Louvre being shut as soon as he was in, excluded the latter. He stopped upon the bridge of the Louvre, and

<sup>b</sup> DUPLEIX, Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>i</sup> DUPL. Hist. de Louis XIII. P. MATTH. Hist. de Louis XIII.

LE GRAIN.

<sup>k</sup> Mercure Francois. Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

<sup>l</sup> Memoires de la Regence. Histoire

de Mere & du Fils.

<sup>m</sup> Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires de la Regence. Historia della Republica

Veneta di B. NANI.

<sup>o</sup> Mercure Francois. MALINGRE. Histoire de Mere & du Fils.

de la Regence. MALINGRE. Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>o</sup> Memoires

<sup>a</sup> leaning his arm upon the rail, was reading a letter, when Vitri, followed by his friends, for whom the marshal's gentlemen, supposing the king behind, had made a lane, laying his hand upon his shoulder, "I arrest you, Sir, in the king's name!" "What me," returned the marshal, in a quick tone; "Yes, you, Sir," replied Vitri, with a loud voice and an oath. The marshal, retiring back, laid his hand on his sword; Vitri, turning his head, cried, "Kill him," upon which Hellier discharged a pistol through his heart, Perfan another through his head, and Guicbaumont a third into his belly <sup>b</sup>.

Vitri's associates began immediately to cry Vive le Roy, till the king appeared at a window, made a signal with his hat that he accepted their services, and then they were silent. The marquis de Pene, son to the marshal, was immediately arrested; and his wife Galigai was conducted to the room where the prince of Condé had been confined <sup>c</sup>. The queen's guards were removed, and those of the king placed in their stead, by which she understood herself to be a prisoner. The king wrote the same day three letters to the parliament, the first with an account of the death of the marshal, the second to avow that what had been done was by his order, the third to create the office of counsellor of the short robe in favour of the baron de Vitri, that he might be secured a seat in that assembly, before he took his oath as marshal of France, taking up the baton that d'Ancre had let fall <sup>d</sup>. A total change followed; Mangot was removed, Barbin was confined, the seals were restored to du Vair, Villeroy returned to his office as secretary of state, Jeanin came again into favour, the king wrote to the duke of Longueville, who was nearest, to come to court: he wrote also to the rest of the princes; the duke of Mayenne sent his majesty the keys of Sciſſons, after setting the gates open to the king's troops, and returned in a few days with the count d'Auvergne. The process was made for the unfortunate Galigai, who fell with a fortitude that buried all her follies in oblivion, and the queen-mother was exiled to Blois <sup>e</sup>. Monſ. Luynes had the confiscation of the marshal's estate, to an immense value; he likewise succeeded him as first gentleman of the chamber, as the king's lieutenant in Normandy, and in his governments. Vitri, as we before observed, had his staff, Hellier had the company of guards which the new marshal had commanded, and Perfan was intrusted with the Bastile. M. de Luynes would have preserved Richelieu, but it was not in his power, the old secretaries were to be restored; but he kept his seat in the council, and was ordered to attend the queen-mother <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> ALL the princes who had engaged in the league were received into favour, without the ceremony of a treaty, and the king was prevailed upon by his new favourite to send a declaration to the parliament, in which he affirmed himself satisfied with their services, and annulled whatever had been done against them: this was registered, as the former letters had been, without any dispute; for there seemed now to be a great disposition of doing honour to the king's entrance upon his government, of which spirit we may judge by the attributing to him the surname of Just, from the fate of the marshal d'Ancre, and that of his widow, though at the same time there happened some other strokes of justice, which, in order to set this period of history in its true light, it is necessary we should mention <sup>e</sup>. Amongst those who had been intrusted with the secret of the marshal's ruin, there was one Travail, who had abjured the Protestant religion, turned Capuchin, and had done no credit to that order. This man had great parts, without the least tincture of probity. He had been promised, or at least he had promised himself, the archbishoprick of Bourges; but, when the prelate who possessed this see was constrained to resign it, and Travail saw it bestowed upon another person, it inflamed him with such resentment, that he went to the Sieur Bressieux, one of the queen-mother's principal officers, and confided to him an infamous design he had formed. He was arrested upon this, and condemned upon positive testimony, that he had laboured to persuade Bressieux to poison the queen; others say, with more probability, that he acquainted him with his resolution to dispatch Luynes, out of pure compassion, as he pretended, for the queen-mother; however that might be, he was broke alive <sup>f</sup>. One Gignier amused Luynes with a pretended conspiracy of the princes against him, and against the king; and even went so far as to charge the duke of Vendosme with an intention to poison them both at his daughter's christening, to which they were invited. The king being informed of this, pretended to have the cholic, to avoid going thither; but the duke observing some symptoms of distrust, went to Luynes, insisted upon making himself prisoner, and examining the matter, whatever it was, to the bottom. This brought the whole business to light, which cost Gignier his head, who, at his death, fairly confessed, that, seeing plots in fashion, he had made one for his own benefit, which, taking a wrong turn, had brought him to the block <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de la Regence. MALINGRE. Histoire di BATT. NANI. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. 9 DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. MALINGRE. 10 Memoires de la Regence. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. Memoires de AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAYE. 11 MALINGRE. Histoire de Louis XIII. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. Historia di BATT. NANI. 12 Histoire de Mere & du Fils. DUPL. Hist. de Louis XIII. MALINGRE. 13 Historia di BATT. NANI. DUPL. Hist. de Louis XIII. MALINGRE. 14 Mercure Francois. Memoires de la Regence. Hist. de Mere & du Fils. 15 MALINGRE. Hist. de Louis XIII.

Marshal
Lesdiguières saves the duke of Savoy from being overwhelmed by the power of Spain.

WHILE the affairs of France were thus strangely embarrassed, the Spaniards had attacked <sup>a</sup> the duke of Savoy, not without some plausible pretences; but the real motive was to establish their sovereignty in Italy, and to bar the entrance of the French into that country for ever. The marshal duke de Lesdiguières, the duke's old antagonist, levied an army for his assistance. The Spanish ambassador complained of this at court, before the queen was divested of the regency. Upon this orders were sent to Lesdiguières to disband his forces. The marshal, who had been long accustomed to think for himself, and who was also persuaded that he understood the interests of his country much better than those who sent him such orders, put them in his pocket, and marched directly into Piedmont<sup>y</sup>. His appearance saved the duke, but, after he had rendered him great service, he was obliged to return into Dauphine, upon the revolt of the princes: that being suddenly over in the manner which we have before related, Lesdiguières <sup>b</sup> received fresh orders from court to return into Savoy, and, while he was preparing for it, was joined by some of the noblest and bravest persons in the kingdom, who piqued themselves on learning the trade of war under such a commander. The marshal found the duke of Savoy on the very point of being undone, Don Pedro de Toledo being in the heart of his country with a superior army. Lesdiguières saw, from the manner in which these troops were posted, that they might be attacked almost without hazard. The duke left him at liberty to act as he pleased; and, in the space of a week, the old man dissipated them all, and made between four and five thousand prisoners. After this he assembled twenty thousand men, and was on the very point of entering the duchy of Milan, when a courier from court brought him a peace, which, as things then stood, the duke of Savoy thought it his interest to <sup>c</sup> sign<sup>z</sup>.

An assembly of the states held at Rouen, which gives de Luynes an opportunity of taking possession of his government of Normandy.

IT was natural for Monf. Luynes to desire the settlement of his administration on the firmest basis possible, to wish the entrance on his new post of the king's lieutenant in Normandy, and yet he saw the necessity of not leaving the king's person. He had either good parts or was capable of listening to right counsels, since he found the means of uniting all these, by engaging the king to call an assembly of the notables to be held at Rouen, in the month of December<sup>a</sup>. There he obtained every thing he could desire with respect to the approbation of that revolution which he had brought about; many good things were likewise proposed for the benefit of the nation, which the king received in the most gracious manner, and promised to advise with his council of state how they might best be carried into execution. The royal presence restored <sup>d</sup> tranquillity to the province, and gave Monf. de Luynes the opportunity he wanted of securing his several governments. In this journey of the court died the famous Monsieur Villeroy, who, with some interruptions, had executed the office of secretary of state upwards of fifty years; a man of great parts, unassisted with learning; an able negotiator, and a consummate minister; difficult in making promises, but punctual in the performance of them; born to a good fortune, to which, in his long service, he did not add above two hundred pounds a year<sup>b</sup>. This year was also fatal to the president de Thou, whose reputation as an historian will last for ever.

He marries the daughter of the duke of Montbazou, and becomes the object of public envy.

To support his greatness, Monf. de Luynes saw nothing wanting but a proper marriage. He had thoughts of espousing madame de Vendosme, and becoming thereby, in some sort, <sup>e</sup> the brother-in-law of the king; but perceiving that this would be attended with great envy, he very prudently yielded that princess to the duke d'Elbeuf, and contented himself with the daughter of the duke de Montbazou<sup>c</sup>. In all this, though he conducted himself with much address, and considering the power he had over his master, confirmed by the management of his confessor, a Jesuit, who is said to have sworn him to do nothing without the consent of Monf. de Luynes, he could not secure the applause of the public, or entirely silence the voice of envy. On the contrary, there ran whispers every-where to his prejudice, and, amongst other censures, the populace took the liberty of saying that the same tavern was still open, and that they had only burnt the old bush; while others, with equal acrimony and less reverence, lamented that the tyranny was unextinguished, and that the nation had only <sup>f</sup> changed one tyrant for another. His two brothers sharing his favour and his power, a ticket was fixed on their apartment in the palace with these words; "Here dwell the three kings." But he might easily pardon these strokes of satire, which, in reality, did him service, if they had taught him caution<sup>d</sup>.

A. D. 1617.

<sup>y</sup> LE GRAIN. MALINGRE. Historia di BATT. NANI. Histoire de Louis XIII. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. P. DANIEL. Journal Historique de Louis XIII. & du Fils.

<sup>z</sup> Memoires de Lesdiguières. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. <sup>a</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. <sup>b</sup> Mercure Francoiſ. MALINGRE. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. <sup>c</sup> Memoires de la Regence. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>d</sup> P. MATTHIEU Histoire de Louis XIII. BATT. NANI. MALINGRE.

S E C T. XII.

The remainder of the reign of Lewis XIII. surnamed the Just, from his assuming the government to his death.

<sup>a</sup> THE queen-mother, who had seen herself a kind of prisoner in the palace of her son, found herself not at all in a better situation at Blois, though at her departure, the king had given her the strongest assurances of behaving towards her with all the respect and duty possible. The favourite Luynes endeavoured also to recover her good graces, and made use of his father-in-law the duke of Montbazon, and the duke of Rohan, to whom he was allied by marriage, and who was one of the wisest and worthiest men in France, to this purpose <sup>a</sup>. But as in reality he had no such intentions, from an apprehension that, if once a reconciliation was brought about, the queen would quickly recover her authority, he had recourse to measures of another kind, and which he thought would answer his purposes better. In the first place, he held it necessary to remove Richelieu, bishop of Lucon, from about the queen, though a person for whom he had expressed great kindness, not only because he knew that he had lived in a strict intimacy with marshal d'Ancre, but because he was thoroughly persuaded of his attachment to the queen, and of his superior capacity, so that nothing was to be expected from his practices, while a person of so much penetration was near her, and therefore he had orders to retire to an abbey of his in Anjou <sup>b</sup>. There, that he might find some employment for his active genius, he composed a book of devotion : his application to his studies being known at court, they had so little idea of things of that nature, that they took it for granted he must be composing memoirs for the service, and apologies for the conduct, of the queen regent, and therefore banished him and his brother to Avignon <sup>c</sup>. When he was at this distance, Luynes thought he might begin his operations with safety. He bribed most of the ladies and women about her ; he suffered Barbin, who was all this time a prisoner in the Bastile, to receive letters from, and to write to, her, which papers, passing through the hands of a bishop, he betrayed them to Luynes, who, when he had made all the use of them he thought proper, directed a criminal prosecution against Barbin, and, not being able to reach his life, caused him to be condemned to banishment, and, under pretence of alleviating, engaged the king to aggravate, the sentence, by changing it into perpetual imprisonment <sup>d</sup>. He then posted troops at some distance about Blois, restrained the queen-mother more strictly than he had done, and at length sent Father Arnoux, a Jesuit, and the king's confessor, to reconcile her to this usage, and to persuade her that he was taking all the pains possible to restore her to the king's favour, in order to which it was necessary to draw up an act of submission upon oath, in which she promised to submit to enter into no intrigues, to discover any that came to her knowledge, to hold no foreign correspondencies, and not to attempt to leave Blois without the king's leave <sup>e</sup>. With this instrument Arnoux returned to court ; and the queen's confessor, who was a Jesuit also, perceiving his brother's artifice, assured her her oath was void, and that, as Luynes would probably depend much upon this instrument, she might from thence find means to facilitate her escape <sup>f</sup>, as her emissaries would be less exposed to danger.

WHILE Luynes was taking so many precautions to secure the king entirely to himself, as the only means of maintaining his power, and amused alike those who wished the deliverance of the prince of Conde, and those who desired the deliverance of the queen, with fair but false promises, he opened the way to both by the measures he took to prevent them. The duke of Espernon had fallen out with the keeper of the seals about precedency, and had brought several dukes and peers to concur with him, which at length rose so high, that some warm words passed in the king's presence, who upon that occasion, though alone, spoke to the duke in very quick terms, and did more than his ministers could have done ; for it struck him with such fear, that he resolved to quit the court, and having procured leave, retired to Metz, of which, though the king's governor, he lived and acted therein as a sovereign <sup>g</sup>. The true reason of his quarrelling with Monsi. du Vair was to conceal the real motive of his differing with the court, which was that Luynes had procured for Monsi. de Gondy, so well known afterwards by the title of the cardinal de Retz, a hat, which had been promised to the duke's son, the archbishop of Thoulouse <sup>h</sup>.

Artifices used by Luynes to keep the queen-mother from court and in confinement.

Duke of Espernon quarrels with du Vair, and retires to Metz.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire de Mere & du Fils. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. Decade contenant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>c</sup> Mercure Francois. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GEND. <sup>d</sup> Histoire de la Mere & du Fils. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. P. DAN. Journal Historique de Louis XIII. <sup>e</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>f</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. <sup>g</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon tom. ii. liv. vii. Histoire de Mere & du Fils. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>h</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre.

The abbe de Ruccellay engages him to attempt the queen's deliverance from Blois.

AMONGST the agents of the queen-mother was the abbe Ruccellay, an Italian, whose father having been employed in the finances, had procured him benefices to the amount of thirty thousand livres a year, and left him, at his decease, as much more. He was of a restless busy temper, capable of assuming any character, and, except the qualities before-mentioned, had none of his own. He had been a favourite with the marshal d'Ancre, and had followed the queen to Blois; but, not liking so melancholy a situation, returned to court, where he lived under the protection of Bassompierre<sup>i</sup>. He had persuaded himself that the duke de Bouillon, who had been always esteemed the ablest head, in point of intrigue, in France, was the only person that could restore the queen; he caused such informations to be given against himself to Luynes, as induced the favourite to order him to retire to his abbey, which being but a small distance from Sedan, gave him the opportunity he wanted, of entering into a correspondence with that duke. Bouillon, though he had, by no means, any good opinion of him, yet received him civilly, and in a little time, he acquired a certain degree of confidence; insomuch that he told him, his age, his infirmities, and his great distance, rendered it impossible for him to act; but that he would indicate a proper person to procure the queen's freedom, and this was the duke of Espernon<sup>k</sup>. This was far from being acceptable to Ruccellay, who had differed with the son of the duke, who, upon hearing something of it, had threatened to chastize him, and besides, the dukes of Bouillon and Espernon were not friends; so that no assistance could be received from this quarter. He returned however to his abbey, and, charging the secretary of marshal d'Ancre, who was just released from prison, with the queen's commission, sent him to Metz, where, by the assistance of the marquis de la Valette, and the archbishop of Toulouse, he succeeded with their father beyond all expectation<sup>l</sup>. When things were pretty far advanced, Ruccellay went himself to a village not far from Metz, and sent a message to the duke, who flew into a violent passion, and declared to his sons, he would have nothing to do with that Italian, who, he knew, owed him a grudge, and would not therefore put it in his power to take his revenge. Ruccellay being told this, informed the duke that the secretary was but his agent, that he was possessed of his cyphers, had seen his letters, and therefore, if he had sought revenge, had him intirely in his power<sup>m</sup>. Upon this the duke sent for him to Metz, concealed him a whole month in his palace, and having settled with him the scheme of operations, sent him away as secretly as he came; so that, notwithstanding Luynes had spies at Metz, and about the person of the duke, they were not able to give him any intelligence, though, for other reasons, he held the abbe Ruccellay in the greatest suspicion<sup>n</sup>.

The Paulette suppressed, and the Jesuits open their college of Clermont.

IN respect to affairs of a more public nature, Luynes, at the beginning of the year, had caused the tax called the Paulette to be suppressed, and promised to put an end to the venality of officers, which, however, he did not perform<sup>o</sup>. In May, the resignation of his government of Guienne was demanded from the prince of Conde, in prison at Vincennes, and immediately bestowed upon the duke of Mayenne. The king's lieutenancy in those parts was given to marshal Ornano, who presently exchanged it for the lieutenancy of Normandy; and the Sieur de Luynes, who had that, obtained the government of the Isle of France, which the duke of Mayenne had quitted<sup>p</sup>. The king proposed restoring the church lands to the popish clergy in Bearn, which met with great opposition; it was, in truth, one of the projects of Luynes, to form a party for his own support, and was the specimen of that design which characterized his administration, the destruction of the Protestants. He knew well enough that this would recommend him to the clergy, and to the violent Catholics; and, by sowing dissensions amongst the Protestants, and a dexterous application of bribes and promises, he thought the thing might be gradually performed, without exciting a new civil war, in which, though he was somewhat mistaken, yet his schemes, as we shall see hereafter, fatally prevailed<sup>q</sup>. Prince Maurice of Nassau becoming, by the death of his brother, prince of Orange, offered his homage to the queen, but, under pretence of finding some new title, the king refused to accept it in the old manner, and the prince, not being disposed to comply with the method prescribed, this homage was not received at all<sup>r</sup>. A chiaux arrived from Constantinople, to renew the antient treaties, and to make some excuses for the ill usage the French minister had received at the Porte; and, towards the close of the year, to reward the good services of Father Arnoux, the Jesuits, by the sole interposition of the royal authority, had leave to open their college for the instruction of youth<sup>s</sup>.

The queen-mother escapes

AFTER having endeavoured in vain to procure the king's leave to quit Metz, to go to his government of Xaintonge, the duke of Espernon, at the opening of the new year, took the

<sup>i</sup> LE GRAIN. BERNARD.

<sup>k</sup> Memoires de AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAYE.

<sup>l</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire

de Louis XIII. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon, tom. ii. LE GEND.

<sup>m</sup> Histoire de Merc & du

Fils. Memoires de Bassompierre Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon.

<sup>n</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis

XIII. Hist. du Duc d'Espernon.

<sup>o</sup> Mercure Francois. MALINGRE. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>p</sup> Me-

moires du Duc de Rohan. <sup>q</sup> P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>r</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>s</sup> Mercure Francois. BERNARD. LE GENDRE;

- a resolution of proceeding in his design, notwithstanding the king's express orders not to leave Metz. He took very extraordinary precautions; he caused his equipage to parade every day for a fortnight together, going out every day at a different gate; in the mean time, as if he had laid aside all thoughts of departing, he sent away his son the archbishop of Thoulouse. At length, confiding the care of the city to the marquis de la Valette, with strict injunctions not to suffer the gates to be opened for three days, and to keep a constant patrol round the place, he put himself at the head of one hundred horse, and began his march<sup>1</sup>. In his passage by Dijon, he conferred with the duke of Bellegarde's lieutenant, and bid him write his master word, that hunger had driven him out of Metz, pretending that he was not able to subsist there for want of money, adding, that he should take it as a favour if he made no great haste to write, which he promised, but dispatched a courier immediately to his master, and this was the first news the court had of his leaving Metz. As it was to no purpose to pursue him, Luynes dispatched one of his gentlemen with a very kind letter to the duke, including the king's approbation<sup>2</sup>. Espéron executed his design happily, but was surprized to hear nothing from the queen. This was occasioned by a very extraordinary accident: one de Lorine, a servant, whom the abbe Ruccellay had often trusted before, being dispatched with letters containing the scheme of the duke's design, and promised great things if he delivered them safe to the queen, thought he might bring them still to a better market if he carried them to the Sieur Luynes. Accordingly, instead of going to Blois, he took the route to Paris, and was, for three days together, at the house of Luynes, soliciting an audience. A counsellor of the parliament of Paris, who was deeply in the queen's interest, hearing of this by chance, and suspecting the truth, sent a gentleman to speak to him, who, by the help of a considerable sum of money, obtained the letters, and the man was disposed of soon after in such a manner as prevented his telling tales<sup>3</sup>. This was the reason that the queen-mother had no intelligence of the duke's arrival, till brought by one of his domestics; however, she was no sooner informed of it, than she took a resolution of escaping from Blois, which she effected on the 22d of February, by getting out of a window so high, that two ladders were requisite in her descending<sup>4</sup>; and being met upon the road by the archbishop of Thoulouse, son of the duke, was conducted to Loches, where he received her in person, at the head of 300 gentlemen on horseback, and conducted her in safety to Angoulesme<sup>5</sup>, at the very time they were concerting measures at court to remove her to Amboise, and to make her a close prisoner in the castle there; so that her escape was as well-timed as it was happily executed.

In the midst of the rejoicings at court for the marriage of the prince of Piedmont with the princess Christiana, the king's sister, there came advice of the queen-mother's escape, which struck the court with the utmost astonishment: at first that monarch and his ministers gave a loose to passion, talked of marching one hundred thousand men to recover the queen, and punish the duke of Espéron, orders being given on one side to the duke of Mayenne and the count de Schomberg to begin the war, and on the other to the duke of Nevers, to form an army to besiege Metz<sup>6</sup>. The king, however, thought it requisite to consult the duke of Bouillon, who, after representing to him, in the most respectful manner, that any who should give him such counsels, as making war upon his mother, and declaring persons of the highest quality rebels, barely for giving a widow, and the mother of their king, protection, were enemies to the state: he suggested that there was no suitable method but that of an accommodation, and concluded with the strongest assurances of his own fidelity<sup>7</sup>. A negotiation was accordingly set on foot, and carried on, notwithstanding the declarations published by the queen, conceived in the most bitter terms, accusing Luynes and his brethren of abusing the king's tender years, subverting justice in the death of the marchioness d'Ancre, and several other persons, procuring their confiscations, robbing the king's treasury of millions, banishing the widow of Henry IV. proposing to thrust her into a monastery, or a prison for life, and keeping the prince and princess of Conde in prison, of whose innocence she was long ago convinced<sup>8</sup>. The treaty going on very slowly, Luynes proposed the recalling the bishop of Lucon, and the king thereupon wrote to him with his own hand<sup>9</sup>. This prelate was but ill received at Angoulesme by every body but the queen. Ruccellay hated him as a rival, Espéron had no confidence in him. At first they refused him a seat in the council; then they excluded him, after consenting to his admission. But things soon changed their face; Ruccellay advised the queen to seize

<sup>1</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron, tom. ii. Mémoires de Bassompierre. <sup>2</sup> Mémoires du Duc de Rohan. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron. MALINGRE. <sup>3</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron, tom. ii. <sup>4</sup> Mémoires de Bassompierre. Hist. de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron. MALINGRE. LE GRAIN. <sup>5</sup> DUPL. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>6</sup> Mémoires du Duc de Rohan. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron, tom. ii. liv. viii. <sup>7</sup> Histoire de Mere & du Fils, tom. ii. p. 335. Lettres du Marechal de BOUILLON au Roy, le 4 Mars, 1619. <sup>8</sup> Extrait des raisons & plaintes que la Reine Mere du Roy fait au Roy son Fils, in 8vo. 1619. <sup>9</sup> Histoire du Regne de Louis XIII. Roy de France, & des principaux evenemens arrivez pendant ce Regne dans tout le Pais du Monde, tom. iii. p. 137.

Angoulesme, and to make her peace by abandoning the duke of Espernon; Mary de Medici a rejected the advice, despised the author, and acquainted the duke with his danger <sup>d</sup>.

By the dexterity of the bishop of Lucon, a peace is concluded.

On the other hand, Espernon, perceiving that none of the great lords joined the queen, began to have a better opinion of the bishop of Lucon's counsels, who advised arming silently, and disapproved invectives. In the mean time the king's forces took several places, and a plot was contrived for blowing up the castle of Angoulesme, and the queen in it <sup>e</sup>. The peace was at length made, to the great satisfaction of the court, and with great advantages to the queen and those of her party, for they were, without exception, to be restored to their offices, their appointments, and the king's favour. The queen was to be at liberty to live where she pleased, to have the intire direction of her own court and domain, and, upon her resignation of the government of Normandy, was to have that of Anjou, with the castle of Angers, Pont de Ce, and Chinon, for her security <sup>f</sup>. The enemies of Richlieu have positively asserted <sup>g</sup>, that, upon this occasion, he betrayed his mistress, and sacrificed her's to his own interest; but this does not at all appear; for though the government she surrendered was much superior to that she obtained, yet it was better situated for her security, as being in the neighbourhood of the duke of Espernon and the Protestants. All that was obtained was derived from the authority of the queen's name, the natural affection of the king, and the apprehensions of Luynes, not from any force that the queen either had or could raise. Besides, this peace was entirely to the satisfaction of the duke of Espernon; and it does not appear that the bishop of Lucon derived to himself any thing in consequence of making the peace, but from the queen-mother, who gave the government of Angers to his brother; who being killed out of mere <sup>c</sup> envy by the marquis de Themmis, captain of her guards, she gave it to the uncle of Richlieu, and disposed of the other places at his recommendation.

That prelate procures many advantages for the queen-mother.

BUT though the peace was concluded in April, and the queen-mother, in consequence of it, was expected at court, she discovered no great willingness to go thither, and was in other respects backward enough in doing what was required, which the court attributed to the bishop of Lucon, and with reason, for the peace being once made, he judged that it was to be equally executed on both sides. This produced fresh negotiations, in all which the queen met with success. The plot for blowing up the castle of Angoulesme, though concerted before, was not discovered till after, the peace; but the queen would not punish the offenders; and the king, for his own honour, was obliged to do it, though what they had done or promised <sup>d</sup> was by his minister's orders <sup>h</sup>. Letters of abolition were granted to the duke of Espernon, and all the queen's adherents <sup>i</sup>. The king, indeed, scrupled taking back two captains of the guards who had quitted him to serve his mother, but she remained firm, and he was at length obliged to comply. At length, all scruples removed, she consented to an interview with her son; and, being accompanied by the duke of Espernon to the frontiers of his government, she presented him at parting with a very fine diamond ring from her finger <sup>k</sup>, which was all he ever had for the expence of two hundred thousand crowns, and the risk of his fame, his family, and fortune. The interview being fixed, the queen set out for, and the king from, Tours; they met at Cousieres, a house belonging to the duke of Montbazou, with a great appearance of tenderness and affection on both sides <sup>l</sup>; they proceeded together to Tours, and continued there eleven days; but the queen-mother could not be brought to think of returning to Paris, saying, in plain terms, when pressed to it, that she was not inclined to be led in triumph, but, however, promised to come at a convenient time. The queen then returned to Angers, and the court to Paris <sup>m</sup>. The grandeur of the favourite and his family rose daily higher, and yet it did not seem to be placed on the most secure and solid basis.

Prince of Conde released, who joins the duke of Luynes.

THE favourite, doubting of his own situation, apprehensive of the queen's recovering her influence, and instigated by those who had more reason to fear it than he, resolved at length upon a measure which he had long meditated. He went in person to the castle of Vincennes, on the 20th of October, and set the prince of Conde at liberty <sup>n</sup>; who, as a mark of his gratitude and respect, accompanied his deliverer to the parliament, where he was received as <sup>f</sup> duke and peer of France, the estate of Maille, near Tours, which was transferred to him by his brother, being erected into a duchy in his favour <sup>o</sup>. But the terms of the king's declara-

<sup>a</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon, tom. ii. liv. viii. Hist. de Mere & du Fils, tom. ii. p. 358—360.
<sup>b</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. MALINGRE. <sup>f</sup> Traites de la Paix par l'heureux accord & amiable reconciliation du Roy avec la Reine sa Mere. Ensemble tout ce qui s'est passé tant d'une part, que d'autre à ce sujet depuis le voyage du Roy jusqu'à present, à Paris, 1619, in 8vo.
<sup>c</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. <sup>h</sup> Proces verbal de la conspiration fait en la ville d'Angoulesme ensemble l'execution publique, qui s'en est ensuive, à Paris, 1618. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>i</sup> Articles accordez à Monsieur le Duc d'Espernon, à Paris, 1619. Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espernon, tom. ii. liv. viii. <sup>k</sup> Vie du Cardinal de Richlieu. P. MATTH. Histoire de Louis XIII. Histoire de la Vie de Duc d'Espernon, tom. ii. liv. viii.
<sup>l</sup> Histoire de la Mere & du Fils, tom. ii. p. 385, 386. <sup>m</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. Hist. Universelle de ce qui s'est passé es années 1619 & 1620, à Paris. <sup>n</sup> DUP. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>o</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

a tion on the release of the prince of Conde being conceived in such a manner as to censure the regency, extremely offended the queen, who fixed upon the declaration rather than the measure, and expressed herself so strongly upon it, that the disputes between the two courts rose again very high; so that the peace of the kingdom was once more in danger <sup>p</sup>. These A. D. 1619. disturbances had all along a very indifferent influence upon foreign affairs, as appeared more especially from the death of pensionary Barneveldt in Holland, for whom the king interceded, and interceded in vain.

At the opening of the year, the king made the first promotion of knights of his order, in which there were fifty-nine included; but the duke de Luynes, to avoid creating enemies, desired a kind of election, which method has been followed since <sup>q</sup>. It did not intirely answer b his end; for himself and both his brothers being included in this promotion, many who had, or who thought they had, as good a right to it, were displeased. The Protestants had assembled at Loudon, not only without the king's permission, but continued assembled, notwithstanding c he had sent them orders to disperse, and, which perhaps gave as much offence, sent some of their deputies to pay their respects to the queen-mother, who insisted peremptorily upon a declaration that might justify her conduct, at least in the same degree that had been used with respect to the prince <sup>r</sup>. The king's coffers being empty, some edicts were prepared for new taxes, to which du Vair, keeper of the seals, made some opposition, but, for fear of losing his office, complied. The king carried those edicts to the parliament, and caused them to be verified in his presence, notwithstanding the first president Verdun, and the advocate general Servin, remonstrated against them boldly <sup>s</sup>. The attachment of the prince to Luynes, and the credit this gave him with the king, excited a secret discontent amongst the princes and great lords, who thought their services but ill requited; and this humour spread itself, in a short time, to such a degree, that about the month of April, most of them left the court. The duke of Mayenne retired to his government; the count de Soissons, the duke of Vendosme his brother, the grand prior, the dukes of Nevers, Tremouille, Rohan, Retz, and others, went directly to Angers, to pay their court to the queen-mother, who appeared to be now at the head of a powerful and well connected party <sup>t</sup>. This alarmed the king exceedingly, and the favourite much more; especially when he understood that the duke d'Espernon, to whom he had rendered very essential services, entered entirely into the views of the queen-mother. The d endeavours used to appease that princess had no effect: she complained that the promises made to her had never been kept; and that, in case of any future agreements, she expected that either some foreign power, or at least the parliament of the kingdom, should become the guarantees of it, which astonished Luynes as much as it displeased the king.

It is certain that in this struggle the queen-mother had great advantages, and might have made very advantageous terms for herself and her adherents; but the prince of Conde and others about the king persuaded him to continue negotiating, but in the mean time to march with what forces he could collect into Normandy, where the duke of Longueville, who had exchanged that government for Picardy, which he yielded to the duke de Luynes, was endeavouring to secure all the strong places for the queen <sup>u</sup>. He entered into this measure with e great spirit; and, after communicating his design to the parliament of Paris, dispatching his orders to such as still remained firm in their obedience, he marched directly to Rouen in the beginning of July. The duke of Longueville abandoned the place upon his approach, and retired to Dieppe. Caen likewise opened her gates, and the castle was reduced in a few days <sup>v</sup>. This success increased the king's vigour, who began now to act of himself, gave his orders frequently without consulting any-body, and excited a new spirit in his forces, by rejecting all timid counsels, and bestowing the governments of the places he took upon such as distinguished themselves in his service. It is inconceivable what an effect this had, and how much it contributed to augment the force and the courage of his army; so that, in the space of less than a month, he advanced into the neighbourhood of Pont de Cé, on the preservation of which the queen's safety depended. If she had followed the advice of the duke of Rohan, the king would have found it very difficult to finish this dispute. That prudent and great man persuaded her to retire to Bordeaux, where she was sure of having her cause owned by that parliament, and might have interposed an army of thirty thousand men between her and the king <sup>w</sup>. The queen was well inclined to this, and it is not a little uncertain how she came to decline so right a measure, or to take so wrong a step as to remain at Angers. Some say the duke of Espernon dissuaded her, from an apprehension that, if she was once in the hands of the duke of Mayenne, he should lose his influence; others ascribe this counsel to the bishop

The queen-mother again displeased the Protestants court her, and many of the great nobility.

Her affairs so managed as that she is constrained to conclude a peace.

<sup>p</sup> BERNARD. LE GRAIN.

<sup>q</sup> Mercure Francois. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>r</sup> Memoires

du Duc de Rohan. <sup>s</sup> Harangue fait au Roy par M. le premier President en la Grande Chambre, le 18 Fevrier 1620, à Paris, 1620, in 8vo. Remonstrances fait au Roy, par M. Louis Servin, son Advocat General en la Cour de Parlement, en son Lit de Justice, le Mardi, 18 Fevrier 1620, in 8vo. <sup>t</sup> Memoires de

Normandie & la Reduction du Chateau de Caen à l'Obeissance de sa Majeste selon les avis auvray de ce qui s'y est passé, à Paris 8vo. Mercure Francois. <sup>u</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. BERNARD. MALINGRE. <sup>v</sup> Le Voyage du Roy en of Luçon from the same motive <sup>a</sup>. It is not impossible that the duke was the author of the measure, and that the prelate, foreseeing the consequences, engaged the queen-mother to conclude the treaty that had been so long negotiating, before things came to extremities. It was accordingly signed on the 7th of August <sup>a</sup>: but the king not receiving, or else dissembling any knowledge of it, ordered Pont de Ce to be attacked on the 8th, which was very ill defended by the duke of Retz <sup>b</sup>; and with this action the war ended; for on the 9th the peace was proclaimed. The enemies of Richelieu say, that he sacrificed the queen and her party to his ambition; the friends of that great minister, on the contrary, assert, that he saved both her and them from the bad effects of their own imprudence: what afterwards happened has made the former sentiment generally prevail, though not supported by any conclusive evidence.

<sup>w</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

Luynes sacrifices the interest of France to his own.

By this treaty that of Angoulême was confirmed. Those who had taken arms for the queen <sup>b</sup> had an amnesty upon laying them down, and were continued in their posts, excepting such as the king had bestowed during the war. It was stipulated privately that the king should demand a cardinal's hat for the bishop of Luçon, and that prelate also promised his favourite niece to the nephew of the duke of Luynes. Their majesties had an interview at Brisac <sup>c</sup>, where the queen seemed to be thoroughly reconciled, and had many fair promises made her. Lewis, charmed with the success of this expedition, and very desirous of putting an end to these confederacies, advanced in the month of September to Bordeaux, in order to curtail the power of the duke of Mayenne, and, after settling his authority in those parts, marched into the principality of Bearn, to restore the church lands, and to establish the Catholic religion in a country where there were no Catholics, and at Navarins he caused mass to be said in his presence, fifty years after it had been abolished <sup>d</sup>. If the marquis de la Force, who was governor of that province, had not trimmed at first, and tried to reconcile his interest and his conscience, all this might have been prevented by the assistance of the Protestants, who then held an assembly at Rochelle; but now there was no remedy. In order to pacify the minds of the people, and prevent an effusion of blood, they were promised the continuance of their privileges, and the preservation of their old form of government; but, as soon as the king found himself absolute master, he, by an edict, united the principality of Bearn to the crown of France, erected the chancery of Pau into a parliament, and, by changing their form of government, suppressed their privileges at once <sup>e</sup>. In order to fix this establishment, he left garrisons in most of the strong places, and then returned to Bordeaux, and, after a short stay, <sup>d</sup> to Paris. Yet, notwithstanding these great exploits, the assembly of the Protestants continued sitting at Rochelle, though they had been ordered to disperse, under pain of being declared rebels <sup>f</sup>. Monsieur de Cadenet, second brother to Luynes, had the staff of marshal of France <sup>g</sup>, and the viscount d'Aubterre was likewise advanced to the same dignity, and had three hundred thousand livres given him, upon his surrendering the government of Blaye, which was given to the favourite's brother, and, which was more dishonourable for France, upon Cadenet's being <sup>e</sup> suffered to carry away the countess of Chaumes from the Netherlands. His brother Luynes undertook that no assistance should be given to the elector Palatine, who was lately become king of Bebemia; and several other steps were taken directly opposite to what was esteemed the true interest of France, from the same motives that had induced the court, the year before, to abandon the Arminian party in Holland, with so much visible discredit.

A. D. 1620.

Causes of the first civil-war against the Protestants during this reign.

As the assembly at Rochelle continued sitting, notwithstanding the king's repeated orders to dissolve, they were considered as rebels <sup>h</sup>, and the great object of the king's council was to devise ways and means for their utter destruction. According to the French historians in general, they drew this upon themselves, by throwing off the royal authority, establishing a sovereign council, dividing the provinces into circles, and, in short, establishing a republic agreeable to the genius of their religion in the heart of the monarchy <sup>i</sup>. This most certainly is a very proper picture of their conduct, supposing it drawn with a view, as it most apparently is, to justify the usage they met with; but, with the pencil of truth, we may describe it in very different colours. These Hugonots, republicans from the principles of their religion, had sacrificed their lives and fortunes to set Henry the fourth upon the throne, and had even consented to his change of religion, that he might sit there in peace, by which they had merited a legal establishment, which they obtained by the edict of Nantes, carefully drawn, maturely considered, fortified by the 'royal authority, registered by the parliament of Paris, and, in short, rendered stable and authentic by every method the law could devise <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espèron. DUPLEX. Histoire de Louis XIII. Articles accordez par le Roy à la Reine sa Mere, & en sa faveur à ceux qui l'on't assistée en ces dernières mouvemens, à Paris, 1620, 8vo. <sup>b</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. <sup>c</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espèron, tom. ii. liv. viii. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. L'entrevue du Roy & de la Reine sa Mere au Château de Brissac & du depuis à Tours, à Paris, 1620, 8vo. <sup>d</sup> BERN. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>e</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. P. DAN. Journal Historique de Louis XIII. <sup>f</sup> Histoire du Conestable de Lesdiguières. <sup>g</sup> Histoire du Regne de Louis XIII. tom. iv. p. 155. <sup>h</sup> Memoires de AMELOT DE LA HOUSSEY. <sup>i</sup> Memoires Jaques de Chastenot, Sieur de Puysegur. <sup>k</sup> Memoires de M. Deageant. GRAMOND Historia Gallia. Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

a NOTWITHSTANDING this, the court had begun to sow discord among their chiefs, were endeavouring to bribe some, to menace others, and, under various specious pretences, were sapping the very foundations of their establishment, in consequence of Luynes's plan, to ingratiate himself with the clergy and the zealous Catholics, in order to have a certain support, in case the royal favour should at any time fail <sup>1</sup>. This the very same writers confess, while they stigmatize with the odious name of rebellion, what, in reality, flowed from the natural desire of self-preservation. But the year before the queen-mother and the great lords of her party had formed a scheme, which, with full as much reason, might have been stiled a subversion of the French constitution, as it consisted in the framing four great councils, with the assistance and by the advice of which the king was to regulate all public affairs <sup>m</sup>. What the queen and her partizans were moved to from principles of convenience, the assembly at Rochebelle were driven to from motives of necessity; and as the former were instigated by the desire of sharing in power, authority, and wealth, with the king's favourite; the latter sought for the defence of their just rights, animated thereto by the most laudable of all principles, those of religion and law <sup>n</sup>. But of these the court had but a slender opinion, as having on their side notions of an opposite nature, the assumed powers of a church pretending to infallibility, and the dictates of young men, who esteemed every thing lawful that tended to gratify their passions. These, as far as we are able to judge, were the real causes of this destructive civil-war.

In order to accomplish this design of abasing, or rather of crushing the Hugonots, it was thought necessary to detach from their party the greatest man they had, who was, at the same time, the greatest man in France. This was the marshal duke de Lesdiguières, who, from a volunteer, had raised himself by his valour and capacity to the first honours, none of which he had ever sought. For the staff and the letters patent for duke and peer of France had been sent him, and now it was resolved to offer him the sword of constable, if he would qualify himself for it by embracing the tenets of the church of Rome <sup>o</sup>. It was a nice and delicate commission; and Luynes, guided by better heads than his own, made choice of one of the greatest masters of intrigue, the famous Deageant, who being clerk to Barbin, had undermined his master, contrived the ruin of d'Ancre, planned the greatness of Luynes, and was now alike hated and feared by him and all the ministers; yet so much esteemed by their master, that they durst not attempt his removal, but in this oblique manner, in giving him a commission to which no other man was equal. He had always lived in confidence with Lesdiguières; he knew the difficulty of the commission, and their motives for employing him; but he accepted it nevertheless <sup>p</sup>. He told them that it was impossible for him to succeed, if the marshal suspected his errand; and this obliged them to purchase for him the post of first president in the chamber of accounts at Grenoble, where Lesdiguières resided in quality of governor of Dauphine. Thither he went to take possession of his new employment, nor was it long before he accomplished the arduous affair with which he was charged <sup>q</sup>. But by that time the views of the favourite were changed, and Bouillon, another instrument of his, was sent to incline Lesdiguières to decline the very honour they had pressed upon him, that it might be given to Luynes: this negotiation was to have been a secret to Deageant, but the marshal consulted him upon it immediately, complained of his ill usage, and threatened to resent it <sup>r</sup>. Deageant, after aggravating the provocation, and observing that he also had cause to be displeased, told him that revenge was beneath a man of his character, whose merit set him above all honours; that, by asking the post of constable for Luynes, he would in reality bestow it, which was far greater than accepting it; and that by contenting himself with the office of marshal de camp general, he would retain the power, and make it visible to the world, that the king had given his favourite a gilded scabbard, instead of a sword, which he could not wield, and that, though with an inferior title, was intrusted with him. Lesdiguières took his advice, and, accepting the solid favours that were offered him, yielded a title to the favourite, which at once covered him with the envy of the court, and which, instead of the affection he had hitherto borne him, brought upon him first the suspicion, and then the hatred of the king <sup>s</sup>, who was jealous of an authority he could not manage, and quickly hated those to whom he trusted it for his own ease.

On the second of April the duke de Luynes was, with great ceremony, installed constable of France <sup>t</sup>; the scabbard and the pomel of the sword being adorned with jewels of the crown, to the value of thirty thousand crowns. His brother, who was already marshal of a France, and who was just returned from his embassy into England, was made duke and peer of France, by his wife's title of Chaulnes; and his second brother, having married the heiress of that illustrious family, assumed the title of the duke of Luxemburg. The king took the field in the beginning of May, accompanied by the new constable, the prince of Condé, the old count d' Auvergne, now duke of Angoulesme, the count de Soissons, the marshals de Chaulnes, Roquelaure, du Plessis Praslin, Lefdiguieres, and St. Geran<sup>u</sup>. The duke of Mayenne acted likewise under his orders, and the duke d' Espernon had already driven the marquis de la Force out of Bearn<sup>w</sup>. Indeed the great operations were begun long before, by bribing, promising, threatening, and exciting jealousies amongst the principal officers of the Protestants, as if the whole force of France had been too little, unless they had assisted to reduce themselves. b About the middle of the month, the town and castle of Saumur, their most important pass upon the Loire, was seized. Monsieur du Plessis Mornay making a scruple to resist the king<sup>x</sup>, a multitude of other places were reduced, taken, and burnt. About the middle of June the king besieged St. Jean d' Angeli in form; it was defended by Monsieur Soubise, brother to the duke of Rohan, and made a glorious defence; but, after a siege of thirty-five days, it was forced to submit, and the king spared the garrison, though without a capitulation<sup>y</sup>. The dukes of Bouillon and Tremouille, and Monsi. Chatillon, deserted the Protestants on this occasion. Clerac was taken after a short siege, but vigorous defence; and, on the 17th of August, the king invested Montauban, persuaded that the loss of this place would break the spirits of the Protestants. His army consisted of twenty-five thousand men; the place was strong, had c a numerous garrison, commanded by the marquis de la Force, who defended it with equal conduct and resolution. The siege was long and bloody, and, after remaining before it three months, the king was obliged to raise the siege, which cost the duke of Mayenne his life, with several other persons of distinction, and the new constable his reputation and his favour. The last stroke of his credit was the disgracing Father Arnoux, and the last negotiation of consequence was an attempt to detach the duke of Rohan from the Protestant interest, in which he failed<sup>z</sup>. The last great office he obtained was that of keeper of the seals, on the death of Monsi. du Vair, the chancellor having refused to accept of them when offered him. The king, after the fatigues of a long and bloody campaign against his own subjects, which ended with less success than it began, and which, in every instance of this dispute, gave him convincing d proofs that he was extirpating the bravest and best of his people, returned to Paris gloomy and dissatisfied, notwithstanding the acclamations of his courtiers, who would have persuaded him that he equalled Cæsar in courage, and Cato in virtue. It was indeed true, that in point of personal valour, and of skill too as an officer of foot, the king had acquired a just reputation; but he was sensible that it was at too great an expence, and that it was impossible to lay the foundation of true greatness in the ruin of his kingdom. Yet the priests and those in their interest besieged him so closely, that he would not listen to a general peace, but persisted in endeavouring to foment animosities amongst the Protestants, and to corrupt such as, whatever they pretended, had no religion but their interest, and no views but for themselves. By degrees this spirit universally prevailed, and, instead of virtue, honour, and regard for the e public good, nothing but cabal and intrigue was to be seen, even amongst those whose birth and rank ought to have taught them other paths to greatness.

<sup>1</sup> BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. AUBERT Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu. Memoires de M. Deageant. <sup>m</sup> Vie de du Plessis Mornay. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. Hist. du Connestable de Lesdiguières. <sup>o</sup> BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. Memoires de M. Deageant. Memoires de Bassompierre. Histoire du Regne de Louis XIII. tom. iv. p. 142—144. <sup>p</sup> DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>q</sup> Memoires de M. Deageant. <sup>r</sup> Histoire du Connestable de Lesdiguières. BERNARD. <sup>s</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>t</sup> Les Ceremonies Royales faites en Baillant, par les mains du Roy l'épee de Connestable à M. le Duc de Luynes, à Paris, 1621, in 8vo.

A. D. 1621.

A debate in the king's council, where those who were for continuing the war prevail.

THE king entered Paris in the month of January, having left the command of the forces about Montauban to the duke of Angoulesme, and the marshal de Themmines<sup>2</sup>. The cardinal de Rhetz and the count de Schomberg were at the head of affairs. The queen-mother had some degree of favour, but very little credit<sup>b</sup>. The policy of the ministers at this time, except with regard to the Protestants, whom they hated heartily, and persecuted furiously, was weak and full of duplicity: for while the king's ambassador, by his order, solicited at Rome a hat for the bishop of Lucon, the king himself informed the pontif that he could not oblige him more than by refusing it<sup>c</sup>. The prince of Condé, who loved money and power, solicited f Retz and Schomberg to admit him as their companion, that they might form a triumvirate, which he thought no intrigue could break. The war was carried on in another manner, even in the depth of winter, marshal Themmines forced Bourniquet and Negrepelisse, but the inha-

<sup>u</sup> Le Voyage du Roy à Calais, l'Ambassade de Monsi. de Cadenet en Angleterre, à Paris, 1621, 8vo. BERNARD. Hist. de Louis XIII.

<sup>w</sup> Histoire de la Vie du Duc d'Espéron, DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN, MALINGRE.

<sup>x</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, Vie de Du Plessis Mornay, Mercure Francois.

<sup>y</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, Memoires de Bassompierre, Veritable narré de ce qui s'est passé au siege de Saint Jean d'Angeli, tant dehors que dedans la ville, par R. F. MANCEAU, à Bordeaux, 1621, in 8vo.

<sup>z</sup> Histoire particuliere des plus memorables choses qui se sont passees au siege de Montauban, & de l'acheminement d'icelui dressé en forme de Journal, à Leide, 1624. Memoires de Bassompierre, BERNARD Hist. de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN, LE GEND. P. Henault.

<sup>a</sup> BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN, LE GEND.

<sup>b</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, Memoires de Puysegur.

<sup>c</sup> Vittoria Siri, Memoires recondites, Memoires Historiques & critiques, par AMELOT DE LA HOUSSEY, AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

a bitants of the latter rose upon the garrison, and cut them off to a man <sup>d</sup>. The duke d'Elbæuf beat the marquis de la Force on the first of February, and, before the end of the month, the marquis de Lesignan, with a small body of Protestants, recovered Clerac; the marshal Lesdiguières and the duke de Montmorency were also in the field. The former, who still wore the appearance of a Protestant, and who had a real concern for the miseries of his country, made use of his interest at court to suggest pacific counsels, and, at the same time, insinuated, that the war was now carried on with such circumstances of rage and fury, as was rather fit to depopulate countries than to reduce them <sup>e</sup>. The king caused this point to be debated in council, where the queen-mother, the chancellor de Sillery, the keeper of the seals, Mons. de Vie, and Mons. de Puiseux, argued very pathetically for peace. They were opposed by the prince of Condé, the cardinal de Retz, the duke de Guise, and the count de Schomberg, who insisted on the continuance of the war, in which they had all a visible interest; and, notwithstanding this, their arguments prevailed, chiefly by irritating the king by declamatory representations against the disloyalty of the Hugonots, and the cruelties they had exercised, all which might have been easily answered, if the marshal de Lesdiguières had been present: as it stood, the king was provoked, and resolved to command in person <sup>f</sup>.

The two circumstances that most affected the king were the death of the president du Crosse, <sup>The king de-</sup> and the invasion of Poitou. The president had been sent by the duke de Lesdiguières to treat <sup>feats M. Sou-</sup> with the duke of Rohan, at Montpellier; he was first president of the parliament of Grenoble, a <sup>bise.</sup> Protestant, and a person of great temper and moderation. The inhabitants of Montpellier, who placed all their hopes in the duke of Rohan, who knew Lesdiguières had left them, and who suspected the president, surmised that, under colour of a treaty of peace, he was come to detach Rohan from their interests, and, in the heat of this imagination, forty of them entered into a conspiracy to murder him, which they effected, in the most base and barbarous manner <sup>g</sup>. The duke of Rohan took all the pains imaginable to detect the offenders, but was able to seize no more than four, who were condemned and executed. The invasion of Poitou was made by M. Soubise, whom the king had treated with lenity at St. Jean d'Angeli. The forces he commanded were indigent; and, as it was not in his power to pay them, he could not prevent their plundering, which was attended with circumstances of violence and cruelty. The king, having assembled a small army of eight thousand foot and a thousand horse, marched directly d towards him in the beginning of April, upon which Soubise retired into the isle of Rbe, with about seven thousand men, and fortified himself there in the best manner he was able <sup>h</sup>. This island was separated from the continent by a small arm of the sea, which was fordable at low-water, but with great hazard. The king, accompanied by the prince of Condé, the flower of the nobility, and the best officers in his service, attacked him in the night, forced his intrenchments, and obliged him to escape with about four hundred men by swimming. Of his troops about fifteen hundred were killed, as many taken prisoners and sent to the galleys, the rest were knocked on the head by the peasants <sup>i</sup>. The courage and conduct of the king upon this occasion are highly magnified by Bassompierre.

In the beginning of May, the duke d'Elbæuf besieged Tomeins, which had been taken by the e marquis de la Force, who twice attempted to relieve it in the space of forty days that it was <sup>General peace</sup> defended. When taken it was burnt to ashes, in revenge for the blood that had been spilt in <sup>concluded.</sup> reducing it. Roan was taken in sixty days by marshal Vitri and the duke d'Espèron, but with considerable loss, and even of some persons of distinction. The marquis de la Force had thrown himself into the town of St. Foix. When summoned he declared he would surrender only to the king, which he did upon very favourable terms for the inhabitants; we may guess at the importance of his submission by the reward of it. He received from Lewis the staff of marshal of France, and two hundred thousand crowns in money, in consideration of the government of Bearn, which he had lost <sup>k</sup>. This had its effect; some of the greatest lords amongst the Hugonots, and particularly the duke of Sully, came in and rendered the places f they had. Negrepelisse was attacked in the beginning of June by the prince of Condé. It was resolved to make an example of the place and of the people, and, which is strange, it seemed to be resolved on both sides; for the inhabitants, when summoned, refused to accept of any terms: they sold their lives very dear, but at length it was forced, and the inhabitants, without respect of rank, sex, or age, except ten men, were put to the sword. When they were brought into the king's presence, he told them they did not deserve mercy; they answered they would not receive it; that the only favour they asked was to be hanged upon the trees in their own gardens, which was granted, and the place reduced to ashes <sup>l</sup>. The

<sup>d</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, BERNARD. Hist. de Louis XIII.

Lesdiguières, DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII.

BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.

Puysegur.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>k</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre, BERNARD Hist. de Louis XIII. MALINGRE, LE GENDRE.

du Duc de Rohan, Memoires de Puysegur, Duple. Histoire de Louis XIII. Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>e</sup> Histoire du Connestable de Les-

<sup>f</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre, Memoires du Duc de Rohan,

<sup>g</sup> GRAMOND Hist. Gallix, Hist. de Lesdiguières, Memoires de

<sup>i</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>l</sup> Memoires

town of St. Antoine was obstinately defended for twelve days, and was at length taken by storm, but it cost the lives of a great number of gallant officers. The count de Soissons was sent, towards the close of the month of June, to form the blockade of Rochelle. In July and August several places were taken by the king, the prince of Condé, and the duke of Vendôme; but in September, the king's forces were obliged to raise the siege of Bristle, which did not hinder the king's being prevailed upon to besiege Montpelier, notwithstanding the inhabitants offered to admit the duke de Lesdiguières. The prince, ever desirous of command, and ever unfortunate, here lost his credit and the king's troops. There fell before the place the young duke de Fronzac, Messieurs Beuvron, Canillac, Zamet, Senecé, Fabrigues, St. Brez, Lussun, and Monbrun. We may from this specimen guess at the miserable consequences of this war; to put an end to which, and to obtain an entrance into Montpelier, a general treaty was concluded with the duke of Rohan<sup>m</sup>, by which the edict of Nantes was confirmed, and, considering the sad events of the war, and the want of any resource, he obtained good terms for his party, with some advantage to himself, receiving a large sum of money for the places he had lost; but as this was owing to his credit with the chancellor and Monsieur Puyseux, he lost all interest at court when they were disgraced.

The king visits several provinces, and returns to Paris.

A. D. 1622.

By the conclusion of this peace it appeared that the prince of Condé had lost his credit. He was displeased at the giving the marshal's staff to the marquis de la Force, much more disturbed at the bestowing the constable's staff upon Lesdiguières, not at all less at the seals being given to Commartin; but the peace so chagrined him, that he resolved to make a tour into Italy, being no longer able to support himself after the death of the cardinal de Retz. The bishop of Luçon at last received his hat, and is henceforward to be stiled cardinal Richelieu<sup>n</sup>. The see of Paris was this year raised to the rank of an archbishoprick by Gregory the fifteenth, the bishops of Chartres, Meaux, and Orleans, being appointed his suffragans, and to them the bishop of Blois has been added since<sup>o</sup>. Besides the marquis de la Force, Charles de Crequi, who married successively two daughters of the constable Lesdiguières, Gaspar de Coligni, the Sieur de Chatillon, grandson to the famous admiral, and the gallant Francis de Bassompierre, were declared marshals of France<sup>p</sup>. The king made a public entry into Montpelier, Arles, Lyons, and Avignon, and, after passing part of the winter in the province, returned, at the close of the year, to Paris, where he was welcomed as a conqueror, though he came from the slaughter and destruction of his own subjects.

Quarrels among the ministers gradually ruin them
all.

THE war being over made way for disturbance and intrigue; the chancellor and his son Monsieur de Puyseux were in great credit, and very desirous of turning out the count de Schomberg, who was at the head of the finances, and, during the war with the Protestants, acted as master of the ordnance; and this had been effected much sooner than it was, if he had not been supported by the marshal de Bassompierre, to whom he had rendered many ill offices, and who did him this service from a mere principle of generosity, because he was his old acquaintance, and ill used<sup>q</sup>. The Protestants began again to murmur; for the chancellor and Puyseux, being warm Catholics, and having a strong bias in favour of Spain, were for tampering with the treaty of Montpelier, and trying to render the operations of peace, tho' more silently, yet not less destructive than those of war. The wise duke of Rohan, endeavouring to oppose this, was arrested at Montpelier, but, being equally able to do himself justice with his pen and with his sword, the king disavowed his ministers, and things were for a short time set to rights, though nothing was done towards a radical cure<sup>r</sup>. The queen-mother entered the privy-council, upon condition that her cardinal did not<sup>s</sup>, which, from his temper, it will be easily conceived, he could not bear. But it does not appear that he made any great efforts to force a passage into the council, believing that, as things then stood, and as the ministers and favourites were continually thwarting and exposing each other, it could not be long before the embarrassed state of affairs would oblige the king and his ministers to court his assistance, which hitherto, out of prejudice or envy, they had declined. Some, indeed, say, that, to amuse his chagrin, he composed some of those histories and censures on the times, which served to expose the blunders of the ministers, and to make it evident how dearly the public paid for the prosperity of a few private families. If this be true, he sacrificed his reason to his resentment, since it is very certain, that not only his own administration was attacked in the same manner, but some of the very pieces ascribed to him were reprinted against him in his turn. Yet, be this as it will, there is no doubt to be made, that in the conduct of foreign affairs, and perhaps in the management of the finances, these ministers acted upon a plan more suitable to their own interests than to those of their master. Instead of taking advantage of the troubles in Germany, where they might have employed the Protestants in support of the king of Bohemia, and prevented thereby the union of that kingdom to the

<sup>m</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

<sup>n</sup> AUBÉRI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>o</sup> BERNARD

Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>p</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre, Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

<sup>q</sup> Memoires de

Bassompierre.

<sup>r</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII.

BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.

Memoires du Duc de

Rohan, Mercure Francois.

<sup>s</sup> AUBÉRI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu, Memoires de Bassompierre.

hereditary

- a hereditary dominions of the house of Austria, they did not interfere at all, but suffered the emperor to overwhelm the Bohemian monarch, and not only strip him of that country, to which he had all the right that election could give, but to deprive him also of his hereditary dominions, and even of his title of elector. They took no pains to undeceive king James, but suffered him to persist in his idle and ill-judged scheme of a Spanish marriage, which, if it had taken effect, would scarce have been more prejudicial to his own interest than to theirs; nay, they fell directly into the same error, and, either through the fear of provoking, or the desire of obliging Spain, acted an under and inconsistent part in Italy. This year was fatal to the marshal duke de Bouillon, the marshal de St. Geran, and the famous Peter Jeanin, president of the parliament of Burgundy, who died at the age of eighty-four years<sup>1</sup>. A. D. 1623.
- b UPON the death of Commartin, keeper of the seals, the king restored them to the chancellor de Sillery, who, with his son Monsieur de Puisieux, secretary of state, continued to manage all things in conjunction with the marquis, afterwards duke, de Vieuville, whom they had raised to the direction of the finances, in the room of the count de Schomberg, who had been their enemy, and to whom they were no friends<sup>2</sup>. The gratitude of Vieuville, if he ever had any, did not subsist long; he began to give the king ill impressions of many people about him, but chiefly of the chancellor and his son: with respect to the former, amongst the mildest of his suggestions, were his infirmities and incapacity; in reference to the latter, he objected his presumption, and his sending instructions to ambassadors at foreign courts, often without the advice of the council, sometimes without speaking to his majesty, and other things, which, by degrees, sunk into the king's mind. As a proof of it he gave the seals to Monsieur Aligre, at the beginning of the year; soon after he gave audiences to foreign ministers, when Monsieur de Puisieux was not present<sup>3</sup>. This was such a mark of that family's declining, as encouraged all their enemies to communicate their sentiments to the king: amongst these was the queen mother, and the prince of Condé, now returned from Italy, who, though they could concur in nothing else, agreed well enough in running down the chancellor and his son: the queen disliked them for not allowing her a larger share of power; the prince of Condé for the same reason, but chiefly because they had advised the peace, by which he lost his influence. At length, in the month of February, the king sent them a message to retire from court, adding, that he had received many accusations against them, into which he was unwilling to inquire; that they might justify themselves if they pleased, but at their peril. The chancellor, old and worn out, submitted without reply; but Monsieur Puisieux answered, the accusations were calumnies, and that he was both able and willing to defend himself; however, they both retired<sup>4</sup>. The departments of war and of foreign affairs, both of which were in the hands of Puisieux, were, for the present, divided amongst three secretaries. The king's cabinet-council consisted at this time of the cardinal de la Rochefoucault, the constable de Lesdiguières, the keeper of the seals Aligre, the duke de Vieuville, sur-intendant of the finances, and Monsieur de Bouillon<sup>5</sup>. The queen-mother laid hold of this opportunity to press the admission of Richelieu into the council, to which Vieuville was extremely averse; but the queen-mother, to whom he had great obligations, being very importunate, he told her that she did not know the man, and that he foresaw his own ruin, and feared her's; but that, as she contributed to his fortune, he would risk it rather than lose her favour<sup>6</sup>. The king himself was little inclined to it, and, to qualify it, declared that he admitted him only as a member who was to speak his sentiments of what came before the council, and who was not to confer with ambassadors, or transact any other business as a minister at his own house<sup>7</sup>. The cardinal, in accepting this limitation, converted it into a favour; he told his friends that the weakness of his constitution rendered him unfit for the load of public business, which had induced his majesty to render it as easy to him as possible, by annexing a condition for which he was more grateful than for the honour of entering into the council. This, however, was no small honour, since, in virtue of his ecclesiastical dignity, he was seated over against the cardinal de Rochefoucault, and above the constable, though the secretaries had formerly disputed with him the precedence<sup>8</sup>.

A TREATY of marriage had been some time depending between Charles prince of Wales and the princess Henrietta-Maria, the youngest sister of the king. The earls of Holland and Carlisle were sent over ambassadors from England upon this occasion, and, notwithstanding the limitation before-mentioned, the nature of the thing made it requisite to put the cardinal at the head of the committee of the council who were to manage this alliance, and the great address he shewed in conducting this affair, which was violently opposed by the court of Rome, placed

<sup>1</sup> Mercure Francois, LE GRAIN, MALINGRE, LE GEND.

<sup>2</sup> Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>3</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>4</sup> Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>5</sup> Histoire du Regne de Louis XIII. tom. v. p. 343, 344.

<sup>6</sup> Memoires pour l'Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, Memoires de Deageant.

<sup>7</sup> Dupl. Histoire de Louis XIII. BERNARD

<sup>8</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>9</sup> Mercure Francois, DUPLEIX Histoire de

<sup>10</sup> Memoires pour l'Histoire

<sup>11</sup> Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu, BERNARD.

him at the head of the administration<sup>c</sup>. Vienville had long affected that post, and, by endeavouring either to ruin or remove such as he disliked, or who disliked him, he excited such a number of complaints, that the cardinal found it no difficult matter to dispossess him of the king's favour, and even to send him prisoner to the castle of Amboise<sup>d</sup>, as he had done colonel Ornano, governor to the king's brother, to the Bastille. On his disgrace Marillac came into the direction of the finances; but the cardinal took care to have such a distinct account of all their departments, that the lesser ministers had it not in their power to conduct things at their pleasure, or to dispute the orders of the cardinal<sup>e</sup>, any more than of the king. But though he disgraced his rivals, or rather procured their disgrace, he paid a proper regard to the merit of their plans, and on this score he adopted that of Luynes for the suppression of the Protestants, provoking them, by the breach of several articles of the last treaty, to take up arms, that they might be said to bring the war upon themselves. From the like motive he pursued the measures which Vienville had begun, for giving a new turn to the affairs of Italy, where, though a treaty had been entered into with the Venetians and the duke of Savoy, for abasing the power of the Spaniards, yet hitherto nothing had been done towards carrying it into execution: but Richelieu no sooner entered into power, than he sent the marquis de Cœuvres, with the title of ambassador-extraordinary, to the Grisons, where, instead of negotiating, he put himself at the head of an army, and, expelling the pope's troops, made himself master of the Valtelline<sup>f</sup>. This occasioned some warm expostulations at Rome, which, however, made no impression upon Richelieu, who roundly told the nuncio that he had the character of the king's minister, as well as a prince of the church, and that he meant to support both; it produced as strong expostulations on the side of the Spaniards; but the cardinal having concluded a treaty of subsidy with the states general, and knowing how well the English were disposed to enter into a league against Spain, was as little moved by them<sup>g</sup>. At home, the old chancellor dying in October, the seals were given to Aligre<sup>h</sup>. The king being upon ill terms with his consort, and extremely jealous of his brother, found it necessary to live in perfect harmony with the queen-mother, so that the cardinal was safe from all intrigues in appearance, and, it may be, in his own opinion; but this calm did not continue long.

A. D. 1624. Charles I. of England marries the princess Henrietta-Maria of France. As the prudence and political skill of the minister had been exercised in the preceding year, so his courage and diligence were employed in this both by a civil and a foreign war. But before we speak of these, let us observe, that the marriage between the prince of Wales and the princess Henrietta-Maria, which had been concluded in the preceding November, was now celebrated with great pomp, on the 11th of May, the nuptial benediction being given by cardinal de Rochefoucault, the duke de Chevreuse being proxy for Charles, now become king of England<sup>i</sup>. Her Britannic majesty quitted that city soon after, and was conducted by the court to Amiens, where she was met by the king's great confident, who, upon this occasion, behaved so imprudently, as to incur the deep resentment of cardinal Richelieu, and the general hatred of the French nation<sup>k</sup>. At this time, as a very judicious Italian historian<sup>l</sup> truly observes, the misfortunes of Europe began under three young kings, none of whom wanted talents for government if they would have employed them, and who, notwithstanding, gave themselves up to a kind of implicit obedience towards their favourites, Lewis the thirteenth to cardinal Richelieu, Philip the fourth to the conde Olivarez, and Charles the first to the duke of Buckingham. Of these the second was the most indefatigable, the latter the most open and generous, the first, beyond question, the wisest and most fortunate.

The second war with the Protestants in this reign ended by the peace of Rochelle. If we credit the French historians, the second war with the Protestants in this reign was begun by Monsieur de Soubise, even without the concurrence of his own party, in contempt of the royal authority, and in a time of full peace. The truth of the matter is this; by the treaty of Montpelier that town was to be left free, and Rochelle in the same condition as before the war; but, notwithstanding, a garrison had been hitherto left in the former, and Fort Lewis, which had been erected during the war, had a strong garrison left in it to curb the latter<sup>m</sup>. But the immediate cause of the second rupture was the equipping a squadron of the king's ships, in the port of Blouet, now l'Orient, in order to block up Rochelle; in this critical situation Monsieur de Soubise offered with a few ships to enter into that port, take or destroy the vessels that he found there, and ruin the magazines prepared for their destruction. He consented, in case he miscarried, to be disowned, chusing rather certain ruin to himself than to hazard the Protestant interest. His enterprize was betrayed; he executed it, notwithstanding, entered the port, took the ships, and, after being blocked up there many weeks, with the advantage of a strong wind forced a passage, and carried out his own squadron and a his prizes, except two that were lost<sup>n</sup>. His brother the duke of Rohan soon after took up arms<sup>o</sup>, and the war was carried on with great vivacity, though the best part of the Protestants were afraid to own the cause of the two brothers, who from thence were exposed to many misfortunes. About the middle of September, the maritime powers being then in alliance with France, the duke of Montmorency, with a fleet composed of French, English, and Dutch ships, attacked that of Rochelle, and beat them, not without great loss, after which he reduced the islands of Rhé and Oleron<sup>p</sup>. However, the clamours of the nation having obliged king Charles to promise succour to the Rochellers, the earl of Holland and Sir Dudley Carleton were sent over to mediate a peace, which had been already granted to the rest of the Reformed; and, having succeeded in this, at the beginning of the ensuing year, the king of Great Britain, b by the consent of Lewis the thirteenth, became guarantee for the performance of it, of which the principal article was, that Fort Lewis should be demolished in six months; so that, notwithstanding their losses by the war, the Protestants were gainers by the peace<sup>q</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires de Deageant, LE GRAIN.<sup>d</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.<sup>e</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre, Memoires de Deageant.<sup>f</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu, DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII.<sup>g</sup> Memoires de Deageant, Memoires de Bassompierre, BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.<sup>h</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII.<sup>i</sup> Mercure Francois, BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN, MALINGRE.<sup>k</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. BERNARD, LE GENDRE.<sup>l</sup> BATT. NANI.<sup>m</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN, MALINGRE.

As to the war in Italy, the constable Lefdiguieres, and his son the marshal Crequi, carried it on in quality of auxiliaries to the duke of Savoy, in shew against the Genoese, in fact against Moncon.
the Spaniards, at first with great success, afterwards with some loss; but the Spaniards, entering Piedmont, and besieging Verue, were forced to raise it, and the army of the duke of Feria was beat in its retreat<sup>r</sup>. The Spanish court caused all the French vessels in the harbours of its dominions to be seized, and all the goods belonging to French subjects, in the month of April; and in May Lewis the thirteenth caused the ships and effects of all Spanish subjects to be seized c in his dominions<sup>s</sup>. The pope sent cardinal Barberini to prevent a rupture between the two crowns, to which they were well enough inclined; and, in the spring of the succeeding year, there was a treaty concluded at Moncon<sup>t</sup>, but without the interposition of the legate, by which the sovereignty of the Valtelline was secured to the Grisons, the passages were left to their disposition, and the exercise of the popish religion exclusively was established, which terms were not so favourable to France and her allies as those of the former treaty; but the situation of things made a peace at that time necessary, for reasons that will appear hereafter, though it seemed more explicit to carry on the account of these wars to their period, than to embarrass the reader with the termination of them in the exact order of time. Within the course of this year the marshal's staff was given at length to Henry count de Schomberg<sup>u</sup>, a man of great d abilities in civil and military affairs, who had been employed in many embassies with credit, who had served as master of the ordnance, and as sur-intendant of the finances, and who was equally capable of deciding in the cabinet and commanding in the field. A.D. 1625.
As the cardinal had incurred the hatred of all the zealous Catholics, and of the partizans of Spain, by entering into the war of Italy, so, by the conclusion of the peace before-mentioned, he exasperated the allies of France, and raised up many new enemies, without recovering any of those whom he sought to oblige. In reality there never were worse or more wicked times, or a court in which men were more attached to their interests and their vices, or had less tincture of honour, virtue, and religion, than this; the king had been very early jealous of his brother, and that from the meanest principle possible, the apprehension of superior parts, e accompanied with a most engaging and affable behaviour, and supported by noble and generous sentiments. The Sieur de Breves, who was his governor<sup>v</sup>, was removed without any reason given, there being no colour to be assigned; and the true reason who could give?
He had a gratification of fifty thousand crowns, and Luynes, who was then the favourite, placed about him his own old master the count de Lude, who quickly tainted his pupil with the love of pleasure, and, among other unprincely qualities, taught him to swear. On the death of that nobleman he was committed to the care of colonel Ornano, who, instead of taking any pains to efface the ill impression made by his predecessor, acquired an influence over him, by a condescension fatal to persons of his rank<sup>w</sup>. To gratify his own ambition, he put him upon demanding entrance into the council of state when he was scarce sixteen, and it f was for this that Vieuville caused Ornano to be arrested. Monsieur expressed great concern; and when Richelieu entered into the ministry, he caused him to be set at liberty, and restored to his office; notwithstanding which, Ornano now set him at the head of a party, into which all the cardinal's enemies entered, and certainly meditated very bad designs. The pretence, for it was no more, was an opposition to his marriage.

His father Henry the fourth, upon the death of the duke of Montpensier, who left an only daughter, had expressed a desire, that, if his son lived, he should marry her, as a princess of the blood, and one of the greatest heiresses in France. The queen-mother had this always in view, the cardinal minister promoted it for that reason; the duke of Guise, who had married
the

<sup>n</sup> GRAMOND Histor. Gallie.

<sup>o</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

<sup>p</sup> Memoires de Puysegur.

<sup>q</sup> CLARENDON'S History of the Rebellion.

<sup>r</sup> Histoire du Connestable de Lefdiguieres.

<sup>s</sup> DUPL.

Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN.

<sup>t</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

<sup>u</sup> DUPL. Histoire de

Louis XIII.

<sup>v</sup> VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite, Memoires de Bassompierre, BERNARD Histoire de

Louis XIII.

<sup>w</sup> Memoires de Deageant, Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

Who becomes the head of a faction against the cardinal,

who ruins it.

the duchess-dowager of Montpensier, was very desirous of it likewise. The cabal formed against it acted only from motives of interest and ambition. At the head of it was the queen, who was afraid of seeing the issue of that marriage when she had none of her own: the duke of Savoy went into this opposition, out of resentment to the late peace, and offered him secretly, by the abbe Scaglia his ambassador, the young princess of Mantua, his grand-daughter. The prince of Condé and the count de Soissons were vehemently against it, from the common motive of its removing them farther from the succession; the duke of Vendosme and his brother the grand prior, from their hatred of the cardinal minister, and many others from the same principle; and the king himself, from the natural jealousy of his temper, was at first little inclined to it; but his favourite Barradas having hinted, whether true or false, that there was a faction formed, which had in view the shutting him up in a monastery, placing his brother upon the throne, and marrying him to the queen, he changed his opinion, and became very warm in favour of the princess of Montpensier<sup>1</sup>. In order to engage Ornano to employ his influence with Monsieur, he was promised the staff of marshal of France; and this giving his pupil a fair occasion, he pressed the performance of it so vehemently, that it was given him in the beginning of April<sup>2</sup>; notwithstanding which he entered into the scheme formed by the abbe Scaglia to murder the cardinal at a hunting match, which was prevented by the information of Henry de Talleraude, count of Chalais, master of the wardrobe to the king, who was drawn into it by his mistress the duchess of Chevreuse. The cardinal avoided the danger, and concealed the intelligence<sup>3</sup>. Soon after marshal de Ornano was arrested and sent to the Bastile, which irritated Monsieur extremely. He demanded of cardinal Richelieu, whether it was done by his advice? "Yes, Sir," answered the cardinal, "I was one of those who advised it"<sup>4</sup>. He put the same question to the chancellor, who through want of courage denied it<sup>5</sup>, upon which the seals were immediately taken from him, and given to Marillac, a creature of the queen-mother's. Monsieur, by the advice of his confederates, and particularly of the count of Chalais, whom the duchess had again embarked, formed a new design of seizing the person of the cardinal, and exchanging him for the marshal de Ornano; but this likewise proved abortive<sup>6</sup>. The king making a journey to Blois, and leaving Richelieu behind, an opinion prevailed that he was disgraced; but this was only a feint to draw the duke of Vendosme thither, who, with his brother the grand prior, was arrested and sent prisoner to the castle of Vincennes<sup>7</sup>. The count of Chalais was likewise seized, Deageant, Modena, and some others, sent to the Bastile; upon which the count de Soissons withdrew from court, and soon after retired into Italy<sup>8</sup>.

He marries the princess of Montpensier, but his favourites suffer notwithstanding. MONSIEUR being left to himself, and the princess of Montpensier, who had been left at Paris, coming to join the court at Nantes, he either conceived a sudden passion for her, or thought to mollify his brother by his marriage, which he concluded privately, on the 6th of August, cardinal Richelieu giving the nuptial benediction<sup>9</sup>. In respect to himself, it had very good effects; the duchies of Orleans and Chartres, and the county of Blois, were settled upon him as his appenage; the princess brought him the duchies of Montpensier and Cbatelleraut, and he had also very considerable pensions assigned on the treasury<sup>10</sup>. But, with respect to his friends, it wrought no such favourable operations as he expected. A special commission was appointed for the trial of the count de Chalais, by which he was condemned as guilty of high treason, for having advised Monsieur to retire out his brother's dominions, though himself was in the king's immediate service. Chalais, either through hopes of life, through weakness of mind, or to unburden his conscience, made a very ample confession, which availed him nothing, for he lost his head, and died with great steadiness and constancy<sup>11</sup>. Marshal Ornano had probably shared the same fate, if he had not died of a fever and retention of urine in the Bastile, where, in the most solemn manner, and in the last moments of his life, he disclaimed all knowledge of any treasonable practices<sup>12</sup>. The enemies of Richelieu say, that, as he was enamoured of the duchess of Chevreuse, he gave a loose to his resentment on this occasion; that, by giving Chalais false hopes, he drew him to confess what he would, and then abandoned him to his sentence; and that his intrigues in the course of this affair were as inexcusable as the conduct of the conspirators. These, however, are but suspicions, or assertions at the most; whereas the facts stand upon record, verified by undoubted evidence. But they say the truth, that he acted very ill, in having recourse to a special commission, where the criminal might have been convicted in the ordinary course of justice, setting up a dangerous

<sup>1</sup> VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite, Memoires de Deageant, Memoires du Duc de Rohan, BATT, NANI, AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu, Memoires de M. de la Rochefoucault, Memoires d'un Favori du Duc d'Orleans.

<sup>2</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>3</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>4</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite, Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>5</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite. <sup>6</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>7</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite. <sup>8</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>9</sup> Histoire de Louis XIII. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GEND. <sup>10</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre, VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite.

<sup>11</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

a precedent, of which too much use was afterwards made. Be that as it will, he turned the storm his enemies had raised upon themselves, established himself more firmly than ever in his administration, created an opinion in the king that his power was absolutely requisite to his majesty's preservation, and procured, for the safety of his own person, a new and very singular prerogative, by having guards assigned him, who accompanied him every where, even when he went to court <sup>1</sup>.

THE dissipation of this conspiracy did not hinder its having very untoward consequences. The duchess de Chevreuse, the widow of the constable Luynes, for whom the king had once a strong affection, and who, after she was hated by him, had an absolute influence over his queen, and might have had it over his minister, retired into Lorraine, and set on foot fresh intrigues <sup>m</sup>. The count de Soissons was not idle at Rome; but the person who did the most mischief was the abbe Scaglia, whom his master the duke of Savoy sent over into England, where he wrought himself into the good graces of the duke of Buckingham, induced him to prevail upon the king his master to send home all his consort's French servants, except the chaplain, which produced such a misunderstanding between the courts, as obliged Lewis the thirteenth to send over marshal Bassompierre to negotiate a reconciliation <sup>n</sup>. But neither was this all; for that active and artful Italian, bent upon making a war between the two nations, induced the same English favourite to enter into a strict correspondence with the duke of Rohan; and having the fair pretence of his Britannic majesty's being guarantee of the last treaty with the Protestants, gave him such hopes as proved the source of fresh troubles <sup>o</sup>. Several persons of great rank died this year, particularly the constable Lesdiguières, who, if he had not sullied his many great qualities by as great vices, might have been very justly considered as one of the most illustrious, as well as one of the most fortunate, persons this kingdom ever produced. The marshals de Roquelaure, du Plessis Praslin, and Souvre, died likewise <sup>p</sup>. Towards the end of the year there was an assembly of the notables held at the Thuilleries, from whence, though great things were expected, yet very little was produced, except an edict against duels, by which the offenders were degraded from their nobility. The government of Bretagne being taken from the duke of Vendosme, was, by the advice of Richelieu, conferred on the marshal de Themmines, which was thought so much the more extraordinary, as his son had killed the cardinal's brother <sup>q</sup>.

d THE king being informed of the bad state of his marine, and, at the same time, being unwilling to aggrandize the duke of Montmorency, who was at that time admiral, obtained his resignation of that high office for an equivalent, and then suppressed it, as he likewise did that of constable, by an edict at the beginning of the year. It was never intended to revive the latter, but the affairs of the marine were immediately committed to cardinal Richelieu, who, some months after, had in effect the power of admiral conferred upon him, with the title of grand-master and sur-intendant of navigation<sup>r</sup>, calculated to lessen the envy of this new dignity, without diminution of his power. Another effect of his influence was the disgrace of Barradas, the king's favourite, who began to presume too much on his master's inclination towards him; but, because he could not be without a favourite, St. Simon was introduced in his room. As the former had enjoyed his favour but six months, the fortune of Barradas is become proverbial in France for a short-lived prosperity. It was likewise found convenient for the court to change, or at least to seem to change, its maxims; and, because this is a point of great importance to the right understanding of this history, the reader will not be displeased if we bestow some pains to set it in a right light, the rather, because we know not whither to refer him for competent satisfaction. All writers agree, that cardinal Richelieu, from the time he entered into the administration, had two great points in view, the humbling the Protestants, and ruining the power of the house of Austria; and they all agree that he persisted firmly in the execution of both parts of his scheme, and at length brought them to bear <sup>s</sup>. We agree with them in all this; but we think there is something in the manner of his doing it, which very much wants to be explained. The matter is no more than this: at his first entrance into the ministry, he intended to begin with reducing the power of the house of Austria, to which he had many just motives, yet had been neglected by Luynes, from personal considerations: it was become highly formidable to France, as the emperor aimed at an absolute sovereignty in Germany, at the same time that the king of Spain was on the very point of completing the like design in Italy; it might be attempted with conveniency, because the princes in Germany, in Italy, the crown of Great Britain, and the republic of Holland, were very well disposed to enter into a league with France for this purpose. The

Aquarrel with England, death of Lesdiguières, and assembly of notables.

The cardinal runs great hazard by venturing to change his political system.

<sup>1</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>m</sup> DUPLEIX, Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires du

Duc de Rohan. RUSHWORTH'S Collection, tom. i. p. 423.

<sup>o</sup> BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>p</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>q</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>r</sup> Memoires de

Bassompierre. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>s</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII.

BERNARD

Histoire de Louis XIII. LE GRAIN. MALING. Memoires de Bassompierre. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite.

cardinal, therefore, like an able politician as he was, resolved to avail himself of these advantages, and began to do it vigorously, by sending the marquis de Cœuvres to recover the Valteline, and by assisting the duke of Savoy.

This matter fully explained.

BUT when he found that, in consequence of these steps, the court of Rome took the alarm in as high a degree as the court of Madrid, and began to treat him as a heretic, or at least as a friend to heretics, and that this gave great spirits to the remainder of the Spanish faction in France, he thought it requisite to alter his conduct, that is, as to the manner of executing his projects, though not as to the projects themselves. He had before endeavoured to cajole the Protestants, by insinuating his inclination to curb the power of Spain; he now gave the emissaries of Rome and Spain to understand that they should proceed, though more slowly, yet more surely, against the Hugonots, under a shew of peace than in a time of war, and if he abandoned the duke of Savoy, it was to save the Valteline, which he thought absolutely necessary, to preserve things in the situation they were in, till he should be in a condition to execute the other part of his plan. He certainly executed his scheme with all the prudence imaginable; but notwithstanding this, he found, as we have shewn before, almost as much danger in this sudden transition as in adhering to his former plan<sup>t</sup>. The Spaniards did not in the least abate of their suspicions; the duke of Savoy was equally violent and implacable in his resentments, the English, with good reason, charged him with insincerity; as having given them hopes, and, it may be, assurances, of joining with them against Spain; and the princes of Germany were no less offended, as being disappointed in reference to the hopes they had entertained of a general confederacy, which was negotiating at the Hague, and which proved ineffectual, from this change in the cardinal's measures. But above all, the Protestants in France were most alarmed, and with most reason. They saw many of their cautionary places taken from them, popish magistrates introduced in most of their great towns, a citadel building at Montpelier, and the port of Rochelle in a manner blocked up by the fort of St. Lewis, and by the garrison in the isle of Oleron, in which the fortifications were erected, and the garrison paid, at the cardinal's own expence<sup>u</sup>.

Source of the war with England, and the Protestants in his own dominions.

WE have before observed, that, by the advice of the duke of Buckingham, who governed all in the English court, overtures had been made to the Protestants in France of assistance from England. These were made through the duke of Soubise, who then lived an exile there, and, as it was very natural, were made by him to his brother the duke of Rohan, who declined a correspondence with the duke of Buckingham, as it might prove dangerous to him, considering that his own court held him in continual suspicion; but he sent over Monsieur St. Blancard to lay before the English court the state of their affairs, and afterwards received an agent from the duke of Buckingham, with whom he consulted every thing<sup>v</sup>. The English agent, if we may depend upon the duke of Rohan, promised more than it was possible to perform; for he gave him hopes of three invasions, one in Dauphine, one at Rochelle, and another at the mouth of the Garonne: on the other hand, the duke of Rohan promised to join the English with a considerable body of troops as soon as they were landed; and there is good reason to believe that the English court understood that the duke of Rohan treated for the whole Protestant interest in France<sup>x</sup>. In consequence of this negotiation, the English began to seize and take French ships; and the duke of Buckingham, framing to himself an idea of making some impression upon that court by talking high, came over in quality of ambassador; but whatever his notions were in this respect, he found himself much mistaken, returned full of resentment<sup>y</sup>, and the court of France having made reprisals, a rupture presently followed, though without the usual formality of declarations<sup>z</sup>. The French attribute this conduct of Buckingham to his passion for the first lady in the French court in the first place, and in the next to his violent aversion to the cardinal, of which there is no doubt. But it may not be amiss to observe, that there was something more, and the duke's conduct was not quite so extravagant as it is generally represented. We have seen that, at the time of king Charles's marriage with the sister of Lewis XIII. the first public transaction of Richelieu's ministry, and in which he acted with so much vigour as to threaten the court of Rome to proceed without a dispensation if they continued to delay it, there was all along a tacit presumption that France would concur with England in the war against Spain, and upon the cardinal's suggesting that it was impossible for him to take this measure, if the people of Rochelle were not obliged to accept a peace, Buckingham was drawn in to send some of his master's ships to the assistance of the French, which raised the spirit of the whole English nation against him, and was made one of the principal grounds of an impeachment. Upon this Buckingham, like Richelieu, changed his plan, and urged the French court to conclude a reasonable peace with the

<sup>t</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. AUBERT Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu. <sup>u</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. <sup>v</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. RUSHWORTH'S Collection, tom. i. p. 424. <sup>x</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. RUSHWORTH'S Collection, tom. i. <sup>y</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, liv. iv. <sup>z</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII.

- <sup>a</sup> Rochellers, and became security to them for its performance, in case they accepted it. But after they had accepted it, and he found that France would neither concur with England in carrying on the war against Spain, nor perform the treaty with the Protestants, Buckingham had no other way left, more especially after the miscarriage of the fleet he sent against Cadiz, of making his peace with the English nation, but to break, as he did, with the French court, in support of the French Protestants; and it was not so much a mistake in his measures, as his misconduct in the execution of them, that ruined this favourite <sup>a</sup>. The cardinal, on the other hand, ever present to himself, and equal in all respects to the vast designs he had in hand, laid hold of this opportunity to conclude a treaty with Spain <sup>b</sup> against the English, by which he brought the Spanish faction in France to act with him. At the same time he concluded another treaty with Holland, <sup>b</sup> by which he granted them an annual subsidy of a million for the support of their war against Spain <sup>c</sup>; and, when the Spaniards represented against this, he told them that it was only to prevent their giving assistance to England and to the Rochellers; whereas he meant it as a temporary assistance, till he had brought affairs into such order as would enable him to make use of their alliance for the other parts of his plan.

In the midst of these political intrigues, the duchess of Orleans, after being delivered on the 29th of May of a daughter, died on the 4th of June following, which was an event of very great consequence <sup>d</sup>. The duke, after his marriage, loved his consort with so warm and so steady an affection, and she behaved so prudently, that, instead of those jealousies and disquiets which hitherto had disturbed and distracted the royal family, all was perfectly quiet and serene. But with her this peace might be said to expire. His old humours revived in the king; he could not forbear expressing an indecent satisfaction, that the child was a daughter and not a son, with which also the queen seemed pleased <sup>e</sup>. Hints were given to the duke of Orleans's favourites that they should spare no pains to amuse and divert him, and that, if any extraordinary sums were necessary to enliven his pleasures, they should be supplied. The cardinal also, in order to contribute to this, parted with his house at Limours to him; and it was besides intimated to the queen-mother, that she should not disturb herself too much with the thoughts of finding another consort for her son, a piece of advice she could not either relish or excuse <sup>f</sup>. But, to shew how little strength there is in the best-laid schemes, these precautions were scarce conceived before it was found necessary to lay them aside. The king fell dangerously ill <sup>g</sup>, and the news coming of the English invasion, it from thence became requisite to put the duke of Orleans at the head of the army, a measure to which the minister was little inclined, and which, however, he knew not how to avoid. The dukes of Buckingham and Rohan might have derived from hence and from other circumstances considerable advantages, if their schemes had been better conducted; but, as we shall see, they were either so ill concerted, or were attended with such a series of inevitable misfortunes, as put it out of their power to draw any advantage from an armament, very puissant in itself, and which had been furnished by the crown of England at an immense expence.

THE duke came before Rochelle on the 20th of July, with a fleet of upwards of one hundred sail of men of war and transports, and between seven and eight thousand land forces on board <sup>a</sup>. But, to his surprize, the people of Rochelle shut their gate and their port against him, taking all possible precautions to prevent his sending so much as a messenger into the place <sup>b</sup>. The duke of Rohan says expressly, that the cause of this was the mayor and principal magistrates being in the interest of the court; but, whatever the cause of it might be, the fleet proved equally fatal to the Rochellers and to himself. The consort of the duke of Rohan and his mother, having fled to Rochelle for shelter, found means, with great difficulty, to bring in Monsieur Soubise, who came over with Buckingham, and he at last prevailed for the admission of Sir William Beecher, the agent of that duke, to declare to them the end and design of his coming, which he did in very pathetic terms <sup>c</sup>, alleging that the king of Great Britain, having induced them to make a peace on the strongest assurances of liberty and security, being informed that they had neither, that they were in the utmost danger of being blocked up, and knew not how to prevent it, or to defend themselves, and having, in vain, endeavoured to procure the advantages stipulated by them for the treaty, through the interposition of his good offices with the court of France, had sent the lord high admiral of England to effect by force what had been denied him in quality of ambassador. The magistrates and people of Rochelle returned their thanks to his Britannic majesty for his care and kindness; said they were a part only of the Protestant body in

Death of the duchess of Orleans (Montpensier), and the consequences to the state.

Duke of Buckingham comes before Rochelle with a powerful fleet and army.

<sup>a</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. Memoires de Bassompierre. Lord CLARENDON's History of the Rebellion.
<sup>b</sup> DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>c</sup> AUB. Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.
<sup>d</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. Memoires de Deageant.
<sup>e</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. <sup>f</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. <sup>g</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>h</sup> RUSHWORTH's Collection, tom. i. p. 425. <sup>i</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.
<sup>k</sup> RUSHWORTH's Collection, tom. i. p. 426.

France; that they must consult their brethren before they could return him any definitive answer<sup>1</sup>; and thus the duke was left to take what measures he judged most expedient. If, as the duke of Rohan truly observes, the Rochellers, instead of asking the advice of their brethren, had demanded their assistance, they had done their business before the court could have been in any condition to have opposed them<sup>m</sup>; or if the duke of Buckingham had followed the advice given him by the duke of Soubise, who unfortunately left him, to go and confer with the chiefs of the Protestant party, and had made a descent in the island of Oleron, which is very fertile, was in a manner intirely inhabited by Protestants, where the fortifications were not half raised, and in which there were but few troops, he could not have failed of success, and of obliging the French to abandon the isle of Rhe, which he might have attacked on all sides. But so it was, that he changed his mind, made a descent in that island, where Monsieur Thoiras commanded, and, having beat him at his landing, might, if he had followed his victory, have carried the only place of strength in the island by surprize<sup>n</sup>; but, wasting some days in encamping his troops and landing his equipage, Monsieur de Thoiras carried in all the provision he could collect into his fortress, and made the best disposition possible for sustaining a siege in a fort of four bastions, two of which were but half finished.

The duke of Buckingham retires out of the isle of Rhe with dishonour.

As this affair was unluckily begun, it was prosecuted in all respects with the same ill fortune, and, to say the truth, with the same ill conduct. The duke of Buckingham besieged fort St. Martin's in form, but without taking the precautions that were necessary. The besieged had at first abandoned a well which was absolutely necessary for them, but they speedily recovered and fortified it. The duke thought it beneath him to attack the small fort of la Pree, which, however, covered the landing-place, enabled the small succours that were sent to the fort to pass in safety, and kept the English vessels at a distance. But the greatest error of all was, that the duke suffered himself to be amused by a treaty, which Monsieur Thoiras set on foot, purely to gain time, which the duke was complaisant enough to give him. In the mean time the cardinal acted with that spirit and prudence which were the characteristics of his ministry. He sent a small body of horse into the neighbourhood of fort Lewis, supported by three thousand foot, under the command of the duke of Angoulesme. At first he made the Rochellers believe that they were not intended against them, but to guard the coast against the English, which made them more remiss. Soon after he caused quarters to be marked in the villages about Rochelle for five and twenty thousand men; of which the Rochellers giving notice to the English fleet, hindered them from attacking fort Lewis, that otherwise might have been taken in a day's time. In order to quicken the preparations, and that nothing might be wanting, he not only advanced his own money, but sold his plate and jewels, that supplies might be procured for the service<sup>o</sup>. Some say this was not necessary, but all admit that it was done discreetly, and that, by his express directions, two considerable convoys were sent to St. Martin's<sup>p</sup>. The duke of Rohan, who fulfilled his engagements, and took up arms, met with incredible difficulties and infinite disappointments; on the one hand he was declared guilty of high treason by the parliament; on the other he was disavowed by the greater part of the Protestants, through timidity, self-interest, and corruption<sup>q</sup>. In October the cardinal brought the king, accompanied by his brother, the count de Soissons, the dukes of Guise, Angoulesme, and Nemours, the marshals Schomberg, Bassompierre, and d'Estrees, the dukes of Tremouille, Bellegarde, Crequi, Chevreuse, Montbazon, Retz, and Rochefoucault, with the flower of the nobility of France, and a considerable army, before Rochelle<sup>r</sup>. On the sixth of November, the duke of Buckingham, having received a considerable reinforcement from England, caused a general assault to be given to the fort St. Martin, in which he was repulsed with considerable loss<sup>s</sup>. Two days after marshal Schomberg landed with a body of troops superior to his army, so that he suffered considerably in his retreat, though his troops behaved well. At length, having embarked every thing, he sailed for England on the 17th of the same month, having done nothing worthy his own high titles, or the reputation of his countrymen<sup>t</sup>. The royal army, notwithstanding the inclemency of the season, and the intrigues of all Richelieu's enemies, continued before Rochelle, and he had interest enough with his master to keep him there likewise, though so lately recovered from a dangerous illness, and of a constitution weak in itself, and very apt to be disordered by the vigorous exercises either of the mind or body<sup>u</sup>.

State of Rochelle when

It is said that cardinal Richelieu had meditated the siege of Rochelle for ten years; it is at least as certain that he might have speculated upon it for ten years more, if his good fortune

<sup>1</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite. RUSHWORTH'S Collection, tom. i. p. 426. <sup>m</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. <sup>n</sup> RUSHWORTH'S Collection, tom. i. p. 426, 427. DUPLEX Hist. de Louis XIII.

<sup>o</sup> DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. RUSHWORTH'S Collection, vol. i. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. <sup>p</sup> AUBERI Histoire de Cardinal Richelieu. DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>q</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. Memoires de Bassompierre. <sup>r</sup> BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. Memoires de Puysegur. <sup>s</sup> RUSHWORTH'S Collection, vol. i. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. Memoires de Puysegur. <sup>t</sup> RUSHWORTH'S Collection, vol. i. <sup>u</sup> DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII. Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

- <sup>a</sup> had not furnished him with this opportunity, when, by their unseasonable diffidences, and as <sup>besieged by</sup> Richelieu was exactly informed of the situation things were in, saw his opportunity, and took it. He determined to besiege a place of great extent, and extremely well fortified, furnished with a numerous artillery, abundantly supplied with military stores, full of a martial, religious, and determined people, under the government of Monf. Guillon their mayor, a man of excellent sense, great experience, and invincible fortitude. The army did not consist of above twenty-three thousand men. The king, as we have observed, graced the siege with his person, but the cardinal commanded, assisted by the duke of Angoulême, and the marshals Bassompierre and Schomberg <sup>w</sup>. The lines of circumvallation were nine miles in extent, fortified by thirteen forts of different sizes, well furnished with artillery, and which flanked one another. He opened no trenches, he raised, for a long time, no batteries. The great point was to shut up the port; trials were made by driving vast stakes to embarrass the entrance, but to little purpose. Some attempts were made to construct a boom, which also miscarried. The cardinal himself, considering what Cæsar had done at Durazzo, and Alexander the Great when he besieged Tyre, resolved upon a dyke. When he first proposed it, those who ought to have been the best judges treated it with ridicule; they said there were many things made a great figure in books, that had but a paltry appearance when they came to be put in practice. At last (for their names ought to be remembered), Lewis Metezeau and John Tiriot undertook to execute what the cardinal had proposed. This was begun on the 2d of December, and the scheme was to run a solid wall across a gulph seven hundred and forty toises broad, into which the sea rolled with great force, and, when the winds were high, with an impetuosity to which it seemed ridiculous to think of opposing any work of man. It was begun by throwing in great rocks to lay a kind of foundation; upon these were laid vast stones, which were cemented by the mud thrown up by the sea. Before and behind it was supported by beams of an enormous size, at twelve feet distance, driven into the bottom with incredible labour. It was raised so high, that the soldiers were not incommoded by the water, even at spring tides; the platform was near five toises in breadth, but the foundation was full fifteen; so that it was built in the manner of a glacis. At each extremity there was a strong fort, in the middle there was an open passage of one hundred and fifty paces, several vessels being sunk immediately before it, together with high stakes in a double row, and before these thirty-five vessels linked together, which made a kind of floating palisade. This amazing dyke was finished in the month of May <sup>x</sup>. This work entirely eclipsed what was done on shore, though that would otherwise have appeared very extraordinary; the troops were well lodged, regularly paid, and, from time to time, both officers and soldiers had considerable gratifications; besides which the latter had hats, shoes, and watch-coats, delivered them whenever it was necessary. A strict discipline kept their markets full, so that necessaries and refreshments were never wanting; as for the sick and wounded, of the latter, of which there were but very few, all possible care was taken of them in the hospitals, which the king, the cardinal, and the marshals often visited in person <sup>y</sup>.
- <sup>e</sup> As the reduction of Rochelle appeared to be a thing still at a great distance, the king found it expedient to return to Paris, and, upon this occasion, appointed the cardinal his lieutenant-general by a special commission, directing the duke of Angoulême and the two marshals to obey him in all things <sup>z</sup>. About the middle of May came the English fleet, commanded by the earl of Denbigh; it was numerous and potent enough to have attempted any thing, and yet did little or nothing, the dyke being perfectly finished, and flanked by good batteries; two of the English officers exclaimed against the cowardice of the rest, who, notwithstanding, alleged many excuses; it may be the best of them was, that most of the vessels were pressed or hired. However, after throwing in some little supply of corn, they withdrew, with assurance of a speedy return <sup>a</sup>. In the mean time, the cardinal omitted nothing that could be attempted in the way of surprize or negotiation <sup>b</sup>. But the Rochellers were so vigilant, that they disappointed all his enterprises; and so firm, that, though the common people lived upon shell-fish and grass, they would not listen to dishonourable terms. In order to hasten the great armament that was making at Portsmouth, king Charles repaired to the neighbourhood, and the duke of Buckingham came thither, where, on the twenty-third of August, old Stile, he was stabbed by one John Felton <sup>c</sup>. This, instead of hindering, promoted the expedition; for the duke of Rohan assures us, and sure he is a competent witness, by the care and diligence of the king, more was done in ten or twelve days than in many weeks before; so that in the beginning of September the fleet sailed <sup>d</sup>. The Spaniards, in virtue of their treaty, had sent a fleet to the assistance of the French, and this, after a short stay, in which they did a little or nothing, retired; but by the cardinal's extreme diligence, exclusive of thirty galliots that were above the dyke, to keep the Rochellers from attempting any thing, he had assembled forty ships of war, which lay ranged before it in line of battle; the English fleet, under the command of the earl of Lindsey, is said to have consisted of one hundred and fifty sail of all sorts; they fought, or rather cannonaded the fleet two or three times, but no great loss on either side; they negotiated to as little purpose as they fought: at length the besieged, quite tired out, surrendered the place on the last of October<sup>c</sup>. They were to enjoy their fortunes and their religion; but their extensive privileges, which they had held for three hundred years, were suppressed, and all their impregnable fortifications demolished. Of twenty thousand inhabitants that were in the place when invested, there were not four thousand left, and of these b not an hundred able to carry arms. The king made his entry into Rochelle on the 1st of November, about ten in the morning<sup>f</sup>. About twelve arose a storm which considerably weakened the dyke; a few days after forty toises of it were demolished. If the English fleet under the command of the earl of Denbigh had arrived a fortnight sooner they had relieved the place, or if the Rochellers could have held out a fortnight longer they might have been relieved and supplied. But Providence disposed things otherwise, and Richelieu boasted, that he had taken the place in spite of three kings; Philip the fourth of Spain, who assisted the Rochellers with money, Charles the first of England, who wasted immense sums in fruitless endeavours to assist them, and Lewis the thirteenth, who, by his inquietudes and despondencies, gave c him more trouble than both. This important conquest, upon which the king was solemnly complimented by pope Urban the eighth, was achieved without much effusion of blood, but the expence of it was computed at forty millions of livres<sup>g</sup>.

<sup>w</sup> BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. Memoires de Bassompierre, VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. Memoires de Puysegur. <sup>x</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu. <sup>y</sup> BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>z</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, liv. ii. c. 17. <sup>a</sup> RUSHWORTH'S Collection, vol. i. <sup>b</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan. <sup>c</sup> CLARENDON'S History of the Rebellion. <sup>d</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

The duke of Nevers becomes duke of Mantua under the protection of the king of France.

THE siege of Rochelle was no sooner over, and the affairs in that part of the kingdom settled, so that the king returned with safety and in triumph to Paris, than the minister proposed a new expedition, no less hazardous, and to the full as fatiguing as that which the king had gone through, notwithstanding the clamours of the courtiers and the murmurs of the two queens<sup>h</sup>. About a year before died Vincent de Gonzagua, duke of Mantua, and left the succession open. He considered Charles de Gonzagua duke of Nevers, his cousin-german, as the right heir, in respect to all that he held in the nature of fiefs of the empire, and his niece, the young princess of Montferrat, of whatever could descend to females. He had invited d the duke of Rhetel, eldest son to the duke of Nevers, to his capital, intending to marry him to his niece, which was actually performed the very night he died, some say by his express command, others after he had expired. The Venetians and most of the other powers of Italy acknowledged the duke of Nevers in quality of duke of Mantua; however, the emperor thought fit to give the investiture to the duke of Guastalla; and the duke of Savoy having set up a claim to the Montferrat, the king of Spain entered into a treaty with the two dukes, by which he promised to furnish them with men and money to support their claims, provided they admitted Spanish garrisons into the two capitals of Mantua and Casal, which their interest induced them to accept<sup>i</sup>. Cardinal Richelieu, who looked upon the Protestants as in a manner subdued, now turned his thoughts to the other branch of his great project, e and represented to the king, that, since the house of Austria considered it as a crime sufficient to destroy all his pretensions that the new duke of Mantua was born in France, he was bound to protect him.

The king passes the Alps, and obliges the duke of Savoy to grant him a passage.

THE small remains of the Spanish party, which the cardinal had in a manner extinguished, endeavoured to defeat this scheme, and the queen-mother went very cordially into the opposition. The duke of Nevers had been ever amongst the malecontents during her regency; and, which affected her still more, the duke of Orleans had a passion for Mary de Gonzagua, the duke's daughter, which hindered him from approving his mother's choice of Anne de Medicis, the younger daughter of the grand duke, which affected her to the last degree. But the cardinal, though he shewed, upon all occasions, great complaisance for the queen-mother, remained firm, and assured his master, that, if they took the field early, Casal, f which was besieged by Don Gonzalo de Cordova, and which was excellently defended, might be relieved in the spring; and that the duke of Rohan, and those that were in arms with him, might, notwithstanding, be brought to submit before the end of the summer<sup>k</sup>. In the middle of February the king arrived with his army at Grenoble, and sent to demand a passage through the territories of the duke of Savoy, who laboured to gain time, in hopes the Spaniards would be able to make themselves masters of Casal; but, by the cardinal's

<sup>c</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre, tom. ii. p. 516. Memoires de Puysegur, p. 50. Memoires du Duc de Rohan. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>f</sup> BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. AUBERI Memoires du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>g</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 2.

<sup>i</sup> Histoire della Repubblica di Veneta, par BATT. NANI. VITT. SIRI Memoire-recondite. Vie de Richelieu.

<sup>k</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. Memoires de Bassompierre.

- a advice, the king marched and negotiated at the same time, passed the Alps in the midst of frost and snow, himself on foot at the head of his troops, and, on the 6th of March, forced the famous pass of Susa, which, though well fortified, was ill defended; the town and castle of the same name surrendered the next day. The cardinal made so good use of this success, that the duke of Savoy quickly consented to a treaty, by which he promised to give a passage, and to furnish subsistence to the troops that were to march to the relief of the duke of Mantua, and also to engage the Spanish general to raise the siege of Casal<sup>1</sup>. In consequence of this accommodation, Monsieur Thoiras was sent with three thousand foot and three hundred horse to take possession of that important place, and the king had the satisfaction, before his departure, to conclude two very important treaties; the first in the nature of an alliance with the republic of Venice and the duke of Savoy, for maintaining the repose of Italy; and the other, under the mediation of the Venetians, with the king of Great Britain<sup>m</sup>.

- After all that had happened both before and after the siege of Rochelle, the duke of Rohan persisted in carrying on the war, always with vigour, and sometimes with success. In order to this he made a treaty with the king of Spain, who promised him an annual subsidy of three hundred thousand pieces of eight, in consideration of his maintaining a certain number of foot and horse, and farther stipulating for the free exercise of the popish religion in all the places within his power during the continuance of the war, and to establish a toleration if he should succeed in his design of forming an independent state in France<sup>n</sup>. This shews how much these were wars of religion, when his Catholic majesty treated with the Protestants in France in arms against their sovereign, with whom he was at peace, and to whose assistance he lately sent a fleet against them. But what is still more extraordinary, it is acknowledged, in the preamble of this treaty, that the king of Spain concluded it from motives of state, and in resentment of the great assistance given by the French to his heretic rebels in the Low Countries<sup>o</sup>. At this time the duke of Rohan had considerable forces on foot in Languedoc, Guienne, and the Cevennes, and, amongst other strong places, he had in his power Nismes, Uzes, Montauban, Castres, Prevas, Alais, Milau-Sainte-Afrique<sup>p</sup>. In May the king besieged Privas, a strong place in Vivarez, which defended itself for twelve days with such resolution, that the king lost some hundreds of his troops before it. At length, hard pressed, and seeing no hopes of relief, the garrison retired into the fortress, and the inhabitants of the town withdrew into the mountains. Those in the fort were obliged to surrender at discretion; and the firing of some powder giving a pretence for suggesting that they had attempted to blow up the troops that had entered the place, they were most inhumanly treated, being put to a variety of deaths, and some hundreds of them hanged by the king's order, and in his sight; for that prince was naturally severe<sup>q</sup>. The cardinal being ill of a fever, was not present, and he took care to apprise the world sufficiently of that circumstance<sup>r</sup>. The fate of Privas so terrified the people of Alerz, that, though the place was well fortified, and the duke of Rohan had taken care to furnish them with every thing necessary for their defence, yet he had no sooner quitted it than they began to treat, and, by the interposition of the cardinal, obtained a good capitulation, which was honourably executed.

- RICHELIEU* took care to let the duke know this, and, at the same time, sent him word, that he might yet treat for himself, or for a general peace; but that, if things went much farther, he would expose himself and the Protestants to utter ruin. The duke of Rohan, being convinced that this was but too true, and having received no advantage from his treaty with Spain, and his intelligence with the duke of Savoy, resolved to take this advice, but he treated honourably for his whole party, and with the consent of the assembly. The treaty was signed on the 27th of June<sup>s</sup>, by which the Protestants were restored to their estates, the free exercise of their religion, and all the privileges granted by the edict, only they were stripped of all their cautionary towns, and consequently lost the power of defending themselves. The dukes of Rohan and Soubise were pardoned and restored to their estates. The king would not see the former, but, on the contrary, insisted he should quit France for a time, upon which he retired to Venice; and, to qualify this exile, he was gratified with a large sum of money<sup>t</sup>. To shun the heats of Languedoc, in some parts of which the plague was more than suspected, the cardinal advised the king to return to Paris, while he went himself to Montauban, the inhabitants of which had rejected the peace, because their fortifications were to be demolished, and, as they apprehended, demolished by the prince of Condé, whom they knew to be capricious and cruel, and against whom they would have defended

<sup>1</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. BATT. NANI. Memoires de Puysegur, p. 34.

de Louis XIII. <sup>a</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

XIII. tom. ii. p. 522.

du Duc de Rohan.

<sup>p</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. Memoires de Puysegur.

<sup>r</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu.

<sup>s</sup> DUPLEIX, BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>m</sup> BERNARD Hist.

<sup>o</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>q</sup> Memoires

<sup>t</sup> DUPLEIX, BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>r</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

themselves to the last ; but they made no scruple of admitting the cardinal and his troops. a He remained there two days, received every body very graciously, and even the Protestant ministers in a body, under the title of men of letters. He caused the treaty to be punctually executed, left the town as he found it, permitted them to demolish their own works, and paid them for it. When he had settled all things he returned in triumph to Paris, where he found the court in the utmost confusion, and himself in such a situation, that he desired the king's leave to resign his employments, the very day after his arrival <sup>u</sup>.

Difference between the queen mother and the duke of Orleans.

WE have before mentioned the resentment of the queen-mother against the duke of Mantua, chiefly on account of the affection of Monsieur for his daughter, in consequence of which the duke was protected and persecuted at the same time by France ; sometimes he was told that he had nothing to expect, unless he withdrew her out of the kingdom ; when he had submitted to this, and sent for her, she was stopped upon the road by the interposition of Monsieur, who threatened the utmost extremities if she was sent away. He then suffered his passion to subside, or rather seemed to suffer it ; upon which the queen-mother again resolved to send her out of the kingdom, but revoked her orders upon finding that her son intended to carry her off upon the road, and to retire with her into Flanders. This provoked the queen-mother so much, that while the king was with his army, and she invested with the power of regent, she caused the princess and the duchess of Longueville her aunt to be arrested, and brought prisoners to Vincennes, with all the circumstances of violence that female resentment could suggest : upon this Monsieur retired to Joinville, a place belonging to the duke of Guise ; and the king could not help shewing that he was not at all satisfied with his mother's conduct, though at the same time he treated his brother's airs of discontent with contempt, highly pleased that the cardinal had placed his authority upon such a basis, as that his subjects of all ranks found it necessary to pay him equal respect <sup>w</sup>. The queen-mother, who thought the cardinal should have entered into all her views, when she found that he did not disapprove of Monsieur's affection, and thought it strange that she should be wrong with both her sons at a time, quarrelled with him without the least reserve, treated him as an insignificant creature, raised by her favour, and stiled him, in plain terms, an ungrateful perfidious person : at the same time the duke of Orleans withdrawing to Nancy, published a manifesto, in which he attributed all his misfortunes to the cardinal ; gave him the invidious title of mayor of the palace ; charged him with usurping the royal authority, with being the author of his exile, and the source of the miseries of France <sup>x</sup>. In this situation the cardinal desired the king's permission to withdraw ; but Lewis, who considered him as his martyr, as well as his minister, refused it <sup>y</sup> ; and while they were thus embarrassed by domestic follies, foreign affairs took such a turn as obliged the king to make the cardinal what his brother had called him, from whence it appears, that some princes may, by chance, be prophets, who never can be made politicians.

A. D. 1629.

The cardinal again passes the Alps.

THE duke of Savoy, as he had been compelled to make the peace of Susa, and to grant a passage for the French troops to Casal, when he once saw the king embarked in the war with the Hugonots, he took it for granted that they might have time enough to dispossess the duke of Mantua before the French troops could pass the Alps ; and, upon this supposition, he, in conjunction with the emperor and the king of Spain, renewed the war and besieged Casal again <sup>z</sup>. In this state of things there was no remedy but that which had been before applied of sending the army again over the mountains, and that without delay. The urgency of affairs being so great, the king, by letters patents, declared cardinal Richelieu his principal minister <sup>a</sup>. He had been so long in effect ; but as this seemed to arise from his quality of cardinal, the king thought fit, by those letters patents, to attribute it to his person, and to stile him therein, not first minister, which might have been referred to precedency, but his principal minister, with regard to his confidence. In less than a month, as it was determined that he should command the army, he was, by letters patents, created the king's lieutenant-general, representing his person, with power to receive ambassadors, to give them audience, to make and to receive propositions, and finally conclude, as if the king himself was present and assenting <sup>b</sup>. Under him commanded the marshals Crequi, de la Force, Bassompierre, and Schomberg. To distinguish him from these, and indeed from all other generals, the founding title of generalissimo was invented, and, for the same reason, the title of eminence was given by brief to cardinals, by pope Urban the eighth, who were before stiled most illustrious. Thus clothed with greater authority, and graced with higher titles than any subject had ever received, he proceeded directly to Lyons, and rejecting some propositions that were made him, and even an interview with the prince of Piedmont, he continued his march,

<sup>u</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite.

de Brienne, tom. ii. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite.

<sup>x</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. Vie de Richelieu.

<sup>y</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>z</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. BATT. NANI.

<sup>a</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. ii. p. 530.

<sup>b</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>w</sup> Memoires du Comte

<sup>v</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de

<sup>u</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant

notwith-

- a notwithstanding the severity of the weather, and, in the month of February, arrived at Susa, with twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse <sup>c</sup>. He summoned the duke of Savoy to execute the treaty concluded the year before, that is, to grant a free passage, to furnish subsistence, and to join a body of troops with those of the king, in order to march to the relief of the duke of Mantua. The duke of Savoy took his measures ill, he endeavoured to amuse the cardinal, who, in return, was very near surprising him at Rivoli, from whence he was glad to retire hastily to Turin, where the cardinal did not let him long rest, causing his artillery to take the route, and marching in person at the head of his forces towards that city; but having obliged the duke to take all necessary precautions against a siege, he very unexpectedly invested the important place of Pignerol, which he took in two days time, and the castle that
- b commanded it, by which a direct road was open from Dauphine into Italy <sup>d</sup>. This great conquest did the cardinal as much honour this year as the relief of Casal had done the year before, augmented the king's confidence in him, and discouraged his enemies, who, though they were numerous and potent, and supported by the queen regent as well as the queen-mother, yet durst not avow their sentiments, but contented themselves with secret insinuations and disguised censures, saying, amongst other things, that the king had disposed of his prerogatives, and had only reserved to himself the power of curing the evil. His master, on the other hand, was so well satisfied, that he set out, as soon as the weather would permit, for Lyons, that he might be the nearer to his army and to the cardinal, who was resolved to make himself master of Savoy <sup>e</sup>.
- c THE cardinal has been censured, as if, upon the unforeseen good fortune of taking Pignerol, he had abandoned his original design, and the relief of the duke of Mantua, who was miserably oppressed, in order to seize the duchy of Savoy, into which the king entered, and became master of it <sup>f</sup>, the fortress of Montmelian only excepted, by midsummer: but it is at least as probable, that the cardinal, who had then a treaty upon the carpet at Ratisbon, might entertain hopes, that, if any thing happened amiss, he might procure the restitution of Mantua for Savoy; and that if, notwithstanding this diversion, he should be at length able to relieve Casal, it might operate still more effectually upon that treaty. There is, however, little reason to doubt, that, whatever his notions were, the interests of the crown and of his ministry always cast the balance. Some advantages the French troops gained in Italy; but
- d the negotiations of Signor Julio Mazarine, who now first appeared on the theatre of the world, in the character of a priest and a politician, for he had been some time before in that of a captain of horse, were more useful: he procured a kind of suspension of arms, upon condition that Casal should be surrendered in case it was not relieved by the middle of October <sup>g</sup>. What was still more advantageous for the cardinal's views, was the death of the duke of Savoy, which deprived the Spaniards of their most faithful ally. But, notwithstanding all these, he had still great difficulties to overcome; the duke de Montmorency had conducted a reinforcement of eight thousand men into Italy, which, notwithstanding, were consumed in a few months, and, upon his return, he was replaced by Marillac, to whom the king had given the staff of marshal at Aletz <sup>h</sup>. It was, after all, a very difficult thing to
- e fulfil the king's orders, who was now gone back to Lyons, and followed by the cardinal, to march through an enemy's country to the relief of Casal. However the three marshals, de la Force, Schomberg, and Marillac, found themselves obliged to undertake it, which they accordingly did. But in the mean time the treaty of Ratisbon came to their relief, in which it was agreed that the emperor should grant the investiture of Mantua to the duke of Nevers, and, in a fortnight after, hostilities <sup>i</sup> were to cease; but the Spanish army lying still before Casal, and insisting upon the execution of the capitulation before-mentioned, Signor Mazarine was again obliged to interpose, and with more danger to himself than either of the armies, riding between them, when they were ready to charge each other, at length procured a convention, which put an end to these disputes, delivered Casal, and intitled Monsieur Thoiras, for
- f his gallant defence, to the staff of marshal of France <sup>k</sup>. But we must now return into that kingdom, where we shall see the cardinal more in danger from the intrigues of the court than he had ever been in the camp, where he sometimes exposed himself more than was necessary.
- DURING his stay at Lyons in the autumn, the king was attacked with a strange disease; he had a slow fever, which nothing could allay, an extreme depression of the spirits, his belly and stomach swelling in a manner that amazed and confounded his physicians, who very positively pronounced that he could not live long <sup>l</sup>; the queen-mother and some others thought they had

The cardinal
on the point of being ruined by the endeavours of the two queens.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires de Puysegur. BATT. NANI. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII.

Brienne, tom. ii. Memoires des principales Actions du Marechal du Pleissy, p. 2.

Cardinal de Richelieu. DUPLEIX Histoire de Louis XIII. BATT. NANI.

Brienne. Memoires de Puysegur. BATT. NANI.

Cardinal de Richelieu. <sup>g</sup> DUPL. Hist. de Louis XIII. BATT. NANI. Memoires du Comte de Brienne.

<sup>h</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI Memoire reconduite.

Louis XIII. BATT. NANI. <sup>i</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 18.

<sup>d</sup> Memoires du Comte de

<sup>e</sup> AUBERI Histoire du

<sup>f</sup> Memoires du Comte de

<sup>g</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. AUBERI Histoire du

<sup>h</sup> BATT. NANI. Memoires du Comte de Brienne.

<sup>k</sup> DUPLEIX, Histoire de

this intelligence a surer way from their astrologers. In this situation the cardinal was in real a distress ; he was governor of Brouage, a strong place upon the coast, but he knew not how to get thither. He had recourse to Bassompierre, colonel-general of the Swiss, whom he desired to secure that body of troops, but he declined it<sup>m</sup>. The king then applied to marshal duke de Montmorency, and having sent for him into his closet, recommended the cardinal to him with tears, and the duke promised, in the strongest terms, that he would conduct him safely through his government to his own. In the mean time the king's distemper declared itself ; it proved to be an imposthume in the bowels, which nature having discharged by the ordinary passages, he became quickly and surprisingly well<sup>n</sup>. Then broke out the designs of the great cabal against the cardinal, at the head of which were the two queens and the duke of Orleans, and yet, in effect, they were but the instruments of others. The queen-mother was intirely b governed by Vautier her physician, the princess of Conti, with whom Bassompierre was in love, the duchess d'Elbeuf, the marchioness d'Ornano, the garde des s<sup>ç</sup>eaux, and his brother the marshal Marillac o. The countess du Fargis, exquisitely handsome, and the most adroit woman in France, made the queen-consort act as she thought fit, and the duke of Orleans was always in the hands of his favourites, who took care to inflame him as much as possible, that they might then sell his submission at as high a rate as they could. These, supported by the Spanish faction, much sunk from what it was, but still subsisting, and still countenanced by the Spanish ministers, attacked the cardinal with the king, and represented to him, that he had seized the reins of government into his own hands ; that he had brought the greatest part of the court to depend upon him ; that he was negotiating a match for his niece with the count c de Soissons, and, when this was completed, would probably devolve the crown upon his head<sup>p</sup>. These things were said with such confidence, and repeated by so many persons, and the king was so jealous of his authority, that he sometimes leaned, or seemed to lean, to this side ; on the other hand, the cardinal pressed him to consider by what steps he had recovered his authority out of the hands of the queen, her favourites, and the princes of the blood ; her apparent partiality for her younger son ; her evident connections with the court of Spain ; the incapacity of her creatures to carry on public affairs ; and the perplexities into which his majesty must be plunged, if once his business fell into such hands<sup>q</sup>.

Is saved beyond his hopes, and becomes more independent than ever.

ALL the king could do for his own peace was to get the decision of things deferred till he came to Paris, where he laboured assiduously to reconcile the cardinal to his mother, who at d length consented, and a day was fixed when his niece and himself should come and ask her pardon on their knees. Madame de Combalet humbled herself first, and instead of pardon, received a torrent of reproaches. When the cardinal came he met with the like usage, at which the king was strangely surpris'd ; but Richelieu contented himself with telling her that he had served her long enough to know that it was not in her nature to forgive, and therefore, to make the king easy, he would demand his leave to retire, and yield up his employments<sup>r</sup>. The king, in his confusion, seemed to acquiesce ; but, that he might have time to reflect at leisure, withdrew to a country seat near Versailles. On the 11th of November the whole court resorted to the queen-mother at the palace of Luxemburgh, fully persuaded that she had recovered the dominion of the court. In the mean time St. Simon, the king's favourite, made e him so sensible that the queen-mother had not forgot the death of marshal d'Ancre, that she was always enquiring of astrologers about the king's death, and that her greatest quarrel to the cardinal was his strict attachment to his master, that Lewis sent for him, gave him the detail of his enemies, and of the charges they had brought against him, adding it was his pleasure he should continue to serve him, and he would protect him against them all. This was no sooner known than the queen's palace became a desert, a circumstance so obvious to all the world, that it was stiled, la journee des duppes, i. e. all fools day<sup>s</sup> : the physician Vautier was sent to the Bastile, the keeper of the seals was arrested and deprived of them, his brother the marshal met with the same fate at the head of the army he commanded, the countess du Fargis was ignominiously turned out of the court, and the queen-mother saw herself com- f pelled to dissemble a reconciliation, that she might not share the same fate ; yet though exterior respects were preserved, she plainly saw the game was lost, that cardinal Richelieu was in full possession of the royal favour, and that the king her son did not love but feared her. If, instead of receiving compliments, she had followed the king to Versailles, she had triumphed.

A. D. 1630.

The cardinal gains the p<sup>r</sup>inces of

In the midst of these domestic disputes, the cardinal proceeded with infinite care and vigilance in respect to public concerns ; in the very beginning of the year he made a treaty with Sweden, by which an annual subsidy was given to Gustavus Adolphus of four hundred

<sup>m</sup> Preface des Memoires de Bassompierre. Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>p</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. de Richelieu.

de Richelieu.

de Richelieu.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 20. AUBERI

<sup>o</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire seconde, tom. vii. p. 282, & suiv.

<sup>q</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal

<sup>r</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne. Vie de Richelieu. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal

<sup>s</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre. DUPLEX Hist. de Louis XIII. LE GENDRE.

a thousand crowns, in consideration of which he was to act with an army of thirty-six thousand men, in order to facilitate the re-establishment of the princes of the empire, who had been abased in their dignities, and despoiled of their estates, by the house of Austria<sup>1</sup>. In the mean time a negotiation was carrying on in Italy, for settling the tranquility of that part of Europe, in which the cardinal made the Spaniards sensible that they had lost the superiority which they had so long maintained in point of treaty-making; for at the very time, and in the very place where this negotiation was publicly carried on, he concluded a secret alliance with the duke of Savoy, in consequence of which that prince yielded Pignerol to France, in virtue of a territory which was to be taken from the duke of Mantua. This convention was signed on the last of March<sup>2</sup>; and in the middle of April was concluded the public treaty of Querasque, in which the Spaniards believed they had outwitted the French, in procuring for the duke of Savoy the district before-mentioned. By this public treaty Pignerol was restored to the duke of Savoy, who took possession of it with a garrison who did not know that there were six times their number of French troops concealed in the place. In May the court of France concluded a treaty with the elector of Bavaria, to the same intent with that which had been concluded with Sweden<sup>3</sup>. In autumn, under pretence that the Spaniards had not executed punctually the treaty of Querasque, a convention was signed with the duke of Savoy, by which he consented to receive a French garrison for six months into Pignerol, to cover that which had been in it all this time: a good body of troops was likewise sent to take possession of Casal, with the consent of the duke of Mantua, and to the intire satisfaction of the Italian princes, who began now to speak in the language of liberty, and who made no scruple of demanding justice from those who, for a long course of years, had behaved towards them as if they had been their masters. Having thus the princes of Germany and of Italy closely connected with him, the cardinal made no scruple of asserting his master's authority in his own dominions, and of making persons of all ranks sensible how much things were changed from what they were when he was placed at the head of the administration: a circumstance that multiplied his secret enemies, and gained him few real friends.

It was not long after the apparent reconciliation, that the queen-mother broke out into fresh complaints against the cardinal. The duke of Orleans carried it farther; he went with a great train to the cardinal's house, with an intent, as was supposed, to have done something extraordinary; but it ended only in vehement reproaches, after which he withdrew from court<sup>4</sup>. In the month of February, the king engaged the queen-mother to come to Compeigne, where, after trying all means to soften her to no purpose, he left the place suddenly, and her under a guard<sup>5</sup>. The princess of Conti, the duchesses of Elbæuf and Lesdiguières, and Madame d'Ornano, were exiled; the marshal de Bassompierre, and some other persons of distinction, were sent to the Bastille<sup>6</sup>. The duke of Orleans retired into Lorraine, where he contracted himself to the princess Margaret, sister of that duke, directing letters to the parliament of Paris, in which he declared himself the prosecutor of cardinal Richelieu. The king, upon this, proceeded to extremities, justified his minister, erected a new court of justice, and took measures, as it is said, to conduct his mother to Florence, upon which she made her escape from Compeigne, and retired into Flanders, about the middle of July<sup>7</sup>. By this extraordinary court of justice, one Duval a physician was condemned to the galleys, for having predicted the king's death; the duke of Rouannes, the marquis de Vieuville, the marchioness du Fargis, and father Chautelute were condemned to death, and executed in effigy. Towards the close of the year, the king marched into Lorraine, where he compelled the duke to conclude a treaty on the terms he prescribed, and to expel all who had taken refuge in his territories immediately<sup>8</sup>.

The king and his minister, in whose favour, in the midst of these troubles, he erected the lordship of Richelieu, with various other lands and seignories, into a duchy, with a limitation to his heirs general, whether male or female, so that now he was stiled the cardinal-duke<sup>9</sup>, as Marshall Marillac his rival was the conde-duke, still pressed the duke of Lorraine, whose sincerity they with reason suspected, and obliged him to give up Marsal, which, however, did not bind him as they expected<sup>10</sup>. The queen-mother wrote a letter to the parliament, in which she charged the cardinal-duke, to whom the king had given the government of Bretagne, upon the death of marshal Themmines, with aiming at the crown, which had no manner of effect, except that it brought to a dismal catastrophe one of her most faithful servants, the marshal Marillac, who, by an extraordinary court of justice, was condemned to suffer death for peculation, and recon dite, Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>1</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>2</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>3</sup> DUPLEIX Histoire de

<sup>4</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 48.

<sup>5</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire re-

<sup>6</sup> Memoires

Vie de Richelieu.

<sup>7</sup> Memoires de Bassompierre, DUPLEIX, BERNARD.

<sup>8</sup> AUBERI Histoire du

Cardinal de Richelieu. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>9</sup> Memoires du Marquis du Beauvau, pour servir à l'Histoire de Charles IV. Duc de Lorraine & de Bar, p. 21. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.

was accordingly brought to his end in the place de Greve, on the 10th of May<sup>c</sup>. It was one of the harshest, and, in the opinion of the world, one of the most unjust things the cardinal ever did. It was said, to colour it, that, at the instance of the queen-mother, he had corresponded with the Spaniards, to the prejudice of the king's service; but that, out of respect to this princess, it could not be mentioned in his sentence; as if there was more regard due to princes than to justice. The truth was, that, in the cabal at Lyons, he had said the shortest way to be rid of the cardinal was to kill him, and had even offered to execute what he proposed. His brother, who had been keeper of the seals, died soon after of grief<sup>f</sup>. Upon information that the duke of Lorraine was assembling forces, and endeavouring to procure assistance from Germany, the king and the cardinal marched against him with a small army, and reduced several of his places. Being on the point of investing Nancy, he concluded a new treaty at Livernon<sup>g</sup>, by which he confirmed that before made at Vie, and, as a security for the due observance of it, yielded Stenai, Janets, and Clermont, the two first for four years, and the last for ever. This short war was of very great consequence, as it hindered the duke, a prince of great abilities, though inconstant, and one of the best officers in Europe, from executing the project he had formed, which might have been fatal to France, since, if it had once brought the Germans into Lorraine, all that happened afterwards had been prevented.

The duke of Orleans penetrates into Languedoc, where he is beaten, and Montmorency taken.

WHILE the king was engaged in Lorraine, the duke of Orleans, with about fifteen hundred Flemish, Italian, and Spanish horse, and five hundred French, miserably equipped, many of them wanting swords, and most of them boots, entered Burgundy, where he published a manifesto, in which he stiled himself the king's lieutenant, requiring all good Frenchmen to fall upon cardinal Richelieu<sup>h</sup>, as a disturber of the public peace, and as a traitor to the king, his family, and kingdom. He summoned Dijon to open her gates, and, because this was not done, he burnt the suburbs; marshal de la Force following him with a small army, he was compelled to pass into Auvergne, and from thence he penetrated into Languedoc with marshal Schomberg and his troops at his heels<sup>i</sup>. There he was received by the marshal duke de Montmorency, the last of that illustrious family, inferior to none of his ancestors in shining qualities, superior to most of them in solid virtue, unfortunate in having pledged his word to support him if he came into his government, doubly unfortunate in believing any engagement could dispense with his duty. He received him with the honour due to his birth, and having drawn together the clergy, nobility, and gentry, who depended upon him at Pecenas, stiled them the states of Languedoc, and declared, in harsh terms, against the cardinal<sup>k</sup>. On the other hand, the parliament of Thoulouse declared him and them rebels. He quickly assembled ten or eleven thousand men, and with them turned upon marshal Schomberg, who had not above four. He took possession of a strong camp, near the village of Castelnaudari, where, on the first of September, he was attacked by the duke of Montmorency, who behaved like a hero, but very unlike an officer. He attacked the intrenchments with horse, without waiting for his foot; he carried them purely by the courage which his example inspired; but attempting to push his success, the best part of the gentlemen who were with him were slain, and, his horse being killed under him, himself covered with wounds taken prisoner<sup>l</sup>. On the news of his misfortune, the infantry disbanded; Monsieur, with the poor remains of horse, fled to Beziers; there he treated for an accommodation, and concluded it, obtaining pardon for himself, his domestics, and the duke d'Elbeauf; promised not to remove a league from the place which should be assigned him for his residence without leave, and that he would sincerely love and esteem the cardinal de Richelieu<sup>m</sup>: a conduct so mean, that it did more injury to his reputation than his rebellion.

Who is tried, condemned, and executed at Thouloute.

THE king caused the process of Montmorency to be made before commissaries, of whom the keeper of the seals, Monf de l'Aubestine de Châteauneuf, was the chief. As an ecclesiastic, he was obliged to obtain a dispensation from Rome, for being present at a trial where life was in danger; but we know not where he obtained a dispensation to sit in judgment upon a lord, to whose father he had been a page. The duke, by this court, was condemned as guilty of high-treason; and, though all France interposed to save him, he lost his head at Thoulouse on the 30th of October<sup>n</sup>. He was in his person one of the most beautiful, from his conduct the most amiable, as well as by his birth the most noble in that country. He died with equal courage and piety, firm without fierceness, humble without fear; he directed his confessor to ask pardon of cardinal Richelieu. If it was true that he gave the king the first notice of the

<sup>c</sup> Relation verit. de ce qui s'est passé dans le procès du Mar de Marillac, dans le Journal de Richelieu, tom. ii. p. 1. VITT. SIRI Memoire reconduite, tom. vii. p. 495, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> DUPLEX Histoire de Louis XIII. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. Memoires de Bassompierre.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 26. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>i</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire reconduite, BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>k</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>l</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii.

<sup>m</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, VITTORIO SIRI Memoire reconduite, BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 85. Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 27. Memoires du Sieur de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. ii. p. 99. Amsterdam, 1749.

a cabal at Lyons, one would think he had no need to ask pardon ; and that, amongst the many great qualities he possessed, the cardinal could not reckon that of gratitude. Monsieur, who was at Tours, and who contented himself with sending a gentleman to ask the duke's life, wrote the king a letter, in which he said he would have redeemed it with his own<sup>o</sup> ; and then, to keep up his character for inconsistency, retired once more into Flanders, which, if he had done before, he might, perhaps, have saved Montmorency ; though, in his excuse, it must be owned, that the hopes of saving him was the cause of his submission. The king, to shew that justice was the sole motive to this act of severity, gave his whole confiscation to the prince of Condé<sup>p</sup>, who had married his sister, which, of a poor, made him a rich prince.

At the time the court was in Languedoc, the queen-mother sent ten of the most determined persons in her service to Paris to seize Madame de Combalet, the cardinal's niece ; but they were discovered and apprehended. The king, upon this, wrote that lady a letter, in which he expressed his sense of her danger, and his joy at her escape ; adding that if the design had taken effect, he would have followed her into Flanders, with an army of fifty thousand men<sup>q</sup>. When Monsieur arrived at Brussels, his mother retired from thence, to avoid seeing him. She pretended to resent one of the conditions in the treaty he made at Beziers<sup>r</sup>, which was, that he should hold no correspondence with her, or any of her adherents ; but, in reality, she was then governed by Father Chantelupe, and, if the reader will compare these two incidents, he will see the true character of both the son and the mother, who, though so passionately fond of power, that they would not suffer others to govern, were, notwithstanding, unable to govern themselves, and exerted their authority to gratify inclinations and resentments that were not their own ; and hated each other for that disposition which both saw in reflection, but which they could not see in themselves. Towards the close of the year, that is, on the 16th of November, the Swedes lost their king, the great Gustavus Adolphus, and yet gained the battle of Lutzen. We have said little of his victories, though they were supported by the money, and, in a great measure, gained for the benefit, of the crown of France, because these are transactions which must be largely treated of in other parts of this work ; however, it is absolutely necessary to say so much of the nature and conduct of this war as may explain the grounds of the cardinal's policy, shew the advantages that arose from it, and enable us to treat perspicuously of their consequences, because this cannot come in with propriety any-where else.

There had been, for some years, disputes between the house of Austria and France, in which though arms sometimes were employed, yet they were not, strictly speaking, in a state of peace or of war. On the one hand, the king complained that the emperor, but more especially the Spaniards, had given private assistance of every kind to the Hugonots, had excited intrigues and even conspiracies in France, and at this time gave a retreat to the queen-mother and the duke of Orleans, who had been supplied with men and money for his late irruption. On the other hand, the Austrians, with equal reason, affirmed, that the cardinal had assisted their enemies of every kind and every-where, but had more especially maintained the war in Germany, and had prevented the Dutch from concluding peace. The disputes about religion had produced a Catholic and Protestant league in the empire, at the head of which was the emperor, the elector of Bavaria, the ecclesiastical electors, the spiritual princes in general, a very few of the temporal, and not many of the cities. The latter was composed of the elector of Saxony, the elector of Brandenburgh, the elector Palatine, the dukes of Brunswick, Wurtemberg, Mecklenburg, and Pomerania, the landgrave of Hesse, and almost all the rich trading cities. However, the emperor and his adherents had met with so much success, that, in all probability, the Protestants had been crushed, if France, or rather the cardinal de Richelieu, had not interposed. We have shewn that, so long as the constable de Luynes was in favour, he preferred the private interest of himself and his family to that of the crown, and had sacrificed the elector Palatine, who had assumed the title of king of Bobemia, and who, properly supported, had certainly preserved that kingdom and the liberties of Germany. At the time Richelieu came into power the former was lost, and the latter was very near it ; a war was inexpedient ; and therefore he applied money ; by the dextrous application of which, and the suggesting plausible pretences, some of the popish powers were drawn to declare themselves neutrals, and, by the subsidy treaty which we have mentioned, the Swedes were brought to act so powerfully and so successfully, that the face of affairs was intirely changed, and, in the space of two years and a half that Gustavus remained in Germany, he beat the Bavarian and imperial troops thrice, and reduced Pomerania, Lower Saxony, Franconia, Bavaria, the Palatinate, and the territory of Mentz, in which state of things that great monarch died<sup>a</sup>, who, by his heroic courage and great abilities, had revived the drooping hopes of his party, checked the imperial eagle, and at last, it is said, gave some jealousy even to France; at least it is certain, that the cardinal declined an interview between the two kings, though he offered to confer himself with Gustavus, whose high spirit taught him to think that all monarchs were equal, saving the distinction that merit made between them, and who therefore insisted, that, if the cardinal conferred with any, it should be with one of his ministers<sup>b</sup>. Some<sup>c</sup> have insinuated that this instance of magnanimity cost him his life; but, if he fell foully, it is more probable that the assassin had his instructions from another quarter<sup>d</sup>. Yet it must be allowed, that Richelieu expressed no deep concern for his death, but took his measures as quickly and as prudently as if he had foreseen it; which proof of his abilities, in all probability, gave rise to the report that he directed it. His instructions to M. Feuquieres for renewing the treaty with the Swedes<sup>e</sup>, and for conducting, in the manner he did, the negotiations in the congress of Halibron, preserved the alliance from being dissolved by that sinister event, and put the war on the same or on a more advantageous foot for France, which, without exposing her troops, and by the sole assistance of a subsidy, enervated her enemies, attached the princes of the empire to her interests, and even extended the bounds of her dominions to the Rhine, without exciting envy or apprehension. Such was the conduct, such the arts of this great statesman, who, though not excusable in the means he used, had always the grandeur of his master at least as much in view as his own greatness.

True character of the queen-mother and the duke of Orleans.

Account of the cardinal's policy in bringing the Swedes into the empire.

* Voyez la Lettre de GASTON au Roi, datée de Montreuil eaut yonne le 13 de Novembre, 1632, dans l'Histoire de Louis XIII. par BERNARD, liv. xvi. P DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. vii. p. 575. Memoires de Bassompierre, DUPLEIX Hist. de Louis XIII. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. vii. p. 580.

A new war with Lorrain, in which the duke is compelled to render his capital.

At the opening of the year the king caused a new parliament to be erected at Metz<sup>f</sup>, which answered at once two great views: in the first place, it brought in a large sum of ready money for such as purchased their seats in that parliament; and, next, it released the inhabitants of the three bishoprics from having recourse to the imperial chamber at Spires, for which a more convenient season could not be taken than this, when the flame of war raged so terribly in Germany, that there was no passing from one city to another, with any tolerable degree of certainty. In Holland the king's ministers<sup>g</sup> wrought so effectually, that the negotiations for a truce with the Spaniards went on but slowly. The duke of Rohan, who was highly esteemed at Venice, though he resided there as an exile, received unexpectedly a commission, appointing him ambassador extraordinary to the Grisons, and was likewise declared lieutenant-general of the troops the king either had or might have in the Valtelline<sup>h</sup>. This so alarmed the Spaniards, that their ambassador had orders to complain in the strongest terms, which he did, to the king and his minister; alleging, that, under a variety of specious pretences, France, without entering into a war, assisted the enemies of the house of Austria on every side; that the king his master was desirous of making a stable and solid peace, in consequence of which he expected to see the French troops withdrawn out of Casal and Pignerol, as well as those that, under colour of assisting the elector of Treves, carried on an actual war in the heart of the empire. To this Richelieu answered, that the king was as desirous of peace as his Catholic majesty; but that he could not desert his allies, or part with Pignerol, which, since the treaty of Querasque, he had purchased of the duke of Savoy<sup>i</sup>. He added, with an air of freedom, that, if they disliked his manner of conducting affairs, they were unjust to themselves, since he only copied their manner of acting, as he demonstrated by a long train of facts. About midsummer he took the field with the king<sup>j</sup> against the duke of Lorrain, who had frequently given out commissions, and, when he had levied troops, he transferred them either to the imperial or to the Spanish service, without any regard to his last treaty. The king quickly made himself master of St. Mihiel and Luneville, upon which duke Charles sent his brother the cardinal of Lorrain to enter once more into a negociation. The king told him plainly, that his resentment arose from his brother's marriage with the princess Margaret, which was null in itself for want of having his consent, and therefore insisted that the princess should be delivered to him in order to facilitate the dissolution of the marriage. But the cardinal, making use of the king's passports, brought his sister out of Nancy, and sent her into Flanders to Monsieur, which so provoked the king, that he invested Nancy, and insisted upon having it delivered to him in deposit. The duke concluded a treaty<sup>k</sup> to this purpose with cardinal Richelieu, and then revoked it. At length, hoping to prevail upon the king to

<sup>a</sup> Introduction à l'Histoire de l'Univers, par Mr. PUFFENDORFF, VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>b</sup> SAMUELIS PUFFENDORFF Commentarius de rebus Succicis ab expeditione Gustavi Adolphi in Germaniam, anno 1628, ad abdicationem Christianæ, anno 1654. fol. Ultrajecti, 1686. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>c</sup> Introduction à l'Histoire de l'Univers, par PUFFENDORFF. <sup>d</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>e</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 215. <sup>f</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. BERNARD Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>g</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, Vie de Richelieu. <sup>h</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan, BATT. NANI. <sup>i</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. <sup>j</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. Memoires du Sieur de Pontis, tom. ii.

<sup>k</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 35. Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii. p. 105, 106.

a soften the terms he had prescribed, he went to pay him a visit. Lewis, by the advice of Richelieu, under pretence of doing him honour, put a guard upon his person, and forced him to deliver up his capital, which otherwise had not been easily taken<sup>c</sup>. Having gone through the foreign transactions of this year, let us turn now to the domestic concerns of France.

In his return from Languedoc to Paris the last year, the cardinal had been so much indisposed as to be once thought at the point of death. It was very natural for many to aim at succeeding him, amongst whom was the keeper of the seals, M. de Chateauneuf<sup>d</sup>. Some say that he danced at a ball while the cardinal was in extremity; others, that having an amour with the duchess of Chevreuse, he wrote her a letter, in which he treated the cardinal's malady ludicrouly<sup>e</sup>. However it was, Richelieu, whose resentment was as quick and as lasting as that of any minister whose name finds a place in history, not only deprived him of his employment, but sent him prisoner to the castle of Angoulesme<sup>f</sup>. He caused the chevalier du Jars, the intimate friend of that minister, to be sent to the Bastille, and, it is said, prevailed upon the judges who were assigned him to condemn him on very slight evidence, on a promise that he should not suffer; in which he kept his word, though not till the last moment, a pardon being produced as the executioner was going to execute the sentence<sup>g</sup>. A circumstance that attended this affair will give us an idea of the court of France at this juncture. Marshal d'Estrees then commanded the army of France in the electorate of Cleves; he was the intimate friend of Chateauneuf and du Jars; he understood, by a private letter, what had happened to them both; he understood, at the same time, that his two lieutenant-generals had received packets from the court, though he had none. The fate of marshal Marillac came into his head; he took it for granted that he was undone, and fairly ran away. After four days, finding that no such orders were come, he frankly wrote the cardinal the truth, who, after rallying him in his answer, bid him return to his command<sup>h</sup>. It was not in France only the cardinal was feared; Urban the eighth was obliged, at his request, to send a commission to the archbishop of Arles, and the bishops of Boulogne, St. Flour, and St. Malo, to hear what could be offered against the bishops of Lodeve, Aleves, St. Pons, Albi, Uzes, and Nismes, who were accused of concurring in the revolt of the duke of Montmorency; and, upon a full hearing, the three former were acquitted, and the three latter were deposed<sup>i</sup>. The queen-mother, wearied with her long exile, and piqued at the ill usage she met with from her son, solicited the king for leave to return, and at the same time assured him that she had not the least knowledge of Monsieur's irruption into Languedoc. The king gave her for answer, that, as to Monsieur's irruption, he could not have made it, if she had not pawned her jewels to supply him with money; and that, till she abandoned those who gave her ill counsels to his justice, he could not think himself safe with her in his court<sup>m</sup>. A. D. 1633.

CHARLES the fourth duke of Lorraine, finding it impossible to comply with the terms of the treaty of Nancy, having a strong aversion to France, and an implacable hatred to the cardinal, flattered himself that he could obtain some ease for his subjects by resigning his dominions to his brother, which he accordingly did, but it had not the proposed effect<sup>n</sup>. The cardinal, duke of Lorraine married the princess Claude, sister to Nicola, his brother's consort<sup>o</sup>, and this so irritated Richelieu, to whose niece he had been a pretender more than a year, that he ordered the marshal de la Force to invest the new married couple in Luneville, which he did, and, the place being quickly surrendered, brought them prisoners to Nancy, where the duchess Nicola was before<sup>p</sup>. On the first of April, tired with their imprisonment, the duke and duchess made their escape, he in the dress of a peasant, and she with a basket on her back<sup>q</sup>. In a little time all the rest of Lorraine was reduced, and treated, in all respects, as a province of France. The states of Holland having broken their negotiation with the crown of Spain for a truce, the king signed a treaty<sup>r</sup>, on the 15th of April, with them, by which he promised to give them a subsidy of two millions, provided they did not conclude either peace or truce with the Spaniards for a year. The death of Walstein, duke of Freidland<sup>s</sup>, was a mortifying stroke to the cardinal, who is thought to have had a great hand in persuading him to revolt from the emperor. On the first of July the king, by an edict<sup>t</sup>, directed his geographers to account the first meridian to pass through the island of Ferro, which is the most western of the Canaries, and, at the same time, declared all French and Spanish vessels, taken beyond that meridian, good prize, till such time as those crowns should open their ports, in both Indies, to all vessels bearing French colours.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 44. <sup>VITT. SIRI</sup> Memoire recon dite, Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. ii. <sup>f</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. <sup>g</sup> VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. vii. <sup>h</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 86. <sup>i</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. vii. <sup>k</sup> Vie de Richelieu. <sup>l</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>BERNARD</sup> Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>m</sup> VITT. Memoire recon dite, tom. vii. p. 693. <sup>n</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 37. <sup>o</sup> Me-moires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 47. <sup>p</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. vii. <sup>q</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau. <sup>r</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 254. <sup>s</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 88. <sup>AUBERI</sup> Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. <sup>t</sup> DUPL. Histoire de Louis XIII. <sup>BERNARD</sup> Histoire de Louis XIII.

The defeat of the Swedes causes a great change in affairs.

ON the 6th of September the Swedes, under the command of the duke of Weymar and marshal Horne, were totally defeated at Norlingen by the imperialists and their allies, with the loss of twenty thousand men and seventy pieces of cannon<sup>a</sup>. By this great blow the cardinal was forced to change his conduct; he had hitherto looked upon it as the most necessary and refined policy to make the house of Austria feel all the miseries of war from the arms and money of France, without declaring openly against her; and on this he had valued himself highly in some of his discourses to the parliament; but the allies of France, who had long thought otherwise, were compelled, by the present conjuncture of affairs, to speak their sentiments freely. They alleged, that, France not declaring, the Spaniards found themselves at liberty to assist the imperialists in such a manner as rendered them superior to the allies; that, in fact, therefore, this gave the house of Austria an advantage, as the French would feel, whenever the Protestant princes in Germany were reduced to make terms, since the imperialists would throw their whole force into Lorraine, at the same time the Spaniards invaded Picardy. The cardinal contented himself for the present with renewing the treaty with the crown of Sweden, the duke of Wurtemberg, the landgrave of Hesse, and the rest of the Protestant princes who still remained in arms; by which he engaged to furnish them with a large sum of money, and, in consideration of another sum, procured from the Swedes Philipsburg and some other places; stipulated farther, that, whenever France should declare war, Alsace should be put into her hands by way of deposit. This treaty was signed at Paris on the first of November<sup>w</sup>, and towards the close of the year the marshal de la Force recovered the city of Heidelberg, and forced the imperialists to raise the siege of the castle with loss: services that procured him considerable gratifications from his master.

The duke of Orleans quits Brussels, and returns to court.

THE queen-mother still continued her solicitations to return, and even condescended to write a letter to the cardinal, to intreat his interposition in her favour, which embarrassed him exceedingly. He gave, however, the same answer he had done before, except that he now named the persons whom he expected to have given up, which were Father Chantelupe, who had hired several persons to assassinate him, the abbe de St. Germain, who had written volumes of libels against him, and abbe Fabroni, who had cast the king's horoscope, and had very confidently predicted he had not long to live<sup>x</sup>. The queen saw, that, if she stooped to this, she should lose the credit and confidence of all mankind, and therefore rejected the proposition, which was, very probably, what the cardinal intended. The cardinal still treated with Monsieur, or rather with his favourite Paylaurens, and the reconciliation was brought very near; notwithstanding which, Monsieur, on the 12th of May, signed the treaty with the marquis d'Aytona<sup>y</sup>, who commanded in the Spanish Low Countries, by which he engaged not to return in two years and a half to France, let things take what turn there they would; and, on the other, the Spaniards promised to furnish him with fifteen thousand men, to make a fresh attempt; but the true design of this alliance was to conceal his negociation, and to raise his terms with the cardinal. His Catholic majesty's ratification, by the shipwreck of the vessel that carried it on the coast of France, fell by that accident into the cardinal's hand, and had actually this effect<sup>z</sup>. However, the parliament, and even an assembly of the clergy of France, declared the duke of Orleans's marriage null and void, under pretence that the house of Lorraine had committed a rape upon him, and that the two dukes had compelled him to marry their sister. On the eighth of October Monsieur<sup>a</sup> stole away from Brussels, without taking leave of his mother or wife, and, on his return to court, was very graciously received.

War declared against Spain.

WE are now arrived at that period, in which the embarrassed state of foreign affairs had almost frightened the cardinal from the helm, as he was once before on the point of resigning, from the consequences of the intrigues at Lyons. The famous Father Joseph, and Bullion, who had the direction of the finances, kept up his spirits on that, as the same Father and the cardinal de la Valette did on this occasion<sup>b</sup>. The year opened with a great misfortune. The imperialists surprised Philipsburg, which, exclusive of its great importance, had cost four hundred thousand crowns to the Swedes; there was in it half that sum in ready money, and the magazines were completed at an immense expence, all of which passed at once into the hands of the enemy<sup>c</sup>. The Spaniards and the imperialists had now so visible a superiority, that, in the beginning of February, the king was obliged to conclude a new treaty<sup>d</sup> with the States General, by which he promised to declare war immediately against Spain, and to act in con-

<sup>a</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, BATT. NANI. Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 282.

<sup>x</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. vii. p. 761.

<sup>y</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, tom. i. p. 425.

<sup>z</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. vii.

<sup>a</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>b</sup> BERNARD

<sup>c</sup> BATT. NANI.

<sup>d</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII.

tom. iii. p. 289.

a junction with the Dutch in the Low Countries, with an army of thirty thousand men. At the same time a plan <sup>c</sup> of partition was made, by which it was determined what part of the Spanish provinces should belong to the king, and what to the republic, provided the inhabitants of those provinces did not accept the proposition that was to be made them, of revolting against their masters, and unite themselves, as the seven provinces had done, into a free commonwealth. This treaty between the crown and the republic, which seemed to unite them more closely than ever, proved the first source of those suspicions that alienated the Dutch from France; for the wise heads in the states, perceiving how earnest a desire the king had to become their neighbour, grew jealous of a power, of whom, hitherto, they had no apprehension. Besides, Frederick Henry, prince of Orange, for certain reasons, hated the cardinal, and was the only one of his enemies who could justly boast of having made him sensible of his resentment <sup>f</sup>. The Spaniards had no sooner an account of this treaty, than they formed the project of surprising Treves, which was executed by the governor of Luxemburg, who, having surprised and cut in pieces the French garrison, plundered the elector's palace, and carried him away prisoner into Flanders, for having put himself under his most Christian majesty's protection <sup>g</sup>. The cardinal took this occasion to declare war <sup>h</sup>, and published a long manifesto, which was quickly answered by the Spaniards. The queen-mother had written at large to the king her son, to dissuade him from this measure, which she represented as necessary to his minister, and fatal to himself. This letter was transmitted to Mazarine, the pope's nuncio, who, after having communicated it to Richelieu, delivered it to the king, who, when he had read it, told him, that, out of respect to his mother, he declined writing an answer, that he might not be obliged to upbraid her with her partiality to the Spaniards, and the small regard she discovered for his honour and interests <sup>i</sup>.

In pursuance of the treaty with Holland, the French army, commanded by the marshals Chatillon and Breze, marched to join that of the prince of Orange, in the neighbourhood of Maestricht. The army commanded by the marshals consisted of six thousand horse and twenty-two thousand foot. In their march they met with the Spanish army, under the command of prince Thomas of Savoy, consisting of about seventeen thousand men, but so well intrenched, that they were not at all apprehensive of being attacked. But the French, in full spirits, and at the opening of the campaign, attacked them with such vigour, that, in a short time, they were totally defeated, four thousand killed upon the spot, nine hundred taken, together with all their baggage and artillery. This, stiled the battle of Avein, was fought on the twentieth of May <sup>k</sup>. The victorious army marched without interruption to Maestricht, where they joined the prince of Orange, and fell under his command. They attacked Tirlemont, a place of considerable strength, and took it sword in hand. The army behaved there with the utmost cruelty and licentiousness, the Dutch throwing the blame upon the French, and the French upon them <sup>l</sup>. They afterwards invested Louvain, but, through some misunderstandings between their generals, were constrained to raise the siege; after which they went into winter-quarters; but those assigned the French were so indifferent, that this flourishing army wasted away in such manner, that they returned home in small parties; which disgrace and disappointment chagrined the cardinal to the last degree, more especially as it created a great clamour in France, where, from the weight of their taxes, and other grievous misfortunes, the people in general were too much inclined to murmur. On the side of Germany things were like to go worse; the electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh made their peace with the emperor, and their example was followed by most of the German princes: the cardinal had much ado to preserve the Swedes in a condition to keep up a diversion on that side, tho' he sent his great friend the cardinal de la Valette to assist the duke of Weymar. The king was so impatient at seeing not only his conquest, but his dominions in danger, that, after being dissuaded from putting himself at the head of the army in Germany, he, in the autumn, put himself at the head of a few troops in Champagne, of whom the count de Soissons was declared general, and with those he entered Lorraine, where he took St. Mibel, which had been surprized by the inhabitants <sup>m</sup>. He retired soon after, the count de Cramail having shewn him that he ran a great hazard of being carried away by the duke of Lorraine: the cardinal, to hide the true cause of this retreat, caused the count to be arrested <sup>n</sup>, and sent to the Bastile, and disgraced the count de Soissons. To put things in a better posture for the future, he concluded, towards the end of the month, a treaty with duke Bernard of Weymar <sup>o</sup>, by which he promised him a subsidy of four millions per annum, for the maintenance of an army of eighteen thousand men, and granted him several personal advantages besides.

This at the beginning is attended with many checks and universal discontent.

<sup>c</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 296.

AUBERI. <sup>g</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite.

BERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

liv. iii. p. 150. <sup>m</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, LE VASSOR. Mercure Francois.

moires du Marquis de Beauvau. <sup>o</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 335.

<sup>f</sup> Memoires de Holland, par

<sup>h</sup> LE VASSOR. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>i</sup> AU-

<sup>l</sup> Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii.

<sup>n</sup> Me-

League of Italy concluded.

THE cardinal, to keep the house of Austria every-where employed, projected and accomplished the grand league in Italy, into which entered the dukes of Savoy, Parma, and Mantua, to whose assistance marched the marshal de Crequi, with sixteen thousand men. The brothers of the famous marshal Thoiras having very imprudently entered into the intrigues at Lyons, that great man became suspected, and of consequence disgraced; however, at the earnest desire of the duke of Savoy, he was permitted to enter into his service. Marshal Crequi invested Valence with his forces, to the relief of which the Spanish army marched, under the command of Don Carlo Colonna. The duke of Savoy went with ill will to this siege, and with a worse to attack the Spaniards, who were advancing to relieve the place; the marshal, however, attacked them, before they were intrenched, and, in all probability, had beat them, if he had been properly seconded by the duke; as he was not, he found himself constrained to retire, of which he made grievous complaints: it was suspected that marshal Thoiras contributed not a little to this check; but however, it is very certain that this misintelligence amongst their chiefs ruined the cardinal's grand design of conquering, in one campaign, the duchy of Milan, and would have been attended with still worse effects, if it had not been for the success of the duke of Rohan in the Valtelline, where, immediately after this misfortune, he beat the Imperialists, who had otherwise entered the duchy of Milan with twenty thousand men, and, on the tenth of November, he defeated the Spaniards at Morbeigne, under the command of general Serbellon<sup>p</sup>: services justly esteemed at that time, but which afterwards were but unjustly requited, through the envy borne to his distinguished abilities, and steady attachment to his religion.

Puylaurens,
the duke of Orleans's favourite, imprisoned and poisoned.

WE have yet the intrigues of the year to account for. All that had been promised to Monsieur was punctually performed, and, after some delay his favourite Puylaurens was fully gratified; he had a sum of money given him, which enabled him to purchase the duchy of Aiguillon: he married mademoiselle de Pont du Chateau, the cardinal's relation, and was made duke and peer of France<sup>q</sup>. His fortune was great, but of no long duration; for it quickly appeared that the cardinal and he were not capable of a right understanding. The king was bent upon dissolving his brother's marriage; the cardinal desired Puylaurens to dispose his master to it, and would not believe that it was out of his power. On the other hand, Puy-laurens was desirous of sharing in the administration; which disturbed the cardinal so much, that he engaged the king to cause him to be arrested at the Louvre, and sent to the castle of Vincennes, where he died on the first of July, a little suspiciously<sup>r</sup>. To pacify his master, he was admitted into the council; but the loss of his favourite, and the imprisonment of some other persons about him, did not operate at all upon his conduct. He disclaimed the pretence of a rape by the princes of Lorraine; he declared that his marriage was the effects of his choice; that he made it a point of conscience to adhere to his wife, to whom he remitted five thousand crowns a month; and shewed so much calmness and steadiness in this, as he had weakness and inconstancy on every other occasion<sup>s</sup>.

The war in Germany and Italy carried on with indifferent success.

ON the side of Germany the imperialists made themselves masters of Metz; but they had not the same fortune in besieging Calmar, from which they were obliged to rise by cardinal de la Valette and the duke of Weymar<sup>t</sup>. The king having sent the prince of Condé to besiege Dole and Franche Comié, the imperialists made an irruption into Burgundy, where they might certainly have done something of importance, if the desire of plundering the country had not induced them to spread their troops abroad, instead of reducing and keeping any of the strong places. The king and his minister were so much alarmed at this invasion, that it was judged requisite to make a new treaty with the young queen of Sweden<sup>u</sup>, and another with the landgrave of Hesse<sup>v</sup>, both engaging for the payment of subsidies, in consideration of the forces they were to employ against the common enemy. The Spaniards attacked the kingdom likewise on their side, took and burned St. John de Luz, and had taken Bayonne, if the duke de la Valette, taking advantage of their slowness, had not relieved it; but the fleet sent to recover the islands on the coast of Provence met with a repulse. It was commanded by the archbishop of Bordeaux, which so extremely piqued the marshal de Vitry, who commanded in Provence, that he hindered the operations till the Spanish galleys appeared, by which the design was rendered impracticable<sup>x</sup>. In Italy things went little better than before; for though the duke of Savoy beat the Spaniards in the month of June, yet he would not improve that victory, because he had engaged by treaty to enlarge the district about Pignerol, in proportion to his conquests in the Milanese, and, to avoid doing the one, he would not do the other. The brave marshal Thoiras, who attended that prince, was killed at the siege of an inconsiderable place, as he was giving directions for a battery. The duke of Parma had the misfortune to see himself stripped of the best part of his dominions by the

<sup>p</sup> LE VASSOR. BATT. NANI. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite.
Mercure Francois. <sup>q</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. <sup>r</sup> Mercure Francois. <sup>s</sup> VITT.
SIRI Memoire recon dite. Vie de Richelieu. <sup>t</sup> BATT. NANI, Memoires de Puysegur. <sup>u</sup> Recueil de a Spaniards, but the duke of Roban was still victorious in the Valteline, which hindered the Spaniards from pushing things on this side with that vigour and advantage which they otherwise would have done <sup>r</sup>.
Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 355. <sup>v</sup> Ibid. p. 359. <sup>x</sup> LE VASSOR.

THE Cardinal Infant, perceiving that, in consequence of the many designs formed on both sides, the frontier of Picardy lay in a manner open, resolved to enter France on that side, with all the force he could collect. Accordingly he committed the command of the army to prince Thomas of Savoy, who was joined by Picolomini, and John de Werth, an enterprising officer, who commanded a corps of irregular troops who rendered themselves terrible where-ever they came. This army presented itself about the beginning of July before la Capelle, which rendered the sixth day of the siege, the baron du Bec, who commanded therein, thinking it impossible to defend it longer. Le Catelet was taken in two days, Monf. St. Leger having surrendered before a breach was made: the cardinal, to cover the omission in not making suitable provision for the defence of these places, caused the officers who commanded in them to be condemned of high treason, as if they had acted in concert with the Spaniards. He even went so far as to treat the duke de la Valette with harsh language, for interposing on the behalf of the baron du Bec, and caused the duke de St. Simon <sup>2</sup>, the king's favourite, to whom he had many obligations, to be disgraced, for endeavouring to support Monf. St. Leger; who was his uncle. These severities had not the effect he expected. The Spaniards forced a passage over the Somme, in spite of the small army commanded by the count de Soissons, and immediately after invested Corbie, in which commanded Monsieur Soyecourt, the king's lieutenant-general of the province, who surrendered in a week, notwithstanding he had a garrison of eighteen hundred men, and the place was reputed strong <sup>a</sup>. The Parisians seeing John de Werth within two days march of their gates, fell into the utmost confusion. The king was so much chagrined, that he scarce spoke to the cardinal, who shut himself up in his palace, not knowing what course to take. In this situation his old friend Buillon, who by his favour was at the head of the finances, advised him not only to appear publicly, but to lay aside his guards; "For I," said he, "who am ten times more hated than you, traverse all Paris with a couple of footmen only." Richelieu took his advice, and the citizens, taking it for a mark of confidence, tho' they had reviled him the day before, applauded his courage, and the populace followed him with loud acclamations <sup>b</sup>. However, this had no effect upon the king; and his coldness so dispirited the cardinal, that he communicated to Father Joseph his intention to quit the ministry, in order to provide for his safety. But the cunning capuchin told him that was not the way to be safe; and that a minister, who had brought the kingdom and himself into danger, ought to employ his thoughts how to bring them out. The cardinal, upon this, laboured assiduously to reinforce the army, borrowed money on every hand, took a footman from every person who kept two, and a horse from those who kept more than two; stopped all the new buildings, and sent the carpenters and masons for recruits; ordered forces from every quarter, and in a little time assembled fifty thousand men; resolved to take the command in person, if the count de Soissons would have served under him; but that prince having absolutely rejected the proposition, he gave the command to the duke of Orleans, supposing those two princes could not long agree, and that this would afford him a fair opportunity of removing them both, or of bringing one of them at least entirely into his measures <sup>c</sup>.

THIS proved one of the most dangerous resolutions he had ever taken. When the king saw his brother at the head of an army, he was so much out of temper that there was no approaching him. On the other hand, Monsieur and the count de Soissons, contrary to the cardinal's expectation, agreed perfectly well: indeed so well, that, upon comparing their grievances, they came to a resolution of causing the cardinal to be assassinated, as he sat in council with the king at Amiens. Four of their domestics were appointed to perform this base action; and they had the cardinal entirely in their power; for on the day fixed the king went early from the council: Monsieur and the count held the cardinal a long time in conversation, the four assassins standing round him ready to have dispatched him, if Monsieur had put his hand to his hat, which was to have been the signal <sup>d</sup>. But, on a sudden, the duke of Orleans left the hall where they were, and went up stairs. One of the four followed him, and asked him what he meant: he said his conscience would not permit him to dip his hands in the blood of a cardinal, archbishop, and priest. The cardinal knew nothing of this danger at the time, but was afterwards informed of it by the duke de la Valette, who was embarked in the conspiracy. The campaign was short; by the middle of September the Spaniards were obliged to repass the Somme; on the 10th of November Corbie was recovered <sup>e</sup>. On the 20th of the

<sup>r</sup> AUBERT Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>a</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. Memoires du Beauvass-Nangis. <sup>b</sup> Vie du Cardinal de Richelieu. Memoires du Comte de Brienne.

<sup>c</sup> Vie du Cardinal de Richelieu. Memoires Historiques, &c. par AMELOT DE LA HOUSSEY.

<sup>d</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. Memoires de Montresor.

<sup>e</sup> Memoires du LE VASSOR

same month, the duke of Orleans and the count de Soissons fled, at eleven o'clock at night, out of Paris, the former to Blois, and the latter to Sedan; the cardinal causing false intelligence to be given them, that the king intended to arrest them, while with his master it passed for a kind of conviction of their guilt, that they had retired in this abrupt manner; yet both were A. D. 1636. treated with great lenity, by the cardinal's advice. The count de Soissons was permitted to receive his rents and his appointments, without being obliged to return; and the king offered his brother to approve his marriage, provided he would give him a promise under his hand not to enter into any correspondence with foreigners, or to attempt disturbing the public tranquillity<sup>f</sup>. In order to gain Frederick Henry prince of Orange, whom the cardinal had disoblige by his haughtiness, and whom he had compelled, which was a very difficult thing, to seek his friendship by submissions, he ordered the ambassador of France to give him the title of highness instead of excellency, and was so fortunate as to succeed, which proved, in many instances, very beneficial to France, and helped to extricate her out of her present difficulties<sup>g</sup>.

Progress of the war in Germany, and dissolution of the Italian league.

In Germany the affairs of the Swedes went but indifferently; but the duke of Weymar had the good fortune to defeat the troops of Lorraine about midsummer. The emperor Ferdinand the second dying, France made some difficulty of owning his son Ferdinand the third, though he had been chosen king of the Romans with the accustomed ceremonies; but, when it was found this example was not either followed or approved by other princes, France dropped her opposition<sup>h</sup>. On the side of Italy things went very indifferently. The duke of Parma being besieged in Placentia, and the French not knowing how to relieve him, he was constrained to accept the terms offered him by Spain, which were not very unreasonable; by this, and by the death of the duke of Mantua and the duke of Savoy, the Italian league seemed to be dissolved, with which the cardinal was not at all displeased, because it gave him an opportunity of saving, and the unavoidable expences of the war ran so high, that he found it equally difficult and necessary<sup>i</sup>. He was, however, sensibly chagrined at the loss of the Valteline, and with reason, since it was intirely his own fault.

The duke of Rohan compelled to abandon the Valteline, and the islands recovered.

HE hated the duke of Rohan, and, though he had served the king with equal fidelity and success, yet no care was taken to supply him with money, which was all he wanted to carry on affairs on that side; upon this the Grisons, to whom he owed a million for the pay and subsistence of his troops, entered into a negotiation with the Spaniards, for obliging him to evacuate the Valteline: he engaged them, however, to give him two months time, and, by way of favour, procured two months more; but the cardinal would not relieve, or so much as afford him an answer. In this distress his prudence suggested an expedient that saved his own honour, and his master's troops: he undertook they should evacuate the country in a certain number of days, and became a hostage for the performance; and thus the blame was wholly and incontestably thrown upon the cardinal, and his own honour secured<sup>k</sup>. The fleet which, the year before, did so little, met this year with better fortune, though still commanded by the count de Harcourt, and the archbishop of Bordeaux; for, after having made a descent in Sardinia, towards the end of February, they, in the middle of May, made a descent on the island of St. Margaret, and, having beat the Spaniards from their forts, with great loss, compelled them at length to abandon that of St. Honorat, which would have been done the year before, had not the archbishop quarrelled with marshal de Vitri, and perhaps would not have been done now, if that marshal had not been sent to the Bastile for returning the prelate's ill language with two or three strokes of his cane<sup>l</sup>. The duke de la Valette, who, being under the cardinal's displeasure, could have no assistance from court, by cutting off their provisions, obliged the enemy to quit two or three small places they had seized in Guienne, and so delivered the province without an army; the Spaniards, to revenge these losses, invested Leucat with an army. It was a place of no great strength, and the Sieur de Barri, who commanded in it, had but fourscore men; but, notwithstanding this, he defended himself for a month, which gave time to the duke of Halvin to march with a body of peasants, raised in haste, with whom he defeated the Spaniards, killed them two thousand men, took their train of artillery, consisting of thirty-seven pieces of heavy cannon, for which he was soon after rewarded with the staff of marshal, and chose to be called by his father's title, Schomberg, though duke and peer in right of his wife<sup>m</sup>.

Campaign in the Low Countries, and la Capelle recovered.

ON the side of the Low Countries, the cardinal de la Valette, assisted by his eldest brother the duke de Candale, reduced Chateau Cambresis, Bavai, Maubeuge, and Landreci, small places, but important by their situation. The marshal de Chatillon took Yvoi in the duchy of Luxemburgh, and, this being quickly recovered, he invested Damvilliers, which he likewise

<sup>f</sup> Memoires d'un Favourite.

VASSOR Histoire de Louis XIII.

BATT. NANI. Vie du Cardinal de Richelieu.

memoire recon dite. Memoires du Comte de Brienne. Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires de Holland, par AUBERI,

<sup>i</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne.

<sup>l</sup> LE VASSOR Histoire de Louis XIII. VITT. SIRI Me-

<sup>m</sup> Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu. LE VASSOR

<sup>h</sup> LE

<sup>k</sup> Memoires du Duc de Rohan.

<sup>a</sup> reduced. The duke of Longueville took also several places in the French Comté. The king was very desirous of taking the field himself, in order to have recovered la Capelle; but, according to the report that was made to the cardinal, this was not so easy or so sure a thing as to venture the monarch's reputation upon it; yet in the month of September, the cardinal de la Valette, after taking the sense of a council of war, resolved to invest it, and became master of it in ten days<sup>a</sup>. The king, though he was sensible of the great importance of this success, was, notwithstanding, displeased that he had not the credit of taking it; upon which the minister found himself obliged to send for the journal of the campaign, that he might convince his majesty that it was not undertaken by his orders, but purely by the advice of the council of war, upon finding the siege of Avesnes, which he had commanded, impracticable; <sup>b</sup> with which the king, in appearance at least, was pretty well satisfied. But this was far from being the minister's greatest trouble<sup>c</sup>.

THE cardinal, in the beginning of the year, had prevailed upon his master to make a tour to Orleans, with the French and Swiss guards. This had an admirable effect in fixing the intentions of Monsieur, who had begun to draw the disaffected about him at Blois, and had talked in high strains of the honour and courtesy of the Spaniards, as if he had forgot the miserable end of the duke of Montmorenci, and his own sad situation at Brussels. But now, apprehending his liberty in danger, he was very willing to treat, accepted the offer that was made him of not proceeding farther in the matter of his marriage, took a new oath of fidelity, and was extremely delighted, that, at his request, the king had been pleased to set the chevalier Grignan and the abbe de la Riviere at liberty. The French wits said of the latter, that he knew the worth of his master the best of any body, because he had fold him over and over<sup>d</sup>. The ill humours of the duke of Orleans were troublesome, but those of the king were terrible, and it was not long before the cardinal experienced these. He seemed at first thoughtful, then melancholy, and at length sullen. His confessor, the famous Father Caussin, a Jesuit, was the source of all this. He had filled his mind with scruples of conscience, and at length, in resolving them, furnished him with four charges against the minister; that he had driven the queen-mother into exile, and kept her there without bread; that he had usurped the royal authority himself, having the power, and his majesty no more than the title, of king; that the people were oppressed with taxes in such a manner, that misery was become universal; and that the wealth torn out of the vitals of the people was consumed in subsidies to heretics, such as the Swedes, the Germans, and the Dutch. The king asked him if he could recommend another minister in point of abilities, which was a thing Caussin had never considered, being moved to this enterprize by bigotry rather than ambition. He answered therefore in the negative; but, being pressed by the king, he undertook to maintain what he had advanced to Richelieu's face, on a day assigned<sup>e</sup>. In the mean time looking upon himself as commissioned to find out another prime minister, he communicated the whole of what had passed to the duke of Angoulesme, who promised to support him. But knowing the vindictive spirit of one priest, and having no great opinion of the sense and spirit of the other, he went directly to the cardinal, and told him how all things stood. The cardinal, in consequence of this intelligence, managed things so well with the king, that by the time the day came, he stood as high in the king's favour as ever; and when Father Caussin appeared, and demanded an audience, he was told that the king had been for a long time with the cardinal in his closet. After waiting, he was ordered to return to Paris, and being that evening arrested, was conveyed to Quimpercorrent, in Bretagne<sup>f</sup>. He had been prevailed upon to undertake this perilous enterprize by Father Monoa, who was confessor to the duchess regent of Savoy, the king's sister; and the cardinal's vengeance reached him the next year, by a positive declaration to the duchess, that the king could not confide in her while Father Monoa continued about her person; upon which he was arrested, and sent prisoner to Montmelian<sup>g</sup>. He made the queen also feel the effects of his power and influence, on account of her correspondence with the duchess of Chevreuse, once the object of the king's and cardinal's passion, and was now inexpressibly hated by both. The marquise de la Force was erected into a duchy and peerage in favour of the marshal. This year also the cardinal instituted the French academy, which, by its institution, was to be composed of forty members, who were to direct their studies so as to improve and perfect the French language. The true design of the cardinal is said to have been to declare himself by this means the protector of letters, that men of parts and learning might, in a more especial manner, be attached to him<sup>h</sup>.

THE king, in the beginning of the year, by a solemn act put his person and kingdom under the protection of the Blessed Virgin<sup>i</sup>. Duke Bernard of Weymar having made a tour into

<sup>a</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires de Puysegur.

<sup>d</sup> Vie du Cardinal de Richelieu. Me-

moires de Montresor.

<sup>e</sup> VITT. SIRI

Memoire reconдите.

Memores de Montresor.

du Duc d'Orleans.

Vie du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>f</sup> AUBERI

Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Mer-

cure Francois.

<sup>g</sup> Vie de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI

Memoire reconдите.

AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Riche-

liu. <sup>h</sup> Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>i</sup> Course of the war in Germany and Italy; death of the dukes of Savoy and Rohan, and marshal

Crequi.

Switzerland, the duke of Rohan, with whom he had many conferences, was so charmed with his conversation, that he engaged him to accompany him to his army, with which he besieged Rheinfeld, a strong place, which is considered as the chief of the forest towns. On the 28th of February John de Werth forced one of the quarters of his camp with great loss, took several pieces of cannon, and obliged him to raise the siege. The duke, having very exact intelligence, returned on the 3d of March, attacked and defeated the imperial army, took twelve pieces of cannon, and their four generals prisoners. To make his court to the king, John de Werth was sent under an escorte to Paris. In the first action the duke of Rohan was mortally wounded, and died on the 13th of March, in a village belonging to the canton of Bern<sup>w</sup>. His corpse lies interred at Geneva. The suit of armour he wore was received with great respect by the state of Venice, to whom it was bequeathed<sup>x</sup>. He was little regretted at court, though one of the greatest men that age produced. The duke of Weymar afterwards reduced Rheinfeld, Friburgh, and, after twice beating the imperialists, and a long blockade, Brisac<sup>y</sup>. In Italy things went but very indifferently. The duchess of Savoy was desirous of concluding a defensive league only; the cardinal, by threatening that the king would abandon her, obliged her to conclude an offensive and defensive alliance with France<sup>z</sup>. The Spaniards having invested Brenca, marshal Crequi going to reconnoitre his lines, standing against a tree, with his perspective glass in his hand, an engineer took so good an aim, that the bullet struck off his left hand with the glass in it, and went through his belly into the tree. Thus fell this great man, on the 18th of March<sup>a</sup>. The cardinal de la Valette was sent to command in his stead, he could not prevent the taking of Verceil, and remained afterwards on the defensive. On the fourth of October died the young duke of Savoy<sup>b</sup>, who was succeeded by his brother Charles Emanuel. The cardinal of Savoy and prince Thomas contested the regency, but the duchess, supported by her brother, prevailed.

The prince of Condé compelled to raise the siege of Fontarabia.

On the side of Spain it was resolved to act offensively. The conde duke had caused France to be invaded twice, the cardinal duke resolved on the siege of Fontarabia, contrary to the advice of the duke de la Valette, who declined commanding the army that was to form it<sup>c</sup>. The cardinal, to mortify that family, declared the prince of Condé the king's lieutenant-general in Guienne, and the provinces adjacent, ordered the old duke of Espéron to keep his house, and the duke de la Valette to attend the prince, who entered Navarre in the beginning of the month of July, took Iron, Figueras, and Port-Passage, in which he found twelve good ships, and one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon. The archbishop of Bordeaux, who had orders to second him with a fleet, defeated that of Spain, which was composed of fourteen galleons and four frigates; one only of the latter escaped, the rest were either taken or sunk, and on board them four or five thousand old troops were either burned or drowned<sup>d</sup>. As this fleet was intended for the relief of Fontarabia, it was given up for lost, though very gallantly defended. But the prince of Condé in the first place made a strange mistake in abandoning Port-Passage, which enabled the admiral of Castile to march with twelve hundred horse and fifteen thousand militia to the relief of the place. It was in so desperate a state, that he put all things to the hazard, and, on the 7th of September, attacked the French in their intrenchments, though their army consisted of nineteen thousand old troops. The officers did their duty, but the first intrenchment being forced, all things fell into confusion; the prince of Conti and the archbishop of Bordeaux retiring to the fleet, embarked what troops they could, and escaped. The duke de la Valette, who had been removed from his command, and was at a distance from the army, returned of his own accord, rallied the flying remains of their forces, and made a decent retreat<sup>e</sup>. The prince, notwithstanding, threw all the blame upon him, and the duke, who foresaw he should be made a victim, notwithstanding the credit his brother had with the cardinal, withdrew to England<sup>f</sup>; upon which his process was made, he was condemned to lose his head, and that sentence publicly executed in effigy at the Greve, though the president Bellevue and some others, his judges, protested against it. As the cardinal had power to depress even without cause, so he claimed also the prerogative of exalting without merit. His nephew Monsieur de Pont Courlai, with fifteen French galleys, attacked as many of the Spaniards before Genoa, on the 1st of September, and with the loss of three of his own, defeated them totally, and took six, by which he gained great reputation, though his personal behaviour did not at all contribute to the victory<sup>g</sup>. These were the dawns of the French naval power, which this minister had much at heart.

The cardinal
inexorable to the queen-mother, and

THE marshal de Chatillon, with a numerous army, entered Artois, and, after wasting that country, in the latter end of May invested St. Omer; but, after lying before it seven weeks, and losing a great number of men, he was constrained to retire by prince Thomas of Savoy and

<sup>w</sup> Mercure Francois.
l'Histoire de Louis XIII.

<sup>x</sup> BATT. NANI.

<sup>y</sup> LE VASSOR.

<sup>z</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant

<sup>c</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. LE VASSOR.

<sup>a</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite.

<sup>b</sup> Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu.

Duc d'Espéron.
Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>e</sup> Mercure Francois.

<sup>d</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Vie du

<sup>f</sup> Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>g</sup> AUBERI

a general Piccolomini, with which the king was greatly offended; so that he was ordered to retire to his house, and the command given to the marshal de la Force<sup>b</sup>. In autumn, however, Monsieur du Hallier recovered le Catelet, which was the last of their conquests that the Spaniards retained. The disputes at court ran as high as ever this year, and the minister's authority and influence appeared with greater lustre than it had hitherto done. The queen-mother, after spending some little time in Holland, made a tour to Great Britain, where she prevailed upon the French minister Bellieure, by the recital of her miseries, to write in her behalf. She desired him to acquaint the cardinal, that as things were no longer what they were, so her desires were regulated by their present state; that she no longer sought for power, for places of safety, or even the splendor of a court; that she was willing to submit to his will, and receive from it, in what corner of France he pleased, bread and peace. The ambassador wrote all she desired in a very pathetic stile, but wrote without effect<sup>c</sup>. The queen-mother had declared herself before the king implacable towards the cardinal; and either fear or resentment made him so ever after. He mortified the reigning queen almost as severely. He discovered her correspondence with her brother the cardinal Infant, and caused her to be interrogated upon it<sup>d</sup> by the chancellor, tho' she was then with child. Her dignity thus invaded, the queen supported it by her behaviour: she said the ties of nature obliged her to love her brother, and her country; but that she had never written any thing inconsistent with her duty to the king, or with the affection she owed to France, since the sole end of her correspondence was to procure a peace. On the 5th of September she was delivered at St. Germain en Laye of her eldest son Lewis<sup>e</sup>, afterwards surnamed the Great, in the twenty-third year of her marriage, and which filled all France with joy to a degree that is inexpressible.

THE cardinal, not satisfied with shewing that he had an interest with his master superior either to his mother or his wife, went yet farther, and took from him his mistress, Madame de la Foyette, and this by corrupting one of his servants, and also forging billets, by which he forced her into a convent. There the king learned the secret<sup>m</sup> from her own mouth; for which the servant was disgraced, but without any diminution of the cardinal's power, as appears from the following instance. He procured Aiguillon to be erected into a duchy and peerage<sup>n</sup>, in favour of Magdalen de Vignerot, better known by the name of Madame de Combalet, with this singular clause, to be enjoyed by that lady, her heirs and successors, as well males as females, in such manner as she should be pleased to appoint. In virtue of which, by her testament in 1674, she called to the succession her niece, Maria Theresa, and at the same time substituted her grand nephew Lewis marquis of Richelieu, whose son the count de Agenois was, by an arret of parliament in 1731, declared duke and peer of France, in virtue of this substitution; but the peerage is esteemed no older than this arret<sup>o</sup>.

DUKE Bernard of Weymar, who had hitherto rendered such important services to France, began now to give some trouble to the cardinal. He was a prince by birth, a soldier by profession; he had learned the art of war under Gustavus Adolphus, but his army was his own, though in the pay of France; it was composed of all nations, but chiefly of Germans: towards the close of the year it was thin and weak, but without any difficulty he recruited it by the spring, by the reputation of his generosity, justice, and an exact regard for merit. The count de Guebriant and the viscount Turenne had served under this prince, and were at once his lieutenants and his pupils. By a secret article in his treaty, duke Bernard was to have Alsace and a large pension; he was inclined, in the mean time, to keep Brisac, and to form a principality by the conquest of several small places round him. This did not at all please the cardinal; he wanted Brisac for France, and he pressed the duke to come to Paris, that they might confer about the operations of the campaign. But of this the duke would not hear; he said the imperialists were making great preparations to oppress and destroy him, and therefore it was not time for journeys. The count de Guebriant had orders to try if he might not be brought to sell Brisac, or to exchange it for the Franche Comté, which, if he could conquer, should be preserved to him at a general peace. The duke answered like a soldier, "Monsieur le Comte, to propose to a woman of virtue the sale of her virginity, and to a brave man the purchase of his honour, is the same thing<sup>p</sup>." He sent, however, major-general Erlach to Paris, to settle the operations of the campaign, and with him the cardinal agreed, that, if the duke died, he should have a certain sum for the surrender of Brisac. On the return of that officer the duke opened the campaign in January, and prosecuted it with vigour, took several small places, but, on the 18th of July, deceased at Newburgh on the Rhine, after a short illness<sup>q</sup>. There seems to be no great doubt that he died by poison, and there is as little that the cardinal was not displeased with his death; but it does not follow that

<sup>b</sup> Memoires de Puysegur. Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne.

<sup>d</sup> Mercure Francois.

<sup>e</sup> VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recondit.

<sup>f</sup> L'Etat de France, tom. ii. p. 303.

<sup>g</sup> Abrege Chronologique de l'Histoire de France, seconde Partie,

<sup>h</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recondit.

par P. HENAU, p. 508.

<sup>i</sup> LE VASSOR. LE GENDRE.

<sup>j</sup> Mercure Francois. Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu.

he procured it, though some have suspected it. He died at thirty-six years of age, and left his succession to any of his brothers who would accept it under the protection of France and Sweden. He appointed major-general Erlach, colonel Obem, the count de Nassau, and colonel Rozen, directors of his army. With these directors, after a long negotiation, France concluded a treaty, and, in virtue of that, and the money before stipulated, major-general Erlach gave up Brisac, as another officer did Friburgh; but of both places they were to remain governors, with a garrison half German and half French; the elector Palatine, who aspired to the command of this army, left England with that view; but, being arrested in his passage through France, the cardinal prevailed upon the directors to accept of the duke of Longueville for their chief<sup>r</sup>.

Military and political transactions in Piedmont, with the famous retreat of count Harcourt.

THERE were, on the side of Piedmont, more transactions of consequence this year, than in any of the preceding. About the middle of March, the princes of Savoy, that is, the cardinal and prince Thomas, uncles to the reigning duke, made a treaty with the marquis de Leganez, at Vaniero, by which it was stipulated, that the marquis should put them in possession of the tutelage of their nephew, which they claimed; that they should use their joint endeavours to drive out the French; that such places as should open their gates should belong to the princes; but that such as were reduced by force of arms should be left in the hands of his Catholic majesty<sup>s</sup>. In consequence of this treaty, before the end of the month, Chivas was surprized, which so raised the spirits of his party, that Guieres and Montcallier declared for him. Verue and Crescentine submitted soon after. In the beginning of May he reduced Trin, which was very ill defended<sup>t</sup>. These losses obliged the duchess regent to conclude on the 1st of June a treaty with the king her brother<sup>u</sup>, by which she consented to receive French garrisons into Carmagnola, Savillan, and Querasque, which were to be restored upon the conclusion of a peace. Her affairs, indeed, were in a very bad situation, notwithstanding that cardinal de la Valette recovered Chivas; but they became still worse, when, on the 27th of August, the princes of Savoy surprized Turin, and this so suddenly, that the duchess had much ado to escape with her jewels into the citadel<sup>w</sup>. About a month after cardinal de la Valette, wore out with labour and chagrin, breathed his last at Rivoli. The pope refused the usual honours paid to the memory of cardinals, because he had commanded armies against Catholics, and had sometimes acted in conjunction with heretics<sup>x</sup>. The command of his army was given to the count de Harcourt, who hitherto had commanded on board the fleet. About this time the duchess repaired to Grenoble, to confer with her brother, where cardinal Richelieu represented to her in plain terms, that her own subjects, being better affected to the princes than to herself, and the Spaniards pouring continually fresh troops into her dominions, there was no measure left for her to take with security and honour, but to put Montmelian into her brother's hands, and to send her son the young duke to Paris, to be educated with the dauphin. She was pressed to this also by the king himself; but, wanting words, she answered both with tears, and returned with little other assistance than promises<sup>y</sup>. Count Harcourt sent Monsieur le Mothe Haudancourt to surprize Quiers, which he performed towards the end of October, on which the count marched thither with the rest of his army to assist in the fortifying it. He continued there about a month, when the marquis de Leganez encamped behind him, with the Spanish army, and prince Thomas before him, with all the forces he could assemble, secure that he could not escape either being starved or cut to pieces. He took his measures, however, so well, that, decamping in the night, he attacked and forced a passage through the army of the princes, before the Spaniards had any intelligence of his march; and having in the next night fortified a bridge, leaving some troops and cannon in it, he proceeded securely with the rest of his army before the Spaniards could force it, which was looked upon as one of the greatest actions in this war<sup>z</sup>.

Progress of the war in Spain and the Low Countries.

By the advice of Richelieu the king resolved to act offensively against Spain; and accordingly the prince of Condé was sent with a considerable body of troops to besiege Salces, while the archbishop of Bordeaux, with his fleet, alarmed and insulted the coast<sup>a</sup>. The reasons which he assigned were, that whatever fate attended the Spanish irruptions into France, the subjects of that monarchy were made to believe their master was invincible and terrible to his neighbours; but, if once attacked at home, they would speedily change their sentiments, and, loaded as they were with taxes, and discontented with the austere insolence of Olivarez's government, some of the provinces would not fail to revolt, when they saw that strangers were both able and willing to lend them assistance. It is true, this year's expedition produced not a much, though Salces was taken, after five weeks siege ; but, in the end, the cardinal's conjectures were verified in such a manner, that, as a great Italian historian<sup>b</sup> remarks, while in other places human counsels followed events, it looked as if events had followed Richelieu's counsels. But, for all this, things did not go quite so happily in all places : the marquis de Feuquieres, in the beginning of June, had with a small army invested Thionville, a very strong place, but which he would have infallibly taken, since it was equally deficient in provisions, ammunition, and garrison. Besides, he had taken his measures so well, that the governor, who was absent upon some necessary occasions, could not get in again. However, general Picolomini marched with such diligence and secrecy, that he attacked Feuquieres unexpectedly in his lines, which he speedily forced, killed and made prisoners six thousand men, and amongst the rest took Feuquieres himself, who died in Thionville of wounds and of grief. He then besieged Mauzon, where Monf. de Refuge, with a very small garrison, stood a general assault, which saved the place, for marshal Chatillon having drawn together the remains of Feuquieres's army, advanced to its relief<sup>c</sup>. But the great effort was against Hesdin, which the marquis de la Meilleraye, the cardinal's near relation, besieged and took, after thirty-eight days open trenches. He received the king standing on the breach, when his majesty, who leaned on Monf. de Puysegur's shoulder, took his cane out of that gentleman's hand, and putting it into the hand of the marquis, "For once," said he, "this shall serve for a baton. Meilleraye, I make you marshal of France." In order to gratify this gentleman with the post of grand master of the artillery, the old duke of Sully had been made marshal when he was near fourscore. On the 1st of August the marquis de Chatillon took Yvoi, in four days, and razed it ; and on the 5th of the same month the new marshal beat the Spaniards near the river Aa, killed two thousand men, took three hundred prisoners, and four pieces of cannon<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> LE GEND. <sup>s</sup> VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite. Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu. LE VASSOR.
<sup>t</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Richelieu. VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite. <sup>u</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. vi. part i. p. 174. <sup>w</sup> VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite. Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu.
<sup>x</sup> Memoires du Marechal de Fabert. <sup>y</sup> BATT. NANI, liv. xi. VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. viii. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. <sup>z</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. BATT. NANI, liv. xi. LE VASSOR. <sup>a</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu.

IN regard to the domestic concerns of this year, they were such as, if possible, gave stronger testimonies of the minister's absolute power, than any which we have yet seen. He thought it necessary to give an answer to the applications of the queen-mother, but he judged it expedient that this answer should be in the king's name. The letter was drawn in very strong terms, in which all that could be said either to justify or to extenuate the ill usage she had received was put in the best light it would bear, and, in the end, she was told, that the king, not being able to satisfy himself that her mind was at all changed, he could only recommend to her a journey to Florence, to which, if she consented, she might depend upon marks of his favour. This letter, penned by Chavigni, was carried to, and signed by, the king<sup>e</sup>. The queen of England wrote in very affecting terms on behalf of her mother, and sent over a person of distinction to support what she had said, and to offer her security for the queen's behaviour, if she was permitted to return to France ; but this made no manner of impression<sup>f</sup>. On the contrary, the cardinal had an agent in Scotland, to blow the coals of that rebellion, which afterwards flamed out with such violence through the whole island. In the court of the queen-consort, madame de Senecey, who had the honour of her majesty's confidence, and who from thence thought it unnecessary to solicit the cardinal's favour, was removed, without any reason assigned, farther than the king's pleasure ; and when, to avoid this, the queen condescended to apply herself to the cardinal, she could obtain no other answer, than that, since she did him the honour to ask his counsel, the best advice he could give her was to obey the king her husband<sup>g</sup>. After madame de la Fayette retired into a convent, the king used to divert himself with madame de Hautefort, with which the queen and the cardinal were for a time equally pleased, the former because it brought him often into her apartment, and the latter because he knew her to be an easy good-natured woman, and one who troubled not herself with affairs of state. At length perceiving her intimacy with madame de Chemeraut, a lady of great understanding, and of a very active spirit, he grew uneasy, and resolved to supply the king with a favourite, who should render him less assiduous about his mistress ; for Lewis did not at all resemble his father ; there was nothing criminal in his amours, scarce any thing gallant ; and as the pleasure of a free conversation was all he desired, it was indifferent to him whether he indulged this freedom with the sex or not. The person of whom the cardinal made choice was Henry d'Effiat, Seigneur de Cinque-Mars, the second son of marshal d'Effiat, who owed his fortune intirely to the cardinal. This young man was handsome, sprightly, well versed in all manly sports, but of a haughty and intractable temper, which he concealed from the cardinal. He was master of the wardrobe, and, in bringing him into his master's favour, Richelieu crossed his inclination, for he had shewn evident marks of dislike to Cinque-Mars ; but

The cardinal gives fresh instances of his ascendancy over his master.

<sup>b</sup> BATT. NANI, liv. xi.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. iv. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, LE VASSOR. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite.

<sup>d</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, p. 174.

<sup>e</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, p. 174.

<sup>f</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>g</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite.

OVERO Histoire de correnti tempi, tom. ii. lib. ii. p. 555. Vie de Richelieu.

A. D. 1659.

The chancellor sent into Normandy to suppress an insurrection.

Count Harcourt raises the siege of Casal, and afterwards
takes Turin.

these, by his patron's instructions, were soon got over, and at the siege of Hesdin the king gave him the first marks of his kindness, by bestowing on him a large pension, and at his return to Paris he was so thoroughly established, that the two ladies before-mentioned were forbid the court, upon a rumour that they had spoken disrespectfully of Cinque-Mars. His great merit was, that he heard the king's complaints of an evening, and repeated them faithfully to the cardinal<sup>1</sup>. But the ladies were not the only objects of the cardinal's resentment. He made the pope feel the weight of it continually, by keeping the marshal d'Estrees at Rome, with the title of the king's ambassador, who, when he bore the title of marquis de Cœuvres, had broke the heart of one of his holiness's predecessors, and who lived in a state of hostility with the pontiff, from the very moment he appeared in his court. Urban the eighth, for this and other reasons, had sent Monsi. Scoti, with the title of nuncio-extraordinary, to Paris; and the cardinal, who was as little pleased with him as the pope was with marshal d'Estrees, engaged the king to send a letter to the parliament, directing them to forbid the bishops of France to have any communication whatever with this extraordinary nuncio, who also received greater mortifications than this; so little was Richelieu inclined to keep measures with any to whom he had taken offence<sup>2</sup>. The cardinal assigned many, and some of them very plausible, reasons<sup>3</sup>, for the umbrage he said the king had taken at the proceedings of the court of Rome: Mr. Scoti made no scruple of publishing, that the true motives were the refusal of a hat for Mazarine, whom Richelieu had chosen to replace the famous Father Joseph, and the delay made in sending the cardinal's own bulls as abbot-general of the order of Cistercian monks, which he resolved to have, and the pope had resolved not to grant<sup>4</sup>.

THERE happened this winter an affair, the like of which had not been seen in France, or perhaps any-where else. The people in Normandy, finding themselves grievously burthened with taxes, the journeymen in the great towns, and the peasants in the villages, assembled together, and refused to pay any taxes. This was called the insurrection les pies nuds, or of the naked feet<sup>5</sup>. But the singularity lay in the chastisement: the chancellor Seguier went into the province, as a kind of constable of the long robe, attended by a corps of six thousand regular troops, commanded by Monsi. de Gassion, who every evening carried the white standard into the chancellor's chamber and received the word; he had likewise Monsi. Vrilliere with him as secretary of state; and, though the great seal was not removed from Paris, yet posterity will believe the contrary; for all that passed it for three months was dated from the places where the chancellor happened to be. He began with interdicting the parliament of Rouen for not proceeding vigorously against the rebels, whom he treated in such a manner, as that no blame of this sort could be fixed upon him. His troops put numbers to the sword, those who were taken were hanged or broke alive upon the wheel. He declared the privileges of the city forfeited, fined the inhabitants severely, and, in a word, made the people of Normandy understand the spirit of Richelieu's administration the most austere and unrelenting to which this or perhaps any other kingdom was ever exposed. After restoring peace, by extirpating those who had taken arms, he restored the parliament to its jurisdiction, and returned to Paris, covered with the hatred of the Normans, by which, however, he merited the esteem of the cardinal minister.

IN Germany there happened nothing of any great moment; for the duke of Longueville, with Weymar's army, which he commanded, being obliged to join the Swedes, who otherwise could not have opposed the Imperialists, great jealousies arose between them, the former endeavouring to debauch the duke's army, and induce them to take service under their crown, and the latter backward in whatever operations were proposed that had not an immediate tendency to the advantage of France<sup>6</sup>. But in Italy things went at another rate. The Spaniards had in all respects a superiority, excepting in the material article of generals. A negotiation for peace, and a kind of suspension of arms, kept things quiet in the spring, both sides professing an earnest inclination to see the tranquility of Italy restored; which both sides only pretended, that, under this fair appearance, they might push their particular points. Cardinal Maurice of Savoy was in possession of the county of Nice, in appearance firmly attached to his brother and to the Spaniards, but at the same time listened to the proposals of his sister and the French<sup>7</sup>. Prince Thomas was master of the city of Turin and several other places, closely connected with the Spaniards for the present, but not averse to proposals which he sometimes communicated to the Spaniards, that he might raise his reputation and his terms. The marquis Leganez, governor of Milan, was, in every body's opinion, an able negotiator, but a great general only in his own. He had concluded a secret

<sup>1</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, Memoires de Bassompierre. Memoires du Comte de Brienne. LE VASSOR.

<sup>2</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 390.

<sup>3</sup> Vie de Richelieu. <sup>4</sup> LE VASSOR. LE GEND. P. DAN. Journal Historique de Louis XIII.

<sup>5</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. PUFFENDORF. Rer. Suec. l. xii. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>6</sup> VITTORIO SIRI Memoire recon dite. BATT. NANI. Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu.

- a treaty with the duchess of Mantua, in consequence of which he made no doubt of surprising Casal: the French governor discovered his correspondence, just as he arrived before it, and prevented its effects. This obliged Leganez to invest and besiege the place in form, which was ill provided, the inhabitants disaffected, and without hopes of relief. However, the governor did his duty, and made a gallant defence. The count de Harcourt, with a small army, at a great distance, having many other disadvantages, resolved to attempt something, and wrote the cardinal word, that he would either raise the siege, or perish before the place. He took his measures so well, and marched with such expedition, that, on the 29th of April, he attacked the Spaniards in their lines, which were not half finished, forced them, though not without an obstinate resistance, and thereby accomplished what he had proposed.
- b Leganez had five thousand men killed, drowned, and taken; he lost besides twelve pieces of cannon, with the best part of his baggage; and what was inexcusable, his papers were taken in his tent, and amongst the rest, the treaty he had concluded with the duchess<sup>9</sup>. After victualling Casal, he returned with great celerity into Piedmont, where he undertook another enterprize about midsummer, which was truly singular: for while prince Thomas, with his forces in Turin, besieged the citadel, the count de Harcourt besieged him, and was soon after besieged himself in his own camp by the Spanish army, under the marquis de Leganez. In this situation his safety depended intirely upon the success of his convoys, and it was here that the viscount Turenne gave the first proofs of that genius, which afterwards distinguished him as the greatest captain of his time. After infinite toil and danger he carried his point, forced the Spaniards to retire, and obliged prince Thomas to surrender on the 24th of September<sup>c</sup>, who soon after entered into a negotiation with Mazarine, whom the cardinal sent expressly into Italy for that purpose.

WE have before mentioned the principles upon which cardinal Richelieu directed the invasion of Roussillon by the prince of Condé, and his reduction of Salces, into which he put a good garrison, under the command of Monf. Espinan, after which he left the command of the army to marshal Schomberg<sup>5</sup>. The marquis Spinola, with a small army, arrived before it on the 20th of September, in the preceding year, and carried the outworks by storm, notwithstanding which the place was so well defended, that the prince had time to assemble all the militia of the province, and, marching over mountains the Spaniards thought impracticable, arrived in sight of their camp, with twenty-two thousand foot, four thousand horse, and two thousand volunteers, which threw them into great consternation, so that, if he had attacked them immediately, they must, in all probability, have been totally defeated; but, being late in October, and in the afternoon, he delayed the attack till the next morning, and in the night there happened so violent a storm, which in that mountainous and marshy country exposed the army to great dangers; in consequence of which, the greatest part of the militia disbanded. However, having collected fourteen thousand men, he, on the 9th of November, attacked the besiegers in their intrenchments, being assisted by marshal Schomberg and the duke de St. Simon, but was repulsed and obliged to retire, with the loss of three thousand men. Espinan, notwithstanding, defended the place to the 6th of January in this year, and then surrendered upon honourable terms<sup>c</sup>. After this there passed little remarkable, at least by land; for at sea the French fleet, commanded by the duke de Breze, beat the Spaniards before Cadiz, and burnt two of their ships on the 22d of July. This success was particularly pleasing to the cardinal, from the nature of the service, and his kindness for him by whom it was performed.

On the side of the Low Countries the king had two armies, one commanded by the marshal de Chatillon, the other by the marshal de la Meilleraie. The project formed by the cardinal was the attack of Clermont on the Meuse; but the heavy rains rendering this impracticable, the two generals resolved on the siege of Arras, and directed their marches so well, that they arrived before the place on the same day: there were present at this siege three marshals of France, Chaunes, Chatillon, and Meilleraie, and almost all the young nobility served as volunteers. The governor was absent when the place was invested, so that the defence was made by colonel Boyle, an Irish officer in the Spanish service, who did all that could be expected from a gallant officer<sup>u</sup>. The cardinal infant, duke Charles of Lorraine, and general Lamboy, assembled a puissant army for its relief, which they first attempted by cutting off the besiegers provisions<sup>w</sup>. Orders were sent by the cardinal to Monsieur du Hallier, brother to marshal Vitry, and who was thought to be the person who killed marshal d'Ancre, to escorte a great convoy to the camp; but the king, apprehensive that, if his corps should be defeated, the Miscarriage of the prince of Condé, and victory gained by the duke de Breze.

Siege and reduction of Arras.

<sup>9</sup> Campeggiamenti del Piemonte del 1640, descrittida Conte EMANUEL TESAURO, volume secondo, AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. BATT. NANI. <sup>5</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. EMAN. TES. volume secondo. BATT. NANI. <sup>c</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. BATT. NANI. LE VASSOR. LE GEND. <sup>u</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. iv. <sup>w</sup> Vie de Richelieu. Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau. Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. iv.

Spaniards would enter the kingdom again, sent him orders not to move. Du Hallier doubted; <sup>a</sup> but the menaces of the cardinal prevailed <sup>x</sup>. He executed his orders with spirit, and the marshals before Arras, being apprised of his march, Meilleraie <sup>y</sup>, with three thousand horse and as many foot, was detached to meet him. The cardinal infant seeing this advantage, attacked the French camp with such vigour, that he made himself master of fort Rentzau, and was very near gaining a complete victory, when the troops of marshal Meilleraie and du Hallier appeared, which obliged him to retire, and of consequence the place to surrender, which it did on the 9th of August, after thirty-five days <sup>z</sup> open trenches. The king remained during the siege at Amiens, where he had a dangerous fit of sickness <sup>1</sup>. It was generally expected that du Hallier's service would have been rewarded with a baton of France; but his having hesitated, on receiving the cardinal's orders, was an unpardonable fault, during his administration; so that, though he continued to serve, and to serve with reputation, yet he never received that honour while Richelieu lived. <sup>b</sup>

Measures taken by Richelieu to embarrass the Spaniards on all sides.

On the twenty-first of September the queen was delivered of a son, who had, for the present, the title of duke of Anjou <sup>b</sup>. The cardinal, apprehensive that her power would increase, laboured to extinguish the memory of past misunderstandings; but it was ineffectual, and the queen contented herself with general returns, the sense of which were well enough understood by Richelieu, who took all kinds of precaution to be in a condition to support himself in case of the king's death <sup>c</sup>. As he was inclined to put the management of foreign affairs into the hands of Mazarine, he intimated to the court of Rome that the gratifying this minister with a hat should be the price of withdrawing the marshal d'Etrees, and, as we shall see, it was accordingly sent him, about the middle of December in the next year, into Piedmont, where, for the present, finding their design traversed by the count d'Agliä, who had a great ascendancy over the duchess-regent, Mazarine, by the direction of Richelieu, caused him to be arrested in the house of Monf. du Pleffis Praslin, and carried away prisoner to Pignerol, from whence he was transferred into France <sup>d</sup>. At the close of this year happened suddenly, and almost at the same time, two great events, which were indeed the effects of Richelieu's policy, but not directly and immediately, as some have represented. These were the revolt in Catalonia, and the revolution in Portugal; the former was intirely owing to the licentiousness of the troops that had been employed in reducing Salces, who after the campaign was over, took winter-quarters in that province, where being ill paid, they lived in a manner at discretion. Upon this, the whole province took up arms, killed their viceroy, and resolved to detach themselves from their obedience to the crown of Castile; but finding this above their own strength, determined, as we shall see hereafter, to submit themselves to France. <sup>d</sup>

A. D. 1640. As for the latter, it was so far from being concerted or managed by one of his agents, that when the news of it first came to Paris, the cardinal did not believe it; but when he could doubt of it no longer, it is very certain that he not only gave king John the fourth the strongest assurances of support, but such advices also as did not a little contribute to fix him effectually on the throne <sup>e</sup>, as the diversion he gave was of infinite consequence to France.

Campaigns in Germany and Italy end with no signal advantage.

THE French forces in Germany were commanded by the count de Guebriant, and acted in conjunction with the Swedes, commanded by the marshal Banier, the Hessians, and the forces of the house of Lunenburg: towards the end of January they bombarded Ratisbon, though the emperor and the dyet were in that city. On the 29th of June, the army of the allies, commanded by count Guebriant, for general Banier was dead, defeated the imperial army, commanded by the archduke Leopold and general Picolomini; notwithstanding which advantage the Imperialists began to recover strength, and the Swedish army, now commanded by Torsten, found sufficient employment in defending what they had acquired; the princes of the house of Lunenburg also made a separate peace, and on Christmas-day the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and Spain on one side, and of the crowns of France and Sweden on the other, signed the preliminaries at Hamburg, referring the conclusion to the congresses of Munster and Osnabrug. The very same day the treaty between France and Sweden was renewed, that these negotiations might be managed without any jealousy on either side, or any fear of separating the interests of the two crowns <sup>f</sup>. In Piedmont prince Thomas of Savoy, notwithstanding the treaty he had concluded with France, closed again with the Spaniards, who had the complaisance, upon his representations, to remove the marquis Leganez from the government of the Milanese, and to send in his place the count de Servela, with whom the prince did not agree better, and under whom affairs went much worse. The viscount Turenne made himself

<sup>x</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Puysegur. LE VASSOR.

<sup>y</sup> Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu. Memoires de Puysegur. LE VASSOR. <sup>z</sup> VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>1</sup> Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu. LE VASSOR. <sup>a</sup> LE

SIRI. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. <sup>b</sup> Vie de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI Memoire recon dite, tom. viii. <sup>c</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. LE VASSOR. BATT NANI. <sup>d</sup> PUFFEND.

Rer. Suec. l. xiii. Vie de Richelieu. LE VASSOR.

- a master of Monte Calvo, and afterwards besieged Ivree <sup>a</sup>, the only place of consequence that prince Thomas had in his own power. It was gallantly defended by his bastard brother, which gave time to the prince to engage the Spaniards to march to his relief, about the time that the count de Harcourt, returning from Paris, resumed the command of the French army. Upon the approach of the Spaniards, he raised the siege of Ivree, and marched to give them battle; which was all that prince Thomas wished, as their army was double the number of the French. When almost in sight, the prince ranged the cavalry in order of battle, at the same time that the count of Servela ordered the infantry to retire; so that count de Harcourt attacked the horse with some advantage, and afterwards returned to his siege. Prince Thomas then engaged the Spanish army to form the siege of Chivas <sup>b</sup>, to the relief of which the count de Harcourt coming with his army, such a reinforcement was thrown into Ivree, that he was constrained to abandon all thoughts of taking it. In the autumn, however, he invested Coni, and took it on the 15th of September, after forty-six days open trenches <sup>c</sup>: prince Thomas and the Spaniards, in the mean time, recovered Monte-Calvo, which, however, was no equivalent, since Coni was a place of very great importance; yet, to remove the jealousies of the Italian princes, this was immediately put into the hands of the duchess-regent <sup>d</sup>. Before we leave Italy, we must observe, that the prince of Monaco, of the house of Grimaldi, having been extremely ill treated by the Spaniards, resolved to put his place into the hands, and himself under the protection of France. It is generally believed that the treaty was negotiated by the nuncio Grimaldi, who passed through Monaco in his way to Paris; it was signed on the 8th of July <sup>e</sup>, and the king engaged to give the duke lands in France, as an equivalent for his estates in the kingdom of Naples, part of which were to be erected into a duchy, with the title of Valentinois, and the rest into a marquisate and county for his son. These two princes managed their affairs with great dexterity, surprised and turned out the Spanish garrison, and, on the 18th of November, admitted the French <sup>f</sup>. Antonio de Grimaldi, the great grandson of this duke, having no heirs male, married his daughter Louisa Hippolita to Monsieur de Matignon, who, by virtue of letters patents, registered in 1716, became duke and peer of France, by the title of duke of Valentinois and prince of Monaco <sup>g</sup>.

THE first project of the Catalans, after their revolt, was to have rendered themselves a free state, with the assistance of France; but, having been vigorously attacked by the Spaniards, and being very sparingly supplied by the cardinal, they quickly discovered the impossibility of succeeding in that design, and, if they had been treated with any tolerable degree of lenity, had, in all probability, submitted again to their own sovereign. But the Spaniards, having branded the inhabitants of some places, of which they became masters, with hot irons, as if they had been slaves, the people in despair fortified Barcelona, and by a treaty, submitted themselves to the crown of France, stipulating only the preservation of their privileges <sup>h</sup>. Upon this the count de la Mothe-Houdincourt was sent to their assistance, with five thousand men, and it was he who advised them to fortify the fort of Montjuic, which covered Barcelona. Towards the latter end of March the French had the good fortune to take five men of war and two galleys in the bay of Roses. About the middle of May the count de la Mothe became master of Constantin, and several other places, and soon after formed the siege, or rather the blockade, of Terragona, in which he shut up the prince de Bottero, with the best part of the troops the Spaniards had in the province, where they defended themselves with admirable bravery <sup>i</sup>. The duke de Ferrendina, who commanded the Spanish galleys, resolved to succour the place, notwithstanding Monsieur Sourdis, archbishop of Bordeaux, lay before it with a fleet. He made an effort on the fourth of July, with forty-one galleys, of which he lost twelve, without any other advantage than that of shewing as much courage and conduct as it was possible for man to exert. However, he did not lose his spirits, but having with infinite pains reinforced his fleet, he, on the 20th of August, surprized the archbishop, destroyed three men of war, and threw a large supply into the place, upon which the count de la Mothe retired, after he had lain more than three months before it. The archbishop of Bordeaux, at his return, found himself disgraced without a hearing. His people on board the fleet mutinied, all the enemies of the cardinal clamoured aloud, and his friends clamoured louder than they; so that Richelieu found himself obliged to give him up, and the prelate no sooner landed, than he received an order to retire to Carpentras <sup>j</sup>. In September the treaty with the Catalans was ratified; the king swore to observe their privileges, and the marquis de Breze was named their viceroy. The cardinal perceiving that it was a thing impossible to support

Campaign in Catalonia, Terragona besieged, and the archbishop of Bordeaux disgraced.

<sup>a</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. EMAN. TESAURO, volume tertio. BATT. NANI. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. LE VASSOR.

Cardinal de Richelieu. BATT. NANI.

p. 423. <sup>m</sup> BATT. NANI. l. xi.

President HENAU, p. 515, 516.

AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>b</sup> Vie de Richelieu.

<sup>c</sup> AUBERI Histoire du

<sup>d</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii.

<sup>e</sup> Abrege Chronologique de l'Histoire de France, seconde part, par

<sup>f</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. i. l. ii. Memoire recon dite, tom. viii.

<sup>g</sup> Vie de Richelieu.

<sup>h</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de

these people effectually without being master of the county of Roussillon, sent orders to the prince of Condé to invade it with what troops he could collect, who made himself master of Elna, and the viscount d'Arpajou was sent to block up Perpignan, a place strong in itself, well fortified, and which, it was resolved, should be besieged and reduced in the succeeding year <sup>r</sup>.

A new treaty with the duke of Lorrain, and an alliance with Portugal.

BEFORE we proceed to the operations in the Low Countries, it is necessary to mention a new treaty made with the duke of Lorrain. Amongst other strange flights of this unfortunate prince, he had taken it into his head to marry the princess of Cantecroix, though his first wife, in whose right he held Lorrain, was yet living. His affairs being in a desperate situation, without money, without dominions, and with a body of hungry troops about him, who made him enemies where-ever he came, she persuaded him to treat with France. Accordingly he came, upon the faith of a single passport, to Paris, where he found himself better treated than he had reason to expect; for the cardinal found, that the seizing of Lorrain had given so bad an impression of France to all the little princes her neighbours, that he was glad of an opportunity to give it him back again, as he did by a treaty, signed at St. Germain en Laye, on the 29th of March <sup>s</sup>, his capital, together with Clermont, Stenay, Jametz, and Dun, being left in the hands of France, by way of deposit with the duke's consent, that they should be united to the crown, in case he violated the treaty: he also agreed to the demolition of the fortifications of Marsal, and to allow the duchess his first wife a pension of one hundred and twenty thousand livres. On the 2d of April he swore to the performance of this treaty; on the 10th he did homage for the duchy of Bar <sup>t</sup>, and then returned into his own dominions. The princess de Cantecroix, who had been the cardinal's instrument to persuade the duke to this submission, was exceedingly displeased that no care was taken of her <sup>u</sup>, which indeed was out of the cardinal's power, as he knew that she could not be mentioned either to the king his master, or to the court of Rome. On the 1st of June the king concluded an alliance offensive and defensive with John the fourth, king of Portugal <sup>w</sup>, and by the interposition of this court, the states general, who were invited to become contracting parties in the treaty, concluded in the mean time a truce for ten years with that prince, which was signed on the 10th of the same month <sup>x</sup>, and by which they engaged to act jointly against the Spaniards in the Mediterranean.

The war of Sedan; death of the count de Soissons, and submission of the duke of Bouillon.

WE have before mentioned the retreat of the count de Soissons to Sedan, where, under the protection of the duke of Bouillon, and in conjunction with the archbishop of Rheims, now, by the death of his father, and the prince of Joinville his brother, become duke of Guise, he assembled all the malecontents that had not fled out of the kingdom <sup>y</sup>. The enemies of cardinal Richelieu affirm, that he compelled these princes to demand assistance from the Spaniards, that he might have an opportunity of destroying them; it is much more certain that they entered into such a league to destroy him. It was apparently with this view that they drew up a most outrageous manifesto <sup>z</sup>, in the name of the count de Soissons, who therein paints his whole administration in the blackest colours, which possibly might have had some effect, if it had come out in time. The cardinal, who was perfectly informed of all their designs, had sent marshal Chatillon, with ten or twelve thousand men, to block up the place, which he performed with equal skill and success <sup>a</sup>. On the other hand, general Lamboy, by order of the cardinal Infant, marched to the assistance of the princes of Peace, for so the chiefs of the malecontents at Sedan stiled themselves. Upon this, marshal de Chatillon posted himself in such a manner, that the enemy would have found it difficult to attack him; but the cardinal sent him orders to fight at any rate, and his orders were not to be disobeyed. This brought on the battle of Marfee, fought on the 6th of July, in which the marshal was clearly routed, and his army dispersed; but, in the heat of the action, the count de Soissons was, some way or other, slain <sup>b</sup>. There are so many various accounts of this matter, that it is safest to agree with a great historian <sup>c</sup>, who says it is a mystery which has never yet been cleared up: however it happened, this gave the advantage of the victory to the vanquished, and Monsieur de Puysegur, going to treat for the exchange of prisoners to Sedan, procured some proposals <sup>d</sup> from the duke of Bouillon, which brought about a peace. It was retarded a little by the king's obstinacy, in refusing to allow funeral honours to be paid to the corpse of the count de Soissons; a process had been ordered <sup>e</sup> against his memory, and the duke of Bouillon absolutely refused to treat, unless this was dropped. The cardinal told the king, that

<sup>r</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. i. l. ii. BATT. NANI. Vie de Richelieu. <sup>s</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, liv. i. p. 60, 61. l. ii. p. 72, 73. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. i. l. ii. p. 289, 291. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 397. <sup>t</sup> Lettres du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, lib. ii. p. 296. <sup>u</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau. Vie de Richelieu. <sup>w</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 411. <sup>x</sup> Vie de Richelieu. LE VASSOR. <sup>y</sup> Memoires de Montresor. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. <sup>z</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. ii. Memoires de Montresor, p. 373. BATT. NANI. liv. xi. <sup>a</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu, tom. ii. p. 735. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de M. de Montresor, p. 398. Memoires de Puysegur, p. 207. <sup>c</sup> P. DAN. Journal Historique de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 429. <sup>d</sup> Memoires de Puysegur. <sup>e</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 423.

- a the prince was Lewis de Bourbon as well as he <sup>f</sup>, and that some respect was due to his name as well as his blood. At length things were adjusted; and the king coming in person before Doncheri, which Lamboi had taken after the battle, it was surrendered, and the duke de Bouillon came to pay his respects to the king <sup>g</sup>. By this treaty, signed the 8th of August, the duke procured an indemnity for all who had followed the party of the princes, a neutrality for his sovereignty of Sedan, and the restitution of his pensions and appointments. He was extremely well received by the king and by the cardinal, who, at his departure, made him this compliment; "You have made war like a hero, and peace like a statesman; and, setting aside your having taken arms against your sovereign, I would rather have the credit you have obtained by the management of this affair, than of all Spinola's achievements <sup>h</sup>."
- b Monsieur de Hallier was immediately ordered to attack Lorraine, the duke having been embarked in the affair of the count de Soissons, and no care taken of him in the treaty; so that he was again dispossessed of his dominions <sup>i</sup>.

MARSHAL de la Meilleraie, the favourite and the relation of the cardinal, commanded on the side of the Low Countries, and after several marches and countermarches to perplex the enemy, at length invested Aire, one of the most important places in Artois, and began to raise his lines on the 25th of May, which, however, did not hinder general Bec from throwing five hundred choice foot into the place <sup>k</sup>. The governor did not defend some of the forts in the neighbourhood, or even the outworks, with any vigour, which gave the marshal hopes that he should soon become master of the town. He found, however, that this was done only to save his garrison; for, when he came to attack the body of the place, the governor defended himself with equal resolution and spirit. The cardinal Infant was very desirous to relieve him, but found himself extremely embarrassed; the Dutch, in consequence of a new treaty they had made with the king, besieged Genap <sup>l</sup>. All the diversions he attempted proved of no effect. He was obliged to wait for the return of Lamboi, who had been sent to Sedan, before he could march to his relief, and then it was too late, for the marshal having offered the governor very advantageous terms, he surrendered the place on the 26th of July, when the cardinal Infant was in his neighbourhood, with a full intent to have hazarded a battle for his relief. It is thought the governor made his peace by giving the cardinal Infant to understand, that he would find it more practicable to recover than he would have done to have saved Aire; and upon this, he took his measures so well, that marshal de la Meilleraie was obliged to leave the place in a hurry, that his army might not be incommoded by the want of provisions; which was all the excuse he could make for leaving the lines in part undemolished, out of which he had no sooner drawn his troops, than they were occupied by the Spaniards <sup>m</sup>. He had a better excuse for leaving the garrison with very little powder, because he had it not. The cardinal pushed the siege but slowly, knowing well the governor could not hold out long; but being taken extremely ill in the camp, he removed to Brussels, where he died <sup>n</sup>. Francisco de Mello, who succeeded him in the government, persisted obstinately in the same design, though the French made several diversions in hopes of raising the siege. At length, being reduced to extremity, Aire returned again to its old master, on the 17th of December, to the great regret of the cardinal and his master, who, except the taking Bapaume <sup>o</sup>, and some other small places, gained nothing on this side. The prince of Orange, at the desire of the cardinal, had entered Flanders with his army, with an intention to have taken Sas Van Ghent, but the count de Fontaines having thrown himself under the cannon of the place, with seven thousand foot, obliged the prince to retire to Bergen op Zoom <sup>p</sup>. It was thought, that if any other marshal had been in the place of la Meilleraie, he would have been disgraced.

In the course of the cardinal's long administration, there seems not to have been any year pregnant with so many favourable events towards him as this. In the beginning of it, the king, and Monsieur Cinque Mars his favourite, who, by the demission of the duke de Bellegarde, had acquired the post of grand ecuyer, or master of the horse, and from thence, according to the mode of the French court, stiled Monsieur le Grand, had a very high quarrel, which would have infallibly ended in the favourite's disgrace, whose temper, of all others, was least suited to that of his master, if the cardinal had not interposed and reconciled them <sup>q</sup>. This, for some time, had the best effect imaginable, and kept them all perfectly easy. The king told his grievances to Monsr. le Grand; he told them again regularly to the cardinal, who squared his conduct accordingly; but, as we shall see hereafter, this calm did not last long. All his endeavours to push the fortune of his niece Combalet (except in making her a duchess) having failed, the cardinal brought forward the younger niece, madame Clara Clementia de

<sup>f</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Memoires de Montresor. tom. ii. lib. i. p. 15.

<sup>g</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. ii. p. 736. <sup>h</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 79. <sup>i</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. i. l. ii. <sup>k</sup> Memoires de Puysegur. <sup>l</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. i. l. ii. <sup>m</sup> Vie de Richelieu. BATT. NANI. <sup>n</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio.

<sup>o</sup> Memoires de Puysegur. Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. v. <sup>p</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. LE VASSOR. LE GEND. <sup>q</sup> AUBERI Memoires du Card. de Richelieu, tom. ii. p. 838.

Maille Breze, daughter to the marshal, whom, in the month of February, he married to the duke of Anguien<sup>1</sup>, son to the prince of Condé, which marriage was celebrated with royal splendor, particularly a splendid balet, in which were exhibited the glories of France, or, in other words, the triumphs of the minister's administration. It was this that overcame the patience of the count de Soissons, who thereupon assumed the title of first prince of the blood, and did not forget this incident in his manifesto. Another affair of consequence, but of a very different nature, happened also this year. Some hermits, who, under pretence of retiring from the world, lived in an obscure part of the duchy of Vendosme, where they committed an infinity of crimes, were arrested by the duke's order, and committed to prison, from whence having made their escape, they were retaken and conducted to Paris; where, to save themselves from an ignominious death, they charged the duke of Vendosme with having caused them to be set at liberty, in order to murder the cardinal<sup>2</sup>. That prince was no sooner informed of this infamous accusation, than he sent his second son the duke of Beaufort, not only to give the strongest assurances of his innocency, but to offer to come in person and confront them, which was accepted<sup>3</sup>. But then, being seized with a sudden panic, he and his son made their escape into England<sup>4</sup>, and joined there with the dukes of Soubize and de la Valette in their practices, which gave an air of probability to an accusation that, after all, perhaps, was destitute of truth. Towards the close of the year the court of Rome, in return for some marks of complaisance shewn by the cardinal, gratified him, by bestowing a hat<sup>5</sup> upon his friend Mazarine, to whom he had, in a great measure, resigned the conduct of foreign affairs, or at least such as regarded Italy, which Mazarine perfectly understood.

*Monfieur Cinque Mars quarrels with the cardinal,
and resolves to attempt his ruin.*

WE must proceed with the intrigues of the court, in order to shew by what steps that minister, who, but the last year, was at the highest point of grandeur, came in this to stand on the very brink of disgrace, and even to place his safety in withdrawing himself from his master. The great cause of the quarrels between Monfieur le Grand and his master, was the amour the former had with one Marion de l'Orine, a very beautiful woman at Paris<sup>6</sup>, but not very illustrious in point of fame or family. So long as he was occupied with his pleasures, he remained firm in his attachment to the minister; which induced him to reject some propositions that were made him by the count de Soissons, as incompatible with his gratitude due to the author, the promoter, and the preserver of his fortunes; but touched by a new passion, which he conceived for Mary Gonzagua, princess of Nevers<sup>7</sup>, and by her inflamed with ambition, who told him it would be time enough to think of her when he was a duke and peer, it equally turned his head and his heart. Upon his mentioning his high views to the cardinal, he read him so harsh a lecture on the meanness of his origin, and the obligations his whole family were under to himself, for drawing them out of obscurity, and prohibited, in such very strong terms, any overtures of the like nature for the future, that it determined the young man to lay a new and odious foundation of greatness, in the disgrace and destruction of his benefactor<sup>8</sup>. Some marks of unkindness had passed between them before, the favourite having caused the disgrace of the king's first gentleman of the bed-chamber, who was in the cardinal's interest, and on the other hand the cardinal prevailed upon the king not to call Monfieur le Grand into his council, after he had done it once. But these were wounds that might have been healed: whereas, after the reprimand before-mentioned, they were scarce in terms of civility. Monfieur le Grand had not the will, and if he had, he wanted the prudence to conceal his resentment.

He joins the dukes of Bouillon and Orleans.

As soon as this was perceived, with another remarkable circumstance, that the king was not displeased with it, all the cardinal's enemies became immediately friends to Monfieur le Grand, who, if he had been a man of parts and prudence, might, very probably, have carried his point, but who could never have carried things so far as he did, if it had not been for two of his friends, who had much better talents than his own. These were Monf. de Thou and Monf. de Fontrailles. The former was the son of the celebrated historian, and was himself a young man of great endowments, and extraordinary learning, which rendered him universally beloved. It is however certain, that he had a great spirit of intrigue; for having formerly managed a correspondence between the queen and the duchess of Chevreuse, and being detected in it, the cardinal passed it by with an admonition<sup>9</sup>. As to the latter, he had the misfortune to be crooked, and the cardinal, with all his great qualities, sometimes sunk so much beneath himself, as to divert himself at this gentleman's expence, who from thence thought himself at liberty to let him see, that, what ever defect he had in his shape, he had none in his head. At the time the duke of Bouillon made his last treaty with the king, Monfieur le Grand made a some overtures to him, which were not well received; but by the interposition of Monsieur de Thou they were made friends, and at the very time that the duke was preparing to come to Paris, upon the invitation of Monsieur le Grand, he received an order from the cardinal to repair thither for the king's service. On his arrival he was told, that the king had cast his eyes upon him to command his forces in Italy; a proof that the cardinal's compliment at their last meeting was not insincere <sup>b</sup>. Monsieur de Thou brought his two friends to confide in Monsieur, but was not present at any of their meetings. In one of these it was agreed, that they should all act against the cardinal, and that, in case of necessity, the duke should receive Monsieur into Sedan. The duke of Orleans proposed a league with Spain, which, at first, Bouillon disapproved. He said, that he knew by experience the Spaniards were ready enough to conclude leagues, but very slow in performing them; however, considering how much Sedan might be exposed, if the duke of Orleans retired thither without any support, he consented, and Monf. Fontrailles was dispatched to Madrid, either with full powers from Monsieur, or with a blank signed with his hand, which he might fill up as he thought fit; and it was agreed by all three, that the duke of Bouillon should accept the command of the army. He went accordingly to thank the minister for the confidence reposed in him by the king, who, at parting, used these remarkable words; "All past failings are forgot, but take care how you offend again; in that case you have no favour to expect <sup>c</sup>."

<sup>1</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. i. l. ii. p. 231. <sup>2</sup> Recueil de Pieces concernant l'Histoire de Louis XIII. tom. iii. p. 395. <sup>3</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. i. l. i. p. 223. <sup>4</sup> BATT. NANI. liv. xi. LE VASSOR. <sup>5</sup> Vie de Richelieu. Histoire du Ministère du Cardinal Jules Mazarine, par le Comte GALAZZO GUALDO, part i. p. 26, 27. <sup>6</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. ii. p. 558. <sup>7</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. ii. <sup>8</sup> Vie de Richelieu. BATT. NANI. liv. xii. LE VASSOR. <sup>9</sup> VITT. SIRI il Merc. tom. ii. p. 567. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

THE cardinal had not the least suspicion of these intrigues; but as he knew that Monsieur le Grand was become his enemy, and saw that he was not at all less in favour with the king <sup>d</sup> for it, he determined to carry that prince to Roussillon, in order to form the siege of Perpignan, for which expedition he had prepared a puissant army, under the command of the marshals Meilleraie and Schomberg. It is said the king had a great repugnance to this journey, and that he was dissuaded from it by his physicians; if so, the cardinal must have still had a great ascendancy over him, and no less influence over them, since he not only engaged him to undertake it, but the physicians to approve it <sup>e</sup>. Richelieu intended likewise that the queen and his brother should have accompanied him, and that the two young princes should be sent to Bois des Vincennes, of which Chavigni was the governor. This some writers have magnified as a great crime in the cardinal, as if he desired to have the whole royal family in his power. We shall see hereafter, that whatever suspicions he had of the queen, they were not ill founded, tho' by her tears she obtained leave to remain with her children at St. Germain <sup>f</sup>. The duke of Orleans avoided going, by having, or pretending to have, the gout. The king left Paris in the beginning of February, and though, in all their former journies, the cardinal had avoided taking the same quarters with the king, from a foresight of its being inconvenient to both, he was now so apprehensive, that he never quitted him upon the road, which, though prudent in one respect, was very near proving fatal in another; for Monsieur le Grand, who, amongst other ways of being rid of the cardinal, had thoughts of dispatching him with his own hand, would have executed his base purpose at Briare on the Loire, if Monsieur had not been absent, whose presence he thought absolutely necessary to support him. In his way to Narbonne he gave the cardinal's hat with his own hand to Mazarine <sup>g</sup> at Valence, and from thence continued his march to the first-mentioned city, where he arrived the 21st of March. There the cardinal fell so ill, that he could not accompany the king to the siege of Perpignan, at which having taken so much pains to be present, he would not have the complaisance to remain with the cardinal, though the physicians thought his case desperate. The politicians had the same opinion of his favour; they knew that Monf. le Grand spoke ill of him to the king, and was well heard; but they did not know that he was only well heard in this, and that his own favour declined every day. Some of his best friends perceived it, and advised him to be more assiduous; to which he made this strange answer, "That the king's breath was so offensive, that he could not bear to be near him <sup>h</sup>." However, when he found the king bore his absence without trouble, he used to remain an hour or two alone in an antichamber after the king was gone to bed, and then come out, as if he had been with him, as he was wont to be in the height of his favour.

WE will now speak of the operations of the war in Roussillon, and the great object of this campaign. We have explained the political reasons of the cardinal's carrying the king Perpignan to such a distance from his capital; but it was a rule with him, not to have recourse to any pretences that might not be so well supported as to appear the proper motives of the actions they were intended to colour. The project of this expedition was so well laid, that it forced his rival the conde duke, much against his will, to abandon his own notions, and to follow his; that is, to bring his Catholic majesty into the field, and, abandoning all other cares, to de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio.

<sup>b</sup> Vie de Richelieu. BATT. NANI. liv. xii.

SIRI il Mercurio. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

Ministere du Cardinal Mazarine, par GALEAZZO GUALDO, part. i. p. 26, 27.

SIRI il Mercurio.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires du Montresor.

<sup>d</sup> Vie de Richelieu. LE VASSOR.

<sup>e</sup> BATT. NANI. VITT.

<sup>f</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. Histoire du

<sup>g</sup> Vie de Richelieu. VITT.

employ the whole force of the monarchy to save Perpignan <sup>b</sup>. The marshal Breze, with the title of viceroy of Catalonia, and the marshal de la Motte Houdincourt, who commanded there, gave the Spaniards infinite vexation, by embarrassing the passage of their troops, which were to cross Catalonia, in order to reach Roussillon. Monsieur de la Motte particularly killed and made prisoners a corps of three thousand five hundred horse, commanded by Don Pedro d'Arragon, who was taken amongst the rest, towards the end of March <sup>1</sup>. The marshal de la Meilleraie, at the opening of the campaign, found it absolutely necessary to be master of Colioure, a good port, well fortified, and covered by a castle, held to be impregnable. It was defended by a numerous garrison, commanded by the marquis de Mortara, who made a very gallant defence: this siege, preparative to that of Perpignan, cost a whole month, so that the place did not surrender till the thirteenth of April <sup>2</sup>. It was believed that the castle could not be taken but by blockade; however, it was resolved to attempt something, by mining the rock; which promising little, it was determined to spring the mines, after a small progress, to see whether they would or would not have an effect. Upon making the experiment, they were judged to have done little; but it was quickly found they had done all; for though the fortifications suffered nothing by these mines, yet the springs which supplied the garrison with water being choaked, they were obliged to capitulate <sup>3</sup>. When the king came before Perpignan in May, he drew the lines of circumvallation and contravallation himself; but being persuaded, by the concurrent testimonies of several persons who had been in the place, that the garrison were in want of provisions, he determined to proceed slowly, in order to spare his troops. This was owing to an artifice of Don Flores d'Avila, the governor, who knowing the distressed situation of his master's affairs, and being desirous of giving as long time as possible to provide for his relief, he distributed provisions strictly and sparingly at the beginning, though, in reality, he was well provided <sup>4</sup>. All this time the cardinal continued ill at Narbonne, and in such danger, that on the 23d of May he made his testament <sup>5</sup>, from a persuasion that he could not recover. The king, not long after, was very dangerously indisposed; insomuch that Monsieur le Grand openly solicited the troops to declare for the crown; the marshals Milleraie and Schomberg exhorted them, in general terms, to do their duty. From hence two factions arose in the camp, one styling themselves royalists, and the other cardinalists <sup>6</sup>. In this situation Monsi. de Thou arrived, who wrote to the count de Brienne, secretary of state, to desire the queen to send him blanks, signed with her name, that he might frame such letters as he should find necessary, and address them to such officers as he thought proper, which at the first motion she would have done, if the count, very honestly, had not advised her against it <sup>7</sup>. In his journey to the camp, Monsi. de Thou had met with Fontrailles, who gave him a long detail of his negociation in Spain, of which he knew not a word before; and it had been happy for him if he had not heard it then; for though he disapproved it in the strongest terms, the bare listening to Fontrailles's story cost him afterwards his life. The king recovering, received an earnest invitation from the cardinal to come to him to Narbonne, where, by this time, he had received a dark account of a French agent that had been at Madrid; but the king's mind was now so indisposed towards his minister, that he received these solicitations very coldly <sup>8</sup>; and yet, in a few days, he returned to his old sentiments again, for very pressing reasons, which we must fetch from Flanders.

The defeat of marshal Grammont alarms the king, and obliges him to a reconciliation with his minister.

As it was impossible to furnish large armies on every side, the king, by the advice of the cardinal, resolved to act only on the defensive towards the Low Countries, and with this view the count d'Harcourt was sent with a small army to cover Picardy, while the count de Guiche, whom, in his journey, the king declared marshal of France, and who is commonly stiled the marshal de Grammont, commanded another small corps of troops, with the like intent, in Champagne <sup>9</sup>. Don Francisco de Mello, who commanded the army of Spain, recovered Lens in two days, and then besieged La Bassée, which he took after twenty-six days open trenches. By this time both the French armies had joined, in order to give a check to his conquests; but Don Francisco, separating his army into two bodies, the French were obliged to take the same method, the count de Harcourt marching towards Hesdin, and the marshal de Grammont to Honnecourt; there he intrenched, having the Scheld behind him, a wood which he thought impregnable on his right, and a deep hollow way, which reached to the river, on his left <sup>10</sup>. Monsi. de Puysegur, an officer who had seen much service, advised him to pass the Scheld, and he afterwards received the same advice from count Rantzau; but he thought to cover the country, and that the Spaniards would not have the courage to attack him <sup>11</sup>. In

<sup>b</sup> BATT. NANI, liv. xii.

<sup>1</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>2</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mer-

curio, tom. ii. l. i. LE VASSOR. BATT. NANI, liv. xii.

<sup>3</sup> Vie de Richelieu.

<sup>4</sup> BATT. NANI, l. xii.

LE VASSOR.

<sup>5</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>6</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne,

tom. ii. p. 145. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. BATT. NANI, liv. xii.

<sup>7</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne,

tom. ii. p. 146.

<sup>8</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu.

Memoires du Comte de Brienne.

<sup>9</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, p. 230.

<sup>10</sup> Vie de Richelieu. BATT. NANI, liv. xii.

<sup>11</sup> Memoires de

Puysegur, p. 232.

a this he was mistaken; Don Francisco took his measures so well, that, on the 26th of May, he attacked him on all sides with all his forces. The marshal de Grammont defended his lines very gallantly, till the enemy penetrated through the wood, and then they fled on every side. The loss was very considerable, fifteen hundred killed, two thousand taken prisoners, with all the cannon and baggage, and one hundred thousand crowns in ready money<sup>u</sup>. It was the fault of the Spaniards that they did not destroy the whole army, the marshal de Grammont, in despair, remaining some time at an abbey behind his camp, desirous of hiding his shame in a prison or in a tomb. It was the news of this defeat that induced the king to write a very kind letter to the cardinal, assuring him that he was as much in his favour as ever, and intrusting him to give the necessary orders for repairing this misfortune, at which he was excessively b chagrined<sup>w</sup>. Many of the French writers, as if they believed that all events were in the cardinal's power, have asserted, that the marshal suffered himself to be beat by his order. It is certain that he had married his relation, and was his great favourite; it is no less true, that, instead of blaming, he wrote a letter to comfort him<sup>x</sup>. But they who say this, should say more, and tell us, that he had some influence also over the Spaniards, since, though there was nothing to oppose their going directly to Paris, they made little or no use of this victory.

WHILE the king was alarmed with this loss, the viscount de Fontrailles arrived in the camp, Monf. le Grand and Monf. de Thou arrested. to press Monsieur le Grand to provide for his own safety. He had sent to Monsieur, to desire that he would retire to Sedan; but they were so imprudent, that they had taken no order from the duke de Bouillon for his admittance; upon which they sent one Monf. de Montmor into Italy, to desire such an order: but, being entirely unknown to the duke, he refused to c trust him; upon which they were constrained to send the count de Aubijoux, one of Monsieur's domestics. Fontrailles, who saw the consequence of these delays, told Monf. le Grand, that, being a tall handsome man, he might make a tolerable figure without a head, but that, his own being taken away, he should become more the subject of laughter than he was at present; upon this he privately withdrew, first into Spain, and then into England<sup>y</sup>. In the mean time the cardinal had received a copy, nobody knows how, of the treaty concluded at Madrid, dated the 13th of March, in which his Catholic majesty promised to furnish Monsieur with twelve thousand foot, and five thousand horse, a great sum of money, and large pensions to the duke de Bouillon and Monf. le Grand<sup>z</sup>. The king, under pretence of a fever, removed d to Narbonne, where, on the 13th of June, Monf. de Thou was arrested. Monf. le Grand absconded, but was taken the next day, and on the 23d of the same month the duke of Bouillon, who likewise endeavoured to make his escape, was seized at Casal<sup>a</sup>; the cardinal, who had embarked at Agde, and who had prepared for his retreat to Italy, was now at Tarrascon, to which place the king went to visit him, and being both ill, they lay in the same room. The cardinal reproached him bitterly for deserting him when he was dying; the king wept, and told him all he knew, which was a great deal, since his favourite is said once to have proposed dispatching the cardinal to his master. Richelieu having procured from the king full powers to act as he thought fit, without consulting him, advised his majesty to continue his journey to Paris, and took upon him to do what was not so fit for a monarch to have done<sup>b</sup>. e As to Monsieur, his conduct was much of the same stamp as it had always been; he endeavoured, to prevent being arrested, to hide himself in Auvergne, and in the mean time f sent the abbe de la Riviere to see how things stood; making most humble supplications to the cardinal, and Monsieur de Chavigni, confessing and begging pardon, but in general terms, which shewed it was downright fear, which he would have taken as repentance; but they did not part with him so easily. On the contrary, though he had burnt the original treaty, he made a long and ample confession of its contents, and of all the previous and subsequent circumstances that attended it<sup>c</sup>. While the cardinal was at Tarrascon, arrived the news of the death of the queen-mother; he shewed a deep concern, and caused a solemn service to be celebrated for her soul<sup>d</sup>. The king's tenderness revived upon the same occasion, and he could not help shewing his sorrow, for having been the author of her miseries, who was the author of his birth. The cardinal went from Tarrascon to Lyons, and having sent for the chancellor, placed him at the head of the commissioners, before whom Monf. le Grand and Monf. de Thou were to be tried. They both steadily denied the treaty. As it could not be produced, or any witnesses to prove it, for Monsieur threatened to fly to the ends of the earth, rather <sup>a</sup> than be confronted with his friends, they knew not what to do. But Lanbardemont, one of the judges, drew them out of this perplexity, by persuading Monsieur le Grand that Monf. de Thou had told all; upon which he made a confession that destroyed them both <sup>c</sup>. While their process was making, arrived the long expected news of the surrender of Perpignan, after a siege of more than three months, by which France gained a place of the utmost importance, in excellent condition, with arms and ammunition for twenty thousand men <sup>f</sup>. On the 13th of September Monsieur le Grand and Monsieur de Thou lost their heads <sup>e</sup>. Both were exceedingly regretted, more especially the latter. They died with great firmness and piety, and with a just detestation of that ambition, which, if it had not been fatal to their lives, might have proved so to the state, as is confessed by those who, in other respects, were <sup>b</sup> not averse to this design.

<sup>u</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. BATT. NANI. LE VASSOR. LE GEND. PR. HENAUULT. <sup>w</sup> Memoires de Puysegur. <sup>x</sup> Vie de Richelieu. <sup>y</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. Memoires de Montresor. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. <sup>z</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire d'Anne d'Autriche Espouse de Louis XIII. Roi de France, par Madame de MOTTEVILLE. Edit. 1750, tom. i. BATT. NANI, liv. xii. LE VASSOR. <sup>a</sup> Memoires de Montresor. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, MOTTEVILLE, tom. i. p. 92. Vie du Cardinal de Richelieu. BATT. NANI. Memoires de Montresor, tom. ii. p. 161. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE, tom. i. p. 92. Memoires de Montresor, p. 161. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. BATT. NANI, liv. xii. <sup>c</sup> Memoires de Montresor. <sup>d</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 147. BATT. NANI, liv. vii.

The duke de Bouillon surrenders Sedan and receives an equivalent.

On the day those unfortunate gentlemen suffered, the cardinal set out for Lyons, and at the first stage, not being able to write much, gave his master the state of his affairs in a single line; "Your troops," said he, "are in Perpignan, and your enemies in their graves <sup>h</sup>." His actions were all in the same stile. He was so ill that he could not rise. He caused a magnificent bed, in which he lay, to be placed in a small room, with a table on one side to hold what he wanted, and a chair on the other, for the person who was to converse with him. This huge litter was carried on the shoulders of sixteen or twenty men. He intended to have hired peasants, but his guards would not allow them that honour <sup>i</sup>. In this new kind of triumph he moved by slow journies towards Paris, entering the towns and the houses <sup>c</sup> where he was to lodge through the breach, affecting, as he had imitated Alexander in his first exploit of the dyke before Rochelle, to follow him also in his last act, by imitating the manner in which he was carried to Babylon. By his advice the king consented to accept the principality of Sedan, and to grant a pardon to the duke of Bouillon, who had been transferred from Italy to the castle of Pierre-Ancise <sup>k</sup>. The king was moved by interest, the cardinal by his respect for the prince of Orange, who, when the cardinal was falling, had frankly acquainted the French minister, Monf. d'Étrees, and desired him to inform the king, that he had listened to some proposals from Spain, as not conceiving that the allies of France could trust her, if the cardinal was disgraced <sup>l</sup>. Richelieu himself was astonished at the service, and confessed, that, in the plenitude of his power, he knew not how to express his gratitude <sup>m</sup>. <sup>d</sup> The duke of Bouillon made a simple cession of Sedan, of which Mazarine took possession on the 29th of September; upon which the duke had his liberty, and a full abolition for every thing that was past. The cardinal, however, thought it incompatible with his master's dignity to take such a present as Sedan, without a proper return, and, by a contract of exchange, gave him the duchies of Albret and Chateau-Thierry, together with the counties of Auvergne and Evreux, and reserved his rights on the duchy of Bouillon, of which the family have been since put in possession <sup>n</sup>.

Last sickness and death of cardinal
Richelieu.

In the month of October the cardinal made a kind of triumphant entry into Paris, tho' still in a low and languishing condition. Rest, though it gave no hopes of recovery, afforded a kind of temporary relief, in which he resumed the dispatch of business, and his ordinary <sup>e</sup> diversions, so that many of those who were most attached to him began to feed themselves with flattering hopes. He would have the operations of the next campaign settled in the king's presence, but he would not go to St. Germain's, where the king was: he thought the place open and insecure; for this reason he desired the king would remove, that he would permit him to come attended by his guards, and that, while he remained with him, they should be mingled with his. Through respect for his past services, or through the weakness of his own temper, the king yielded to these demands <sup>o</sup>, but did not listen with the same complaisance to those which he made when he came, and which were indeed very exorbitant. He proscribed four of the king's captains of the guards by name, and insisted they should be dismissed, though he acknowledged their fidelity to the king, but he suspected them to have <sup>f</sup> been friends to Monsieur le Grand, as they had never sought his favour. The king promised him satisfaction, and a few days after the cardinal sent Monsieur Chavigni to urge the performance of this promise, and to desire they might be immediately discharged. The king told Monsieur Chavigni, that the cardinal had persons about him whom he did not like, and whose dismissal he desired. Upon his requesting to know their names, the king mentioned himself, and Monsieur de Noyers, both secretaries of state. Having carried his majesty's

<sup>c</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. Memoires de Montresor. Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE, tom. ii. p. 94. LE VASSOR.

<sup>f</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITTORIO SIRI il Mercurio. LE GEND. Pr. HENAUULT.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires de Montresor. Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE, tom. i. p. 95. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 147. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. ii. l. iii.

<sup>h</sup> AUBERI Memoires du Cardinal de Richelieu, tom. ii.

<sup>i</sup> Vie de Richelieu.

<sup>k</sup> VITT. SIRI. AUBERI Me-

moires du Cardinal de Richelieu.

<sup>l</sup> BATT. NANI, liv. xii.

<sup>m</sup> Vie de Richelieu.

<sup>n</sup> VITT.

SIRI il Mercurio, tom. ii. l. iii. AUBERI Memoires du Cardinal de Richelieu, tom. ii. p. 766. Pr. HENAUULT, seconde partie, p. 520.

<sup>o</sup> Vie de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio.

message,

a message, he returned with the minister's desire in writing to quit his employments, which the king refused; and directed his captains to sell, but privately signified to them that it was against his will; and promised that, at a proper time, they should receive proper marks of his favour<sup>p</sup>. This was the last, and perhaps the largest stretch of the cardinal's power, for towards the end of November his disease became desperate. In the beginning of his ministry operation, the acrid humour in his blood discharged itself on his arm, and being forced from thence by baths and fomentations, fell upon his lungs, and formed two abscesses, of which he died on the fourth of December, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and the eighteenth of his administration. He bore his malady with invincible patience, and met death with a firmness and serenity that was amazing. The king went twice to comfort him in his last moments, when the cardinal, in the most solemn manner, assured him, that he had done nothing but with a view to his majesty's honour, and the welfare of his kingdom, gave him many counsels of great importance, and recommended to him his relations, and his dependents<sup>q</sup>.

We have been obliged to defer part of the operations of this campaign to the close of the year, though too important to be omitted: the count de Guebriant, on the 17th of January, forced the imperial generals Lamboy and Merci in their lines at Kimpen, killed two thousand men, took five thousand prisoners, with their baggage and cannon, and, which did him still more honour, their generals also, and merited thereby the baton. During the remaining part of the campaign, he made himself master of the electorate of Cologne, made a powerful diversion in favour of the Swedes, who, under the command of Leonard Tortenson, defeated the Imperialists in two battles, and made themselves masters of the castle of Leipsic<sup>r</sup>. Things, however, did not go at this rate in Lorraine, where Monsieur du Hallier was constrained to raise the siege of la Motte, with the loss of almost all his men<sup>s</sup>. On the side of Piedmont the princes of Savoy signed a treaty in the month of June with France, and with their sister, by which they abandoned the Spaniards. In consequence of this, prince Thomas was declared general of the troops of France in Italy, with whom he took Nice, Verrue, and Torton, before the close of the year<sup>t</sup>. In Roussillon, after taking Perpignan, the marshals Schomberg and Meilleraie reduced Salces, and, which was as honourable an action as any of the year, the marshal de la Motte Houdincourt gained, on the 7th of October<sup>u</sup>, a victory over the marquis de Leganez, at Lerida, though he had double his number. This finished the disgraces of that unfortunate officer, and made way for that of the conde duke de Olivarez; which may be looked upon as a new advantage to France, since, after the death of his old antagonist Richelieu, it is highly probable he would have recovered his reputation, if he had not lost his power.

The new year opened with a new prospect; and those who had been long tired of the strict and severe conduct of the cardinal, promised themselves freedom and ease under the reign of Lewis the thirteenth. Some say, that the king himself thought in the same manner; that he declared he would have no governor; and that, for the little time he had to live, which he foresaw without disquiet or despair, he would pursue his own sentiments. But others with greater truth assert, that, for the short remainder of this reign, the spirit of Richelieu governed the king, as absolutely as he did himself while living. It is, however, very possible, that the king might make such declarations, and it served not a little to confirm them, that the prisoners in the Bastille, such as the marshals de Vitri and Bassompierre, the count de Carmail, and many others, were discharged<sup>v</sup>, and the exiles, such as the duke of Vendosme, and his son the duke of Beaufort, with many more, were recalled. But still this makes nothing against the positive declaration of the king to all the sovereign courts in his own dominions, and to the ministers of foreign princes, that he meant to make no change in his administration. As a proof of this, cardinal Mazarine was introduced into the council the very day the cardinal died; the rest of the ministers were continued, and he directed his late will to be punctually executed<sup>x</sup>. Monsieur, who by an edict had been declared incapable of the regency, deprived of his government, his troop of gens d'armes and light horse suppressed, had, however, leave given him to come to court, where, notwithstanding, he was not at all caressed<sup>y</sup>. The war was carried on with vigour in Catalonia, where the Spaniards were obliged to raise the siege of Flex, and soon after that of Mirabel, by the marshal de la Motte Houdincourt. On the twenty-ninth of March the prince of Monaco did homage to the king for the duchy of Valen- inois, and received assurances of his majesty's intentions to support his allies in Italy <sup>a</sup>. Soon after he gave the staff of marshal of France to Monsieur du Hallier, stiled afterwards marshal Hopital, which was one of the last acts of his government <sup>2</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. BATT. NANI. lib. xii. <sup>q</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 151. Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. vi. p. 360, & seq. Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE, tom. i. p. 112. BATT. NANI, liv. xii. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. LE GENDRE, PR. HENAULT. <sup>r</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio, tom. ii. l. i. p. 4. <sup>s</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 86, & seq. <sup>t</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. Memoires du Duc de Noailles & de la Valette, p. 25. <sup>u</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Richelieu. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio. <sup>v</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 161. Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE, tom. i. p. 114. <sup>x</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. <sup>y</sup> Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio.

Disposition of the king and court after the death of the cardinal.

HE had, for the four last years of his life, been subject to many infirmities, which some think were increased by his frequent journies, and his fatiguing himself beyond the strength of his feeble and delicate constitution. He was more sensible than any body about him of the decline of his health, which induced him to think very seriously of settling the government during the minority of his son and successor. His court was divided into two factions, one for the queen, and the other for Monsieur. Lewis liked neither of them, but he did not hate his queen; and besides, experience had taught him, that affairs could not be in worse hands than those of his brother. Father Sirmond, his confessor, forgetting what had happened to his predecessor Causin, pressed the king to establish her majesty and the duke of Orleans joint regents; but that monarch thought that different talents were required to direct consciences and counsels, and, since he would interfere in both, dismissed him the court <sup>3</sup>. The king, who in the life-time of the cardinal had shewn some dislike to Monsieur Chavigni, relied upon him so incirely after his decease, that Monsieur de Noyers desired leave to resign his post of secretary of state, presuming he should be refused, and that the king would allow him a greater share of his confidence, in order to retain him in his service; but in this he was mistaken, for his demission was accepted <sup>b</sup>, and Monsieur le Tellier appointed to execute his office by commission; he had been intendant of the army in Italy, and was by that means known to cardinal Mazarine, who found him so useful, that he would never part with him. <sup>c</sup> The count de Brienne resigned from another motive; he was attached to the queen; he found he could not serve her effectually, and chose, as the highest proof of his zeal, to reserve his talent for her regency; Monsieur Poëtier, bishop of Beauvais, had the queen's confidence; the duke of Beaufort was strongly attached to her; so was the duke de Rochefoucault, who drew to her likewise the duke of Anguien, son to the prince of Condé, who began now to make a figure. Chavigni finding the king determined with respect to his brother, began likewise to court the queen; and the prelate before-mentioned, to give a proof of his abilities, brought the cardinal to make a tender of his services, though the count de Brienne went farther than courtiers are wont to do with each other, in telling him he would repent it: the queen accepted his offer, and this, with the recommendation of the nuncio, was the introduction of <sup>d</sup> that minister, who made so great a figure in the next reign <sup>e</sup>.

His declaration in regard to the form of the regency after his decease.

AT length, after mature deliberation, the king, on the nineteenth of April, published the form of the regency, the plan of which had been drawn by Chavigni, and put into order by the chancellor <sup>d</sup>. According to this declaration, the queen was sole regent, and had the custody of her children. Monsieur, the former order against him being revoked, was declared head of the council, and lieutenant-general throughout the kingdom; in his absence the prince of Condé; in the absence of both, cardinal Mazarine <sup>e</sup>. Bouthillier, sur-intendant of the finances, and his son Chavigni, were of the council, where all was to pass by plurality of voices. The queen had the nomination of all officers, except secretaries of state, for which she was to take the advice of the council. The nomination to benefices was reserved to the cardinal. After <sup>e</sup> it was read, the queen and Monsieur swore to the observance of it, and the next day it was registered in parliament, a circumstance which, in respect to its authority, was strong in appearance, but weak in effect <sup>f</sup>. In order to make his brother the more easy, the king gave his intire consent to his marriage with the princess Margaret of Lorraine, provided it was solemnized again in France, which order took place, but not till after the king's decease <sup>5</sup>. The command of the army, by the advice of the cardinal, who was desirous of making his court to the prince of Condé, was given to the young duke of Anguien, under whose orders the marshal Hopital was to act. The king left no public acts of displeasure upon any except Chateaufort and the duchess of Chevreuse; the former was still in prison at Angoulesme, and the latter in England; he directed that neither should return to court. The deceased cardinal <sup>f</sup> had possessed him with an opinion of the ingratitude of Chateaufort, who, when he little expected it, had the seals delivered to him, received one hundred thousand crowns in gratifications in the space of a year, and was made governor of Touraine, which did not hinder his entering into intrigues. The duchess of Chevreuse had a great influence over the queen, and was the principal instrument of the misunderstandings between them; she was a woman of gallantry and intrigue, and the secret histories of those times shew clearly that she had a large share in those transactions that gave the king infinite disquiet <sup>6</sup>. But these, like most of

<sup>1</sup> BATT. NANI, liv. xii.

<sup>2</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio.

<sup>3</sup> Abrege Chronologique de l'Histoire de

France, sconde partie, par President HENAUT, p. 524.

<sup>4</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 165,

& seq.

<sup>5</sup> VITT. SIRI il Mercurio.

Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii.

<sup>6</sup> Corps Uni-

versel Diplomatique du droit des gens, tom. vi. part i. p. 269. VITT. SIRI il Mercurio.

<sup>7</sup> Memoires

du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 170. Histoire du Ministère du Cardinal Mazarin.

<sup>8</sup> VITT. SIRI il

Mercurio. <sup>9</sup> Idem ibid. & auctor supra citat.

<sup>10</sup> Memoires de Madame de MOTIEVILLE. VITT.

SIRI il Mercurio.

a the directions of dying princes, were very little regarded, and the consequences shewed, that, independent of his royal character, they deserved to have been treated with great respect.

THE king, having taken these steps, had nothing to do but to die, which he did leisurely, Death of Louis XIII. and with amazing calmness and fortitude. Seeing the duke of Beaufort, and some others, who he thought did not love him, in the room when the declaration for settling the regency was read, he said to one who was near him, "Those people are come to see if I am making haste in my journey." One day, opening the windows of his chamber that looked towards St. Denis, he said, without the least emotion, "Yonder's the place where I shall lodge a great while: my body will be well shaken, for at present the roads are very bad<sup>i</sup>." His distemper was a slow fever, which wore him gradually to skin and bones. One morning he b called Monsieur de Pontis to him, and unbuttoning his shirt, shewed him his arms, emaciated to the last degree: "Here, Pontis," said he, "take hold of my hand; see what arms these are that belong to a king of France." About two hours before he died, seeing Dr. Seguier, the queen's physician, near his bedside, he made a sign to him to approach, then gave him his arms: "Seguier," said he, "feel my pulse, and tell me how many hours I have yet to live; but feel it carefully, for I should be glad to know as exactly as possible." The doctor did as he was bid, and then told him, he thought he might live two or three hours at the most. The king then joining both his hands, and looking stedfastly to heaven, said softly, "Well! my God, I consent with all my heart<sup>l</sup>." He deceased on the 14th of May, 1643, in the forty-second year of his age, and the thirty-third of his reign, dying on the day of c his accession<sup>m</sup>. An excellent writer<sup>n</sup> has given us a very just character of him in few words: he was as valiant as Henry the fourth, but his valour was without heat and without eclat; and no way proper for the conquest of a kingdom. Providence placed him therefore precisely where it was proper for him to be placed; sooner he had been too weak, later too circumspect; son and father of two great kings, he fixed the throne, yet tottering, of Henry the fourth, and prepared the way for the wonders of the reign of Lewis the fourteenth.

<sup>i</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 111, & seq. <sup>l</sup> Memoires de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. v. p. 363. <sup>m</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 119, 120. <sup>n</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 173. Memoires de Pontis. Memoires de Puysegur, p. 240. Le Vassor. <sup>a</sup> Abrege Chronologique de l'Histoire de France, seconde partie, par President Henault, p. 526.

S E C T. XIII.

The reign of Lewis the Fourteenth, surnamed Le Grand, from his accession to the throne to the peace of the Pyrenees, and his marriage with the Infanta Maria Theresa of Austria.

AT the time of his father's decease, the young monarch Lewis XIV. wanted something more than three months of five years of age. The first act of the regency shewed how great an illusion it is for princes to imagine, that the living will be governed by the dead. Lewis XIII. thought maturely he had been well advised in making his declaration; he had obliged the queen and the duke of Orleans to swear to it in the presence of the whole court, and had caused it to be registered by the parliament of Paris. All this time the queen was taking measures to render these precautions abortive, and had secured to herself success before the king was dead. On the 18th of May she went to the parliament; told them in a short speech that her grief was inexpressible, that it admitted of no consolation till their deputies came to pay their duties to her son; that, afflicted, confused, and not knowing which way to turn, she came to repose herself on their advice, and to form her conduct upon their councils<sup>a</sup>. Such was the queen's compliment; the chancellor sufficiently explained her meaning. The parliament, prepared for the queen's purpose, and glad of such an opportunity to support their own authority, confided to her the tutelage of the king, and the regency of his dominions, solely and simply, the duke of Orleans and the prince of Conde<sup>b</sup> assenting. In a word, without repealing, they intirely cancelled the king's declaration. The great favour into which cardinal Mazarine rose soon after, and which he maintained as long as he lived, has induced an opinion that he was the author of this measure; but the fact is so much otherwise, that at the time he was the only person to whom it gave distaste; which he made no scruple of declaring, and disposed every thing for his<sup>c</sup> return into Italy. This too has been treated as a refined stroke in policy, but it was real.

THE queen had, however, no mind to lose him, and at the same time knew not how to keep him; she communicated her thoughts to the count de Brienne, who advised her to offer Cardinal Mazarine at the head of the queen's council, and in possession of her confidence.

<sup>a</sup> AUBERT Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine, edit. 1730, tom. i. p. 145. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 133. <sup>c</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 178.

him

him what he had lost by cancelling the king's declaration; which she did; and upon his accepting it, he quickly gained her confidence in a degree of exclusion, even to those who had raised him to it<sup>d</sup>. The old Bishop of Beauvais, though not very quick of apprehension, either saw or was told it; upon which he behaved so strangely, that, though he had been admitted into the council, he was directed to repair to his diocese, where he died<sup>e</sup> not long after of chagrin. The queen, forgetting her husband's injunctions, permitted Monsieur de Chateauneuf to retire to his own house, and recalled the duchess of Chevreuse and Madame de Hautefort<sup>f</sup>. Her gratitude to those who had sided with her in the time of her difficulties, was so strong at her entrance on the regency, and her resentment carried so sharp an edge, that she reposed her confidence in the duke of Vendosme and his sons, particularly the duke of Beaufort, whom she intrusted with the king's person, when she removed him from St. Germain's to Paris<sup>g</sup>. She shewed likewise a disposition to despoil the family and creatures of cardinal Richelieu, that she might gratify these and other favourites. But her interests and her inclinations quickly changed, not through any fickleness in the queen's temper, but from her seeing things in other lights.

Progress of the war in Germany and in Piedmont, with the defeat of the Spanish fleet.

WHILE the court was kept in a continual fermentation by these intrigues, the war was carried on with very different success in the different scenes of action. The marshal de Guebriant, one of the bravest and ablest officers in the service of France, besieged Rotwil, which surrendered on the 19th of November; but he was mortally wounded in the siege, and died in the beginning of the succeeding month: his corpse was removed to Paris, and the queen caused it to be interred in Notre Dame, all the sovereign courts attending the funeral<sup>h</sup>. After his misfortune, great disputes arose in the army, and the command devolved upon the count de Rantzau, who being attacked at Tudelingen by the duke of Lorraine, general Meric, and John de Werth, was totally defeated, himself and all the general officers made prisoners, together with six thousand men, and all the artillery and baggage. The recovery of Rotwil was the first consequence of this victory<sup>i</sup>, which raised the courage of the imperialists extremely. In Italy prince Thomas of Savoy continued to command, assisted by the viscount de Turenne and Monsieur de Plessis Praslin<sup>k</sup>. The Spaniards were long employed in the siege of the castle of Tortona, of which they at length became masters; the French and Piedmontese in the mean time took Ast and Turin; soon after which the viscount de Turenne was recalled; and the command, by the sickness of prince Thomas, devolving upon M. du Plessis Praslin, he concluded the campaign with the taking the bridge over the Stura, a place of great consequence, as it opened a communication between Piedmont and the Montferrat<sup>l</sup>. In Catalonia marshal de la Mothe Houdincourt maintained the reputation that he had acquired, though he could not hinder the king of Spain from retaking Moncon. The truth is, that at so great a distance, and while the court was in such agitation, armies were not so well supplied, or the demands of those at the head of them so punctually answered, as in the time of Richelieu. However, his nephew de Breze, now become by his death duke de Fronsac, beat the Spanish fleet on the 3d of September, in the sight of Carthagera, and took two of their largest ships<sup>m</sup>.

The duke of Anguien gains a complete victory over the Spaniards at Rocroi.

BUT what fixed the reputation of the regency, and consoled the court for the wrong turn things took in other places, was their success on the side of Flanders. The duke of Anguien, then in his twenty-second year, commanded the forces of France, having under him the marshal Hopital, and the count de Gassion. His army consisted of sixteen thousand foot and seven thousand horse; the Spaniards were about twenty-six thousand, under Don Francisco de Mello, who had formed the siege of Rocroi, on the frontier of the Low Countries, towards the Ardennes. The duke having received, by an express, an account of the king's death, resolved to relieve the place, and give the Spaniards battle. The marshal laboured all he could to dissuade him, but in vain; the battle was very warmly fought; the left wing of the French army, commanded by the marshal de Hopital, was beat, and the marshal had his arm broke;
but the count de Gassion having dispersed the left wing of the Spanish army, and having passed round their main body, came to his assistance, and taking the Spanish cavalry in flank, they were quickly beaten. Their infantry, forming a square battalion, having their general the count de Fuentes in the centre (who, being ill of the gout, was carried in a chair) began to retreat, and repulsed the duke of Anguien, who, through impatience, attacked him with his horse: at last the foot came up, and then they were broken, or rather slaughtered, with their general. They lost nine thousand men, and twenty pieces of cannon<sup>n</sup>. This was a decisive

<sup>d</sup> AUBERT Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine. <sup>e</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. <sup>f</sup> LIMIERS.
<sup>g</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 176, 177. <sup>h</sup> LIMIERS, Histoire de Louis XIV. Memoires
de Pontis, tom. ii. liv. vi. p. 401. Histoire du Comte de Guebriant, Marechal de France, par J. LE LA-BOUREUR, Prieur de Juvigne fol. Paris, 1656. <sup>i</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 83. <sup>k</sup> Memoires du Duc de Navailles, p. 26. <sup>l</sup> Idem p. 26. LIMIERS. <sup>m</sup> Histoire de la Monarchie Françoise, par SIMON DE RHINCOURT. <sup>n</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 218. QUINCY, Histoire Milit. de Louis XIV. tom. ii. p. 2. Histoire du Prince de Condé, edit. 1699, p. 27.

defeat,

a defeat, and the ruin of the Castilian infantry, which could never be repaired. The duke of Anguien afterwards besieged Thionville, and took it, after six weeks open trenches °, tho' the Spaniards had the good fortune to throw in two thousand men before the place was invested. This strong place surrendered on the 10th of August, as Sirk did on the 2d of September, with which ended the campaign. The viscount de Turenne had the baton of France given him on the 26th of November, and Monsieur du Gassion on the 27th; and the same honour was intended for the marquis de Gesvres, if he had not been killed before Thionville p.

THE disturbances at court rose higher and higher. The faction of Vendosme, to whom the prince of Condé had given the name of Les Importans, or The Importants, persecuted b the queen publicly, and privately censured her conduct. The duke of Beaufort, a young man of a large size, well made, of moderate parts, but endowed with a peculiar kind of popular eloquence, by which he charmed the vulgar, was so much incensed at the preference the queen gave to Mazarine, that, having abundance of persons about the court at his devotion, he took some such steps, as, instead of doing his own, did his enemy's business at once, so that he was arrested when he least expected it q. He was charged with a design to murder the cardinal, though he pretended that their only aim was to frighten him. But, whatever their view was, this put an end to all their pretensions to favour. The duke de Vendosme, and the duke de Mercœur his eldest son, were ordered to retire to their houses, and in a little time Madame de Hautefort and the duchess of Chevreuse fell again into disgrace r. The queen was sufficiently sensible that the weight of government was too heavy for her, and therefore in a little time discharged it almost intirely upon the cardinal, who persuaded her to desist from the resolution she had formed of despoiling the relations and friends of his predecessor. He told her, that in general they were persons of merit, who had discharged the places they held with reputation: that they could expect protection only from her majesty, and must consequently remain attached to her; and that, in depriving them of the places they held, she would not find it easy in disposing of them to others who were like to behave better, or to be more steady in their obedience. The duchess of Aiguillon, to whom her uncle had secured the government of Havre de Grace, treated the queen with such profound respect, and gave her such strong assurances of perpetual fidelity, that by degrees she grew much d into her favour s. But the chancellor, the surintendant of the finances, and his son Chavigni, remained still exposed to the queen's resentment. As to the first, the cardinal represented his late service in parliament in so strong a light, that the queen at length came to endure him; but as for Bouthillier he was removed towards the close of the year, and the office of surintendant bestowed upon the president Bailleul t, a man of incorruptible integrity, but of too mild and soft a disposition for that employment, and therefore he had first M. d'Avaux, and then Mr. Emery, given him as an assistant. This secured the chancellor, from whom, if the seals had been taken, they would have been given to the president. Mr. Chavigni was ordered to dispose of his employment as secretary of state. The queen hated him for the restrictions in the late king's declaration, while he thought it no small merit that the declaration was not farther clogged, e to which the king was strongly inclined. The cardinal was under great obligations to him; and perhaps would have exerted himself with greater warmth in his favour, if his abilities had not been so conspicuous, or his experience in affairs had been less. He disposed of his employment to the count de Brienne u, who had sold his own; but, to preserve some measures with him, the cardinal took care that Chavigni should be admitted into the council. In pursuance of the preliminaries signed at Ratisbon the French plenipotentiaries Longueville, d'Avaux, and Servien, were sent into Germany thro' Holland v.

THE queen and her minister were obliged to have great complaisance for the duke of Or- Progress of the leans and the prince of Condé; and this affair went the better, because the want of sincerity war in Ger-on all sides obliged them to act with the most strict punctuality and precaution. The duke of many under f Orleans testified a desire of being at the head of the army, and this could not be refused. It the duke of was determined that he should command on the side of the Low Countries, where there was in Italy un-the least doubt of his meeting with success. The difficulty of restoring affairs in Germany der prince invited rather than deterred the duke of Anguien, who very readily took the command, hav- Thomas of ing under him the marshals Grammont and Turenne. In the mean time the plenipotentiaries, Savoy.
in their passage through Holland, concluded a new treaty with the states, in which they gave them the title of high and mighty Lords x, and in virtue of which the prince of

° Mercure Francois.p Memoires de Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 220, 221.q Memoires de

Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 167—187.

r Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. AUBERI*Histoire du Cardinal de Mazarine*.s Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. LIMIERS, REINCOURT.t AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal de Mazarine, BATT. NANI. liv. xii.u *Memoires de Madame de Motteville*tom. i. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii.

v LIMIERS, REINCOURT.

x *Corps Uni-*versel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vi. p. 294. LIMIERS, REINCOURT.

Orange promised to act in concert with Monsieur, whom he advised to attack Dunkirk <sup>a</sup> and Gravelines. The treaty of alliance was also renewed with Portugal; and a subsidy granted to Ragotski, who thereupon made an irruption into Hungary, and afforded thereby a very necessary diversion in favour of the Swedes. General Merci, who commanded the Bavarian army, had taken Friburgh before the French were in a condition to take the field, at least with an army capable of looking him in the face. At length, having drawn together about 26,000 men, the duke of Anguien advanced towards general Merci, who was encamped very advantageously to cover his new conquests. He attacked him, notwithstanding his retrenchments, on the 3d of August, and with great difficulty forced them on one side: upon this Merci decamped, and took possession of a mountain, where he fortified himself as strongly as before; the duke attacked him again on the 5th, but without being able to force him; <sup>b</sup> but on the 9th he quitted his retrenched post, and leaving behind him six pieces of cannon <sup>y</sup>, and part of his baggage, made a great and glorious retreat. The duke of Anguien, without amusing himself with the recovery of Friburgh, resolved to become master of the course of the Rhine. Accordingly he attacked Philipsburgh, which surrendered on the 9th of September. Upon this success Mentz opened her gates; Worms and Oppenheim were reduced; and marshal Turenne took all the places on that river as far as Landau <sup>z</sup>. In Italy things went but indifferently; prince Thomas, after a long siege, reduced St. Va, and obliged the Spaniards to abandon the castle of Ast, which they had surprised while he was engaged in that siege <sup>2</sup>. Pope Urban the eighth dying, France interposed to prevent cardinal Pamphilio from succeeding him; but cardinal Antonio Barberini, who at this time was protector of <sup>c</sup> the affairs of France, being gained, and the French ambassador, who confided too much in him, deceived, Pamphilio was advanced to the papal throne, and assumed the title of Innocent the tenth; which so provoked the French court, that they obliged cardinal Antonio to take down the arms of France that were placed over his gate, and recalled and disgraced the ambassador <sup>b</sup>.

Marshal de la Mothe Houdincourt beat before Lerida, and unjustly censured.

THE marshal de la Mothe, who still commanded Catalonia, was obliged to raise the siege of Tarragona, in order to march to the relief of Lerida, which was besieged by his catholic majesty in person. The marshal de la Mothe, with great courage, though with an inferior army, gave the enemy battle on the 15th of May, in which he had the misfortune to be beaten, with the loss of two thousand men, his artillery and baggage. In these circumstances he gave <sup>d</sup> a distinguishing proof of his prudence and presence of mind, by causing a great convoy of provisions to enter the place during the heat of the dispute; notwithstanding which Lerida surrendered <sup>e</sup>, after a siege of six weeks. Cardinal Mazarine, notwithstanding his former services, recalled the marshal, caused him to be arrested at Lyons, and sent prisoner to Pierre Encise, loading him with heavy accusations. On the other hand, the marshal retorted the charge, affirming, that, since the death of Richelieu, he had been ill supported; and that, in the action before Lerida, he had defeated the Spaniards, if his horse had done their duty. He even went so far as to allege, that this was not owing to any want of zeal or courage in them, but to certain secret orders which were sent them by Monsieur le Tellier. This piqued the cardinal extremely, who thereupon caused his process <sup>d</sup> to be made before the parliament <sup>e</sup> of Grenoble; but four years after he was discharged with great honour, and released from his imprisonment, in spite of all the arts used to prevent it.

The duke of Orleans reduces Gravelines, and then returns to court.

THE duke of Orleans, having under him the marshals de la Meilleraie and de Gassion, marched into the heart of Flanders, and, contrary to the advice of the prince of Orange, invested Gravelines, after taking some small places that covered it <sup>e</sup>. The states promised to send a fleet to facilitate the reduction of the place by sea, which they did under the command of the famous Tromp; but he came too late to do any great service, and the governor, Don Hernando de Solis, was obliged to surrender it on the 28th of July, after forty-eight days open trenches <sup>f</sup>. On the 7th of August the prince of Orange made himself master of the Sas van Ghent <sup>2</sup>, a place of great importance, which the republic has ever since possessed, and which gave their <sup>f</sup> forces an open passage into Brabant. The duke of Orleans was ambitious of the same, but did not care to engage in enterprizes which were accompanied either with much difficulty or danger, so that nothing farther of importance was done on this side. He was received however, on his return <sup>b</sup>, with all imaginable testimonies of respect by the court, with which he was highly pleased.

<sup>y</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIII. tom. i. p. 22. Histoire du Prince de Condé. <sup>z</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, par M. DE RAMSAY. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 282. <sup>a</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. 34, 35. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 233. <sup>c</sup> Memoires chronologiques & historiques, Hist. de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. 44. <sup>d</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. p. 36—373. <sup>e</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, p. 244. <sup>f</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. 19. Memoires de Puysegur. <sup>2</sup> Memoires de Fred. Henri, Prince d'Orange, in 4to, p. 322. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de Mad. de Motteville, tom. i. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii.

- <sup>a</sup> THE domestic affairs of France began to be disturbed, in consequence of the hasty steps taken by the queen in the beginning of her regency. The council of state had imposed a tax upon the new houses built contrary to the edict for setting bounds to the city of Paris; upon which followed an insurrection of the people, whose cause was supported by the parliament. At first vigorous measures were resolved on; but the natural moderation of Mazarine prevailed; and the queen, in return for the affection the Parisians had always shewn for her, pardoned the offence<sup>1</sup>. This did not hinder new disputes with the parliament, who saw their opportunity, and were very desirous of extending their authority. The queen sent for them to court, and caused them to be reprimanded by the chancellor<sup>k</sup>; but this had little effect. They resolved to convert her compliment into a concession, and made her deeply repent the promise she had made them of receiving their counsels, and following their advice. If this spirit of theirs had been truly what it seemed, zeal for the cause of their country, and an honest desire of sparing the purses of the people, it had been highly commendable; and, very probably, by a moderate proceeding they might have prevailed. But this was not the case; Mr. de Chateauneuf, released from his imprisonment, and suffered to live at his house at Montrouge, was the great author of these discords. He expected to have succeeded cardinal Richelieu, or at least to have had the seals; being disappointed in these great views, he forgot the favour he had received, and, by his discourses to those who came to visit him, inspired the parliament with a desire of controuling the administration, and acquiring a share in the government by censuring its proceedings<sup>l</sup>. The sickness of Mazarine<sup>m</sup> was another misfortune; it retarded the progress of affairs, and it raised a multitude of pretenders; but at the same time it afforded an excuse for that want of vigour which was shewn in support of the royal authority. Mazarine, who was very able in foreign affairs, was not so knowing in those that regarded the domestic interest of France; and could never be driven from that equitable maxim, that the queen, having received her regency from the parliament, could not, either with propriety or decency, treat them roughly. This minister, in appearance so gentle, treated duke Charles of Lorraine very hardly, prescribing to him such terms as it was impossible for a sovereign to accept. The duke, who had an art of politics of his own, quickly saw this, but continued to negotiate; got some articles softened, others explained, and at last concluded<sup>n</sup>. His views were to make better terms with the Spaniards, which he did, and then refused to ratify the treaty with the minister, so that in the end he was the only gainer<sup>o</sup> by the minister's obstinacy. The queen of Great Britain, whom the civil war in her own dominions had driven abroad, A. D. 1644. after passing some months in drinking the waters of Bourbon, returned to pass the winter in Paris, and was treated with very great respect. On the 6th of October died Elizabeth of France, queen of Spain, exceedingly regretted<sup>p</sup>; she had just acquired some influence in the councils of Madrid, and employed it in behalf of the people.
- <sup>e</sup> LEONARD Tortenson, who commanded the Swedes, had gained a great victory over the imperialists at Tabor, in the beginning of March, in consequence of which general Rosen was sent with a body of cavalry to join marshal Turenne, who was advancing into Franconia. With this view he passed the Rhine and the Main, and sent Rosen with his horse to observe the motions of general Merci, an officer inferior to none, who continued retiring before him<sup>q</sup>. Rosen, having followed him for four days, returned to marshal Turenne, with an account that the enemies were gone; upon which, at the request of the Germans, and because the season was rude, the troops were put into quarters of refreshment. Merci, who foresaw this, and who had followed Rosen back but slowly, and at a distance, on the 5th of May fell upon the quarters of the French at Marindal, carried them with great ease, killed a great many men, and took six pieces of cannon, and all the baggage, which obliged Turenne to repass the rivers, and to retire fighting under the walls of Philipsburgh<sup>r</sup>. This was the single check that Turenne ever received, and yet perhaps it was the source of his humility in his victories. At least this is certain, that whenever he was applauded for the latter he always mentioned the former, and gave those praises to Merci that others would have given to him<sup>s</sup>. The duke of Anguien, who was destined to command on this side, marched to his relief, and in his passage assisted the marquis de Villeroy in taking la Motte, where the duke of Lorraine had still a garrison, and before which place Magalotti, an Italian officer, for whom the cardinal intended a baton of France, had been killed.
- <sup>f</sup> THE French forces, being joined, marched under the command of the duke, the marshals Grammont and Turenne, in order to form the siege of Hailbron. After taking Wimpfen, which opened the passage of the Neckar, they continued their march towards Nortlingen, not far

Beginning of these disputes and discontents which at length produced a civil war.

The French army under marshal Turenne surprised by general Merc.

The duke of Anguien, with the marshals

<sup>1</sup> Memoires d'Omer Talon, la Haye, 1732, 8 vol. 12mo. t. iii.

<sup>k</sup> REINCOURT, LIMIERS.

<sup>l</sup> Me.

moires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i.

<sup>m</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 229.

<sup>n</sup> Corps

Univerfel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vi. P. i. p. 300.

<sup>o</sup> LIMIERS, REINCOURT.

<sup>p</sup> Mc-

moires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 283—289.

<sup>q</sup> Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

<sup>r</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV.

<sup>s</sup> LIMIERS Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, tom. i.

from

Grammont and Turenne, beats the Germans at Nortlingen, where general Merci is killed. from which they found general Merci, encamped more strongly than at Friburgh, on a mountain surrounded by a morass, a large village in his centre, his right wing covered by a thick wood, his left by an old fortress, into which he had put several pieces of cannon. The duke determined to attack him even in this posture, and he performed it on the third of August. The command of the right wing was given to marshal Grammont, who was to oppose general Glesne; the marquis de Castelnau commanded in the centre; and marshal Turenne, with the German horse, in the left wing, was opposed to count Merci, who commanded the right of his own army. The duke took no post. The action began by attacking the village, which the marquis de Castelnau performed with great vigour; but was on the point of being repulsed, when the duke of Anguien, with his gens d'arms, came in to his relief, and carried their point. Marshal Turenne with infinite difficulty forced an eminence between the village and the enemies right wing, which he defeated with great slaughter, the brave count Merci being killed upon the spot. Marshal Grammont, with the French cavalry, was thoroughly beaten, and himself taken prisoner; and if general Glesne had not amused himself with attempting to plunder the baggage, he might have restored the fortune of the day, or at least he might have made a good retreat; but his troops being dispersed by the victors, he was himself made prisoner. The imperialists had three thousand killed, two thousand taken prisoners, and fifteen pieces of cannon: but the victory was very dearly bought. Nortlingen and Dunkespiel surrendered, and the victorious army besieged Hailbron. The duke of Anguien, falling ill, was obliged to leave the army to the command of marshal Turenne; and the archduke Leopold and general Galas advancing with a superior army to its relief, he raised the siege. The imperialists, after retaking Nortlingen and Dunkespiel, went into winter-quarters, as the marshal was about to do. But, being informed that there was a very weak garrison in Treves, he very unexpectedly advanced towards it, and invested the place, which opened its gates on the 19th of November, by which means it was restored to the elector, whose liberty the French plenipotentiaries at Munster had procured; the only remarkable thing they had done in the space of two years, which was chiefly owing to the disputes amongst themselves. Mr. Servien had the minister's confidence, which the duke of Longueville thought due to him from his rank, while the public have judged that Mr. d'Avaux had the best title of them all in point of merit.

Campaign in Italy, and the retreat of the Barberins into France. ON the side of Italy there was a treaty concluded on the third of April, between the king and the dukes of Savoy, by which Turin and all the other places in which there were French garrisons, were delivered to the young duke. The execution of this treaty took up so much time, that the Spaniards might have taken advantage of it, if their forces in the duchy of Milan had been near so considerable as in times past; but, to say the truth, this long war had so exhausted both crowns, that, in the more distant scenes of action, things were carried on in a very languishing manner. In the summer campaign, when there was in a manner nothing to oppose them, the marquis de Serra, who commanded in the Milanese, only rendered himself master of the fortress of Capiara, which he demolished. In the autumn prince Thomas of Savoy took the field with the French and Piedmontese troops, and besieged Rocca de Vigevano, which surrendered on the 12th of September. But though the campaign ended here, we cannot quit Italy so soon. Innocent the tenth, who had ascended the papal throne by the assistance of the Barberins, who, in that, had sacrificed their attachment to France, was no sooner firmly seated thereon, than he began to make them feel the weight of his resentment, and that in so extraordinary a manner, as obliged them to have recourse to the protection of France, or rather to that of the cardinal, who, by his sole influence, procured it to be employed in their behalf in its utmost extent. In consequence of this, the cardinal Antonio Barberini, and his brother the prefect Thadeus, with his family, retired to Paris, where they were received with all possible marks of honour and respect. We cannot enter here at large into the motives of the cardinal's conduct, which has been censured by some, and commended by others; it is sufficient to say, that they brought with them immense sums of money, which they freely lent for carrying on the war on this side; and in consideration of which Mazarine, in process of time, advanced cardinal Antonio to the archiepiscopal see of Rheims, and the post of lord high almoner.

Count de Harcourt, viceroy of Catalonia, takes Roses. THE minister was obliged, for his own justification, to take all imaginable care of the affairs in Catalonia, where the marshal de la Motte was replaced by the count de Harcourt, with the title of viceroy. He opened the campaign towards the close of March with the siege of Roses,

<sup>a</sup> Histoire du Prince de Conde, p. 108. AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine, tom. i. p. 294. Memoires chronologiques & historiques.

<sup>b</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, tom. i. <sup>c</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires chronologiques & historiques, Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 304, 305.

<sup>d</sup> Histoire du Prince de Conde. <sup>e</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii.

<sup>f</sup> VITTORIO SIRI il Mercurio, tom. iv. p. ii. p. 299. <sup>g</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. ii. p. 88.

<sup>h</sup> AUBERI, Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine, Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 281, 282.

a an important port, strong by situation, well fortified, and in which there was a garrison of three thousand foot and three hundred horse. The count du Pleffis Praslin commanded the siege, and the count de Harcourt covered it. The place was well defended; and Don Andrew de Cantelmo, who commanded the army of Spain, did not find himself strong enough to undertake any thing for its relief, so that the place surrendered on the 26th of May, after forty-nine days open trenches <sup>d</sup>, which intitled the count du Pleffis Praslin to the baton of France; which as soon as he received, he was sent into Piedmont, to assist prince Thomas of Savoy <sup>e</sup>. After his departure, the count de Harcourt passed the Segro with all his forces, in order to give battle to the Spaniards, who were posted between Liorens and Balaguier. The battle was fought on the 22d of June, when the Spanish troops were beat, having 1000 men killed, and 2000 taken prisoners, which was followed by the loss of Liorens and Balaguier <sup>f</sup>. But this was not the greatest event of the year; the baron d'Alby formed a dangerous conspiracy for restoring Barcelona to the Spaniards, in which a great number of the inhabitants were embarked; but it was discovered on the very point of execution, by the great vigilance of the viceroy, by whose orders some of the principal criminals were severely punished <sup>g</sup>, and the malecontents put out of the power of acting for the future.

THE greatest efforts were made on the side of Flanders, where the duke of Orleans commanded, having under him the marshal du Gassion, and the count de Rantzau. The Spaniards were but weak, and the great diversion made by the prince of Orange very much facilitated the progress of the French. Casal was taken by storm, which opened a passage to the siege of Mardyke. This place was then no more than a very strong fort covered by marshes, into which the Spaniards had put a garrison of twelve hundred men, with all the ammunition and provisions necessary, general Picolomini being near with his army, to afford the besieged all the assistance in his power. The siege was carried on with great circumspection; and the Dutch fleet, commanded by admiral Tromp, blocked up the place by sea. It was surrendered on the 10th of July, after twenty days open trenches <sup>h</sup>; by which the count de Rantzau, abjuring the protestant religion, obtained the marshal's staff. To secure this conquest, the marshal de Gassion was sent to take the fort of Link, which he performed within the compass of the same month, being dangerously wounded in the attack. The two marshals next attacked Bourbourg, which, after a siege of ten days, was surrendered, and the garrison made prisoners of war. Menin, Bethune, and Lillers, followed; in the mean time the prince of Orange besieged Hulst <sup>i</sup>, a place of great strength and importance. The Spaniards, seeing him thus employed, assembled all their forces in Flanders, in order to recover some of the places they had lost; in which they met with some good fortune, for they recovered Casal, and surprised the fort of Mardyke <sup>k</sup>; but in the mean time the prince of Orange took Hulst on the 14th of November, after which the forces on both sides went into winter quarters.

AT home the cardinal found himself every day in fresh perplexities with the parliament; and very often his quarrels were about such trifles, that it was sufficiently evident this great and powerful body took a pleasure in embarrassing and perplexing his administration. He wanted not some true friends, who advised him to act with vigour; and to let the parliament know, that though kings were minors, yet the royal authority did not participate either of age or of youth, but was always the same; and that having declared the queen sole regent, they were as much bound to obedience as the rest of her subjects <sup>l</sup>. But the cardinal considered his own situation as a stranger that had no alliance, no support but from the queen; he had no adequate notions of the constitution of France, but took his opinions in that respect implicitly from others; and had also so many false friends, who either took a pleasure or found their interest in seeing him thus confounded, that he really knew not how to act. The queen herself did not discover any want of resolution; but, in the audiences that she gave to the committees of parliament, behaved with steadiness and dignity; and the chancellor was not wanting in the proper discharge of his office <sup>m</sup>. But, notwithstanding all this, the parliament were gainers by every dispute; and it was this that excited them, as soon as one was terminated, to set on foot another. In point of raising money, it was thought proper to make use of the king himself, who went in person to hold his bed of justice, when according to the established usage, the parliament registered the edicts, out of respect to the king's presence, without remonstrances <sup>n</sup>. In order to make the most of this expedient, the king carried nineteen money bills <sup>o</sup> at once; which offered so fair an occasion, that the advocate general Talon made a bold and eloquent speech, which the queen, more intent upon the spectacle than the importance of this transaction,

<sup>d</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. 50.
du Marechal du Pleffis Praslin, 4to, Paris, 1676.

<sup>e</sup> LARRY, tom. i. p. 48.

<sup>f</sup> de Fred. Henri Prince d'Orange.

<sup>g</sup> AUBERTI Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine.

<sup>h</sup> moires d'Omer Talon, tom. iii.

<sup>i</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. 37.

<sup>k</sup> BUSSY, RABUTIN, Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. ii. p. 78, 79.

<sup>l</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i.

<sup>m</sup> Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par M. VOLTAIRE, tom. i.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires de divers exploits & actions
Fastes des Rois de France, tom. ii. p. 298.

<sup>o</sup> Memoires

<sup>p</sup> Me-

could not help applauding <sup>p</sup>; and it was not without concessions that a point of so great consequence, and in which there was nothing harsh or immoderate, was got over; and even with the help of these it was not without much difficulty the minister brought it to bear. The cardinal was no less embarrassed with the negotiation at Munster, where the Spaniards laboured assiduously, and with great address, to detach the states general from their interests, at the same time that the emperor acted with the same view, and with the like probability of success, in regard to the Swedes; but, in the management of these affairs, the cardinal discovered much greater abilities, and, with the assistance of the count of Brienne, enabled the French plenipotentiaries to make good their party with their allies <sup>q</sup>. Ladislaus, king of Poland, having demanded the princess Mary of Nevers in marriage, the treaty was quickly concluded, and on the 9th of November the ambassadors espoused that princess in the name of their master <sup>r</sup>. b
 Madame la Marechale de Guebriant conducted the princess Mary into Poland; and was the first, and perhaps will be the last, that bore the title of ambassador, which however was never better supported; for, notwithstanding some private histories of a disagreeable nature had taken a quicker passage than she to Warsaw, and made such an impression on the king's mind, that he had in a great measure lost the inclination of becoming a husband, yet the ambassador managed things so well, that she not only carried her point, and saw the princess she carried placed upon the throne, but raised her own credit with the king so high, that, by his command, the same honours were paid to her that had been paid to the archduchess, who had conducted his first consort <sup>s</sup> into Poland. This year the heiress of the illustrious family of Roban espoused the chevalier Cbabot, descended from the admiral of that name, but who was far from being rich; which so provoked her mother, that she produced a young man whose name was Tancred, affirming him to be her own son by the duke of Roban, and the true heir of the family; but, after a long suit which this occasioned, the determination was in favour of her daughter against a son, who made his appearance upon so critical an occasion <sup>t</sup>. c

The king taken out of the hands of the women, and marshal Villeroy appointed his governor.

LEWIS the fourteenth was now turned of seven years old, and it was judged absolutely necessary to take him out of the hands of the women. But as the education of the young prince was a point of great consequence to the queen and her minister, it was judged most expedient to confide this great trust to the cardinal himself, who was by letters patents created surintendant of the king's education <sup>u</sup>. The marquis de Villeroi, now raised to the rank of marshal of France, was declared his governor; and the abbé de Beaumont, better known by the name of Perefixe, afterwards archbishop of Paris, was his preceptor <sup>v</sup>; but whether it was thro' the fault of the latter, as is commonly reported, or whether in fact the king had naturally slow parts, and no capacity of learning languages, so it certainly was, that he made but very little progress in what is generally stiled learning, tho' on the other hand it is no less certain, that, by the conversation of marshal Villeroi, and of the cardinal himself, he was informed of those things that it best became a king to know, was accustomed to think before he spoke, and to judge of persons and things without passion or prejudice. Calumny has imputed to the queen and the cardinal a desire of breeding him up in ignorance, that they might manage him the more easily, and keep public affairs the longer in their own hands; but his attachment to the cardinal, and his affection and reverence for marshal Villeroi, seem to afford an evidence sufficient to destroy any suspicions of this kind. It is certain that the cardinal himself was very sensible of the defects in the king's education; but at the same time suggested, that they were in a great measure unavoidable, and that he had laboured not unsuccessfully to correct them as he advanced in years, as far as it was in his power; and impartial judges have inclined to believe, that he asserted nothing in this respect that was contrary to truth <sup>w</sup>. But notwithstanding this, the censures passed upon his preceptor have not been thought without foundation, and that his want of talents for the office confided to him were not discovered till it was too late. d Disputes in the parliament of Paris, and delays in the negotiation at Munster.

THE presidents Gayan and Barillon dying towards the close of the year, revived the ill humour of the parliament at the beginning of this, and for two reasons. The first was, the president Barillon died in the fortrefs of Pignerol, to which he was sent as the author of the first quarrel. He was a magistrate of great parts and probity, but of so strange a temper, that he was ever at the head of some party or other. Under her difficulties, he had been very steady in the service of the queen, and very useful in getting the limitations contained in the king's declaration cancelled. But when this was done, he was the first to murmur, and the last to be reconciled to the court; so that, after condescending often to his humours, and f

<sup>p</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 311, 312.

<sup>q</sup> Negociations secretes de Munster.

&c. tom. i.

<sup>r</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 319—321, &c. REINCOURT, tom. i.

p. 141.

<sup>s</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 37—340.

<sup>t</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 313.

<sup>u</sup> AUBERI Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine, Memoires de Madam de Motteville, tom. i. p. 347.

<sup>v</sup> Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, tom. i.

<sup>w</sup> Histoire

de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. iv. p. 163, 164.

- a sacrificing much to his repentment, the queen very unwillingly caused him to be arrested, and carried prisoner to the frontiers of Piedmont<sup>y</sup>. The other cause was, that these two employments were disposed of to two young counsellors, with a dispensation for their want of age, which furnished fresh matter of complaint. When the court gave way in this, the chambers quarrelled amongst themselves, as if peace and the prosecution of their duty had been the most intolerable of all grievances. In the course of these debates, they advanced a little too openly that maxim which it imported them most to have concealed, “that they held the royal authority incomplete during a minority<sup>z</sup>.” But the perplexity occasioned by these ill-timed animosities was still less than that which arose from the disagreement of the plenipotentiaries at Munster, where, at the same time, the imperial and Spanish ministers were practising every art to separate France from her allies. Amongst others, his catholic majesty proposed leaving it to the queen regent to dictate a peace, making her the high compliment to declare, that he looked upon her wisdom and piety to be such, that he was content she should adjust all things between her brother and her son. This imposed upon the French plenipotentiaries, who made no scruple of declaring, that they looked upon the peace as made, and they transmitted this offer to the queen. But she, by the advice of Mazarine, treated it in a proper manner; and, after expressing a due sense of the compliment, declared, that in a thing of such high importance she could not trust herself; that she would never listen to any terms of peace, but in conjunction with her allies, or negotiate any-where but at Munster<sup>a</sup>. The treaty of subsidy<sup>b</sup> was renewed with the states; and the requisite measures having been taken for carrying on the war, the forces were permitted to act as if all thoughts had been lost of peace. Such as affirmed that this war was commenced by Richelieu, to render himself necessary to his master, might with equal reason allege, that it was persisted in by Mazarine to maintain his own authority in supporting that of his mistress. His enemies, it is certain, always objected his having no inclination to a general peace, though he professed the contrary.

- MARSHAL Turenne commanded on the side of Germany, the only side on which the minister, from the situation of public affairs, was able to do little. The whole army consisted but of eight thousand men; and all that could be expected was, that the marshal should make some effort to join the Swedes, which was apparently difficult, if not impracticable. Turenne himself treated the project as a chimera, and made dispositions of a very contrary nature. He prevailed upon the landgravine to throw a bridge over the Rhine at Wesel; and, passing there unexpectedly with his forces, prosecuted his march with such vigour, that, before the imperialists could reach him, he entered Bavaria, joined the Swedes, and besieged Augsburgh<sup>c</sup>, which siege, however, he was obliged to raise in the beginning of October; but his junction with the Swedes, notwithstanding, was the principal motive that induced the electors of Bavaria and Cologne to conclude a neutrality<sup>d</sup>, in order to save their country, which was of as great consequence to France as a victory would have been. The reason that the army in Germany was so feeble, was, from the efforts made on the side of Italy, where the cardinal Mazarine was determined to employ the power of France to humble the pope, who not only prosecuted the Barberins with unrelenting severity, but had refused a hat to the archbishop of Aix, the cardinal's brother; and had even published a bull, insisting on the attendance of the whole sacred college at Rome, unless exempted by his holiness's permission<sup>e</sup>. Mazarine knew perfectly well the temper of that court, upon which nothing can work but fear. Prince Thomas of Savoy had orders to march with his forces to Orbitello, on the coast of Tuscany, where the duke de Breze embarked five thousand French troops to assist him in the siege, on board a fleet commanded by the duke de Breze. This was scarce done, before the Spanish armada appeared under the command of admiral Pimentel. The duke de Breze acted with great spirit, went immediately on board his own vessel, and put to sea with his fleet, in order to give that of the enemy battle. This engagement happened on the 14th of June, and it is said that he had the advantage, when unluckily, by a cannon shot, he lost his head in the flower of his age, being but twenty-seven<sup>f</sup>. His vice admiral, the count d'Oignon, instead of prosecuting the fight, or regarding what might happen to the forces on shore, bore away for the coast of France, in order to secure Brouage, and the rest of the places of which, in consequence of his uncle Richelieu's will, the duke was governor. This action, which one would have thought must have occasioned his disgrace, made his fortune<sup>g</sup>. Prince Thomas, after laying before the place

Campaign in Germany and Italy, where the cardinal forces the pope to submission.

<sup>y</sup> Memoires d'Omer Talon, vol. iv. p. 57. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 226, 227.
<sup>z</sup> Memoires d'Omer Talon, vol. iv. <sup>a</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. iv. p. 170, 171. <sup>b</sup> Corps
 Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vi. P. i. p. 343. <sup>c</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. <sup>d</sup> Recueil des Traitez de Confederation & d'Alliance
 entre la Couronne de France & les Princes & Etats Etrangers, p. 401. FREDER. LEONARD, tom. iii.
<sup>e</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. iv. p. 181, 182. <sup>f</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville,
 tom. i. p. 361. Memoires du Duc de Navailles, p. 36. <sup>g</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. ii.
 p. 181.

till he had lost the greatest part of his troops, was constrained to raise the siege. But Mazarine, persisting in his resolution, equipped another fleet of greater force than the former, embarked a fresh body of troops, and sent the marshals Meilleraie and du Plessis Praslin, into the island of Elbe, where they reduced Piombino and Portolongone<sup>b</sup>. But, before this, the very terror of this armament forced pope Innocent to comply with the cardinal's terms, by which the Barberins were restored to all they had lost, which gained him great reputation<sup>c</sup>, as, in the plenitude of their power, they had been his personal enemies, though he had been once their creature, which shewed his generosity in taking them under his protection. The duke of Modena, encouraged by this success, declared again on the side of France, and admitted a body of troops into his dominions.

Count de Harcourt forced to raise the siege of Lerida, which is highly censured in France.

THE count de Harcourt continued to command in Catalonia, and thought himself in possession of beating the Spaniards, who, after all his mistakes and misfortunes, were constrained to intrust the command of their forces once more to the marquis de Leganez. The count de Harcourt, tho' his army was not superior, proposed to himself to beat the marquis first, and then to take Lerida. On the other hand, the marquis very well knew that fighting was not his business, and therefore avoided it with great address. At length the count invested Lerida, a very strong place, and well provided in all respects. The marquis suffered him to remain there quietly enough for about six weeks, then harassed his foragers, and at length advanced towards his lines with his troops in order of battle; and, having presented himself in this manner frequently, he at length retired, as despairing of success. In the mean time he had provided a large convoy of provisions, under the escort of fifteen hundred chosen troops, and on the 21st of November they approached the place on one side, while he with all his forces marched back from the same distance on the other. The count de Harcourt judged rightly that he was in earnest, made the necessary dispositions to receive him, and defended his lines with great courage and intrepidity. But while he was thus employed, the Spanish troops who escorted the convoy forced one of his quarters, and entered the place; of which he was no sooner apprised, than he raised the siege, and made a regular retreat, but was obliged to leave behind his artillery, and the best part of his baggage<sup>k</sup>. This unfortunate event cancelled all his former services, and induced the cardinal to remove and recal him; but being as complete a courtier as a captain, though he came in disgrace, he had not remained long at court before he wrought himself into very high favour.

The duke of Orleans takes Courtrai, and the prince of Conde Dunkirk.

ON the side of Flanders the Spaniards being in motion in the beginning of May, with an intent to strengthen the garrisons of the most exposed places, marshal de Gassion marched with two hundred horse to Menin, where being informed that the enemy's infantry were on one side the canal and their horse on the other, he marched with such celerity and secrecy, that he surprised six regiments of the latter, as they lay scattered in the villages, and killed, took, or dispersed them all<sup>l</sup>. At the entrance of the campaign the army was commanded by the duke of Orleans, under whom served the duke of Anguien, and the marshals Gassion and Rantzau<sup>m</sup>. The army consisted of thirty thousand men, with which about the middle of June they invested Courtrai<sup>n</sup>; the enemy, commanded by the duke of Lorraine and the generals Bec and Lamboy, were twenty-five thousand strong; who encamped so near them, that they cannonaded each other's camp with some effect. The abbé de la Riviere, who could not leave Monfieur, was not at all pleased with this situation, shewed it upon all occasions so much, and this timidity of his had so visible an operation on their councils, as hurt his master's credit. The place, however, surrendered on the 28th, after fifteen days open trenches<sup>o</sup>. After this, the army of France joined that of Holland, upon which the duke of Lorraine retired under the cannon of Bruges. Much was expected, and much might have been done, after this junction; but the states general, and even the prince of Orange himself, had changed their sentiments, and were more afraid of their ally than of their enemies. In consequence of some disputes about command, they separated, six thousand French only, under the command of marshal Grammont, being left with the prince of Orange, the rest retired towards Courtrai, and, after a short respite, besieged Bergues-Saint-Vinox, which surrendered in three days. This facilitated the siege of Mardyke, which was long and bloody, because it could not be perfectly invested on the side of Dunkirk, from whence the garrison was every day as regularly relieved as the troops of the besiegers in their trenches; neither had it been taken at last, if the Dutch, to save appearances, after delaying as long as possible,

<sup>b</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 385.

<sup>c</sup> AUBERT Histoire du Cardinal de Mazarine, Histoire du Ministere du Cardinal Jules Mazarine, par GALEAZZO, premiere partie, p. 42, 43.

<sup>k</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 302—311.

<sup>l</sup> BUSSI Histoire de Louis XIV. <sup>m</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, p. 251.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 567.

<sup>o</sup> REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de Puysegur, p. 252.

BUSSI, Memoires, Edit. de 1711. tom. i. p. 108.

- a had not sent Tromp with a fleet before Dunkirk, which soon brought the place to capitulate, which it did on the 24th of August, and the garrison was made prisoners of war<sup>p</sup>. The duke of Anguien signalized himself at this siege, in which he was wounded; notwithstanding which, the duke of Orleans left the command to him, being persuaded by his favourite to quit the army. The Spaniards had such a sense of this change, that the marquis de Carracena, with his forces, quitted the neighbourhood with such precipitation, that they abandoned Furnes, and thereby facilitated the design of the duke of Anguien, which he had cautiously concealed, and which now appeared to be the siege of Dunkirk. His army was so diminished, that it did not consist of above ten thousand foot and five thousand horse, his whole train of fifteen pieces of heavy cannon, and not quite so many small ones. The garrison consisted of
- b two thousand five hundred foot and three hundred horse, commanded by the marquis de Lede. The duke, though he made all the dispatch possible, was three weeks in finishing his lines; but in that time the Dutch fleet under Tromp arrived. The trenches were opened on the 24th of September, and the siege carried on with all possible vigour, and the place was very gallantly defended; but, as the garrison had no hopes of succour, the duke prevailed upon the governor to capitulate upon very honourable terms, provided he was not relieved within five days. This capitulation was signed on the 7th of October; and, the Spanish army not appearing, the French became masters of this important place<sup>q</sup>. The duke of Anguien, having provided for the security of Courtrai, put his troops into winter quarters, and returned to reap the reward of his services at court, where, however, his presence was far from being
- c welcome.

- We have before observed, that the duke of Breze's death was considered as a thing of great consequence; it is necessary to explain this. The duke of Anguien, having married his sister, concluded he had a clear right to the employments and to the governments possessed by the deceased; and the service of the count d'Oignon consisted in this, that he put it in the power of the queen and her minister to consider how they should elude the duke's demand, by taking possession of Brouage and the isles adjacent. The prince of Condé solicited warmly; the duke himself wrote from the camp before Mardyke in very decent, but in very strong terms, and, which is much more extraordinary, he prevailed upon the duke of Orleans to write likewise in his favour. The queen was so much embarrassed, that she could find no other method of avoiding the duke's application, but by having recourse again to Richelieu's expedient, and causing letters patent to be expedited for the superintendence of commerce and the marine to herself. The parliament made some difficulty of verifying this grant; but, being acquainted with the true reason, they consented. When the duke of Anguien saw it impossible to have the thing, he seemed disposed to accept of an equivalent, but the difficulty was as great to find that<sup>r</sup>. They offered to him the towns lately detached from Lorraine, which he refused, and proposed giving him an army sufficient to make the conquest of Franche Comté, which he might hold, rendering homage for it to the crown of France; but the court was not disposed to revive the ancient duchy of Burgundy, which, in the hands of princes of the blood, had formerly given so much trouble to France. In the course of this dispute died
- e Henry prince of Condé, on the 26th of December<sup>s</sup>, a prince, who, with great faults, had also great virtues, and was singular in having a good and an ill quality, which hardly ever met, at least conspicuously, in any other man, these were, the love of justice, and the love of money. In respect to the latter, he was born the neediest, and died the richest, person of his rank in Europe. At the time of his marriage he had not above five hundred pounds a-year of our money; at the time of his decease his annual income was computed at fifty thousand pounds. With the title of Condé, and this vast fortune, which the duke of Anguien inherited from his father, he kept, by the favour of the regent, the posts and governments which he had enjoyed, so that all mention of an equivalent was dropped, the generous disposition of the young prince making him ashamed to take notice of it. His brother Armand, prince of Conti, and his
- f sister the duchess of Longueville, as yet had not interfered in public affairs.

THE plenipotentiaries continued to treat at Munster and at Osnabrug, the catholics in the former of these cities, and the protestants in the latter. The French ministers, though able men, were strangely outwitted. Mr. d'Avaux, who had both a sound head and an honest heart, pressed the duke of Longueville to sign the treaty, assuring him, that, with respect to the interests of France, the terms proposed were extremely favourable. The duke himself was of the same opinion; yet Mr. Servien prevailed upon him not to sign, assuring him, that this was the way to procure still better<sup>t</sup>. He had the secret of the court, or rather of the cardinal, who, finding himself exceedingly embarrassed with the parliament on one side, and the princes of the blood on the other, concluded that, a peace once made, they would concur to his destruction. On the side of Germany, marshal Turenne commanded a small corps of troops, that could scarce be stiled an army; but, by his junction with the Swedes and Hessians, he had obliged the electors of Bavaria and Cologne to sign the treaty of Ulm; after which he repassed the Rhine; and, in consequence of the orders he had received, he was on the point of marching into the Low Countries, after reducing several places, and rendering equal service to the Swedes and to the landgrave <sup>a</sup> of Hesse. This did not hinder the allies from taking it extremely amiss that he should be recalled; and the Swedish general Wrangel engaged Rosen to draw off the German and Swedish officers and troops that still remained of the forces once commanded by the duke of Saxe Weymar; to prevent which, the marshal found himself obliged to arrest Rosen; and this offended that part of his small army to such a degree that they mutinied. Turenne did all that lay in his power to reduce them by fair means; and, when these failed, he attacked and dispersed them; after which he continued his march <sup>b</sup>. The elector of Bavaria, who had detached himself from the emperor purely to save his country, thought this a favourable opportunity for renewing the war, believing what they had so long fought was at length effected; and that the French and Swedes, after what had passed, could never act together again. Marshal Turenne saw this clearly, with all the consequences that must attend it; and, having represented them in the strongest light to the court, received both orders and reinforcements, passed the Rhine, and, in spite of all the obstacles that could be thrown in the way, came to the assistance of the Swedes; which so intirely effaced all memory of former misunderstandings, that they took quarters together in Bavaria, and thus punished the elector for his perfidy in breaking the peace <sup>c</sup>. In this transaction Turenne shewed as great prudence and presence of mind as in any action of his life.

<sup>p</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, p. 254. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. Memoires de Puysegur, p. 257, 258. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 385. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. Histoire du Prince de Condé, Memoires de Madame de Montpensier, Edit. de 1735, tom. i. p. 95, 96. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 394, 395. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 237, 238. AUBERT Histoire du Cardinal Mazarin.

Progress of the war in Italy and in Catalonia, where the French forces were but feeble.

ITALY furnished a great many remarkable events, which will be represented elsewhere. We shall only observe, that the constable of Castile, who commanded the Spanish troops, gained some advantages on the side of Piedmont; and would probably have done much more, if it had not been for the diversion made on the side of the Modenese, where a small body of French troops, under the command of Monsieur de Navailles, maintained their ground till they were joined by the marshal du Plessis Praslin, and then, in conjunction with the forces of the duke of Modena, acted offensively <sup>d</sup>. In the latter end of the year the duke of Guise made his romantic journey to Naples, where he performed things almost incredible, and where it is morally certain that he would have carried his point, if it had not been for the jealousy of Mazarine, who sent a fleet indeed to Naples, which might have done every thing, but which in effect did nothing <sup>e</sup>. On the side of Catalonia the prince of Condé commanded, but with an army much inferior in point of strength to his own rank, and to the nature of the service, though composed of good troops, and commanded by excellent officers <sup>f</sup>. The prince, however, considering rather for what end he was sent than the means that he had in his power, dismissed the fleet, that might have been of great service if he had attacked any of the ports, and resolved to attack Lerida, before which the marshal de la Mothe and the count de Harcourt had failed. Don Antonio de Brito, who had acquitted himself so well in the former sieges, commanded there still; and the Spaniards, who knew the importance of the place, had left him a garrison of three thousand men, well supplied with all things necessary. The prince came before the place in the middle of May, invested it, prepared the old lines, but did not break ground till the 27th, and then, according to the Spanish custom, opened his trenches with a concert of violins, a circumstance with which he was often reproached afterwards. After some progress made in the siege, it appeared, that they had made their attack on the wrong side; and that the shortest and wisest step they could take was to begin again. But, by this time, the Spanish army was formed, and advancing towards Lerida, where the governor had allowed them no respite from the time they began the siege. The prince, laying these circumstances together, very prudently resolved to retire in time, and having sent away the artillery and baggage, raised the siege on the 21st day after the trenches were opened, without losing a man <sup>b</sup>. The rest of the campaign was spent in preventing the Spaniards from gaining any farther advantage, and in taking a little place or two upon the frontiers of Arragon, in which the marshal de Grammont <sup>c</sup>, who commanded under the prince, gained great credit; and the prince himself, by the check he received before Lerida, that degree of caution which was the only quality wanting to render him a great captain.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne. de Louis XIV. tom. i.

<sup>w</sup> Memoires chronologiques & historiques, REINCOURT, Hist. de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. iv.

<sup>x</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. de Louis XIV. tom. i. Memoires du Duc de Navailles.

<sup>y</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire

tom. i. REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. Les Memoires de feu Monsieur le Duc de Guise, Paris, 1668, 4to.

<sup>z</sup> AUBERI, Histoire du Cardinal Mazarin,

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 419.

<sup>b</sup> LIMIERS, tom. i. p. 110.

LARREY, tom. i. p. 101. Histoire du Prince de Condé.

<sup>c</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV.

<sup>a</sup> THE Spaniards, having united themselves still closer than formerly to the emperor, resolved to make great efforts on the side of Flanders, and with that view confided the government of the Low Countries, and the command of the army, to the archduke Leopold, <sup>The campaign in the Low Countries, and the death of the gallant marshal Gassion,</sup> who, reinforced with some German regiments, took the field in the beginning of May. On the other hand, Mazarine, extremely embarrassed in raising money, was very well pleased that the physicians of the duke of Orleans sent him to drink the waters of Bourbon, and gave the command of the army to the marshals Gassion and Rantzau. The archduke besieged Armentier, and, though it was very well defended, took it after fourteen days open trenches<sup>d</sup>. He next besieged Landreci. Marshal Gassion would have attacked him in his lines, but Rantzau declined it; upon which it was agreed that they should endeavour to make a diversion.

<sup>b</sup> Rantzau accordingly attacked the forts Knocque, Nieudam, and Sluce, while in the mean time marshal de Gassion besieged La Bassée, which he pressed with great vigour, knowing that Landreci could not hold long, and that he should have the archduke with his army at his elbow. In two days he carried the covered way, and began to batter in breach. On the fourth he prepared for a general assault; and at the same time sent the governor word, that, if he carried the place sword in hand, he would not spare man, woman, or child. The governor demanded four hours to consider: the marshal laid his watch on the ground before him, and bade the officer who brought the message tell the governor, that if in three quarters of an hour he did not deliver him a gate, he had no quarter to expect for himself or the rest of the inhabitants. The place surrendered<sup>e</sup>; and the marshal had scarce taken possession,

<sup>c</sup> before he had intelligence that Landreci surrendered the night before, which was the 18th of July, and that the archduke was in full march to relieve it. About the same time marshal Rantzau became master of Dixmude. On the 24th of September marshal de Gassion invested Lens, and pushed the siege with the same vivacity as he had done that of La Bassée; but, in the attack of the covered way, as he was endeavouring to pull up a palisade, he received a shot in the head, of which he died on the 2d of October<sup>f</sup> following, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. He was at that time in disgrace for having thrown an impertinent letter of Mazarine's upon<sup>g</sup> the floor, and for having exclaimed against the idle expences of an opera, at a time when several places in the frontiers were in a very bad condition. France lost in him an able officer, and a man of honour<sup>h</sup>. Monsieur de Villequier continued the siege, and forced Lens

<sup>d</sup> to surrender the day after the marshal's death; the archduke, in revenge, besieged and recovered Dixmude, with which ended the campaign<sup>i</sup>.

As the events of the war were not favourable, so the intrigues of the court were as troublesome to the cardinal as ever. The duke de Longueville was desirous of being made admiral of France at the same time with the prince of Condé: and not being able to obtain it, insisted on an equivalent, which he did obtain: for this was the cardinal's weakness; he was unwilling to reward services; he gave seldom out of friendship, but his timidity made him seem generous when he really was not so. The duke, who was already governor of Normandy, had the government of Caen and the citadel added to it, and a great lordship was bought for him in the neighbourhood of his sovereignty of Neufchatel<sup>k</sup>; yet when the court intended to have passed into Normandy, there appeared such a backwardness in the people, that it was laid aside. Things went just at the same rate with the parliament, who affected to cancel or to limit edicts, just as they suited with their designs. Mazarine spoke high of the royal authority, confuted their reasons, negociated all the time, and at length complied<sup>l</sup>. The duke of Anjou had a severe fit of sickness, from which even the best judges thought it very doubtful whether he could recover<sup>m</sup>. He was beginning to amend when the king fell sick, which quickly appeared to be the small-pox<sup>n</sup>, which threw the whole nation into disorder. The cardinal negociated, and made presents; but, if what he feared had taken effect, it is highly probable that most of his resources thus purchased would have failed him. Charles prince of Wales, and very soon after James duke of York, sons to the unfortunate king of Great Britain, were then at the French court with their mother, which gave it an air of splendor and magnificence, and which gave the flatterers of those times an opportunity of stiling Paris the asylum of princes<sup>o</sup>; we shall see it the very next year expelling their own. At Munster things took a new turn; the plenipotentiaries closed with the proposals made on the part of Spain; the prince of Orange, now grown old, and worn out with fatigue and diseases, no longer opposed a separate peace<sup>p</sup>: some say that he was wrought upon by arguments, others, that the Spaniards made the princefs of Orange fenfible of their liberality in a very high degree; to which it is added, that Mazarine, after repeated promifes, forgot to fend her a pair of rich diamonds, which gave her very great offence<sup>a</sup>. The queen-regent, Anne of Austria, whom experience had taught to judge of affairs better than in times past, grew apprehenfive of that ill temper which appeared in the parliament; and of that complaisance which was natural to a minifter, and now likely to increafe, fince he had fent for a nephew and three nieces<sup>r</sup> out of Italy, with an intent to eftablifh them in the kingdom: a circumftance which heightened the averfion the people had conceived againft him, and at the fame time made him more and more defirous of purfuing what he would have ftiled moderate counfel, though in reality he facrificed the interefts of the ftate, and made ufe of the wealth wrung from the people to bribe thofe who pretended to pity and protect them.

Sources of the troubles in the court, and of cardinal Mazarine's apprehensions.

<sup>d</sup> REINCOURT Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. Memoires de Puysegur, p. 260. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. i. p. 399. <sup>e</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. 80. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. p. 42. <sup>f</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. p. 76. <sup>g</sup> Idem ibid. p. 82. <sup>h</sup> Memoires chronologiques & historiques. <sup>i</sup> AUBERI, Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine, tom. i. p. 379. <sup>k</sup> Memoires politiques de du Mont. <sup>l</sup> Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. iv. <sup>m</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. p. 52. <sup>n</sup> AUBERI, Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine, tom. i. p. 376. <sup>o</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. i. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. <sup>p</sup> Negociations secretes de Munster & d'Osnauburg, tom. iv. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii.

A. D. 1647.

The parliament moved rather by ambition than public fpirit to fall on the minifter at this time.

THIS year is the moft important of all the regency; but the events are fo various and fo complicated, that, in order to render them intelligible, we muft alter our method, and begin with the difputes between the parliament and the minifter. It was at this juncture the cardinal became odious; he deferved it afterwards, but then he was refpected and triumphant. If he continued the war, it was becaufe he durft not make peace; the great taxes he levied were abfolutely requifite to fupply the exigencies of the government; and, if there was any mifapplication in the finances, it was owing to Monsieur and the prince of Condé, the former having a paffion to fquander, the latter rapacious, and both taking what they pleafed. This difpofition gained them friends, and made the cardinal many enemies. The diftreff of the treasury obliging him to be frugal, which the world ftiled avarice, his modefty was accounted art, and his moderation afcribed to cowardice. At this time there was no room for thefe imputations; he was far from being rich, he was induftrious and indefatigable, he gave every body good words, he was ignorant of the conftitution of France, which made him fometimes too peremptory, and, upon recollection, too compliant. He became afterwards what he was now faid to be; but the parliament was not then in a condition to controul him. The parliament in the preceding year had rendered themfelves popular, by interpofting againft edicts that charged the neceffaries of life with heavy impositions. In order to obtain money, the court created twelve new mafters in the chamber of inquefts; that chamber refufed to receive them; and the parliament began to avow their doctrine, that, during a minority, no new charges, or, as we ftile them, offices, could be created<sup>s</sup>. New incidents fell in; the court forbade the chambers to affemble, and they affembled, notwithstanding this prohibition<sup>t</sup>. It is ftrange, but it is true, that the queen was for firm meafures<sup>u</sup>, the minifter for mild ones. The reafon is not hard to find; the latter had more to fear than the former. The firft prefident was in the intereft of the court at the beginning; but, feeing reafon to doubt whether he fhould be fufained, began to trim, which enabled the parliament to go<sup>w</sup> greater lengths. Thefe domeftic difputes had a ftrong influence on foreign affairs; it raifed the drooping fpirits of the Spaniards, it encouraged the Dutch to perfift in their new maxims, it difabled the minifter from purfuing the war with vigour, at the fame time that it took from him the power of making a good general peace. Thus, which has alfo happened elfewhere, thofe who complained loudeft were the caufers of what they complained againft.

The excellent conduct of the vifcount Turenne obliges the imperialifts to conclude the treaty of Munfter.

MARSHAL Turenne having, in the fpring, joined the Swedes under general Wrangel, refolved to attack the imperialifts under the command of general Melander and the duke of Wirtemberg; and they, on the other hand, paffed the Danube, in order to avoid fighting, if poffible; but the marshal, paffing that river at Laufinghen, purfued them with fuch violence, that he came up with, engaged, and beat a part of the army, where general Melander was killed. But the duke of Wirtemberg, with twelve hundred horfe, and two battalions of foot, occupied a meadow, and defended themfelves fo well, that they prevented an intire defeat. This is called the battle of Zufmarhaufen, or Summerhaufen<sup>x</sup>, fought on the 17th. of May, in which the imperialifts loft four thoufand men, ten pieces of cannon, and the greateft part of their baggage. As a proof of their victory, the French and Swedes befieged Rain, a little town not far from Augsburgh, which quickly furrendered. Upon this the old elector of Bavaria found himfelf obliged to quit his dominions, and to retire to Saltzburgh<sup>y</sup>. The victorious army gained thereby the advantage of plundering and raifing contributions as far as the river Inn; which was an inexpressible advantage, fince it enabled the marshal not only to fubfift, but to enrich his troops, who would otherwife have been forced to difperfe for want of pay. In Bohemia, another body of Swedes, under the command of the count Coningsmark, plundered a

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. p. 403—406.

<sup>r</sup> AUBERT, Hiftoire du Cardinal Mazarine.

<sup>s</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, Amfterdam, 1731, tom. i. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. iv.

<sup>t</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. p. 108.

<sup>u</sup> Hiftoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. iv.

<sup>w</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. iv.

<sup>x</sup> QUINCY, Hiftoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. Hiftoire du Vicomte de Turenne.

<sup>y</sup> Hiftoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. v. p. 268.

a part of the city of Prague, and acquired thereby an immense booty ; so that, under this dismal distress, and wearied by the representations of the elector of Bavaria, who threatened to quit the imperialists in earnest and for ever, the peace that had been so long negotiating was at length concluded<sup>2</sup>, in spite of all the measures taken by Spain to prevent it ; and therefore, before we continue the progress of the war in other parts, we will clearly and concisely represent the nature and consequences of this peace with respect to France.

We have before observed, that the Spaniards and the Dutch began to have a good understanding about two years after the conferences began, which was in some measure owing to the advances made by the Spanish plenipotentiaries, but chiefly to the mistakes of the French, though they were all of them great men. The duke of Longueville, whose sovereignty of Neuchâtel ran continually in his head, talked of nothing but sovereignty ; and shewed such an aversion for preserving the rights and liberties of the cities and lordship of Alsace, as gave the ministers of the republic a terror of having France for her neighbour. Mr. d'Avaux, a wise and moderate minister, made as strange a mistake when he passed through Holland into Germany : after several conferences with the chief persons of the republic, he thought it became him, after the example of the president Jeanin, to recommend in very warm terms their catholic subjects to the states general. The difference of the times, and the difference of the language, gave these harangues very different effects ; the former was well received, and the latter was very ill taken, and gave the states a very bad impression of the best of the French ministers. As for Mr. Servien, who had the cardinal's secret, he had also a great deal of the cardinal's manner ; he talked and wrote very plausibly, but his meaning could seldom be ascertained. There was great vivacity in his reasoning, his periods were perfectly well turned, and his conclusion seemed to follow his premises, but then they were not distinctly expressed. He drove the cardinal's project, for exchanging Catalonia and Roussillon against the Low Countries and the Franche Comté, very warmly with the Spaniards, who communicated all his propositions constantly to the Dutch. This alarmed them exceedingly ; and if they still carried on the war, and continued to negotiate in concert with France, it was in appearance only ; and the proposal of giving the marquisate of Antwerp to the prince of Orange, instead of gaining him, lost the states. The Spaniards, who had granted them very good terms, under the notion of a truce, offered to convert this project into a stable peace, which was accepted ; and the concurrence of France being demanded for form's sake, and to preserve an apparent regard for treaties, was, without that concurrence, signed on the 30th of January, which the Spaniards looked upon as a great point gained, and was a favourable precedent also for the emperor's making a like treaty with the Swedes.

THE treaty of Osnaaburg, which settled the affairs relative to the protestants, was signed on the 6th of August ; that of Munster on the 24th of October. The last victories of marshal Turenne, and the dexterity with which he had reconciled himself to the Swedes, did more towards rendering this important negotiation favourable to France, than either the arts of the cardinal, or the address of the plenipotentiaries. To say the truth, this treaty could not have been more favourable, or more honourable. The supreme seignory of the bishopricks of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and of the town of Moyenvic, were yielded to the French crown ; the emperor and the empire made also a cession of their rights on Pignerol, as also on Brisac, the landgraviate of the Upper and Lower Alsace, the Sundgau, and the provincial prefecture of the ten imperial cities in Alsace ; besides this, the king was allowed to have a garrison in Philipsburgh, and no new fortresses were to be erected between that and Bale. These were vast accessions in point of power and territory, and yet these apparent advantages were nothing in comparison of the benefits derived to France from the influence which this treaty created. The liberty of the empire was secured, the balance between the two religions settled, and all this seemed to be ascribed to France, and was to depend upon her for support. The Swedes had dominions given them in the empire, which was in effect attaching them for ever to France, and a free entrance into Germany secured to both these crowns ; so that the great project of Richelieu, with respect to abasing and constraining the power of the house of Austria in Germany, was most effectually executed ; and though this may seem to be contradicted by the last period of our history of this reign, yet if the reader will consider that this was intirely owing to the ill conduct of France, or more probably of Mr. Louvois, who, quitting the amiable influence of a protector, and introducing the tyrannical severity of a conqueror, drove all the states of the empire to support the house of Austria in her endeavours to maintain her own rights and theirs, we shall see that matter in its true light, and be convinced that the great advantages gained by this treaty were sacrificed for a time by the boundless ambition of Lewis XIV. and the natural brutality of that minister's temper. But, in our own times, we have seen the spirit of this treaty revive, and French armies in the heart of the empire, invited a thither by German princes.

<sup>2</sup> Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. v. Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. i. par. i. p. 450.

The campaign in Italy and in Catalonia, during the perplexed situation of France at home.

BUT, to leave this political digression, and to return to the history of the war: the marquis de Navailles, who had maintained his quarters upon the Po till joined by the marshal du Plessis Praslin and the duke of Modena, advanced with the army of the allies to attack that of Spain, intrenched under the command of the marquis de Carracena, upon the Oglia; which intrenchments, chiefly by his good conduct and gallant example, were forced, and the Spaniards obliged to retire to Cremona, with considerable loss, on the 30th of June<sup>f</sup>. In consequence of this victory, they besieged Cremona<sup>g</sup>; but, not having troops enough to invest so large a place, and some differences arising amongst the generals, they were constrained to raise it. The revolt of Naples, which the duke of Guise had excited, and managed with the wisdom of a statesman and the valour of a hero, came<sup>h</sup> to nothing, for want of the smallest support, which cardinal Mazarine suffered to be imputed to his dislike to the duke, and to a variety of suspicions he was supposed to conceive, in order to conceal the real cause, which was, that he had not wherewithal to support him. The duke, being taken prisoner by the Spaniards<sup>i</sup>, availed himself with great ability of the current opinion, and saved his life by avowing himself an enemy to France; upon which he was sent into Spain, where he no sooner arrived, than the cardinal, in his turn, avowed, that he had done nothing but by command and under the authority of the French court<sup>k</sup>, that he might no longer be considered as a prisoner of state, but as a prisoner of war. In Catalonia the marshal du Schomberg commanded, though the cardinal, by a strain of ambition not very consistent with that moderation which he affected, had given the title of viceroy to his brother the cardinal archbishop of Aix, who died when on the point of entering on the administration. The marshal, who had but a small army, invested Tortosa on the 4th of July, and, on the approach of Don Francisco de Melos, advanced to give him battle; which he declining, in consequence of express orders from his court, the marshal returned to the siege, and, finding the breach practicable, made a general assault, and took the place by storm on the 10th of the same month<sup>l</sup>. This was a desperate and bloody affair; for not only the garrison, and a great part of the inhabitants, were put to the sword, but the bishop, with a half-pike in his hand, with several priests and monks about him, was found lying dead on the breach. With this conquest ended the campaign. The count de Harcourt, who knew that Schomberg was no favourite, very generously told the minister, that, though Lerida was a stronger place, yet Tortosa was the more important conquest of the two; and that it was very extraordinary that Schomberg, in worse circumstances than any of his predecessors, should, by his courage and conduct, achieve so great an enterprize, when even the few friends he had at court would have thought him very happy, if, at the close of the year, he had put the handful of troops he commanded into winter quarters without loss.

The sieges of Ypres and Courtrai, the battle of Lens, and the taking of Furnes.

THE prince of Condé commanded in the Low Countries, having with him the marshals de Grammont and Rantzau; and, after some deliberation, he caused Ypres to be invested, and prosecuted the siege with great vigour<sup>m</sup>. The archduke presented himself before his lines with a fine army, but found them so well fortified, that he did not attempt to force them. The prince, being delivered from this, met with no other extraordinary difficulty, so that on the 28th of May he became master of the place, after twenty-eight days open trenches<sup>n</sup>. In the mean time the archduke attacked Courtrai<sup>o</sup>, a much smaller place indeed, but of greater importance. The governor, Mr. Pallvau, served in quality of lieutenant-general in the army of the prince of Condé, and had conducted the greatest part of his garrison to the siege of Ypres, so that the town was taken by assault, and the castle surrendered soon after. This disgrace was followed by another; marshal Rantzau formed the project of surprising Ostend<sup>p</sup>; but, instead of succeeding, the troops, which were the best in the French army, were made prisoners of war. The archduke likewise reduced Furnes; and the Flemings, to whom this good fortune was new, spoke of the French army with contempt, because its motions were conducted with more than usual caution. The true reason of this was, that the prince, being informed Monsieur had gained a great ascendancy in the queen's council, thought it for his interest to make a tour to court, where, however, his stay was not long<sup>q</sup>. On his return, he resolved to take the first opportunity of fighting; and, having received intelligence that the archduke was marching towards Lens, he directed his route thither, though his army did not consist of more than fourteen thousand men. He entered the plain, in which that place was situated, on the 19th of August, where he had the mortification of seeing Lens taken by

<sup>f</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i.

Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

Motteville, tom. ii. p. 165.

Louis XIV.

Histoire de Conde.

Louis XIV.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires du Duc de Guise.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires du Duc de Guise.

<sup>i</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, p. 265.

<sup>j</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, p. 266, & suiv.

<sup>k</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. p. 269, 273.

<sup>l</sup> Memoires du Duc de Navailles, liv. i. p. 73.

<sup>m</sup> Memoires de Madame de

QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de

<sup>n</sup> REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i.

<sup>o</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de

- a assault. He persisted, nevertheless, in his resolution of fighting; and accordingly attacked the enemy the next day, himself commanding the right, the marquis de Chatillon the main body, and marshal Grammont the left wing, of the army. At the beginning the Spaniards had very much the advantage, several officers of distinction being killed and taken; but the prince, making a new disposition, and attacking with great vigour, gained a complete victory, though the archduke distinguished himself extremely in respect to conduct<sup>r</sup> as well as courage. The Spaniards had about four thousand men killed, and as many taken; they lost upwards of thirty pieces of cannon, and as many standards and colours. On the 21st of August Lens was retaken; and, on the 10th of the succeeding month, Furnes, where the prince of Condé was wounded in the thigh; after which, both armies separated, and went into winter quarters, the
- b success of the campaign being rather of more consequence at home than abroad.

THE campaign was almost as warm at court as in the field, and the minister was more indebted for his safety to the queen's fortitude than his own. The duke of Beaufort made his escape out of the castle of Vincennes<sup>r</sup>. The parliament, by an arret, established an union with all the sovereign courts, in order to deliberate on the king's edicts. This was annulled by an edict of the council of state, which likewise forbade their assembling, in pursuance of the former edict, but it had no effect<sup>s</sup>. On the 14th of July the parliament, by an arret, discharged all the intendants throughout the kingdom<sup>t</sup>, and ordered them to be prosecuted for their oppressions, which edict the queen was obliged to confirm by a declaration. On the last day of the same month the king held a bed of justice, revoked certain edicts, and forbade the parliament to assemble. The chambers met the next day, in contempt of the royal authority: in this assembly the parties first took the names, reciprocally thrown by way of reproach, of Mazarins and Frondeurs. The cardinal, finding that all concessions were vain, and only furnished new pretensions, resolved to have recourse to bolder measures; and, on the 26th of August, when Te Deum was solemnly performed at Notre Dame for the victory gained at Lens, caused the president Blancmenil, and counsellor Broussel<sup>u</sup>, to be arrested; which was done with great difficulty, and threw the whole city of Paris into confusion, all the entries of the streets being chained, and the barricades renewed. The queen and the whole court remained in terrible apprehensions all night: the next day the storm rose higher, and the queen was obliged to promise the prisoners should be set at liberty<sup>v</sup>. She made a kind of escape soon after out of Paris to Rouel, with the king; she retired from thence to Fontainebleau, and at length to St. Germain. The cardinal attributed to them, though without any direct evidence, the ill temper of the parliament, banished Mr. Chateaufort; and, having caused Chavigni to be arrested, sent him prisoner to Havre-de-Grace, which served only to raise a new storm<sup>w</sup>. The parliament persisted in and augmented its pretensions; at court there were infinite intrigues and miseries, without giving her any real assistance. The cardinal was constrained to recall Chavigni<sup>x</sup>. The parliament mistook their point, and treated the minister as the sole author of these confusions, who in reality had the least share in them, and was more disposed to an accommodation than any body else. They excluded him from all conferences; and yet it was in virtue of his advice that things were compromised by the king's declaration of the 24th of October<sup>y</sup>, which was verified by the parliament of Paris. By this ten millions were remitted in the tailles, two millions in the duties of entry; and, which was of the greatest importance, it was provided, that every French subject, charged with any crime of state, should stand intitled to a legal trial, according to the ordinary forms of justice. In order to gain a greater strength to the court, titles were very liberally bestowed; the duchy of Roban was revived in favour of Monsieur Chabot, who had married the heiress. Cœuvres was erected into a duchy, by the name of Estrees, in favour of that marshal. The county of Guiche was likewise erected into a duchy, by the title of Grammont; as the county of Tresines also was by the name of Gesvres<sup>z</sup>. The abbe de la Riviere, who governed the duke of Orleans, and who had been promised a hat from Rome, was admitted into the council<sup>a</sup>, to qualify his disappointment which arose from the prince of Condé; and thus, by the end of the year, things seemed to be pacified, though in reality there was scarce any body contented; for when men rise without merit, they are never contented with their places, because there is no more reason they should rest so low, than mount so high.

THIS artificial calm did not last long; the parliament, under pretence of infractions, began to resume their meetings, in which all things were conducted according to the old method. The parliament declare the minister a

<sup>r</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. de Rochefoucault, p. 152. <sup>s</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. <sup>t</sup> Memoires <sup>u</sup> Idem ibid. liv. ii. <sup>v</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. ii. p. 12. <sup>w</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, Amsterdam, 1738, p. 10, 11. <sup>x</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. <sup>y</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. liv. ii. p. 153. <sup>z</sup> Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. v. <sup>a</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. liv. ii. p. 165. <sup>b</sup> L'Etat de France, tom. ii. p. 307—309. <sup>c</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i.

disturber of the public peace, and an enemy to the kingdom, but at length incline to peace.

The better part of the assembly knew not by whom, or by what spirit, they were governed; a abundance of great lords were discontented; they wanted power, they wanted places, that is, b fortresses, where they might act like sovereigns; they wanted vast appointments; and yet, with all these private views, they instigated their partisans to declare loudly their zealous attachment to the public good. The queen saw the disposition of the parliament, and suspected the secret authors of these confusions; but she did not suspect they were so numerous, or of so high quality, as they proved. She exposed her apprehensions to the duke of Orleans and the prince of Condé; she made them sensible how much the monarchy suffered, and how little the king, herself, and the royal family were safe at Paris, notwithstanding all her complaisance at their request. In consequence of these explanations, it was determined to retire, or rather to escape, to St. Germain-en-laye, and it was executed with great secrecy on the 6th of January, at four in the morning<sup>d</sup>. The inhabitants of Paris were strangely astonished when they found the royal family and the princes gone. By degrees they recovered, or rather their fear gave them spirits. On the 8th the parliament, by a solemn arret, declared cardinal Mazarine a disturber of the public peace, and an enemy to the kingdom<sup>e</sup>. In this state of affairs, the concealed chiefs found themselves obliged to declare: the prince of Conti, the dukes of Beaufort, Longueville, Bouillon, and Rochefoucault, with all their adherents, offered their services. The prince of Conti was declared generalissimo, the dukes of Elbœuf and Bouillon, and the marshal de la Motte, generals. But the soul of the party was the coadjutor to the archbishop of Paris, so famous afterwards by the name of the cardinal de Retz, a man of prodigious abilities and prodigious vices. The parliament taxed themselves to raise c an army, and, in the space of six weeks, there was ten times as much money raised and squandered away as the taxes amounted to, which had given the first rise, or rather the first pretence, to these quarrels<sup>f</sup>. The prince of Condé, with an army of between six and seven thousand men, blocked up Paris, where, though the people were not in absolute want of bread, yet they were very near it. The prince of Conti, to give them spirits, occupied Charenton with three thousand men: the prince of Condé, to convince them of their own weakness, caused it to be attacked by the duke de Chatillon, with a very small force; who carried it, after a short dispute, but had the misfortune to be shot through the body<sup>g</sup>, and died with a fairer character than almost any man of his rank that he left behind him. On the signal given by Paris, other parliaments and other provinces revolted, so that the whole d kingdom was in confusion. Volumes have been written upon this subject, for which we can spare only a very few lines. The whole conduct of the malcontents was wild and ridiculous; their troops were beaten as often as they engaged; they refused admittance to an herald<sup>h</sup> sent by the king: they granted audience to a monk who took upon him the character of an agent from the king of Spain. They caught at the distant assistance of the avowed enemies of the kingdom, and they neglected what was absolutely in their power. If they had taken the advice of the duke of Bouillon, the only man with a sound head they had amongst them, and had sent a fourth part of the money they raised to his brother, the marshal de Turenne, whom he had seduced from his duty, he had been enabled to march the army out of Germany to their assistance: for want of this they found themselves under a necessity of making peace, to which e the court was very much inclined.

Noble behaviour of the first parliament, in the conclusion of a peace.

A CONFERENCE was agreed upon at Rouel; the parliament, the princes, and the city of Paris, sent their deputies thither; on the part of the king came the duke of Orleans, the prince of Condé, the cardinal, the chancellor, the marshal de la Meilleraie, the abbe de la Riviere, Mr. le Tellier, and the count de Brienne<sup>i</sup>. The negociation was several times on the point of being broken; the deputies were in terrible apprehensions, if they did not keep close to their instructions; the prince of Condé was excessively warm, and, resenting the hatred the people of Paris had expressed against him, behaved in such a manner, as made him still more hated. On the 11th of March the treaty was concluded<sup>k</sup>; but it was the end of the month before the parliament and the city of Paris consented to and confirmed it. The first f president, Matthew Mole, gained immortal reputation. His colleagues were afraid of signing at Rouel, when, taking the pen, he said, "It is for the public service, and it is our duty to "risque ourselves." At his return, he shewed the same intrepidity against the enemies of peace amongst the princes and the parliament; and, after running infinite hazard there, refused to go out privately, and hide himself from the people. His virtue was respected by the

<sup>d</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. liv. ii. pag. 171.

<sup>e</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. p. 45.

Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. liv. ii. p. 195. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii.

Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. iv. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. iii.

<sup>f</sup> Memoires du Cardinal

de Retz, tom. i. liv. ii. p. 231.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. liv. ii. p. 233—236.

<sup>i</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 38.

<sup>k</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. i. liv. ii.

p. 319, 320, & suiv. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. Memoires de Madame la Duchesse de Nemours, Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii.

populace,

- a populace, and his courage and conduct saved the capital and the kingdom<sup>1</sup>. By this treaty neither party carried their point; the parliament was permitted to assemble, which was what the court would have avoided; the minister was preserved, whom the parliament and people would have destroyed. A general amnesty was granted; and thus a temporary quiet was procured, without any extinction of hatred on either side. The coadjutor of Paris would not be included, as he says, in the amnesty. Cardinal Mazarine asserted, that he was included, not by name indeed, but in the general words. The former affected to shew his intrepidity by this declaration; and the latter, by his construction, expressed his contempt.
- On the side of Germany, at the opening of the present year, there was an army without a war, commanded by marshal Turenne; it was not indeed very numerous, seven or eight thousand men at the most, but it was under very singular circumstances. The troops as good as any then were in Europe, but a kind of mixed body of Swedes, Swiss, German, and Dutch, as well as French, were ill paid, and ready to serve any power that would but tempt them with money. The marshal himself, who had been long solicited by his brother the duke of Bouillon, seeing the times favourable, looking upon himself as ill used, and desirous of supporting the interests of his family, began to intrigue with the officers and soldiers, in hopes of gaining them for the parliament, and thereby rendering them serviceable to his views, or rather to his passion; for it is more than possible that the former were pretences only, and that his affection for the duchess of Longueville was the true motive to his infidelity. This shews of what real consequence it was to a government, that religion and morality should be considered as worthy the attention of persons of the highest rank, since there seems to be no manner of doubt, that, whatever colours might be given them, the troubles of France, which were fatal to the lives of many, the fortunes of more, and the liberties of the whole nation, sprung from the coquetries of half a dozen great ladies, who, with light heads and bad hearts, sacrificed every thing to their pleasures, according to the nature of the sex, who, having forfeited one, seldom respect any other kind of virtue. The minister very well knew the disposition of the army in Germany, and of their chief. He sent his orders, therefore, to general Erlach, to take the best care he could to defeat the marshal's intrigues; and, notwithstanding the extreme distress of the court, sent Hervart, intendant of the finances, with half a million of livres, to support that general's persuasions. This management had so excellent an effect, that, instead of debauching the forces, as he might have done, if the Parisians had furnished him with money, Turenne was obliged to retire, and thought himself happy that he escaped being arrested by them<sup>m</sup>. The Spaniards did not let slip so fair an opportunity; they were early in the field, recovered Xpres by the 8th of May, and St. Venant on the 10th. But the peace of Paris being made, and the troops from Germany arrived, the count de Harcourt also took the field with an army of thirty thousand men, with which he besieged Cambrai<sup>n</sup>. The place was very large, and not well fortified; and it is generally thought that the count would have taken it, but the German troops behaved suspiciously, and suffered a considerable reinforcement to get into the place, upon which the count de Harcourt raised the siege on the 3d of July. Some time after cardinal Mazarine came to the army, but it was not without some apprehensions. He was, however, better received than he expected, and had the same honours paid him that had been formerly paid to cardinal Richelieu, with which he was extremely well satisfied<sup>o</sup>. The army afterwards took Condé, and some other places not worth keeping; and towards the end of August, or the beginning of September, went into winter quarters<sup>p</sup>. On the side of Italy things went very indifferently; the duke of Modena was again forced to come to terms with the Spaniards, and even<sup>q</sup> to take such as they thought fit to prescribe in Catalonia. Don Juan de Garai commanded for his catholic majesty; he rendered himself master of Constantine and other places, and even threatened to besiege Barcelona; but Monsieur Marfin, though able to do nothing else, put this out of his power<sup>r</sup>.
- It was not without some apprehensions, that, after keeping the court in motion all the summer, the cardinal returned with their majesties to Paris in the autumn, where his par- Return of the tisans having whispered that their majesties returned by his advice, the people received him not court to Paris, only with satisfaction, but with joy. But this was far from putting an end to the troubles: the and the first queen found herself very uneasy, being obliged to live in a continual state of dissimulation, the symptoms of the ceiving courteously those who least deserved it, and bestowing favours on such as ought to have revival of the thought themselves happy if they escaped punishment. The duke of Orleans could not resist troubles.
the temptation of becoming popular, or the prince of Condé the continual solicitations of his

<sup>1</sup> Mémoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. iii. Mémoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. dame de Motteville, tom. iii. pag. 201. Mémoires de Gui Joly, tom. i.
 de Louis XIV. Mémoires de Puysegur, pag. 291, 292.
 COURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. Mémoires de Puysegur, p. 304.
 Louis XIV. REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i.
<sup>m</sup> Mémoires de Ma-
<sup>n</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire
<sup>o</sup> Mémoires de Puysegur, p. 300.
<sup>p</sup> REIN-
<sup>q</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de <sup>r</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i.

A D. 1649.
a b c d e
f

sister the duchess of Longueville. It was now that cardinal Mazarine began to alter his measures; and, not having been able to gain the esteem of the French nation by his merit, thought it necessary to obtain an establishment, to make alliances, and to return the compliment they had paid him in plundering his house, and dispersing his library, by squeezing them, and oppressing their liberties, which before were far from his intentions. He had incurred the public hate, while attached sincerely to the public service. To overcome this, he attached himself intirely to his own interest; and, having his passions more at command, and being a greater master of intrigue than any of them, it is no great wonder that he succeeded in this age of intrigues. In the mean time the state, the government, and the royal family, suffered extremely. The war was carried on with disadvantage on every side, and there were less hopes than ever of making a good peace. The Frondeurs were daily gathering strength; the treasury was empty and the people not relieved; the king's household in a great measure cashiered, for want of money to sustain it; and, while private persons were acquiring titles, power, and fortune, by their crimes, the public, who paid for all, was brought to the very brink of ruin: a circumstance the more credible, as it has happened also elsewhere.

The queen causes the princes to be arrested, at which the people of Paris exceedingly rejoice.

A sudden and a great change was brought about, in the beginning of the year, by all those silent and underhand methods that were now grown into fashion, and had in a manner banished candour and sincerity from the court. The prince of Conde, presuming upon his great services, treated every body with an air of haughtiness, that, notwithstanding his power, deprived him gradually of affection and esteem. He had framed to himself a strange notion of assuming absolute power, in an age and country where even legal authority was so far from producing obedience, that it could not secure respect. The manner in which he expressed this fancy united all parties against him. He had excited one of his dependents to make love to the queen<sup>1</sup>, and undertook to prevent the effects of her resentment when she shewed an inclination to chastise him. He opposed the cardinal's marrying his niece into the house of Vendosme, looking upon it as a sign that he was withdrawing himself from his protection<sup>2</sup>. In this situation there was an attempt made to assassinate him in Paris, which he attributed to the Frondeurs, and persecuted them so briskly for it in parliament, that they found the only method of securing safety was his destruction. Upon this motive, the coadjutor, by the interposition of the duchess of Chevreuse, proposed the matter to the queen and to the cardinal, who concurred in it, brought the duke of Orleans to consent, and, which was more, to discard his old favourite the abbé de la Riviere, for fear he should disclose the secret. Things being thus concerted, the prince of Conde, the prince of Conti, and the duke of Longueville, were arrested at council<sup>3</sup>, on the 18th of January, and sent prisoners to the Bois des Vincennes; upon which the people of Paris made bonfires, who had rebelled upon the arresting Brouffell, who was now well received in the queen's circle, and the government of the Bastile confirmed to his son. The duchess of Longueville made her escape, and retired into Normandy<sup>4</sup>; the duke of Bouillon retired into his territory of Turenne; his brother the marshal to Stenai, where he quickly drew together a small force, and entered into a treaty with the Spaniards<sup>5</sup>. By this strange conjunction of the court with the Frondeurs, the cardinal found himself under the necessity of taking the seals from the chancellor Seguier, who was his best friend, and the queen's faithful servant, to give them to his rival Chateaufeuf<sup>6</sup>. When the seals were demanded, the chancellor said, that, as he lost them without imputation, he parted with them without pain.

Insurrections in Normandy, Burgundy, and Guienne, speedily and fully suppressed.

By the imprisonment of the princes, a new civil war commenced, before the old one was quite extinguished. The duchess of Longueville endeavoured to raise Normandy<sup>a</sup>; friends of the prince were in arms in Burgundy; and Guienne, in consequence of the declaration of the parliament of Bordeaux, was still in a state of disobedience ever since the last broils. The court began first with Normandy, where the very presence of the king brought the people to submit, and obliged the duchess of Longueville to retire by sea into Holland, and from thence to marshal Turenne at Stenai, where, having drawn the flame of rebellion to a head, she had the courage to undertake a journey by land to Bordeaux, where the duke of Bouillon, and her other admirer the prince of Marillac, now become duke of Rocheffoucault, were admitted, with the princess of Conde, and was so lucky as to accomplish it, though she was once taken prisoner in her passage<sup>b</sup>. In Burgundy the troubles were likewise speedily suppressed with little effusion of blood; which, though it afforded the minister some satis-

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de Rocheffoucault. <sup>t</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. ii. liv. ii. p. 53. <sup>u</sup> Memoires de M. Jaques du Saulx, Comte de Tavannes, p. 13. <sup>w</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 71. <sup>x</sup> Memoires de Madame la Duchesse de Nemours, p. 68, 69. <sup>y</sup> Memoires du Gui Joly, tom. i. Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne. <sup>z</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. ii. liv. iii. p. 76. <sup>a</sup> Memoires de Tavannes, p. 36. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. <sup>b</sup> Memoires

a faction, yet this was in a great measure abated by the necessity he was under of being absent from Paris, where the duke of Orleans was left in the hands of the Frondeurs, who, though they had concurred with the cardinal in the imprisonment of the princes, were now negotiating with the duke a reconciliation with those princes, in order to the cardinal's destruction. In this perilous situation he caused the court to set out for Bordeaux, that the presence of the king might encourage the small army under the marshal de la Meilleraie. And it had this effect; for though the dukes of Bouillon and Rockefoucault made a great and gallant resistance, yet the royalists, daily gaining ground, and the cardinal ever pressing better terms than they had reason to expect, the parliament would not have the complaisance to sacrifice themselves and their fellow citizens either to the interest or the caprice of those great men; who no sooner b discerned this, than they concurred in the treaty, and made very good terms for themselves, and, with the prince of Conde, and her young son the count de Anguien, went to pay their respects <sup>c</sup> to the queen. The two dukes had also several conferences with the cardinal, which alarmed the Frondeurs at Paris exceedingly.

In her return to that capital, the queen was afflicted with a fever, occasioned chiefly by the chagrin of the ill treatment she had met with at Bordeaux, notwithstanding the general amnesty which he had granted to all who had been embarked in the revolt; and her distemper <sup>d</sup> was increased, not only by the want of accommodations upon the road, which could not well be greater than they were, but by her displeasure at seeing so great pains taken by the Spaniards to support her rebellious subjects, and carry war into the heart of her dominions, c as the late king and herself had done into theirs; and, which was worst of all, that this was attended with so great success, as to find almost as little duty and respect in her capital as she had met with in Bordeaux. The cardinal met with the same, or rather with worse treatment; the Frondeurs had in a great measure gained the duke of Orleans, and were at the same time treating with the princes on a proposition that the prince of Conde <sup>e</sup> should marry the daughter of the duchess of Chevreuse; for the intrigues of a few women continued to be in reality the sources of those disturbances that distracted the state. In outward appearance, however, things passed quietly enough; the duke of Orleans, the keeper of the seals, the coadjutor, all paid their respect to the minister, who made them returns of the like kind, as being no stranger to their real sentiments, or to those of the duke of Beaufort, though he had procured for his father the duke of Vendosme the queen's resignation of the superintendance of d navigation and the marine, with the survivance in favour of this duke, though his youngest son, who could not prevail upon himself to be grateful at the expence of his popularity <sup>f</sup>. In such a state of things, the minister, after mature reflection, resolved to leave Paris and the court, in order to go to the army of the marshal du Plessis Praslin, on the frontier, with a view to revive the spirits of the soldiers, and mortify the malecontents, who had given evident marks of satisfaction; and marshal Turenne advancing so near to Paris, as to render it necessary to remove the princes, first beyond the Seine, and then to Havre de-grace, it may be, he thought it safer also to trust himself with an army commanded by a person <sup>g</sup> in whom he could confide, than in a city full of intrigues, where those who managed them were capable of any thing that might contribute to their own interests. But, before we speak of the transactions that followed his arrival in the army of the marshal, it will be necessary to speak of the progress of the war during this campaign.

THE domestic affairs of France being in this disorder, it may be easily conceived that the crown was in no condition to furnish the necessary supplies on all sides, and that of consequence those at the greatest distance suffered most. In Italy, Portolongone, in the island of Elbe, which had been taken with so much difficulty and expence, was surrendered to the Spaniards on the 15th of August, after a siege of forty-seven days <sup>h</sup>. In Catalonia things went still worse; the duke de Mercœur, who had the title of viceroy, after having caused count Marfin to be arrested, who was in the interest of the prince of Conde, made himself master f of Salces; but when the Spanish army was formed, they quickly made them sensible of their superiority, by recovering Flix, Tortosa, Balaguer, and several other places <sup>i</sup>. In Lorrain, the count de Ligni recovered several places <sup>k</sup> for the duke, till at length he received a severe check from the marquis Ferte Senneterre. But what made the greatest impression was, the attack made on the frontier by the Spanish army under the command of the archduke Leopold, the marquis de Fuensaldagna, and the marshal Turenne, whose intrigues had reduced him to the necessity of serving as a lieutenant general in a foreign service against the crown of France,

After all these successes, the cardinal is compelled to withdraw, and the queen is left in great distress.

Misfortunes Italy and in Catalonia, and defeat of the Spaniards and rebels at Rhétel.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. Memoires de Tavannes.

Brienne, tom. iii. p. 84. 87. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i.

Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. iv.

Memoires de Tavannes.

Louis XIV. tom. i. Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

XIV. <sup>k</sup> Memoires du Marquis de Beauvau, p. 98.

<sup>d</sup> Memoires du Comte de

<sup>e</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. Me-

<sup>f</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. ii. liv. iii. Me-

<sup>g</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de

<sup>h</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis

after all the honours and rewards he had received. To this army La Catelet surrendered on the 15th of June, after a very gallant defence. The archduke advanced to Guise, and invested it; but the marshal du Plessis Praslin obliged him to raise the siege on the 1st of July. This did not hinder Monsieur de Turenne from taking la Capelle on the 3d of August<sup>1</sup>. It was from thence that he advanced with a body of four thousand horse, in order to deliver the princes out of the Bois des Vincennes; in which he had certainly succeeded, if he had not been betrayed by those about him<sup>m</sup>. Monzon surrendered to the Spaniards on the 6th of November; the marshal du Plessis Praslin, with his army, which did not consist of above fifteen thousand men, covered Rheims<sup>n</sup>. When cardinal Mazarine came to the army, he had determined upon the siege of Rhetel. As he was a man of a singular turn, he left the minister behind him; and whereas at court he was civil, but reserved, difficult of access, and sparing to a great degree, he was quite another man in the camp. He kept three or four open tables, conversed familiarly with the officers, and took great care of the private men. As a proof of this, he brought with him from Paris shoes and warm waistcoats, which he caused to be distributed amongst them, and bestowed small but frequent liberalities in money. Rhetel surrendered on the 15th of December, the weather being very severe. The army taking winter quarters in the adjacent villages on the 14th, the enemy, commanded by Don Estevan de Gomara, and marshal Turenne, attacked them the next morning; and, after a warm engagement, they were intirely beaten<sup>o</sup>. Monsieur de Turenne with great difficulty escaped into a wood; the Spaniards lost four thousand men, and some of their best officers. Don Estevan de Gomara was taken prisoner, with eight pieces of cannon, and many standards and colours<sup>p</sup>. This victory, gained under the eye at least of the minister, one would have thought might have done him some honour even with the people of Paris; but, at his return, he found them generally indisposed towards him, tho' Te Deum was sung; yet, except in the queen's palace, there were little or no rejoicings<sup>q</sup>.

Cardinal Mazarine is compelled for the first time to retire out of the kingdom.

THE new year began with new troubles. The duke of Orleans could not be without a favourite; and, though he had himself better sense than any of those in whom he confided, and executed well even their bad designs, yet he would never act without advice, or trust himself with his own concerns. He loved power, he affected independency; he had it in as great a degree at this time as he could desire; and he might have kept it, and have restored the tranquillity of France, if, closing sincerely with the queen and her minister, he had demanded peremptorily the marriage of the king with mademoiselle. It is true, the queen was averse to it; but the cardinal thought it a right measure, if the duke could be prevailed on to act steadily. But he was now in the hands of the coadjutor, who, finding the minister not inclined to procure him a hat from Rome, pushed the duke of Orleans to secure his authority another way. The majority of the parliament were bent upon releasing the princes; the duchess of Chevreuse had treated with the duke of Orleans, and concerted three points, that the duke of Anguien should marry his youngest daughter, that the prince of Conde should marry her daughter, and Monsieur de Chateaufort should be raised to the dignity of prime minister. But, after all, even this party were more inclined to the cardinal, who was totally ignorant of their intrigue. The duke de Rochefoucault went often to him, hinted in ambiguous terms his danger, and pressed him to preserve himself by setting at liberty the princes<sup>r</sup>. Upon this occasion we discern not, in any of the memoirs, the arts of a consummate politician in the cardinal's conduct. He refined so much, and delayed so long, that at length all parties formed a league against him, and attacked him with such force, that he saw himself under the necessity of retiring. He found indeed the new marshals, Monsieur d'Aumont, Monsieur de la Ferte Imbault, stiled marshal d'Estampes, and Monsieur de Ferte Senneterre, called marshal de la Ferte, who, together with the count de Grancey, had the baton given them after the battle of Rhetel, full of professions of affection and esteem; but he durst not think of raising a civil war in the capital of France. On the 6th of February, not before he was in imminent danger, he quitted the palace, and went directly to Havre-de-grace, where it is thought he meant to make the princes sensible of his being the author of their freedom; but in this he was disappointed; for they, knowing he was forced to it; treated him civilly, but without making any great professions<sup>s</sup>. In the mean time the queen was in a miserable situation; the duke of Orleans consulted with the coadjutor about taking the king from her, shutting her up in a

<sup>1</sup> REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. Memoires historiques & chronologiques. Vicomte de Turenne.

<sup>m</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne. <sup>n</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, pag. 308, 309. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV.

<sup>o</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 86.

<sup>p</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne.

<sup>r</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. ii. liv. iii. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. iv. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. Memoires de Rochefoucault, Memoires de Madame la Duchesse de Nemours.

<sup>s</sup> Memoires du Card. de Retz, tom. ii. liv. ii. p. 187—203.

convent,

a convent, or assuming to himself the government under the title of the king's lieutenant general. Her former escape from Paris had made the people so jealous of her, that she was for a month imprisoned in her palace, and her authority, her rank, and even her sex, so little respected, that at midnight she was forced to let the mob come into her apartments, and draw the king's curtains, that they might see he was in bed and asleep<sup>1</sup>. This continued till the arrival of the princes, when the parliament ordered a process against the minister, and, by an arret, excluded all foreigners from being of the king's council, and all cardinals, even tho' they were natives of France<sup>2</sup>. The prince of Conde, finding himself without any rival since the retreat of the cardinal, and his own union with the duke of Orleans, thought himself at liberty to dispense with the Frondeurs; and though the duchess of Chevreuse had generously returned him the promise he had signed while in prison, as to the marriage of her brother with his daughter, that it might appear to be a matter of choice, he, by a strange stretch of power, compelled the queen to make a shew of forcing him to break the marriage. This induced the duchess of Chevreuse, the princess palatine, and even the coadjutor, to make a short turn; and, after all that had passed, to offer their services to the queen, whom, from humour, pride, or resentment, the prince of Conde continued to persecute with unrelenting severity, and, tho' contrary to the natural turn of his own temper, he was supported therein by the duke of Orleans<sup>3</sup>.

THE cardinal, after traversing the bishoprick of Liege, had retired to Bruell, at some distance from Sedan; and from thence not only carried on a regular correspondence with the queen, but with the heads of all the different parties, who conspired together in abusing and treating with him at the same time<sup>4</sup>. The coadjutor, finding himself slighted by the prince of Conde, and being assured of his hat by the cardinal, entered with the same violence into the intrigues for bringing back, as he had shewn in those for excluding him the court, proposing, in some councils, the arresting, or, if necessary, putting to death<sup>5</sup>, the prince of Conde. The queen was much better advised; she recalled, at the desire of the prince, Mr. Chavigni, that she might persuade the parliament of her having no intentions to recall the cardinal. She likewise dismissed Le Tellier, Servien and de Leonne, purely because the prince asserted they were friends to Mazarine<sup>6</sup>: but, perceiving that the prince was not softened by these concessions, she, by the advice of the Frondeurs, sent the count de Brienne, secretary of state, with an accusation against him, to the parliament, where, though he had consented to the measure, and corrected the charge with his own hand, the duke of Orleans sent another paper in his justification, to which the parliament gave their sanction<sup>7</sup>. The queen, however, finding she had acquired a greater strength, resolved to exert it, took the seals from Chateaufeuf, and gave them to the first president<sup>8</sup> Mole. This was in the month of August; but, finding she was not able to support him, she took the seals back, and returned them to the old chancellor Seguier. By a strange mixture of passions, the ambition of Chateaufeuf taught him humility, inasmuch that he promised the queen all things; and the cardinal likewise, if he might be restored to favour. In consequence of this, upon the king's being declared major, on the 7th of September, he was raised to the object of all his intrigues, the post of prime minister<sup>9</sup>, and the seals again given to the first president. Upon this, against his own inclinations, and determined by the persuasions of his sister the duchess of Longueville, the prince of Conde raised a new civil war, by retiring into his government of Guienne, which he had exchanged with the duke of Espenon for Burgundy. He was joined by the dukes de Rochefoucault, de Beaufort, de Nemours, de Richelieu, the prince of Tarentum, the marquis de la Force, and Mr. de Marfin, who brought him the troops that should have defended Catalonia. The court did not leave him much time to collect his strength, but, advancing to Bourges, Mr. Chateaufeuf prevailed upon the inhabitants to quit the party of the prince, and to receive their majesties<sup>10</sup>. The count de Harcourt commanded the army that was to oppose the prince of Conde; and in this embarrassed state of affairs the queen invited cardinal Mazarine, who was now at Cologne, to come and join the court at Poitiers; which so inflamed the parliament, otherwise well enough disposed, that, by an arret of the 29th of December, they proscribed that minister, and offered a reward of fifty thousand crowns<sup>11</sup> to any who would take him alive or dead, to be paid by the sale of his own library and effects. The Spaniards A. D. 1651.

<sup>1</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. iv. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. <sup>2</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. ii. liv. iii. p. 204. <sup>3</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. iv. <sup>4</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>5</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. ii. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 85, 86. <sup>6</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 85, 86. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. <sup>7</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. p. 79. <sup>8</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 107. <sup>9</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 80. Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. ii. liv. iii. <sup>10</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. ii. liv. ii. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. <sup>11</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. p. 221.

had by this time subdued almost all Catalonia, and blocked up Barcelona; they recovered likewise several places in the Low Countries; and might have done much more, if they had confided solely in their arms, instead of entering into treaties with the malecontents, by which they promised them vast succours, and lavished immense sums to all parties, not out of any particular regard to this or that, but because they thought, that, whatever contributed to the confusion of France, must be beneficial to Spain.

After much insincerity and trimming, the duke of Orleans and the parliament declare against the crown.

CARDINAL Mazarine, escorted by six thousand men, commanded by Hocquincourt, lately made marshal of France, came to Poitiers, surrounded<sup>f</sup> by a croud of gallant officers, to whom he had given governments on the frontiers, and who had remained ever firmly attached to his service. He had likewise detached the duke of Bouillon, and his brother the viscount de Turenne, and taken thereby the best head and the best heart they had, from the malecontents. The parliament continued to act the same strange part as they had done for some time past, that is, they endeavoured to accommodate themselves to all parties, which did not give them the confidence so much as of one. They had verified the queen's edict, by which she declared the prince of Conde guilty of high treason. They set a price upon the cardinal's head; and formed a process against marshal Hocquincourt, for that protection he had given him<sup>g</sup>. The duke of Orleans acted the very same part; he had on many occasions declared in strong terms for the royal authority, and yet towards the close of January he concluded a treaty with the prince of Conde<sup>h</sup>, but at the same time reserved a liberty of conferring and living in friendship with the coadjutor, who was that prince's mortal enemy. He also brought a corps of troops in the Spanish service into France, which joined those commanded by the dukes of Beaufort and Nemours. Mademoiselle was sent by her father to Orleans, and had the good fortune to engage that city to declare for the princes by her presence solely; but to shew the true complexion of the public spirit that prevailed in this age, she immediately gave the queen mother to understand that she was not implacable, and that a person of her great talents and influence might be purchased at no higher price than that of the crown of France; and, in short, that she expected to espouse the king<sup>i</sup>.

The king and court twice saved from rebels by the courage and conduct of marshal Turenne.

As strange as this might appear, she might possibly have brought it to pass, and that by force of arms; for the surprize of Orleans put the court under so great a difficulty, that they were forced to lodge in the little town of Gergaut, which has a good bridge over the Loire, with a very small number of troops about the king's person. They were scarce arrived, when the duke of Beaufort with his forces took post on the other side, and began immediately to attack the bridge. Marshal Turenne happened to be there, and his presence saved the king and queen; he took two or three hundred men who were there, but who had neither ball nor powder, posted them at the houses joining to the bridge, caused the barrier to be thrown open, and, advancing with his sword drawn, called to his troops, with a loud voice, not to fire till the enemy were close. This astonished the baron de Sirois, who commanded the rebels; and induced him, instead of marching on, to barricade on his side. Marshal Hocquincourt, coming up with the guards, attacked that barricade; and Sirois being killed, his troops were dispersed<sup>k</sup>. The boldness of Turenne, upon this occasion, saved the king and queen from being made prisoners. The dukes of Beaufort and Nemours having quarrelled, the prince of Conde, whose affairs were not in a good situation at Guienne, abandoned his troops there; and, accompanied only by a few friends, made, with infinite trouble and danger, a journey of one hundred and twenty leagues, to put himself at the head of this army on the Loire, where he arrived on the 26th of March. His presence restored order and courage to those troops that wanted both. The marshal Hocquincourt having quartered part of the king's army at Blenau, at too great a distance from the rest under marshal Turenne, the prince, on the 6th of April, attacked them in the night, and carried two quarters; and had infallibly beaten the whole army, and perhaps taken the royal family at Gien, if Monsieur Turenne had not advanced with four thousand foot to his assistance, and taken post on an eminence opposite to a wood. The prince, finding a pretty large aperture, caused his horse to advance through it, in order to attack Monsieur Turenne, whose troops moved slowly, as if they meant to retire. But as soon as a considerable part of the prince's army had passed, the battery, which the marshal had been preparing, fired upon them briskly on the right, while he with his forces attacked them in the front and on the left, so that, after suffering a considerable loss, the prince was obliged to retire<sup>l</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> Idem ibid. p. 223. Memoires de Madame la Duchesse de Nemours, p. 141.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. viii. part i. p. 80.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 138.

<sup>i</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 105. 109. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 104.

<sup>k</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, tom. i. Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. iii. liv. iv. p. 104.

<sup>l</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 145. Memoires de Tavannes, Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. iii. liv. iv. p. 107.

- a THE conduct of the duke of Orleans and of the parliament was of such a nature, that the prince thought it necessary to leave his army, in order to go thither, where, notwithstanding the parliament <sup>m</sup> had declared him guilty of high treason, he was well received. After his departure, marshal Turenne, with marshal Hocquincourt, attempted to surprize the army he had left in the neighbourhood of Estampes, and forced them to take shelter in the neighbourhood of that town, in one quarter of which twelve hundred of their best foot were cut to pieces. The two marshals besieged the rest in Estampes; and had very probably forced them to surrender, if the duke of Lorraine, having received a large sum of money from the Spaniards, had not penetrated into France, and, being acquainted with their distress, marched to their assistance <sup>n</sup>. This so much changed the face of affairs, that marshal Turenne found the king's army in great danger, as being obliged to fight several different corps of a sum of French gold determined his retreat, as the Spanish money had produced his invasion. The prince of Conde, by the interposition of the duke of Roban, negotiated with the court; and afterwards sent deputies to St. Germain's, to revive that negotiation. As the demands made for himself and those of his party were most exorbitant, though the duke of Orleans and himself had over and over assured the parliament that they had nothing in view but the expulsion of a foreign minister, the honour of France, and the ease of the people, who paid taxes both to the king and to the princes, cardinal Mazarine made them public, and took pains to let the world know, that though the first article of their instructions was, that they should have no correspondence with him upon any pretence, yet that was calculated only for the dupes at Paris, since they had made no scruple at St. Germain's of treating with him every day.

- THE prince, finding himself equally disappointed on the side of the parliament and on the side of the court, put himself once more at the head of his troops, which were encamped at St. Cloud, having the river between him and marshal Turenne. But, receiving intelligence that marshal la Ferte was advancing with another army behind him, he found it necessary to march to Charenton, and, having passed the river there, marshal Turenne pressed him so close, that he was constrained to take shelter in the suburb of St. Antoine, where the inhabitants had thrown up some works to secure themselves against their good allies the troops of Lorraine. There, on the 2d of July, happened that famous engagement, of which, from an adjacent eminence, the king himself was spectator, and in which the prince and the viscount performed all that could be expected from the greatest masters in the art of war <sup>o</sup>. By the coming up, however, of the marshal la Ferte, the prince had been ruined, if Broussel, at the command of Mademoiselle, had not fired the cannon of the Bastile on the king's troops, at the same time that the people admitted the prince's forces into the city of Paris, which put an end to the dispute. There were abundance of brave men killed on both sides; amongst the rest, the cardinal lost his nephew. The princes claimed the victory, as they remained in possession of Paris. The use they made of it was terrible; in order to bring all the inhabitants to a submission as absolute as under the league, a general assembly was held at the Hotel de Ville. When they were in the midst of their consultations, they were attacked by an armed mob, who set fire to the gates, forced a passage, massacred some, and ransomed many, that is, made them pay largely for saving their lives, and in this they made no distinction of parties <sup>p</sup>. It was never known how this was brought about, or by whom; but it is very certain, that the prince of Conde might have put a stop to it; that he was applied to, and that he did not. However, on the 10th of July, the parliament declared the duke of Orleans lieutenant general of the kingdom, and the prince generalissimo of the forces for restoring the king to his liberty, who, they said, was deprived of it by cardinal Mazarine <sup>q</sup>. On the last day of the month the king published an edict, transferring the parliament of Paris to Pontoise, where he then was. Most of the presidents and twenty of the counsellors obeyed. The keeper of the seals, at the head of the new parliament, demanded, in very strong terms, of the king, the dismissal and departure of the cardinal. To this a long answer, containing a laboured apology for the minister, was given, concluding, however, with the king's assent. On the 19th of August <sup>r</sup> he set out for Sedan, leaving the affairs of state in the hands of prince Thomas of Savoy, and the army to the command of the viscount de Turenne.

<sup>m</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. iii. liv. iv. p. 108.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 128, 129. Memoires du Duc de Navailles, liv. ii. p. 142, 143. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. ii. p. 15, 16. Memoires de Tavannes, p. 168, & suiv. Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, tom. iv. p. 229. Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. viii. p. ii. p. 35.

<sup>o</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 150. Memoires de Rochefoucault. <sup>q</sup> Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. viii. p. ii. p. 54. <sup>r</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. ii. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 160.

The king, on the retreat of the prince of Conde, enters the capital in triumph.

THE last sedition had lost the princes the hearts of the citizens of Paris; they had only a the dregs of the parliament left, and even what they did in their favour was done by force. But the court, notwithstanding, was under the greatest uneasiness, the Spanish army advancing directly towards Paris. Application was made to the duke of Longueville, to know whether the king's person might be safe in Normandy. The answer was far from being favourable; it was then debated, whether he should retire to Lyons. The army commanded by marshal Turenne consisted but of eight thousand men, and upon this small force depended the fate of the king and kingdom. The councils, in this extremity, were chiefly directed by the duke de Bouillon, who, with all his faults, was perhaps the ablest man of that time. He and his brother rejected these timid measures, as equally unsafe and dishonourable. The marshal, with his small army, advanced to Compeigne, which, in another general, would have b been rash and imprudent. The peculiar talent of this great man was, that he hardly ever failed of judging what effect his motions would produce in the mind of an enemy. He had saved the royal family at Gergaut by a prudent temerity; at Blenau, by his vigilance, he saved them again, by foreseeing that the Spaniards, who had a very high opinion of his discretion, would immediately suspect some mystery. They did so; and the count de Fuensaldagna marched back to cover Flanders, leaving the duke of Lorraine, with an army as strong as the marshal's, to assist the princes. The difficulties of the court did not end here; the duke of Lorraine advanced again towards Paris; the marshal encamped at St. Germain, near Cressy, where he received positive orders from the court to remain, because they were in treaty with the duke of Lorraine, who had promised not to remove. Turenne chose rather to hazard his c head than to trust to his promises, or their orders; and, judging he would attempt to pass the Seine, marched directly to Villeneuve St. George, and thereby disappointed him. He encamped about a league higher, and was joined there by the prince of Conde. There he fortified himself, being much inferior in strength. The prince and duke thought themselves so secure of either beating or starving him, that they began to talk of disposing of governments and the great charges of the crown. In this situation things continued for a month, when Monsieur Turenne, took advantage of the duke and prince being gone to Paris to divert themselves with their mistresses, to march to Corbeil, and thence to Meaux, which he performed without loss, and without being attacked. By this time the royalists were grown so d potent in Paris, that the prince of Conde grew weary of being there, and on the 14th of October * quitted that city, to go and throw himself into the arms of the Spaniards. On the 21st the king **, accompanied by Charles II. entered in triumph into his capital, which the duke of Orleans quitted at the same time. He went directly to the Louvre, and sent an order to Broussel to deliver up the Bastile, on pain of being hanged at the gate. He presently submitted. The next day the king held his bed * of justice, where the parliament verified four declarations; for their own re-union, a general amnesty, a prohibition of their meddling for the future with affairs of state, and the expulsion of three presidents and nine counsellors, amongst whom was Broussel. The coadjutor, now become cardinal de Retz, by outwitting the minister at Rome, delayed paying his respects till the 19th of December, and, after a civil reception, was arrested, and sent prisoner to Vincennes †. He was the head of the faction of the Frondeurs, and with him it ended. It may not be amiss, before we speak of the operations of the war, which still went on, to mention the fate of some of those busy men, who, by their ambition and avarice, excited these troubles. Monsieur de Chateaufort, exiled on the cardinal's first return, broke his heart in his own house at Montrouge; Chavigni died of rage and in despair, insulted by the prince of Conde in his last moments; the duke of Beaufort killed his brother-in-law the duke of Nemours by a pistol shot in the streets of Paris; and the prince of Conti and the duchess of Longueville remained blocked up in Bordeaux ‡, where, some misunderstandings arising between them, they caballed against each other.

The progress of the war in Catalonia, Italy, and in the Low Countries.

In Catalonia, the desertion of count Marfin, in order to carry his troops to the prince of e Conde, lost all that had been acquired with so much blood and treasure. The marshal de la Motte surrendered Barcelona by a capitulation on the 23d of October, together with all that he held in that principality, except Roses; but he obtained honourable terms for the French troops, and the preservation of their privileges for the people. In Italy, Casal was also lost; and it was with much difficulty that the duke of Mantua was prevailed upon to declare himself neuter, and the duke of Savoy hindered from putting himself under the protec-

* Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. pag. 156, 157. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. ii. † Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. iii. p. 234. ‡ Memoires

de Gui Joly, tom. ii. * Idem ibid. p. 39. † Memoires d'Omer Talon, tom. viii. P. ii. p. 106. ‡ Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. i. p. 56, 57. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. pag. 163.

§ Memoires de Mad. de Motteville, Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. ii.

a tion of Spain<sup>a</sup>. In this situation the court offered the crown of Portugal to enter into engagements not to make peace with Spain, but in conjunction with her, provided, in this time of distress, she undertook to advance two millions of crowns in five years, of which eight hundred thousand were to be paid immediately. The Portuguese thought this proposition exorbitant, and complained loudly afterwards of what was the consequence of their hasty judgment<sup>b</sup>. On the side of Flanders, the Spaniards were at liberty to do what they could at least, if not what they pleased. France had no army to oppose, and consequently the governors of their fortresses had no succours to expect. They abandoned Mardyke in the middle of April. The archduke Leopold besieged Graveline with an army of thirty thousand men, which surrendered on the 18th of May, after sixty-nine days open trenches<sup>c</sup>. He next attacked Dunkirk, which b was defended by the marshal d'Estrades. The duke of Vendosme, in quality of high admiral, was ordered to equip a fleet for its relief, which he performed with infinite difficulty, and at a vast expence; but, in the chanel, by the command of Cromwell, he was attacked by the English fleet, and, except three, all the vessels of which it was composed were taken<sup>d</sup>. At that time, it seems, he chose rather to have Dunkirk in the hands of the Spaniards than of the French; he afterwards changed his opinion; however, after thirty-nine days open trenches, the place surrendered on the 16th of September<sup>e</sup>. To these successes they made no doubt of adding the taking winter quarters in Lorraine, the army of the prince of Conde and of the duke of Lorraine consisting of at least twenty-five thousand men.

His highness took Rhetel and Chateau Porcien towards the end of October; about the c middle of November he reduced St. Menehaud, which was a place of importance, and then marched to Bar-le-Duc, in which he committed, according to the opinion of Monsieur Tu- renne, a great fault<sup>f</sup>, that place being strong, and his army much exposed. He had, however, the good fortune to take the greatest part of the garrison in the lower town; so that he was very quickly and unexpectedly master of the place. To these conquests he added those of Ligri, Voyd, and Commerci. Marshal Turenne was by this time arrived with the king's army, not above twelve thousand strong, at Stainville; he passed the Meuse as soon as possible, and pushed the prince of Conde from Voyd to Commerci, from thence to St. Michel, and in six days time to Luxemburgh. His highness had weakened his army by putting his infantry into so many places; the marshal knew this, and pushed him so hard, that he had not time to red cover his force, or to entrench himself. When he had carried his point, the marshal la Ferte, d who commanded in Lorraine, recovered all the places with the troops of his province. At the siege of Bar-le-Duc, cardinal Mazarine arrived in the army, and brought with him a considerable reinforcement out of Picardy; the prince of Conde attempted its relief in vain.
After it was reduced, the army marched into Champagne, and, though in the depth of winter, recovered Chateau Porcien and Vervin: by this means M. Turenne performed his undertaking<sup>g</sup>, that the enemy should take no quarters in France.

As long as cardinal Mazarine remained out of the kingdom, the queen could not apprehend the royal authority was thoroughly established; Mr. de Navailles, therefore, towards the middle of January, was sent with a strong escorte to fetch him from Sedan<sup>h</sup>. When e he drew near the capital, the king, and his brother the duke of Anjou, went to meet him; and he returned with them in the coach, not only without any emotion, but even with visible marks of satisfaction and joy<sup>i</sup>. In order to make this as public as might be, he was invited to dine at the Hotel-de-Ville<sup>j</sup>. The minister managed all this affair with great address; the parliament had mortgaged their own funds during the war; the rents of the Hotel-de-Ville were very ill paid; the cardinal brought a plan with him for regulating these, which was immediately executed. The regularity with which the judges salaries were paid, and the punctual discharge of the citizens annuities, were irresistible proofs of their being mistaken in times past, and that Mazarine was an excellent minister. The keeper of the seals had hitherto executed that employment without quitting the post of first president; but, this f being attended with many inconveniencies, he disposed of the latter to the president Bel- lievre<sup>k</sup>. The coadjutor, though in prison, could not be quiet, and his party still gave the court some apprehensions. Not that he was the hero which he appears in his own memoirs; so far from it, that, when his friends had employed fifty thousand crowns to purchase his

The marshal Turenne, by his address, obliges the enemy to retire into Luxem-burgh and Flanders.

A. D. 1652.

Return of cardinal Maza-rine, and his great application to the restoring regularity in the government.

<sup>a</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 169.

<sup>b</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. i. liv. xv. p. 216. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 140, & suiv.

<sup>c</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de Puysegur.

<sup>d</sup> Lord CLARENDON's History of the Rebellion, HEATH's Chronicle of the Civil Wars of England, LE CLERC, Histoire des Provinces Unies, tom. ii. p. 315.

<sup>e</sup> QUINCY, Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV. CLARENDON's History of the Rebellion, Life of Oliver Cromwell, Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. ii. liv. xv.

<sup>f</sup> Histoire du Prince de Conde.

<sup>g</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, Memoires de Puysegur.

<sup>h</sup> Memoires du Duc de Navailles, liv. ii. p. 151, 152.

<sup>i</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 164, 165.

<sup>j</sup> Histoire du Ministere du Cardinal Mazarine, par GALEAZZO GUALDO, seconde partie, p. 45, 46, 47.

<sup>k</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. ii. liv. xv. p. 25.

liberty, he refused to go out, from a dread of being assassinated by the person who managed a that design<sup>1</sup>. He would even have accepted the offers that were made him for the resignation of his rights to the archbishoprick of Paris, if the remains of his party had not made him ashamed of it. The pope entered warmly into his quarrel, not purely out of respect to him, but out of pique to the court of France, or rather to Mazarine. His holiness was highly offended at the insults offered to a prince of the church, and threatened to send a legate to espouse his cause, and to carry things to extremities. The minister<sup>m</sup> observed, upon this, to the nuncio, that he himself was a cardinal as well as Mr. de Retz; and that the holy father was very calm and undisturbed when the parliament set a price upon his head, in defiance of the royal authority. That illustrious body, not much inclined to be in love with any authority but their own, protested against this measure of the court of Rome, and requested b the king<sup>n</sup> to forbid the legate's entering into his dominions.

The remains of rebellion extinguished in all parts of the kingdom by treaty or by force.

THE sparks of rebellion that still remained in different places were gradually extinguished; Bellegarde, the only place in Burgundy that held for the prince of Conde, had for its governor the count de Bouteville, so famous afterwards under the title of the marshal de Luxembourg. He defended it gallantly against the duke de Espernon, governor of the province, who had his father's spirit. When the breach was practicable, and the count saw that they were about to make a general assault, he intimated, that perhaps he might listen to terms, if he was summoned. The duke answered, that the usage was to summon enemies, but not rebels. He had, however, good terms given him, and the place surrendered on the 8th of July<sup>o</sup>. Other places in different parts of the kingdom had the like fate; in some the people expelled c their garrisons, and admitted the king's troops. The only places that held out were those in the government of the count de Oignon, and the city of Bordeaux. In respect to the former, Brouage and Oleron were of such consequence, that the cardinal listened to his demands, and, upon the payment of four hundred thousand livres, and the delivery of the baton of France, he admitted the king's forces. He was not ashamed to appear at court afterwards under the name of marshal Foucault<sup>p</sup>. The prince of Conti and the duchess of Longueville capitulated in Bordeaux, and the count de Marfin was permitted to march with two thousand five hundred men to join the prince of Conde. The citizens also made the best terms they could<sup>q</sup>. In order to fix the power of the monarchy on the firmest basis, and to procure an infantry that might be depended upon, the cardinal very prudently renewed the ancient d alliance with the Swiss cantons<sup>r</sup>. But we find no marks of gratitude or justice rendered to the reformed in France, who, in all these quarrels, adhered inviolably to the crown<sup>s</sup>, had dispossessed the rebels of Rochelle, and, notwithstanding their fortifications were demolished, had defended other places from a principle of duty; which most of the French writers<sup>t</sup>, from motives of policy, have been content to bury in silence, but which ought to be preserved in a work consecrated to truth.

Progress of the war in Italy and Catalonia, where the Spaniards were victorious this campaign.

IN Italy the Spaniards had proposed to the duke of Savoy their assistance for the recovery of Pignerol, and the proposition was not absolutely refused. It was therefore at all events necessary to have an able general and a considerable army in that country; the marshal de Grancei was sent thither with all the troops that could be spared, and he came time enough e to prevent the effects of this negotiation<sup>1</sup>. The marquis de Carracena, who commanded in the Milanese, was piqued at this; and, having received considerable reinforcements from Naples and Sicily, he passed the Tanaro, in hopes of surprising the French army; but the marshal, having good intelligence, quitted his camp as the Spaniards were passing, in expectation of gaining some advantage over them before they were thoroughly formed; but, when he arrived in sight of their army, he found them disposed in order of battle. This engagement, which happened on the 23d of September, is stiled in history the battle of Roquette<sup>u</sup>. The marshal claimed the victory, because the enemy were obliged to repass the river; and, in conjunction with the duke of Savoy, the French forces crossed the Sessia, took the castle of Carpignano, and went into winter quarters in the plentiful country of Navarre. The marquis f du Pleffis Belliere commanded in Catalonia, and delivered Roses from a kind of blockade. He afterwards besieged Gironne, having called the marshal d'Hocquincourt to his assistance; but they had the misfortune to be beaten by Don Juan of Austria, who came to the relief of the place, and who afterwards made himself master of the Ampourdan. The marshal, being moires de Gui Joly, tom. ii.

<sup>1</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. ii.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

tom. ii. liv. xvi.

<sup>m</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 165. 169.

<sup>o</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Histoire de Louis XIV.

<sup>p</sup> BARDÆUS de rebus Gallicis, p. 649.

<sup>r</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. vi. part. ii. p. 65.

<sup>s</sup> MARTI, p. 240, 241.

<sup>t</sup> QUINCY, Histoire

<sup>u</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>v</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>w</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>x</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>y</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>z</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>aa</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>ab</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>ac</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>ad</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>ae</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>af</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>ag</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

<sup>ah</sup> Memoires de Montglat,

a by the troops from Guienne, made a fresh irruption into Catalonia in December, and relieved Rosès, that was blocked up a second time ; he also beat a corps of Spanish cavalry ; and had perhaps done more, but the severity of the weather obliged him to return into winter quarters <sup>w</sup>.

THE great stress of the war lay on the side of the Low Countries ; the prince of Conde had the pompous title of generalissimo of his catholic majesty's armies, and it was stipulated by treaty, that he should have all he conquered in France, in order to form for himself a principality on that side. They had without doubt a superior force, but then part of the forces were in the county of Luxembourg with the princes and the duke of Lorraine, and part in Flanders under the count de Fuensaldagna. Marshal Turenne had about seventeen thousand men ; he foresaw that the prince would assemble his army about Rhetel, in order to have all Champagne open before him. It was a backward season ; and the marshal having, with incredible diligence, brought his troops into the field, took possession of the very camp the prince had marked for the Spaniards on the 1st of July, and on the 5th Rhetel surrendered <sup>x</sup>. This disconcerted the prince, who afterwards entered Picardy, and advanced as far as Roie ; but, being continually followed by Turenne, he was not able to take any place of importance ; and, as the season began to advance, he resolved to besiege Rocroi about the middle of September, with which the Spaniards were very little pleased. The marshals Turenne and la Ferte besieged Mouzon, which surrendered on the 26th, as Rocroi did to the prince on the 30th <sup>y</sup>. The campaign was closed by the siege of St. Menchaud, which was as bravely defended by Montal as Mouzon had been by colonel Wolfe. The place was not surrendered till the 26th of November, after thirty-three days open trenches. It was one of those belonging to the prince of Conde, and the Spaniards were not very forward to succour it <sup>z</sup>. The prince had indeed all possible respect paid him ; but this went to his person only, and not to his advice, or the campaign had been more to their advantage. The little time that Monsieur Turenne had spent amongst the Spaniards had rendered him so well acquainted with their dispositions and manner of acting, that he formed as just notions of what passed in their councils of war as if he had been present at them, and took his measures accordingly <sup>a</sup>. Besides the marshal before-mentioned, there were two others made this year, Mr. de Miosans, who was stiled the marshal d' Albret ; the other, Monsieur de Pulvau, called afterwards the marshal de d Clerambaut. The campaign in Champagne and Picardy, in which the Spaniards take Rocroi, and lose Mouzon and St. Menchaud.

THE new year was opened in a manner very agreeable to the minister ; the prince of Conti, who, since the surrender of Bourdeaux, was retired to Pizenas, grew out of temper there with himself, and with all the world. As he had good sense at the bottom, and an excellent education, he took at last a short resolution of making himself easy both with respect to his public and private affairs. He had been intended for the church, and was possessed of benefices to a great value ; he wrote to the minister, and offered to resign them all into his hands for a proper establishment with one of his nieces. It may be presumed that the cardinal did not hesitate ; he gave him the choice, and he fixed on Madame Martinozzi, the best and the most beautiful of the three. The prince of Conde wrote to his brother in the bitterest terms, without considering that he had shewn the same complaisance for Richelieu as the prince of Conti had done for Mazarine. The marriage was celebrated in February <sup>b</sup>, and the prince and princess of Conti were esteemed the happiest couple in France, and sustained that character as long as they lived. This did not hinder the making the process of the prince of Conde before the parliament, who, after assigning him a day to come in, condemned him to suffer death as a traitor, and to forfeit all his honours and estates. The like sentence was passed upon all his adherents, with this difference only, that the manner of their death was pointed out <sup>c</sup>. It was soon after discovered that the prince had passed sentence of death, though in another way, on the cardinal minister ; in short, a design was laid to assassinate him. One Ricoux, and two or three other persons, hired to perpetrate this action, were condemned and f executed ; but the cardinal, either from a natural mildness of temper, or that studied moderation which accompanied his actions, took no notice of some persons of higher rank, and particularly a lady <sup>d</sup> of very great quality, who had dipped deeply in this and other intrigues. It is not impossible that this disposition of the cardinal, whether natural or feigned, encouraged

<sup>w</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. tom. ii. liv. xvii. p. 256—258.
 de Puysegur, p. 368. Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne.

Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de Montglat, tom. iv.

Montglat, tom. iv.

<sup>a</sup> Memoires du Duc d'York, p. 304.

ville, tom. v. p. 168. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 173.

<sup>c</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. Memoires de Madame de Montpensier, tom. iii.

moires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 180. Memoires de Madame de Montpensier, tom. ii. Histoire du Duchesse de Chastillon.

<sup>x</sup> Histoire du Prince de Conde, Memoires

<sup>y</sup> Memoires de Puysegur, QINCY, Histoire

<sup>z</sup> Histoire du Prince de Conde, Memoires de

<sup>b</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motte-

ville, tom. v. p. 168. Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 173.

<sup>d</sup> Me-

the parliament to attempt several times the revival of the old spirit. Once, when they held an extraordinary assembly, at which the cardinal was extremely alarmed, the king went from Vincennes to Paris, and, being in his hunting dress, entered the hall in a close coat, with large boots, a cap on his head, and a long whip in his hand, and walked up directly to the first president's chair, in which having seated himself, he told them, they were not to assemble themselves in an extraordinary manner but by his permission<sup>c</sup>. This did more than all the edicts and declarations hitherto had done; they forbore to assemble, and they forbore to remonstrate; but they did not forbear to grumble as much as ever, or to wish ardently for an opportunity of doing more: it was the business of the minister to prevent, as much as in him lay, their having such an opportunity.

The cardinal de Retz, now become archbishop of Paris, makes his escape to Rome.

THE affair of the cardinal de Retz grew every day more and more embarrassed; he was desirous of his liberty, and, in order to obtain it, had begun to treat for his demission. In the mean time his uncle the archbishop of Paris died on the 21st of March; and the chapter, without acquainting the king, acknowledged the cardinal in that quality, and suffered him to take possession of the see by proxy. How much soever this offended, the chapter remained firm; and, if the cardinal had done so, things might have come to great extremities. His impatience would not suffer this; he apprehended from Mazarine that treatment which Mazarine would have met with if he had been in his place; and this extinguished in his heart that heroism which dwelt upon his tongue, and which appears still in his writings. He consented to a demission, provided he might be committed to the custody of the marshal de la Meillerai, to which the court consented<sup>e</sup>. He was accordingly removed from Vincennes to the citadel of Nantes, from whence his party had pressed him to make his escape, though he had given his word to the marshal, and the marshal to the court: after which it was proposed he should go to Paris, disown his demission, and assume his archiepiscopal dignity; which if he had done, it might have kindled a flame not easy to be extinguished. But, in making his escape, he was in such terror and confusion, that he fell from his horse, and dislocated his shoulder<sup>f</sup>; upon this accident he was carried to the house of the duke of Brisac, afterwards to that of the duke of Retz, and from thence he made his escape into Spain<sup>g</sup>; but, notwithstanding the example given him by the prince of Conde, he refused to enter into any engagements with that crown, and only desired leave to continue his journey to Rome<sup>h</sup>, where, on his arrival, he was treated with all the respect which his holiness thought due to the capital enemy of Mazarine. On the 7th of June the king<sup>k</sup> was crowned at Rheims by the bishop of Soissons, the archbishop (duke of Nemours) not being in priests orders. The king, being informed that, after all the services the duke of Lorraine had rendered the Spaniards, they had seized and sent him prisoner into Spain, he, by a solemn edict<sup>l</sup>, commanded all the subjects of that prince to quit the service of Spain, and either to retire into his dominions, or to enter into the king's troops; which had its effects, thro' the concurrence of the duchess Nicola.

The campaign in Italy, and the descent of the duke of Guise upon the kingdom of Naples.

IN Italy there passed nothing very remarkable; on the side of the Milanese the marquis de Carracena, though he could not prevent the marshal de Grancei from penetrating into that duchy during the summer, yet managed the little force he had so well, as to put it out of his power to take quarters there during the winter, so that both sides in their turns<sup>m</sup> prevailed. We have before mentioned the enterprize and the imprisonment of the duke of Guise, to whom the Spanish court had restored his liberty, out of complaisance to the prince of Conde, and in hopes he would create some disturbances in France; but, on his arrival there, he either found things so altered, that he despaired of success, or found himself so well received by the king and his minister, that he had no inclination to it. But being a person of much vanity, as well as of great courage and capacity, he could not help boasting of the great intelligence he still had in the kingdom of Naples; and as he was naturally eloquent, and the cardinal perfectly well knew the disposition of that nation, he at last either persuaded or persecuted him into consenting he should make an expedition. Accordingly a fleet of forty sail of ships and gallies were equipped in autumn; with which, notwithstanding many obstacles, he at length arrived upon the coast, and on the 15th of November made himself master of Castelmere<sup>n</sup>. After this, he published his manifestoes, in which he promised much more than he was able to perform; but the inhabitants were so much changed in their temper, or so much

<sup>c</sup> AUBERT, Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine, tom. ii. p. 438. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 176.

<sup>f</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. ii. Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. v. p. 173. GALEAZZO GUALDO, troisieme partie, p. 200, 201.

<sup>g</sup> GALEAZZO GUALDO, troisieme partie, p. 207. <sup>h</sup> Memoires du Cardinal de Retz, tom. iii. liv. iv. p. 330. 334. GALEAZZO GUALDO, tom. iii. pag. 210.

<sup>i</sup> Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. ii. GALEAZZO GUALDO, tom. iii. p. 216. <sup>k</sup> Memoires de Gui Joly, tom. ii. <sup>l</sup> Memoires de Madame de Montpensier, tom. ii. p. 9. Memoires de Montglat, tom. iv. p. 55. GALEAZZO GUALDO, tom. ii. p. 267.

276. 277, & suiv. <sup>m</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. <sup>n</sup> Histoire de Louis XIV. liv. xviii. p. 302. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. pag. 193. GALEAZZO GUALDO, tom. iii. pag. 431.

a frightened at the consequences of a revolt, that, instead of rising in his favour, they refused him so much as provisions, which obliged him to abandon his new conquest, and to return with his fleet into Provence°. Some have observed, that this made the cardinal as ridiculous as himself; but it is highly probable that minister might mean to render the hatred between the duke of Guise and the Spaniards both irreconcilable and perpetual; and, if he did, without doubt this expedition answered his end, and delivered France from any apprehensions of the house of Guise.

THE prince of Conti, to whom the king had offered all his brother's charges and governments, and who had generously refused them, commanded in Catalonia, where, though he had not a very numerous army, it was however composed of good troops, commanded by b some of the best officers in France; amongst these were the duke of Candale, the marquis de Merinville, and the count of Buffy Rabutin. He opened the campaign in the month of June, and on the 5th of July made himself master of Villafranca, the capital of the little county of Conflans, after four days open trenches. He afterwards took Castillon, and revictualled Roses°. In the autumn campaign he attacked Puicerda, a place strong by situation, and which had a good garrison. He had the misfortune, at the beginning of the siege, to lose his principal engineer; and this was so great a loss, that, in all probability, he would have been constrained to raise the siege, if the garrison had not had a greater, which was the loss of their governor. This dispirited them to such a degree, that they surrendered on the 22d of October, after fourteen days open trenches°. This conquest made the prince master of c Cerdagna, and, to cover that district, he took the castle of Belvere. The inhabitants of Urgel and Montcallier, upon this, took up arms, expelled the few Spanish troops that were in them, and admitted those of the prince of Conti°, with which ended this campaign.

ON the side of the Low Countries, it was resolved to open the campaign with the siege of Stenai°, a place belonging to the prince of Condé, which had been taken from the duchy of Lorraine in the late king's time, and torn from the court, with other places, by the prince, in this. The garrison was numerous, and commanded by the count de Chamilli, an excellent officer, and the place was strong and well provided. The project of the siege was formed by Mr.
Fabert, governor of Sedan, to whom the cardinal had great obligations, as having received and protected him in his distress, and used great fidelity in respect to his family and treasures, which d had been committed to his charge. It was invested towards the end of June, and the marshals Turenne and la Ferte commanded the army that covered it, consisting of about sixteen thousand men. The king made his first campaign here, and had an opportunity of seeing some of the great improvements that Fabert had made in the art of war. The prince of Condé was extremely uneasy, and desired to have the troops of Lorraine added to his own, in order to relieve the place; but duke Francis, whom the Spaniards had sent for to command his brother's troops, absolutely refused to act, unless the place, when relieved, was given back to Lorraine°. The prince then proposed the siege of Arras, in hopes this would oblige the French army to raise the siege of Stenai. The siege of this great city was accordingly formed by the archduke Leopold, the prince of Condé, and the count de Fuenfaldagna, and pressed with all pose sible vigour. The marshals Turenne and la Ferte came and encamped in the neighbourhood of the Spaniards, who had twenty-five thousand men. Turenne tried every method to oblige the enemy to raise the siege without hazarding a battle, or forcing their lines, but without effect°. At length Stenai surrendered on the sixth of August, after thirty-three days open trenches; and the best part of the troops employed in the siege were sent under marshal Hoc- quincourt to join Turenne, who, against the advice, and contrary to the inclinations of most of his officers, resolved to force the lines, which he performed on the twenty-fifth of August, and made himself master of the baggage, artillery, and ammunition of the Spaniards, though the prince of Condé gained as great reputation by his retreat, as the marshal by his victory°; for his catholic majesty, in a letter he wrote to him with his own hand, said, "That the arch-f " duke and the count de Fuenfaldagna had besieged Arras, but that Condé had saved the Spanish
" army." It may be remarked, that the taking of this city in 1640 was no less useful to the reputation of Richelieu, than now the protecting of it was to his successor Mazarine, whose vanity made him attribute to himself the glory of this transaction. There could indeed be nothing more ridiculously insolent and supercilious than the conduct of the prime ministers of the French and ° Histoire de Louis XIV. liv. xviii.

P Memoires de Buffy Rabutin, tom. i. p. 402. GALEAZZO

GUALDO, tom. iii. p. 297.

° Memoires historiques &amp; chronologiques, GALEAZZO GUALDO, tom. iii.

p. 400, &amp; suiv.

° QUINCY, Memoires de Buffy Rabutin, tom. i. Memoires de Montglat, tom. iv.

° Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 174. Memoires de Montglat, tom. iv. p. 57. Memoires de Puy-segur, p. 381.

° Vie de Condé, pag. 451. GALEAZZO GUALDO, tom. iii. p. 220, 221, &amp; suiv. Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, tom. iv.

° Memoires du Comte de Brienne, tom. iii. p. 175. Memoires du Duc de Navailles, liv. ii. p. 158. GALEAZZO GUALDO, tom. iii. p. 127, &amp; suiv.

° Memoires de

Puysegur, p. 381—393, 394. Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne.

Spanish ministers.

France and Spain, who governed those kingdoms with the most absolute sway, and sustained a bitter war merely to gratify their own animosity, to the ruin of the industry, commerce, and felicity, of the people. Don Lewis de Haro had the same dominion over Philip the fourth that Mazarine maintained over all the actions of Lewis the fourteenth. Neither scarce ever mentioned the names of their sovereigns in any public transactions; and it must be acknowledged there was hardly a crowned head in Europe, at this period, that had any personal glory. Christiana, queen of Sweden, alone kept up the dignity of her throne, governed independent of haughty ministers, and assumed the real prerogatives of royalty; but this princess resigned her crown to Charles Gustavus, her cousin, and the nephew of the great Adolphus, and retired to France, where she was regarded only by the learned <sup>a</sup>.

A D. 1655.
A treaty concluded between France and England.

WHILE France was torn with civil divisions, England was in the height of power and grandeur, and the usurper Cromwell feared and courted by all the states in Europe. Policy had obliged him to sign a peace with Holland, when the whole nation cried out for the continuance of the war, to revenge the insults committed in the East Indies, and oblige that insolent republic to pay the due respect to the British flag. All the satisfaction, however, which the protector obtained on this occasion, was an acknowledgement of the superiority of the English flag in the narrow seas; that the republic should never chuse a prince of the house of Orange for stadtholder or admiral; and that the interests of the Stuart family should be wholly renounced. Mazarine, on the other hand, suffered the commerce, marine, and finances, of France, to decline. With the same power that Cromwell had in England, he wanted that elevation of soul which could turn the misfortunes of the kingdom to the good of the people. Don Lewis de Haro offered to assist the protector to besiege Calais: Mazarine hoped to gain him by an offer of putting Dunkirk into his hands, as soon as the Spanish garrison could be dispossessed: the prince of Condé used all his influence with him; but Cromwell was too politic to regard the solicitations of a prince without a party in France, or interest in Spain. In the end he embraced the proposals of Mazarine, and concluded a treaty with the king of France, but without making mention of Dunkirk. He treated his most Christian majesty upon a footing of equality, obliged him to acknowledge his title of protector, and give notice to the fugitive king of England to quit the French territories.

Turenne opens a way into the Spanish Netherlands.

In the mean time Turenne was pursuing his conquests, and had early in the campaign opened a way to the Spanish Netherlands, by obliging Landreci and Quesnoy to surrender. This was in fact paving a way for all the advantages gained by France the 18th of August, and St. Guillaîne was taken by the 25th, at which last siege the king, who had served the campaign, commanded in person (A). Quiers and Catillon surrendered some days before, and the marquis de Heronville had forced the Spaniards to raise the siege of Solfona. But these were not the whole of the king's successes; for the duke de Vendôme, with an inferior force, defeated the Spanish fleet before Barcelona <sup>b</sup>.

DURING the winter, several proposals of peace were made by Spain, which were all rejected by cardinal Mazarine, highly elated with the successes of the former campaign, and full of expectation from the alliance contracted with Cromwell, who had already effected the conquest of the island of Jamaica. Spain endeavoured to be revenged of the cardinal. Don Lewis de Haro dispersed writings at all the courts in Europe against Mazarine, accusing him of having violated all the laws human and divine, and sacrificed honour and religion by contracting an alliance with a murderer and usurper, and driving out of the French dominions king Charles the second and his brother the duke of York, the grandchildren of Henry the fourth, and cousins of Lewis the fourteenth. But the cardinal answered the whole accusation, by shewing publicly the proposals made by Spain to the protector; though it must be acknowledged that Spain had not the same natural ties and obligations to countenance the fugitive princes as France.

A. D. 1656.
He is forced to raise the siege of Valenciennes.

THE finances of both parties were now reduced so low, that, with the most eager inclinations to push the war with vigour, they wanted the ability. It was the month of July before any thing considerable was undertaken in the field; at length Turenne opened the campaign by laying siege to Valenciennes, where he experienced the same turn of fortune that Condé had the preceding year before Arras. The Spanish army not being yet assembled, he marched expeditiously to Tournay, hoping to surprise this fortress, at that time defended only by a slender

<sup>a</sup> Siccle, t. i. p. 74.

<sup>b</sup> HAINAULT, Hist. de France, t. ii. p. 70, & seq.

(A) The president Hainault expressly affirms, that Lewis commanded at this siege, by which he probably means that he was present at it (1). Voltaire says, that Mazarine introduced him to the theatre of war; but would not suffer him to mount it, after he had attained the age of twenty-one years (2); this was at the siege of Dunkirk, anno 1658.

(1) Hainault, t. ii. p. 704.

(2) Siccle, t. i. p. 73.

garrison;

a garrison. Finding, however, that several regiments of the enemy were encamped in the neighbourhood, he altered his purpose, and marched straight to Valenciennes. This town was defended only by 2000 foot and 200 horse of regular troops; but the inhabitants, to the number of 10,000 men, were armed. The very evening of his arrival he invested the place, drove the enemy from two redoubts, and next morning began to draw lines of circumvallation. The marshal de la Ferte, who had joined him a few days before, was posted with his army on the eminence, to right of the river towards St. Amand, while the viscount took post on the left of the river towards the plain. By the third day the lines were sufficiently advanced to prevent any succours from being thrown in to the besieged. An attempt made by the enemy to that purpose was frustrated, and a great number of Spanish officers and soldiers taken prisoners. On the sixth day the lines were completed, with a double ditch defended by b pallisadoes; the men wrought first at the avenues most exposed, and afterwards at those places the least liable to an attack. But the Spaniards were not idle; they made use of several reservoirs near Bouchain to swell the river Scheld, which divides the town into two parts, and drown the country. The viscount's army was greatly incommoded by this proceeding; but his indefatigable industry surmounted the difficulty. He caused the reservoirs to be drained, several channels to be dug, and turned the course of the water so as to drown one quarter of the city. Finding this step ineffectual, the prince of Condé, now assisted by Don John of Austria, assembled his army with all expedition at Douai, and posted himself on an eminence near the Lorrainers camp, within half a cannon shot of the French lines. On his left he had the c Scheld, over which he threw six bridges. The Spanish army amounted to 20,000 men; and, as it was nearly as strong as the viscount's, he foresaw, by their motions, they would attack him in his camp, and accordingly turned his chief thoughts to the defence of his lines. As the marshal de la Ferte's quarter was most exposed, it was fortified with double lines pallisadoed, one of which was new, and the other old; but the marshal, thinking the first sufficient, ordered the other to be levelled. On the 16th advice was brought that the enemy had sent away their baggage, and were drawn off in order of battle. As they were so near as to reach the intrenchments in half an hour, the viscount sent repeated messages to the marshal, exhorting him to be on the watch; but his advice was slighted. In the beginning of the night he was attacked, and his lines forced with little difficulty. Finding the enemy had entered his d quarters, the marshal flew with some squadrons to repulse them; but all was now in confusion, his personal bravery was excited to no purpose, and all his endeavours to retrieve his mistake ineffectual. Condé, with the Spanish infantry, having filled up the ditches, marched directly to the town, while the cavalry were sent in pursuit of the fugitives. La Ferte was taken prisoner at the head of the gens d'armes, with more than 400 officers, and near 4000 soldiers. Marfin had in the mean time attacked Turenne's quarters, who had weakened himself to succour La Ferte, but he was repulsed with great loss. However, the viscount's success could not prevent the fatal consequences of the marshal's defeat, for by day-break the shouts of joy in Valenciennes proclaimed that the town was relieved. It was now that Turenne stood in need of all his capacity to draw off the broken troops in the face of a victorious enemy. He sent immediately to the trenches, with orders for the troops to retire; but, they being above a league e distant, his directions could not be executed without great loss. In a short time, however, he Turenne's so retrieved matters, that, after dismounting the cannon, and levelling the lines, he marched off fine retreat. in such good order with his artillery and baggage, that the enemy durst not attack him. As his march was directed to Quesnoy, it was thought he would have retired to the frontiers of France; and it is probable indeed he would have retreated to Picardy, had he not been sensible that such a motion would have disturbed the court, and given new life to the king's enemies. He therefore halted at Quesnoy, and marched back with some regiments to meet the prince of Condé and Don John, who had come in pursuit of him. At the first approach of the enemy, the French began to move the baggage; but the viscount, firing a pistol at a soldier busied in loading a cart, commanded, on pain of death, that no one should quit his post. When the f Spaniards came near enough to discover his camp, they were astonished at the air of resolution he maintained with his tents standing, and camp unfortified. This intrepidity obliged Condé to change his design, at the same time that it removed the apprehensions and panic in the French army, by shewing so little precaution upon so pressing an occasion.

THE enemy directed their march with an intention to lay siege to Condé; and Turenne, penetrating their design, sent a thousand horse, each with a sack of corn behind him, to victual the place. In a word, the conduct of the viscount, during this whole unfortunate affair, drew upon him the admiration of all Europe, and was perhaps one of the most daring and masterly strokes of his life. All the French writers speak of it as something supernatural; and the king was so ravished with the stand made at Quesnoy, that he ordered Tellier his secretary to return his thanks to the viscount, for retrieving the reputation of his arms, after so unhappy a defeat. <sup>a</sup> He could not, however, prevent the fate of the town of Conde; all the means in his power was to retard it, gain time to refresh his troops, and balance the loss by the reduction of Capelle, while the enemy was in sight with a superior army. "This," says Voltaire, "was the first time that the broken remains of a vanquished army had dared to undertake a siege<sup>d</sup>." The prince of Condé and Don John, who had, after reducing Conde, laid siege to St. Guillaine, dropped that enterprize, and hastened to the relief of Capelle. They advanced within a league of the French intrenchments; but the infantry being much fatigued with their march, and the heavy rains which had fallen for the whole day, they continued for two days within sight of Turenne's camp without offering battle, while he battered the town to powder with his cannon, and obliged it to surrender. Immediately he repaired the breaches, left a good garrison in the <sup>b</sup> place, and, by his expedition, threw succours into St. Guillaine, before the enemy had time to return. With this transaction the campaign ended, both armies contenting themselves with observing each other's motions, and frustrating all the attempts of either side by proper movements and dispositions. Whatever his success had been, Turenne had raised his reputation to the highest pitch of glory by the affair of Valenciennes. He repaired that defeat, checked the ardour of the great Condé, surprised the magazines at Capelle of a victorious army, and obliged one of the greatest generals in the world, flushed with victory, to retreat before him, at the very time he had undertaken to pursue him.

* HAINAULT Hist. p. 707. VOLT. p. 78. La Vie de Turenne, p. 290.

Turenne takes the enemy's magazines at Capelle.

The Fronde party intirely quashed.

<sup>c</sup> DURING the recess of military affairs it was that the duke of Orleans came to court, having accommodated differences with the cardinal. After staying eight days with his majesty and eminence at Compeigne, he retired to Blois, where he passed the remainder of his life in peace and tranquillity, so that now not a shadow of the Fronde remained. The duke of Orleans, the prince of Conti, and the duchess of Longueville, had obtained the king's pardon; the prince of Conde might be considered as a Spanish general; and cardinal de Retz, having broke through his confinement, was wandering in Europe.

A. D. 1657.
Treaty with England.

THE next year was opened by a closer connection with Oliver Cromwell, a treaty offensive and defensive against Spain being concluded between the court of France and the commonwealth of England. His eminence the cardinal was diligent to repair the losses of the former year, and laboured hard to put the king's forces in a condition to undertake something important. By the treaty, Cromwell engaged to send six thousand foot into Flanders, on condition that the French should attempt the reduction of Mardyke, Gravelin, or Dunkirk, and deliver into his hands which ever of these places should be soonest taken. By the month of May the viscount was enabled to take the field; and, perceiving that the English were slow in their motions, and the Spaniards busied in securing their maritime towns, he formed the design of surprising Cambray. To disguise his intention, the king went to Montreuil, by which the enemy might be induced to think that his army would be chiefly employed about the sea-coasts; and the marshal la Ferte had instructions to march towards the frontiers, to prevent the Spanish troops, quartered in the provinces of Luxemburgh, Guelderland, Juliers, and Brabant, from passing. Turenne set out with his cavalry from the neighbourhood of Bethune, and arrived in less than two days before Cambray, which he invested the next day, on being <sup>d</sup> joined by the infantry. He relied on La Ferte's obstructing the prince of Condé, and was disappointed; for that general, crossing the Meuse, marched with all his cavalry to Valenciennes, and arrived at Bouchain on the very day the viscount had invested Cambray. About <sup>e</sup> 11 o'clock at night he advanced towards the French camp with three thousand horse; but, however rapid and secret his motions were, Turenne had intelligence, though he could not prevent the prince from throwing himself with all his troops into the city. This was indeed so fine a manœuvre, that Turenne himself bestowed on it the highest encomiums, and declared it an action worthy of the great Condé, whose expedition was so extraordinary, that the garrison, not expecting it was possible he should so soon have foiled the viscount, kept the prince a long time at the counterscarp, before they could be persuaded but it was a body of the <sup>f</sup> enemy.

The extraordinary march performed by Condé.

Endeavour to surprise Calais.

TURENNE now thought it would be in vain to continue the siege; he therefore took the road to St. Quintin, in order to cover the frontiers. Here he was joined by the king, the cardinal, and the body of English auxiliaries. La Ferte had immediate orders to lay siege to Montmedi, by this diversion to prevent the enemy from attacking any place in Flanders that was unprovided; while Turenne undertook to cover the siege, and at the same time watch the motions of the Spanish army. The prince of Condé and Don John made several marches and countermarches to amuse him, with a view of falling suddenly upon Calais. Joining their forces near Charlemont, they made a feint, as if they intended to relieve Montmedi, and then suddenly detached the prince de Lignes to seize, when the tide was low, a suburb of the town,

<sup>d</sup> T. i. p. 77.
p. 24.

<sup>e</sup> HAINAULT, t. ii. ibid.

BUSSE RABUTIN, p. 204.

<sup>f</sup> La Vie de Condé,

a joining the quay; which would infallibly have put Calais into their hands, had the enterprize succeeded. But the prince arrived too late; the tide was up to the walls, and the garrison apprised of his intention<sup>a</sup>.

After the surrender of Montmedi, Turenne marched to lay siege to St. Venant, a town upon the Lys, in the country of Artois. The enemy were fatigued with marches, and the viscount knew they could not succour the place; but Condé, however, found means to cut off a strong convoy going to the French camp. Instead of attempting the relief of St. Venant, which, they foresaw, must be attended with a battle, the Spanish generals laid siege to Ardres, contrary to the opinion of Condé, whose patience was quite spent with the unnecessary delays, the loss of opportunities, and the constant opposition to all vigorous measures, of his colleagues. While the Spaniards were weakening themselves before Ardres, Turenne pressed the siege of St. Venant without intermission, distributing his own plate among the soldiers, to prevent their murmuring on account of the arrears due to them. Animated by his generosity, the troops forwarded the works with incredible diligence; and so punctually executed all the orders of Turenne that the garrison was forced to capitulate, without waiting to sign the articles of capitulation. He detached 4000 horse towards Ardres; which corps the Spanish generals mistaking for the whole French army coming to fall upon them, instantly struck their tents, and raised the siege. The campaign ended with the taking of Mardyke, which held out but a few days, and was, according to treaty, put into the hands of Oliver Cromwell. Turenne takes St. Venant; obliges the enemy to raise the siege of Ardres.

In Catalonia matters were equally prosperous for the king, the marquis de St. Arbore having obliged the Spaniards to raise the siege of Urgel. In Italy the prince of Conti and the duke of Modena raised the siege of Alexandria de la Paglia in the Milanese; but as the chief efforts of the French were made in Flanders, we shall confine ourselves to a minute relation only of these, as they wholly determine the fate of the war.

The death of the president Bellievre, which fell out this year, was matter of great satisfaction to the cardinal, who looked upon him as the only man able to obstruct his designs, and willing to clip the wings of his soaring ambition. We shall close the year with just mentioning a change made in the council of state, the number being now reduced to twenty-four; and a bull published by Alexander VII. confirming the bull of pope Innocent X. received in France by a registered declaration, and condemning the five chief propositions of the Jansenists. Four prelates refusing to sign it, headed by Arnaud bishop of Angres, this business made a considerable noise, and might have been attended with the worst consequences, had not the grievances of the people, from the weight of taxes to support a tedious and bloody war, turned their hands to other concerns<sup>d</sup>.

No sooner did the season admit of taking the field, than the viscount Turenne made preparations to besiege Dunkirk; but his designs were for a time retarded by some untoward accidents. The marshal d'Hocquincourt, whose treasonable practices in the year 1655 had been discovered and disconcerted by Turenne, and which treason had been pardoned by the king, now again renewed his engagements with the prince of Condé, gained over the town mayor of Hedin, and prevailed on him to receive a Spanish garrison into the place. On the other hand, marshal d'Aumont suffered himself to be duped by the inhabitants of Ostend, who, pretending they would admit the French, seized upon a body of 600 men sent by the marshal to take possession. Several commotions arose among the nobility in the different provinces of France, notwithstanding which, the cardinal, in compliance with Cromwell's pressing remonstrances, ordered Turenne to make the necessary dispositions for investing Dunkirk. The viscount foresaw the difficulties that would attend it; but his orders were peremptory. To attack Dunkirk, while Furnes, Bergue, and Graveline, were in the power of the enemy, was in a manner to be blocked up himself while he was investing Dunkirk. Besides, to begin his operations so early in the year, before there was forage for the cavalry, was to expose them to the danger of perishing with hunger. However, he complied, relying upon his own genius to surmount every difficulty<sup>f</sup>.

The inhabitants of Dunkirk were no sooner apprized of his intention, than, opening the sluices, they laid the whole country under water as far as the lake of Bergue, formed by the overflowings of the Colme. By this every passage, except by the dike leading from Bergue to Dunkirk, was obstructed, and even this the late heavy rains had rendered almost impassable. On this dike two strong forts were raised, each garrisoned by 1000 men; and the marquis de Lede, a consummate master in the defence of towns, was sent with 2000 foot to reinforce and take command of the garrison. Turenne was not discouraged by the hardness of the enterprize; he knew the necessity of obedience, and persisted, unmoved by the remonstrances of his officers and friends, who dreaded the consequences to the army, and the viscount's reputation. With so inconsiderable an army as 8000 men, he marched into Artois, passed the

<sup>a</sup> La Vie de Condé, p. 82.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid.

<sup>c</sup> HAINAULT, p. 709.

<sup>d</sup> La Vie de Turenne.

Lys, and advanced towards the Colme, where he surprised a redoubt raised to defend the passage of the river. On his arrival before Dunkirk, he saw the town floating in a sea, and immediately set about filling up the ditches, laying bridges over the canals, and taking every measure that could render the passage by the dike practicable. Several redoubts and forts on the canals and dike being taken, he arrived at length; after encountering numberless difficulties. Every thing necessary for the siege and the support of the troops was brought from Calais; and the men were set to work upon the lines, forming a curve round the town of the figure of a crescent. Twenty English men of war blocked up the port, so that Dunkirk was everywhere hemmed in by sea and land, at flood; but as the sand was for six hours at ebb tide left dry, by which the garrison had an easy passage to Newport on the east, or Gravelin on the west, the viscount terminated each extremity of his line with a staccado reaching cross the sand quite to the lowest water-mark. These staccadoes were formed of vast piles fastened together by strong iron chains; behind the pales was a barricade of bomb chests, which were drawn thence by horses as the tide came in, and replaced as it went out. Still farther back were ranged several barks with cannon, which defended the approach to the staccadoes; a part of the cavalry kept guard at night, so that now the pass was quite blockaded. Such were the works which drew the king, the cardinal, and the whole court, to be spectators of a siege that promised the highest military entertainment. Before the works were finished, the English auxiliaries, to the number of 6000 men, landed, and joined the viscount. They were immediately under the direction of major-general Morgan, a brave experienced officer; though Lockhart, Cromwell's ambassador, had the nominal direction. The trenches were opened by two approaches, one of which was carried on by the French, the other by the English, who seemed to rival and outvie each other in bold actions, diligence, and conduct. At first the enemy made several brisk sallies, but were always repulsed; and so vigorously did Turenne push his measures, that some of the pallisades on the glacis were torn away, several traverses in the covered way taken, and preparations making to effect a lodgment on the counterscarp, before the Spaniards thought of putting themselves in motion, or stopping the progress of the king's arms. They could scarce persuade themselves that Turenne would have ventured upon that enterprize, before he had possessed himself of the surrounding fortresses; but perceiving that he was actually engaged in the siege, they made the necessary preparations for attacking his lines. The prince of Condé detached marshal Hocquincourt with his own regiment to reconnoitre the viscount's disposition; he came to an action with some out-parties, and was killed on the spot. Turenne had determined to go out of his lines, and attack the Spaniards; Condé suspected his design, and communicated his opinion to Don John and the other Spanish generals, who disregarding his admonition, he turned round to the duke of Gloucester, at that time in the Spanish army, and asked, "If he had ever seen a battle won?" The duke answering that he had not, Condé replied, In half an hour you will see in what manner we shall lose one<sup>1</sup>. This intuitive spirit seized in a moment every object, and perceived at the first glance that Turenne's disposition must carry the day. The English led the attack, and behaved with great intrepidity. The marquis de Créquy charged the enemy with his right wing, and the marquis de Castlemere, marching along the strand with his left wing, wheeled suddenly to the right, and attacked the Spaniards in flank. General Morgan led his troops up the sand hills, so steep, that the soldiers supported each other with the butt ends of their muskets, and gained possession after a slight resistance; but the duke of York, hastening thither with his guards, rallied the Spaniards, surrounded the English, and made several prisoners by force, all refusing to lay down their arms or surrender. Their obstinacy maintained their ground, till they were joined by some French battalions, when their attack became so furious, that the enemy were soon broke, and put in confusion. The marquis de Castlemere was no less successful on the flank, where the Spaniards were intirely broke and dispersed by the cavalry. Créquy had made a bold onset with the right wing; but, pushing in too far, he was attacked and repulsed by the prince of Condé, to the front of the right wing of the French army. No general possessed the art of pursuing every advantage like the prince; putting himself at the head of a corps of horse, attended by the general officers and volunteers of fashion in the Spanish army, he charged with such astonishing intrepidity, as had well nigh forced his way through the French lines, and penetrated to Dunkirk; but the rest of the army being dispersed, and the viscount Turenne coming with fresh troops from the centre, the prince was attacked on all hands, and obliged to cut his way back with terrible loss, after having a horse shot under him, and exposing his person to the most imminent perils. With this last effort the enemy yielded the victory, after a resistance which reflected honour upon Condé alone, who had now distinguished the fire and vigour of his genius as much as he had signalized his talents for war upon other occasions. His retreat was equally bold and masterly; for to him alone

<sup>1</sup> La Vie de Turenne, t. i. p. 310.

- a was it owing that the greater part of the Spanish army was not made prisoners. He rallied the troops, and defended the rear of the army with a body of horse; which kept so good a countenance, that Turenne was forced to drop the pursuit where the prince commanded, tho' the rest of the defeated army was chased to the gates of Furnes. About 9000 were taken prisoners, and a number more considerable fell by the sword, but not without considerable loss on the side of the conquerors. Among the slain in the king's army may be reckoned the brave marquis de Castelnau, as he died of his wounds a few days after the battle, his gallant conduct having first been rewarded with the baton of marshal. It will be sufficient to quote a paragraph of Turenne's letter to his lady, to shew that his modesty was equal to his merit: "The enemy, says he, came to us, and, God be praised! they have been defeated; I was pretty busy all day, which has fatigued me; I wish you a good night, I am going to bed."
- b Another man would have written in an exulting ostentatious stile, that would have destroyed the whole merit of his conduct.

NEXT day after the battle Turenne resumed the operations of the siege with redoubled vigour; and the garrison, though now without hope of succour, made so gallant a defence, that it was three days before the besiegers effected a lodgment on the counterscarp, the foot of which they had reached before the defeat of the Spaniards. At length, all the outworks Dunkirk surrenders. being taken, the town surrendered on the 24th of June, ten days after the battle, and eighteen days from the opening of the trenches. It would probably have held out longer, had not the marquis de Lede, the brave governor, been unfortunately killed. The garrison, now reduced to 1000 foot and 700 horse, marched out with the honours of war; and his majesty, with all his court, came from Mardyke to make his triumphal entry. Some writers allege, that cardinal Mazarine wanted to equivocate the treaty with Cromwell, and for some time delayed putting the town into the hands of the English; but was soon forced to yield to the untractable temper of that usurper, whom he equally dreaded and admired<sup>m</sup>.

- THE vanity of Mazarine broke out upon this as upon a late former occasion which we mentioned. He was fond of having the honour of the battle of the Downs, and the reduction of Dunkirk ascribed to him; whereas Turenne was above disputing what he did not rate so high, what he knew the world would wholly attribute to him, and what was no more than the result of that duty which he owed to his king, his country, and his own reputation. The extraordinary vanity of Mazarine.
- d But he refused the request made to him by the cardinal, by Moret, of writing a letter, in which he should ascribe to Mazarine the honour of having projected the siege, and formed the plan of the battle. Turenne smiled at the request, and answered, that his eminence might employ what means he thought proper to impress mankind with a high opinion of his military capacity; that he would never contradict it; but must beg to be excused, if he would not consent to authorize a falsehood under his hand-writing. As terms exceedingly alluring were proposed to the viscount, Mazarine, though greatly mortified, could not but admire the greatness of his soul, and that disinterestedness which characterised every action of his life<sup>n</sup>.

- Two days after the surrender of Dunkirk, the little fortress of Bergue yielded to the fortune of the conquerors, and admitted a French garrison. Furnes and Dixmude had the same fate; Furnes and Dixmude taken.
- e but the king's illness forced Turenne to stop the course of his conquests, which now would probably have been more rapid than ever, as the whole Spanish army was divided in garrison towns, and no enemy to oppose him in the field. Upon the king's recovery, Turenne again renewed his operations, after having been forced to loiter inactive while the fate of the kingdom hung in suspense during his majesty's illness, which was extremely dangerous. To finish a campaign begun so gloriously, Mazarine sent for La Ferte's army from Lorraine; the two generals waited on his eminence at Cassel, and here it was resolved that the marshal should lay siege to Gravelin, while the viscount covered the siege with his army. This last precaution was necessary, as the enemy had got together a considerable force, and would certainly attempt the relief of the town. They did so; but their endeavours were frustrated by the vigilance of Turenne, who disposed his army so happily, that the trenches were opened, and the siege carried on without impediment until the 30th of August, when the town surrendered. This obliged the Spanish army to retire to Ypres; the cardinal returned to court, and la Ferte solicited leave of absence, so that the sole command of the army devolved on Turenne for the remainder of the campaign<sup>o</sup>.

THE viscount, leaving count Schomberg with seven or eight regiments to cover his conquests, Turenne's marched towards Thielt, thereby to persuade the enemy that he had a design upon some of the great cities, Ghent, Bruges, or Brussels, and by this means gain the opportunity of besieging the further conquests. Oudenarde, Menin, and Ypres. His feint succeeded; he laid siege to Oudenarde, and took it after a slight resistance. The want of heavy cannon and provisions was now the cause why he did not actually make an attempt on Brussels; a consideration which obliged him to content <sup>m</sup> Siecle, t. i. p. 79.<sup>n</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>o</sup> RABUTIN, sub hoc anno. La Vie de Turenne, p. 322.

himself

himself with staying in the neighbourhood of the maritime towns, the more easily to support a his army, and seize the first occasion of falling upon Courtrai, Menin, and Ypres. On his way thither he surprised and defeated the prince de Lignes, who proposed throwing himself with a considerable reinforcement into Tournay. Of this whole detachment, consisting of 2000 foot and 1500 horse, only 600 horse escaped with the prince. Menin surrendered without a stroke; and Ypres stood but a short siege, the prince de Lignes being permitted to march out with all the honours of war. These advantages were succeeded by the reduction of Grammont and Ninove, places useful only to the viscount during his residence in that country. With this last transaction the campaign ended, after Turenne had dispersed and defeated the Spanish army, taken Dixmude, Dunkirk, Gravelin, and other important places, to the number of twelve towns and cities, and subdued the whole country between the Yper, the Lys, and the Scheld. Leaving 100 troops of horse and 5000 foot in the conquered places, he led his army back to France, and returned himself to court, where he was highly caressed and distinguished. b

In Italy the campaign had been pretty successful. The duke of Modena, having established quarters in the frontiers of Mantua, obliged that duke, who had declared for Spain, to embrace a neutrality. The marquis de Villa took the strong fortrels of Trim in Montferrat on the 21st of July, and Mortare in the Milanese surrendered by the 25th of August. On the side of Portugal the war was not more fortunate for Spain; Don Lewis de Haro was constrained to raise the siege of Elvas, after being defeated and driven from his lines by the Portuguese and marshal Schomberg. We shall conclude the transactions of the year with observing, that the death of Oliver Cromwell, connected in close alliance with France, afforded more satisfaction to the king and cardinal, than if it had pleased Heaven to remove the bitterest of their enemies. They perfectly knew the protector's disposition, and that they could never expect his friendship but while he was pursuing his own interest. They eagerly wished to see a French garrison in Dunkirk, of which they might despair in his life-time. They, in a word, were forced to court the protector, because they feared him; and the pride and cunning of Mazarine were made to stoop to the superior genius and capacity of Cromwell<sup>p</sup>. c

Death of Oliver Cromwell.

Spain makes proposals of peace, which are accepted.

THE winter, as usual, introduced the subject of peace; his catholic majesty began to be alarmed at the rapid conquests of France, especially in the Netherlands; he apprehended that the viscount might possibly carry his victorious arms into the heart of his dominions, after d first over-running all Flanders. Accordingly, he made overtures for a peace, which were strongly seconded by the queen, who, looking upon the king's recovery as the peculiar blessing of Heaven, thought herself obliged to shew her gratitude by stopping the effusion of Christian blood. She declared, with some warmth, to the cardinal, that she could not, without acting against all the sentiments of her heart, and neglecting the true interest of France, refuse equitable terms of accommodation. In both kingdoms she observed the cities were dispeopled, the provinces desolated, the few remaining inhabitants distressed, and the treasures consumed; every thing, she said, seemed to call aloud for peace, as the only remedy for those miseries under which all Christendom laboured. But cardinal Mazarine was influenced by motives different from those the queen represented. He had never intirely dropped the e scheme of marrying the king to the infanta Maria Theresa, who might again be presumptive heiress of the crown by the death of the young prince her brother, born since Lyonne's negotiation. To draw the court of Madrid into his measures, he pretended he was going to conclude a treaty of marriage between Lewis and the princess Marguerite of Savoy; carried his majesty in the depth of winter to Lyons, and prevailed on the duchess of Savoy to come there, accompanied by her two daughters. In the mean time he hinted to the Spanish minister, that the time was now come to prepare for the alliance between Lewis and the infanta, or for an irreconcilable war between the two nations. In consequence of this insinuation, Pimentel was dispatched to Lyons with advantageous proposals from the Spanish ministry. They were accepted by Mazarine; the duchess of Savoy sent back with her two daughters; f and the court returned to Paris, where it was agreed with the Spanish ambassador, that the cardinal and Don Lewis de Haro should have an interview on the frontiers, in the Isle of Pheasants, in the Pyrenees. To prevent all disputes about precedence, two lodges of the same fashion were built, and at an equal distance from both was a hall with two opposite doors, by which the ministers entered at the same time, and two chairs, of which they took possession without ceremony, or possibility of altercation. The first conference was in the month of August, and in eight or nine meetings the whole treaty was adjusted, and more business finished in a few days by these subtle politicians, than the mediators of all the nations in Europe had been able in five years to effect at Munster.

<sup>p</sup> VOLT. Siecle, ut supra.

a THE first articles of the treaty of the Pyrenees related to commerce. It was next stipulated, Treaty of the Pyrenees. that the most Christian king should marry the infanta, with a portion of 500,000 gold crowns. Afterwards followed the regulation concerning the restitution of the conquests on either side. Here his catholic majesty promised to pardon the rebellious Catalans, and to renounce his pretensions on Alsace. The treaty of Querasque was confirmed, and regard preserved to the French. Spain restored Verceil to the duke of Savoy; Reggio to the duke of Modena; his whole territories to the prince of Monaco; and to the duke of Newburg the city of Juliers, sequestered for several years past in the hands of the house of Austria. But the affair of the prince of Condé was the most difficult to accommodate; so many obstructions arose, and both ministers frequently grew so warm, that they were on the point of breaking off the conference. At last, however, the cardinal, reflecting on the importance of gaining back to his allegiance such a hero as Condé, yielded to the Spanish minister's remonstrance, but on condition that Avenne should be surrendered to France. The whole treaty consisted of 124 articles; but we chose to omit those which did not immediately relate to our design<sup>a</sup>.

In this manner ended a war between the crowns of France and Spain, which had continued for the space of twenty-one years, and been marked with scenes of blood and devastation that shewed the peculiar rancour of both nations, almost ever since linked in the closest ties of friendship. Alsace, Roussillon, Artois, and Flanders, became provinces of France. Thus the principal objects of Richelieu's politics, viz. the extension of the boundaries of the French monarch, were happily executed by the victories of Turenne, and the negociations of Mazarine. Whatever ridicule the witty St. Evremond, in his letter to Crequi, may have cast on this treaty, it certainly was not the work of a day, nor of a minister of ordinary capacity. Mazarine, perhaps, never upon any other occasion displayed so much political foresight. The marriage between Lewis and the infanta was negociated about four years before; but then the cardinal would seem to have only certain advantages gained by the peace of Munster in view: he was not apprized at that time of the prodigious changes which this alliance between the crowns of France and Spain would introduce into the politics of Europe. Voltaire intimates, that it was not without some struggles he could bring himself to renounce the ambitious project he is said to have formed of marrying his niece Mademoiselle Mancini to the king<sup>r</sup>. This was the last material transaction of the cardinal's administration; and it is alone sufficient to prove, that he was penetrating and sagacious. He died on the following year, released Lewis from Mazarine's the bondage of rigid tutelage, suffered that prince at length to become a sovereign, and to deat's and cha- wield the scepter as well as to wear the diadem. Writers are greatly divided about the cha-<sup>acter.</sup> racter of his minister, whom some think little inferior in capacity to Richelieu; while others affirm, that all his notions consisted in chicane and artifice, and his success proceeded from good fortune and perseverance. But candour must own, that Mazarine was subtle, enterprising, indefatigable; that he was vain, haughty, and avaricious. The eclat with which he returned from banishment, the treaty of the Pyrenees, the absolute dominion he gained at court, his triumph over all his competitors, his last testament, his immense wealth, and little arts to gain the reputation of a warrior, are proofs of our allegations<sup>s</sup>. His good sense, rather than his genius, raised him to the highest pinnacle of fame and power; the selfishness of his disposition prevented his using his authority for the good of the public, or leaving any vestiges of that elevation of soul which creates the true statesman (A).

<sup>a</sup> DANIEL Hist. de France, tom. v. HAINAULT, p. 715.
t. i. p. 16.

<sup>r</sup> Siecle, t. i. p. 84.

<sup>s</sup> PELLISON,

(A) It ought to have been observed, that the king's marriage was solemnized at St. John de Luz on the 9th of June, 1660; and that their majesties made their public entry into Paris on the 26th of August, with all possible magnificence and splendor. On this occasion was built the gate of St. Antoine; but it somewhat diminished the lustre of the procession, that foreign ministers declined attending, because M. Fabert had ordered, that marshals of France should take place of them (1).

(1) Hainault, p. 717.

S E C T. XIV.

History of France, from the death of cardinal Mazarine, to the peace of Utrecht.

Lewis XIV. takes the reins of government into his own hands.

AT the death of Mazarine, a variety of attempts were made to gain the same ascendance over the king, which that minister had long maintained; but Lewis had tasted too much restraint and controul, ever again to submit to the same authority. All imagined that a prince, bred up in perfect ignorance of the art of government, would soon find himself oppressed with the weight of public affairs; but they were astonished when they saw him determined to try the strength of his own genius, and fix the several departments of his ministers, beyond which they were not permitted to act. They were still more amazed to see him give separate hours of audience to each; to see the finances put upon the best footing, discipline restored among the troops, and all the luxuries and pleasures of a court blended with a regular attention to the business of the nation.

ON the 5th of September, M. Fouquet, superintendant of the finances, was arrested at Nantz, for some misdemeanors committed in the office of solicitor general to the parliament of Paris. Of all his professed friends, M. Pellison alone now adhered to him in his misfortune, and shewed, that his attachment was to the person, and not to the dignity, of the unhappy criminal, who was condemned first to perpetual banishment, and then, for reasons of state, to perpetual imprisonment. The place of superintendant was suppressed, but the chief direction of the finances was committed to Colbert, as comptroller-general; a person bred to business under Mazarine, and formed by nature for the very office to which he was promoted. Le Tellier held the post of secretary of state for domestic affairs, and de Louvois for that of foreign; all were unconnected with each other, and subject to no controul but the sovereign's. Regular accounts were delivered to the king, of whatever was transacted in their several offices. They were applauded, reprimanded, and consulted, according to their defects, and the confidence reposed in them; but Colbert, from the nature of his office, and his own capacity, soon engrossed the greater share of power and influence. The great number of changes introduced into public employments, the salutary edicts published on this occasion, and the excellent choice of ministers, all reflect great honour on this period of the reign of Lewis XIV. To specify them all would be tedious and unnecessary, as the reader may find them in such a variety of authentic books, memoirs, lives, and histories<sup>a</sup>.

A dispute between the French and Spanish ambassadors in London.

A DISPUTE between the French and Spanish ambassadors, at London, about precedence, had almost involved the two kingdoms in a fresh war. These kinds of disputes were formerly decided at Rome; for the pope, who disposed of kingdoms and states by a bull, thought he might with much more reason take cognizance of points of honour. With respect to France and Spain, the precedence was always adjudged to that court most in favour, or most dreaded by his holiness, so that the dispute rested undetermined. When the Swedish ambassador made his public entry, the count d'Estrade, ambassador from Lewis, demanded the place of honour in the procession of baron Watteville, ambassador from Philip. The Spaniard, having gained the populace on his side by the brilliancy of his train, and the liberality with which he threw money among them, first cut the traces of the French ambassador's chariot, wounded several of his attendants, suffered his own servants to commit the grossest insults, and then marched at the head of his retinue with their swords drawn, and the most insulting expressions of triumph. Lewis, informed of the affront put on d'Estrade, recalled his ambassador from Madrid, ordered the Spanish minister immediately to quit France, broke off the conferences in Flanders about adjusting the frontier, and gave notice to his father-in-law Philip IV. that unless he acknowledged the superiority of the French crown, and made proper satisfaction for the affront, he would immediately resume the war. Philip had no inclination again to plunge his people in those misfortunes out of which they had so lately emerged by the peace of the Pyrenees; he sent the count de Fuentes to declare to his majesty at Fontainebleau, in presence of all the foreign ministers at that time in France, "that the Spanish ministers would not henceforward treat about precedence with the French." This declaration did not absolutely acknowledge the pre-eminence of Lewis, but it certainly implied the weakness of Philip.

The pope is forced to make concessions to Lewis.

A. D. 1662.

ANOTHER affair of a similar nature happened in Italy, from which Lewis extricated himself with great honour. The insolence of the duke of Crequi's servant occasioned a tumult in the streets of Rome, in which some Italians were killed, and several wounded among the city guard. Animated by Mario Gbigi, the pope's brother, who highly resented the indignity sustained by the Romans, and hated Crequi, the populace besieged the ambassador in his house, a dragged his lady out of her coach as she was entering the house, killed a French page, and wounded several domestics. The duke immediately quitted Rome, and complained loudly to the king of the insult offered to his ambassador, not only by the populace at Rome, but by the pope's relations, and even by himself. Lewis demanded reparation; but the pope temporised, and endeavoured to put off what he durst not absolutely refuse. At length, after four months altercation, he sent two of the populace, and the governor, supposed to have abetted the sedition, into France; but he was terrified to find that the king threatened to besiege Rome, had actually ordered troops to file off for Italy, and appointed the marshal Plessis Praslin to command on that service. However, before he consented to make the humiliating concessions required, he implored the mediation of all the catholic princes, and endeavoured to stir them up against Lewis; but the circumstances of Europe were unfavourable to his design, and his conduct served only to incense the king, without hurting him. At last his holiness found, that complying was his only resource; he banished his brother, sent his nephew cardinal Chigi in quality of legate to France, to make the king ample satisfaction, to promise the abolition of the town guards, and that a pyramid should be erected in Rome, to perpetuate the injury done to the ambassador, and the concessions made to his master. Chigi was the first legate ever sent from thence to solicit pardon; formerly they came to impose laws, and exact tythes, and nothing could be more mortifying than this diminution from the dignity of that sovereign of kings, and representative of St. Peter <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> PELLISON, p. 28.

c But while Lewis was thus employed in supporting the dignity, he did not neglect the necessary measures to augment the power, of his crown. The finances were so well managed by Colbert, as to put the king in a condition to treat with the English about the sale of Dunkirk and Mardyke. 5,000,000 of livres were offered, a sum too great for the needy and prodigal Charles to refuse, though he was shamefully disposing of the price of English blood. Lewis immediately employed thirty thousand men in erecting works at Dunkirk, which were executed with such expedition, that in a little time the English, who had just quitted it, would scarce have known the town <sup>c</sup>.

d It was the maxim of Lewis to endeavour to augment and enlarge his dominions by negotiation, but to hold himself in constant readiness to make war, to keep his frontier in good condition, and his troops complete and well disciplined. It was the policy of the French kings, from the time of Francis the first, to keep a good correspondence with the Porte, and even to maintain an alliance with the grand Turk, for the benefit of trade, and clipping the wings of the house of Austria. But though it was the interest of France that the emperor should be kept in constant employment by the Turks, it was not convenient that Germany should be over-run by that warlike people. To prevent Hungary from falling into the hands of the infidels, Lewis deviated from the policy of his ancestors, became the auxiliary of the house of Austria, and detached 6000 men under the count Coligni, the last branch of that family, so celebrated in the civil wars, to assist the emperor, and join Montecuculi, a general afterwards employed by the emperor to balance the fortune and rival the glory of the great Turenne <sup>d</sup>.

e Though the crowns of France and Spain were at peace, yet Lewis did not fail to assist Portugal against his own father-in-law. Mazarine, finding he could not include the Portuguese in the peace of the Pyrenees, formally abandoned their interest; but as the Spaniards had been guilty of divers slight infractions of that treaty, Lewis thought himself at liberty privately to espouse the cause of Portugal. Marshal Schomberg, a foreigner and a protestant, was permitted to serve them with 4000 French soldiers paid with Lewis's money, but supposed to be hired by the king of Portugal. The French monarch could not think of the re-union of the crowns of Spain and Portugal, by the conquest of the latter kingdom; and that this might have been the case, had not marshal Schomberg very opportunely arrived, is more than probable. The French troops, joined to the Portuguese, obtained the signal victory of Villa Viciosa, which established the duke of Bragança on the throne of Portugal. Thus Lewis, upon his first taking the reins of government, obtained the reputation of a politic and even of a warlike prince, before he had even entered upon open war.

f It was deemed no slight proof his genius for the cabinet, his having so artfully tampered with the duke of Lorraine, that enterprising and whimsical prince. From him he obtained the city of Marsol, and the reversion of the duchy of Lorraine at the death of Charles IV. on condition that a certain sum of money should be paid to himself, and the rights of princes of the blood of France conferred on his heirs. It was likewise no bad instance of his policy, that he improved the marine of France, from five or six frigates, to thirty ships of the line, during the war between England and Holland. Voltaire relates, that when the Dutch demanded his aid in the beginning of that war, an old fireship was the only vessel of war in the harbour of <sup>The weak state of the marine of France.</sup>

<sup>b</sup> PELLISON, t. i. p. 117.
p. 343.

<sup>c</sup> Sieck, t. i. p. 103.

<sup>d</sup> PELLISON, ut supra. Vie de Turenne,

Brest (A). We shall now see him acting in a higher capacity, and, by the most aspiring views and daring projects, threatening the liberties of Europe.

Lewis forms pretensions upon the Netherlands. THE death of Philip IV. afforded Lewis the first opportunity of displaying his talents in casuistry for the purposes of his ambition. The artful pen of Louvois drew up that subtle manifesto, wherein Lewis, in right of his queen, claimed Cambresis, Burgundy, Luxemburgh, and the greatest part of the Spanish Netherlands, by virtue of the right of devolution that takes place in the Low Countries, by which the children of the first marriage, male or female, inherit before those of the second. Maria Theresa, queen of France, was the only remaining child of Philip IV. by the first marriage, so that the king's pretensions seemed to be founded not only on the constitution of the country, but the decrees of the council of Mechlin, which authorize this law of succession, and the acknowledgement of the dukes of Brabant and Charles V. who submitted to it. Unfortunately, however, for Lewis, he had renounced all pretensions to the Spanish succession before the solemnization of his marriage; but this difficulty was easily removed, by asserting, that it was out of his power to surrender the rights of his queen and her children <sup>f</sup>.

He invades
Flanders, LEWIS wanted not specious arguments, and able heads about him to enforce them, but he relied more on the sword than the pen. His forces, he knew, would carry conviction where his arguments might happen to fail; accordingly he marched to Flanders at the head of thirty-five thousand men, sending at the same time a corps of eight thousand, under marshal d'Aumont, towards Dunkirk; and another of four thousand, under the marquis de Crequi, into Luxemburgh. The queen was appointed regent during his majesty's absence, and a council nominated to assist her, at which presided the chancellor Seguir, and the marshal d'Etrees. Colbert had so managed the finances, that the resources of the state were greatly multiplied, and the revenues put into the best order; while Louvois, the new minister, placed in the department of war, had made prodigious preparations for the campaign, and distributed magazines of every kind along the frontier. Louvois had first introduced that custom, which the weakness of the government had till then rendered impracticable, of supporting vast armies by magazines. On whatever side the king turned his arms, necessities of every kind were ready, quarters for the troops marked out, and even the marches regulated. Turenne, now created a marshal of France, commanded under the king, his majesty declaring his intention to learn the art of war from this great general.

Takes several towns, and NOTHING could withstand the efforts of an army so well provided, animated with the presence of a young ambitious king, and headed by the most experienced and renowned officer in Europe; but the frontier was quite defenceless, and Lewis entered Charleroi as he would Paris. Furnes, Armentieres, and Courtrai, were taken in two days; the king sat down before Douai, and took it next morning; and even Lille, the most beautiful and best fortified town in the Netherlands, garrisoned with 6000 men, stood a siege of no more than nine days. Lille appeared so strong, that Louvois would have dissuaded his majesty from it; it was defended by fourteen royal bastions; the inhabitants able to carry arms amounted to 20,000; the governor was an officer of great experience, and the garrison was well provided with every necessary for sustaining a siege. Indeed the Spaniards seemed to have bestowed their whole care on this town, while they neglected almost every other. The reliance Lewis had on the abilities of Turenne, and his order to finish the campaign with some difficult enterprize that would reflect real glory on his arms, made him deaf to the remonstrances of his minister. The place was invested, and lines of circumvallation drawn, with all possible expedition. After five vigorous sallies, in which nothing remarkable occurred, the count de Croni, the governor, capitulated, and marched out with his garrison to Ypres. The count de Marsin, and prince de Lignes, not knowing that the city had capitulated, were advancing to throw succours into it. They were suddenly attacked and defeated by the marquis de Crequi and the marquis de Bellefonds, who took 1500 prisoners, eighteen standards, and five pair of kettle-drums <sup>e</sup>.

concludes the campaign with the reduction of Lille. AFTER this victory, the king returned to Paris, without having once experienced the hardships or dangers of a campaign; for the army marched with such abundance, and overran the country with so much ease, that the court thought themselves upon a tour of pleasure.

<sup>e</sup> Siccle, t. i. p. 107.

<sup>f</sup> VOLT. ut supra, HAINAULT, p. 734.

<sup>g</sup> PELLIS. vol. i. p. 122.

(A) Lewis balanced a considerable time whether he should declare in favour of England or Holland; he was ashamed to discover the weakness of his marine, and afraid to throw Charles II. into the arms of Spain. At last, however, he detached six thousand men to assist the Hollanders against the bishop of Munster, that warlike and ambitious prelate, so long the scourge and terror of the republic. Before the peace concluded at Breda, a French squadron of thirty ships, under the duke de Beauport, had joined the Dutch, which shews the vast increase of the marine, under the auspices of Colbert and Louvois (1).

(1) Hainault, p. 735.

- a THE rapidity of these conquests gave the alarm to Brussels; the citizens removed all their best effects to Antwerp. It is probable that the reduction of the whole country would have been the work of no more than one campaign, had the king's forces been numerous enough to garrison the towns he had taken. Louvois advised the putting strong garrisons, and fortifying them. His advice was followed, and the direction of the works committed to Vauban, A. D. 1668. Men were now surprised to see towns fortified with works as level as the field, and high walls despised as food only for the artillery. It was matter of astonishment to behold places made strong in proportion as they appeared more naked and defenceless. The citadel of Lille was constructed on this principle, and it has been admired as a master-piece in the kind.<sup>a</sup> Vauban fortifies the conquered towns.
- b ALL the states of Europe were alarmed at these conquests, which seemed to wait only for the death of the sickly Charles II. king of Spain, to grasp at the union of both crowns, and thence lay the foundation of universal empire. The Dutch were more immediately exposed to his designs, and wished for an opportunity of uniting with England in a confederacy that should be able to oppose a sufficient barrier to the ambition of Lewis. The king of England, The triple alliance formed. ambassador extraordinary to the Hague, with full powers to conclude a treaty with the states general, and stipulate the terms most promising to stop the career of Lewis. In five days the alliance was concluded, every difficulty yielding to the address of the English minister, whose abilities shone forth with uncommon lustre on this occasion. The king of Sweden acceded to this alliance, as a principal; and thus was formed the triple alliance, by which the contracting powers assumed to themselves the office of arbiters in the difference between France and Spain in the Netherlands, as well as in the war between Spain and Portugal. Its object was, to support the Spanish monarchy, restrain the exorbitant power of France, and prevent a dreadful war in which all Europe would probably be involved. The scheme was well concerted; it was therefore applauded, and, with respect to England, seemed by far the wisest step entered upon during the reign of Charles II.<sup>b</sup>
- c THE triple alliance was founded upon an alternative which Lewis had proposed to the court of Madrid. He offered to relinquish the rights of his queen, on condition the court of Spain would either consent to his keeping the conquests already made in the Low Countries, or, in their stead, cede to him Franche Comté, with the towns of Cambray, Aix, and St. Omer. The queen regent of Spain kept aloof, in expectation of the happy effects of the triple alliance; and Lewis ordered his troops to file off towards Franche Comté, and gave the prince of Condé the command, having under him his friend Bouteville Montmorenci, who never forsook him in the midst of adversity. It was thought the prince was set up by Louvois to lessen the reputation of Turenne with his master, who consulted him not only as the general of his armies, but as a minister. Condé and Turenne had been old rivals; they could not but admire, while they continued to hate, each other. Turenne gave up the command, assuring the king, that he could not have bestowed his favour upon a general half so deserving as Condé; and the prince received it with a compliment to Turenne, that whoever succeeded must appear to uncommon disadvantage. Condé felt his martial ardour return, when he saw himself at the head of an army, which at the same time intimated an oblivion of his past conduct. He assembled his troops, entered Franche Comté, made himself master of it in ten days, and obtained the government of his conquests for a reward.<sup>c</sup> The prince of Condé over-runs Franche Comté.

d THE queen regent of Spain, finding that no benefit hitherto resulted from the triple alliance, and that the conquest of the whole Netherlands might be effected in almost as short a time as Condé employed in the reduction of Franche Comté, consented at length to the French king's keeping his conquests in the Low Countries, on the supposition that the Dutch would necessarily be obliged to oppose him, should he attempt to extend his acquisition in the Netherlands. It seemed extraordinary that her Spanish majesty had not rather preferred ceding Franche Comté, together with Cambray, Aix, and St. Omer, than thus to expose all the great towns in Flanders by the vicinity of so enterprising and ambitious a neighbour as Lewis. But this was a refined stroke of policy in the marquis de Castel Rodrigo, indispensably to engage the English and Dutch on the side of Spain. The Dutch used all their influence to oppose a measure which threatened danger to themselves; but the court of Spain was not to be altered in their resolutions, especially as the king of France gave weight to the negotiation with an army of 100,000 men, great part of which he ordered to take the route towards Brussels. Aix-la-Chapelle was the place fixed upon for the meeting of the plenipotentiaries, who were immediately sent thither from France, Spain, England, Sweden, and Holland. The treaty A peace concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle. was signed in May, after a very short negotiation, and by it Lewis remained in possession of all the towns he had reduced in Flanders. He restored Franche Comté to the Spaniards, and the peace was guarantied by the powers composing the triple alliance. The vanity of the republic of the states general broke out in an insolent and ridiculous medal struck by public order, with a pompous inscription, arrogating to herself the honour of having given peace to all Europe. Joshua Van Beuningen, the Dutch plenipotentiary at Aix-la-Chapelle, was weak enough to strike another, in which he compared himself to Joshua stopping the course of the sun, which was the device of the French monarch. These and other unseasonable marks of pride gave umbrage to Lewis, who seemed to remember them in the sequel, when he found an opportunity to punish the presumption of the republic<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Sicile, t. i. p. 113.<sup>b</sup> HAINAULT, t. ii. p. 734.<sup>c</sup> Vie de Condé, p. 204.

The king studies the art: of peace. IT was not long before the king took ample vengeance; but he first employed himself in the arts of peace, in beautifying, regulating, adorning, and embellishing his kingdom, with all the arts of taste and magnificence. His conduct proved, that an absolute king, with a disposition to do good, may easily accomplish every inclination. He had nothing to do but to direct, and the successes in the administration were as rapid as those in the field: every difficulty yielded to the genius and indefatigable industry of Colbert and Louvois, two ministers born to raise the French monarchy to the highest pitch of grandeur. Sea-ports, before naked and desolate, were surrounded with works, and filled with shipping. About sixty large men of war were equipped, and ready to put to sea at the shortest notice. New colonies flourished in Asia, Africa, and America, which reflected no less honour on the administration than they returned wealth to the nation. The arts were cultivated with the utmost assiduity, and the finest taste for painting and architecture broke forth in many magnificent monuments of Lewis's patronage. Learning in all its branches flourished, and reason and taste united to expel the remains of Gothic barbarism out of France. In this manner was the French monarch employed, when the excessive pride and power of the republic of Holland drew upon her his jealousy, and that bloody war which had almost ended in the total annihilation of the states general of the United Provinces<sup>m</sup>.

The state of Holland.

THIS republic, by invariably pursuing the maxims of perfect prudence, industry, and frugality, had attained the highest pitch of grandeur and glory. Amsterdam was become the emporium of Europe, and the richest city in the universe. Holland alone contained three millions of souls, and all the other provinces were proportionably populous. The states dispatched ministers and consuls to China, Siam, and Bengal, to the great mogul, the king of Persia, the khan of Tartary, the grand signor, the czar of Muscovy, and the princes of Africa. They were considered as an important weight in the scale of Europe, and no treaty was concluded without their ambassadors. The late triple alliance, into which they had entered, gave Lewis suspicion that they proposed to set bounds to his ambition, and clip those bold pinions which had so swiftly conveyed his conquests over the Low Countries. Van Beuningen's insolence at the late treaty, and since during his residence at the French court, highly disgusted his majesty, who was shocked at the presumption and pride of a republic just started out of obscurity, and gained, in the space of a century, out of the ocean. But what was still more alarming to Lewis, was the probability that the Dutch would ruin the manufactures of France, and his new established commerce in the Indies. His jealousy discovered itself in divers instances; and the pensioner De Witt, his brother, and his party, did all in their power to remove these prejudices; but the unhappy differences, which then prevailed in the United Provinces, frustrated all their endeavours. The prince of Orange's family, the avowed enemies of France, and the impudent vanity of Van Beuningen increased the king's distrust. Lewis watched every motion of prince William, and perceived that all his measures tended to oppose the ambition of France, establish the power of his own family, and augment the grandeur of a republic formed by his ancestors, and rescued out of slavery by their victorious courage<sup>n</sup>.

A. D. 1670.
Lewis's designs upon the United Provinces.

He fixes on Lorraine.

LEWIS now sought every opportunity of breaking with the Dutch, less perhaps from any dread of their power, or ability to injure him, than with a view to enlarge his dominions by the intire conquest of the Low Countries. He knew that the whole strength of the republic consisted in her marine; that her frontier was weak, her provinces divided, and the chief power in the hands of men inveterately set against the family of Orange, the ancient captains of the republic. His first attempt was to dissolve the triple alliance, and disengage from it Charles II. king of Great Britain. In this business the duchess of Orleans was employed; she went to England, under pretence of visiting the king her brother: her negotiation was successful, and she returned triumphant to Paris. In the mean time Lewis possessed himself of Lorraine, of which he took possession, under pretence that duke Charles was forming alliances in the empire against France, and infringing every article of the treaty he had so lately concluded with his most Christian majesty. In this manner was this restless, turbulent, and suspicious prince, deprived a second time of his dominions, and forced to wander a vagabond, first to Cologne, and then to Frankfort, there to wait for better fortune, or a more favourable

<sup>1</sup> VOLT. p. 121.

<sup>m</sup> Siecle, t. i. p. 128.

<sup>n</sup> Id. ibid. & sup.

opportunity

a opportunity of embroiling the empire. Upon this occasion we cannot agree with those writers who assert, that the ambition of Lewis led him to commit the most flagrant acts of tyranny and oppression with respect to Charles IV. In our opinion, self-defence and political prudence dictated, that some restraint should be laid upon the conduct of a prince, who was acting in his natural element when he was fomenting divisions among all his neighbours °.

Lewis spent the year following in negotiations with the emperor, Spain, and Sweden, with the electors of Cologne and Brandenburgh, with the bishop of Munster, and other spiritual and temporal German princes. His design was to prevent their acceding to the triple alliance, from which he had already weaned one power, the most considerable of the whole. The ambitious, rapacious, and warlike, bishop of Munster, beheld with uneasiness the growing power of the United Provinces; he pretended, that they had made several attempts upon the counties of Stirum, Culemburg, Bentheim, and East Friesland; that they had seized on Ravestein on the Meuse, and several other places belonging to his bishoprick. In his own defence he concluded a treaty with France, and prevailed on the elector of Cologne to follow his example. By signing a treaty with these two princes the king opened a way to Holland by the Meuse and the Rhine; he established by this means places of arms and magazines in a country distant from his own dominions, and secured a retreat in case his enterprize proved abortive. With respect to the emperor, every artifice was used to keep him neutral; and indeed his own inclinations co-operated but little in favour of the Dutch, whom he regarded as subjects revolted from the princes of his family, and in possession of several places belonging to the empire. In Sweden, Lewis's negotiations were equally successful; for here he prevailed so far with Charles XI. as to obtain a stipulation, that if the emperor, or any of the princes of the empire, joined their forces to the Dutch, a Swedish army should then march into the very heart of Germany and join the French, in order to force those princes to observe the treaty of Westphalia.

WHATEVER the views of Lewis's allies might have been, it is but too probable his intention was not to curb, but to destroy, the republic, and thereby to annex the United Provinces to his own dominions. At least he wanted to reduce all the towns and fortresses possessed by the Dutch on the Meuse, in Brabant, and in Flanders; while the bishop of Munster watched the opportunity of retaking all his towns in Overijssel and Zutphen; the elector of Cologne, Rhinberg, and the places dependent on his electorate; and the king of Great Britain to possess himself of certain islands in the province of Zealand for the security of the British trade p.

OF all the Germanic body, the elector of Brandenburgh alone interested himself for the safety of the States General. The peace of Westphalia had prevented this enterprising prince from extending his dominions in Germany, and retaking Pomerania from the Swedes. He had long aspired at the stadtholdership of Holland; and though that office had been for six years suppressed, yet he flattered himself, that, in case of a war, he might obtain it, perpetuate it in his family, and in time reduce Holland by dint of force, intrigue, and stratagem. With this view he winked at the encroachments of the Dutch in the country of Cleves; he made no demands upon them for the large sums owing him by the republic; he suffered them quietly to possess several of his towns; he interested himself in their quarrels with their neighbours; he rejected the proposals of several princes of the empire, and even those of France, endeavouring by every possible method to insinuate himself into the friendship and confidence of the States. In the end he concluded a treaty with them, whereby it was stipulated, that he should assist the republic with 25,000 men. Beverning, the Dutch ambassador at Madrid, disconcerted all the schemes of France at that court, and engaged the queen of Spain to furnish money and troops for the defence of the United Provinces. Thus was the face of Europe wholly changed. France and England, who had contributed largely to the raising and aggrandizing the republic, were now incited to destroy her; while Spain, that for an age had been endeavouring to suppress her, was arming for her support. Pierre de Groot, the Dutch minister at Paris, was employed to penetrate into Lewis's designs; he gave his constituents notice that he foresaw a terrible storm ready to fall upon them, which they might nevertheless break by seasonable submissions and proper acknowledgements. Upon this the states wrote to the king, endeavouring to appease his wrath; but, finding him inexorable, they prepared for receiving him, and provided for the security of their provinces. But the long peace the republic had enjoyed destroyed her standing forces, and little confidence could be reposed in new levied soldiers q.

As soon as matters were ripe for execution, Lewis ordered an army of 100,000 men to file off towards the Rhine. Before the opening of the campaign, and previous to his declaration of war, he divided his army into four columns, commanding one in person, with the marshal Turenne under him. Another was led by the prince of Conde, assisted by the marshals Humieres and Bellefonds; the third was headed by Crequi, and the fourth marched to Westphalia, under the conduct of the duke of Luxembourg, to join the bishop of Munster. As the marshals

° HAINAULT Hist. p. 743.

p Ibid. 747.

q Hist. des Provinces Unies, p. 426.

Crequi,

A. D. 1671.

Designs of the bishop of Munster.

The elector of Brandenburgh espouses the cause of the Dutch.

A. D. 1672.

The king's army begin their march.

Crequi, Bellefonds, and Humieres, refused to receive orders from Turenne, they were banished; <sup>a</sup> but, after six months exile, were recalled, at the instance of the whole body of marshals in France, upon their making proper submissions.

The Dutch
preparations.

SUCH an army drawing towards their frontiers could not but terrify the Dutch, now torn with civil factions. The partisans of the Orange family were for abolishing the perpetual edict, and raising William III. to the dignity enjoyed by his predecessors; but the De Witt faction opposed him violently, though they could not prevent the young prince from being chosen captain general and high admiral. Many persons hoped that William's new dignity would incline his uncle Charles II. to return to the triple alliance; but that hope was frustrated by the conduct of his majesty, who, in conjunction with the most Christian king, declared war against the States General on the 7th day of April. A month after, the elector of Cologne <sup>b</sup> and bishop of Munster followed the example of the two kings. The Dutch put themselves in the best posture of defence that circumstances would admit. Maastricht was strongly garrisoned; the prince of Orange had assembled an army of 25,000 men, with which he advanced to the banks of the Iffel, and the Dutch fleet cruised off the mouth of the Thames, to prevent the junction of the naval forces of England and France, which amounted to 150 ships. All Europe watched the first motions of two powerful kings, seconded by the greatest generals of the age <sup>c</sup>.

The king begins the campaign.

His most Christian majesty set out from St. Germain en Laye about the end of April, and joined his army at Charleroy. It was composed of twenty-three companies of gens d'armes, life-guards, musqueteers, and light horse, two regiments of the French and Swiss guards, <sup>c</sup> fourteen regiments of foreign infantry, and sixty regiments of light horse or dragoons, comprising in all an army of 110,000 fighting men, under the command of marshal Turenne as captain-general. Holland could only be attacked by the Rhine or the Meuse, and the generals and ministers differed by which of these inlets they were to make the first impressions. The former were for laying siege to Maastricht, the latter thought the enterprize hazardous, and too expensive for any utility it could produce. They were for marching towards the Rhine to encourage the allies of France, then penetrating into the heart of Holland, and thereby facilitating the taking of towns upon the Meuse. At last, after several deliberations, it was determined to make both attacks at the same time, in order the more to divide the enemies forces, and disconcert their councils. It is probable that Turenne always opposed the siege of Maastricht, <sup>d</sup> for we find him, immediately after the surrender of Maseick, strongly dissuading the king from that enterprize, in opposition to the sentiments of the prince of Conde. At last he prevailed, and it was resolved in council to advance towards the Rhine, and besiege at the same time the towns of Rhinberg, Vessel, Orsoi, and Burick. These places were all well fortified, and deemed the keys of Holland; however, the Dutch did not appear disturbed at their being invested, as they were only under their protection, and did not immediately belong to the United Provinces. They were, besides, in hopes, that any attempts upon the territory of Cleves would hasten the preparations of the elector of Brandenburgh, and even rouse the emperor into a sense of the danger he was in from the vast designs of Lewis. Nothing could oppose armies so well appointed, led by generals so skilful and so experienced. The four towns surrendered within <sup>e</sup> a few days of each other, and Rhinberg, that held out longest, opened its gates on the 7th of June. A few days after the town and fort of Rhees and the town of Emerick surrendered; upon which the king resolved to pass the Rhine by a ford, over which the cavalry were to swim. This bold enterprize was projected and conducted by Conde, who, in the face of two regiments of foot, and several squadrons of horse, under general Wartz, intrenched on the opposite side, effected the passage, in the same order, and with as much regularity, as if he had marched his troops on dry land. The enemy made a stout resistance; but were driven from their post, after having killed the duke de Longueville on the spot, and wounded the prince of Conde in the wrist, which disabled him for some time from attending the service, and obliged him to resign the command of his army to Turenne <sup>f</sup>.

The rapidity of his conquests.

It is almost incredible with what rapidity towns and fortresses yielded to the fortune of his majesty's arms. The reduction of Beitau, the most fruitful country of the United Provinces, and the surrender of Tolbus fort, obliged the prince of Orange to abandon the Iffel, lest he should be attacked in the rear, and retire to the very heart of the country, as far as Rbenen, in the province of Utrecht. By this means the town of Arnheim, the forts of Knotsemburgh, Voorn, St. Andre, and Skenck, this last the strongest in the Netherlands (having cost the great Henry Frederic prince of Orange a seven months siege), a variety of other towns and forts, surrendered as soon as summoned; and at last Nimeguen, a town strong from the nature of the works and fortifications, and garrisoned by 8000 fighting men, including the inhabitants, was invested. After the citizens had, for eight days, exhibited signal proofs of courage a in defence of their liberties they were forced to yield to the superior good fortune, skill, and experience, of Turenne <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire des Provinces Unies, p. 426.

<sup>b</sup> Siecle, t. i. p. 178. <sup>c</sup> Petits, t. ii. p. 219.

In the mean time the bishop of Munster and elector of Cologne, having joined the body of troops under the command of the duke of Luxembourg, the united army entered the province of Overyffel, and by dint of cruelty, and the terror which the duke spread, reduced the towns as soon as he appeared before them. Animated by that implacable rage that constantly attends religious wars, the two prelates obliged the duke to exert a severity, by no means suited to his nature, against heretics and the rebellious subjects of the house of Austria. Next the king's forces penetrated into the province of Utrecht, where their conquests went on with the same rapidity, and put the capital of the province in the utmost danger. To retard its fate, the Dutch could imagine no other expedient than opening sluices, and overflowing the country. The other towns followed the example of Utrecht, and Holland, Brabant, and Dutch Flanders, was one vast lake, the towns rising like islands in the midst of the waters. Farther to stem the torrent of Lewis's conquests, the people were persuaded the only barrier was to lodge the supreme power in the hands of the prince of Orange. They accordingly obliged the states of Holland and West-Friesland to abrogate the perpetual edict, and unite the dignity of stadtholder to those of captain general and high admiral, with which the prince was already invested. They likewise sent remonstrances so pathetic to his majesty, that Charles, moved with the situation of the republic, and jealous of the designs of Lewis, dispatched the duke of Buckingham and earl of Arlington into Holland, to quiet the fears of the Dutch, and insist upon the king's penetrating no farther into Holland. In case of Lewis's refusal, his Britannic majesty declared he would break the alliance, as he perceived, that, instead of securing Zealand to the English, agreeable to the treaty, the designs of France were to unite the whole republic to their own monarchy <sup>2</sup>. His most Christian majesty had in fact no great regard to the menaces of an ally he despised; but as persisting obstinately to advance into a country, which the inundation rendered impassable, might terminate in blasting all the blooming laurels he had acquired, he seemed, out of compliment to the king of England, to listen to terms of accommodation; which, after all his victories, could not fail of proving advantageous. In the space of three months he had conquered the provinces of Guelderland, Overyffel, and Utrecht, taken above fifty towns and forts, and made 24,000 prisoners. Conde and Turenne advised his majesty to send the prisoners to work upon the canal of Languedoc, and to leave all the places that were not essential to the preservation of his conquests; but Louvois was of a different opinion, and his sentiments determined the king. The prisoners were released for a trifling ransom, and the king's army totally reduced and exhausted by the continual drains made to garrison the conquered places <sup>3</sup>.

A NEGOCIATION was set on foot at Boxtel, near Bois-le-duc, whither the king, attended by the English ambassadors and the Dutch deputies, repaired. What he chiefly insisted upon was a treaty of commerce, for regulating the rights of the French and Dutch East and West India companies; the public exercise of the catholic religion in all the territories of the States General; twenty millions of livres to reimburse his expences in the war, and a confirmation of his conquests on the Meuse, On the the opposite side of the Rhine, and in the empire, in consideration of his restoring the three provinces. His Britannic majesty demanded the compliment of the flag where-ever his ships appeared, a million sterling for his expences, a hundred thousand pounds sterling yearly for the right of fishing on the coasts of Great Britain and Ireland, a share in all the commerce of the Indies, and the perpetuity of the stadtholdership for his nephew the prince of Orange. These propositions were rejected with disdain by the Dutch, who, animated by their stadtholder, resolved to wait a change of fortune in the midst of the waters. They used every expedient to rouse the princes of Germany in their defence, and so successfully, that the elector of Brandenburgh, the nearest and most interested prince, prepared to take the field. The undaunted courage, the vigilance, and public spirit, of the prince of Orange, gained him the intire confidence and affection of the republic, and excited their resentment against the two De Witts, his implacable enemies, whom they accused of receiving pensions from Lewis. The suggestion was false; but possibly their love of liberty, and jealousy of the house of Orange, had carried these two great politicians too far in their pacific measures and complaisance to the power of the French monarch. The pensioner was attacked in the street by the populace, and by his personal bravery broke through the croud, and saved his life, though covered with wounds <sup>4</sup> (A).

WILLIAM

<sup>1</sup> Siecle, t. i. p. 178. PELIS. t. ii. p. 219.

AULT, sub hoc an.

<sup>2</sup> WICQF. Hist. 229. Sir W. TEMP. Mem.

<sup>3</sup> Mem. de De Witt, p. 209.

<sup>4</sup> HAIN-

(A) Soon after the sedition broke out afresh, and the partisans of the house of Orange again stirred up the animosity of the republic against the De Witts. MOD. HIST. VOL. IX.

Several crimes were laid to the pensioner's charge, but he cleared himself. Suborned witnesses accused his brother of an attempt to poison the prince of Orange.

The emperor
espouses the Dutch.

A. D. 1673.

Turenne baffles the imperial army.

Policy of France.

Conde retires beyond the Meuse.

WILLIAM of Orange in the mean time daily ingratiated himself more. He gave up his whole fortune for the safety of the state, and exerted himself with such prudence and ability, that all Europe began to unite against the two kings, by the month of July. Every prince in Germany was in motion to succour the Dutch. The emperor, the king of Denmark, the elector of Brandenburgh, the duke of Brunswick Lunenburgh, the landgrave of Hesse, immediately ordered their troops to join; several of the other princes were preparing to take the field. All were jealous, England began to waver, and there was not a power in Europe upon whom Lewis the fourteenth could heartily rely. The army of Brandenburgh, commanded by the elector in person, and the forces of the empire, under the famous count Montecuculi, joined near Heidelsheim, and composed a body of 40,000 men. Turenne, now appointed generalissimo of the king's army on his majesty's return to Paris, marches to oppose the enemy's passing the Rhine. For three whole months were the elector and Montecuculi employed in abortive attempts to effect a passage at Mentz, Coblentz, Strasburgh, and other places. This answered the purpose of making a powerful diversion in favour of the Dutch, though they could not accomplish their design of joining the prince of Orange. After repeated disappointments, the imperial army directed its march to Westphalia, and Turenne followed, in order to keep the bishop of Munster steady to his engagements. Here the viscount displayed the greatest talents for the cabinet and the field. For half the campaign he, with a body of 16,000 men, baffled every stratagem of the elector of Brandenburgh and Montecuculi, the most renowned general of the empire, at the head of an army near triple his strength. He obliged them to go into winter-quarters, in a country harrassed and exhausted, and confirmed the bishop of Munster in the alliance of France, at the very time he was upon terms with the emperor. He obliged the elector of Brandenburgh, who took the chief command during Montecuculi's illness, to abandon the siege of Warle, took Unna, Kamen, Altena, Berkembaum, and several other towns and fortresses. By continuing his operations, he forced the elector out of his winter-quarters again into the field, chased him from post to post, until he obliged him to quit Westphalia, repass the Weser, and retire with precipitation into the bishopric of Hildesheim. After taking possession of all the elector's towns in Westphalia, he pursued him into the bishopric of Hildesheim, and at length, by mere dint of superior genius, forced him to seek shelter in his hereditary dominions. All this was effected after Louvois had appointed the marshal's army quarters in Alsace and Lorraine, amidst the rigours of a severe winter, opposed by a superior enemy, by the artifices of Louvois, and seconded only by his own prudence, and the affections of his troops, which he maintained in defiance of all the difficulties, hardships, and dangers, they encountered<sup>y</sup>. It was indeed supposed, that Montecuculi was prevented from giving Turenne battle by the remonstrances of prince Lobkowitz, the emperor's ambassador, influenced by the gold of Lewis. Certain indeed it is, that Montecuculi's illness arose from his chagrin at seeing all his projects frustrated by the unsteady dilatory conduct of the court of Vienna. Lewis's negotiations disturbed Europe no less than his arms. His tools and creatures swarmed in every court. Leopold could not be prevented from declaring in favour of Holland; but his ministers were bought off from seconding the emperor's intentions. The whole English nation exclaimed against the alliance of their king with France; but Charles stood in need of French gold to supply his extravagance and profligacy. The elector of Bavaria had indeed been compelled by Lewis to retire to his capital; but it was by dint of intrigue that he was forced from his alliance with Holland, and constrained to sign a peace with France<sup>z</sup>.

WHILE Turenne was thus employed on the Rhine, Conde, having recovered of his wounds, returned to the command of the army in Holland. He besieged and took Maestricht in thirteen days. Having repaired the fortifications, he proposed making himself master of several other towns; but the inundations every-where stopt his course. All his attempts to draw off the waters were vain, and he was forced to content himself with preserving, without pretending to extend, the king's conquests.

WHATEVER glory the king might have acquired by land, certain it is that the conduct of his admirals deserved equal praise with that of his generals. In little more than twelve months the French were taught the art of naval war. Before they fought ship to ship; but

<sup>y</sup> Siecle, p. 149, & seq. Vie de Tur. p. 100.

<sup>z</sup> Siecle, p. 150, & seq.

Cornelius was imprisoned, and treated with great barbarity. While he was under the torture, he sung that ode of Horace, Iustum & tenacem propositi virum. His brother took him out of prison after sentence of banishment was pronounced; the tumult rose high, and both the De Witts were cruelly torn in pieces in the streets. William of Orange seemed touched at this terrible sacrifice; he made the pensioner's eulogium, and ordered the murderers to be prosecuted; however, the clemency he shewed them, the advantages he obtained by the massacre, and the animosity he bore the De Witts, convinced all men, that he countenanced the murder.

understood

a understood nothing of those evolutions by which whole fleets imitate the movements of armies. The duke of York, afterwards James the second, invented the method of giving all orders at sea by means of signals; this and every other part of the art the French borrowed from the English, and became so apt scholars, that they ventured to give battle to the Hollanders, the great rivals of the English on that element. Their fleet, amounting to forty sail, besides fire-ships, joined to the English, gave battle three different times to the Dutch. Ruyter gained additional glory in these engagements, and D'Estrees, the French admiral, acquired the esteem of De Ruyter. Valour and conduct were on both sides so great, that victory remained undecided <sup>a</sup>.

In the mean time Spain declares in favour of the Dutch, and prevails upon the emperor to act more heartily in the cause of Holland, and defence of the liberties of Europe. The prince of Orange was reinforced by 10,000 Spaniards, sent to him by the governor of the Low Countries. Philip had concluded a treaty with the States at the Hague, whereby he declared war against France, engaged the emperor to make a powerful diversion on the Rhine, stipulated not to accept of peace before the Dutch had retrieved all their losses, and obtained from them a promise to listen to no terms of accommodation before his catholic majesty was reinstated in all his possessions in the Low Countries, previous to the peace of the Pyrenees. Montecuculi was ordered to advance with 30,000 men to Franconia; and Turenne, joining the troops of Cologne and Munster, passed the Main, and took post in the electorate of Mentz. The prince of Orange receiving no impediments from Conde, who was forced, on account of the inundations, to repass the Meuse, thought this a proper time for action, as the enemy had no considerable forces in the heart of the United Provinces. He ordered some troops to file off secretly to Amsterdam and Muyden, lined with infantry the intrenchments which secured the passage to Holland, and to deceive the duke of Luxemburgh, who commanded in Utrecht, sent some forces by sea to attack Bowmel. The duke, not penetrating the prince's design, came to succour that place, and William, finding his stratagem succeed, marched to Naerden, and with 25,000 men invested and took the place before the duke could provide for its security. Encouraged by this success the Dutch took courage, fortune inclined in their favour, and in a short time all the horrors of war were removed from the interior parts of the United Provinces to the Spanish Netherlands. Neither the experience and consummate address of Turenne, the genius of Vauban, or the indefatigable vigilance of Louvois, could repair the error committed in ruining the army, to garrison the conquered towns. Even Conde's fire seemed extinguished in the waters with which the Dutch had drowned their country. Instead of penetrating farther he was obliged to retreat. Turenne could not prevent the junction of Montecuculi and the prince of Orange, nor the loss of Bonne. This junction, and the declaration of Spain, obliged the armies of France to abandon the three provinces with still more rapidity than they conquered them. The triumphal arch at St. Denis was hardly erected as a monument of Lewis's victories, before the fruits of those victories were relinquished. In a word, the parliament of England would no longer suffer Charles to be the mercenary tool of France; the late ill success cooled the elector of Cologne and bishop of Munster in their friendship; and Lewis, forsaken by all his allies, found himself under the necessity of maintaining singly a war against the empire, Spain, and the United Provinces <sup>b</sup>.

Naval affairs..

Spain declares war against France.

The French evacuate the Dutch provinces.

<sup>a</sup> HAINAULT, 1673.

<sup>b</sup> PEL'S. t. iii. p. 224, & seq. Siecle, ut sup.

S E C T. XV.

Containing marshal Turenne's glorious campaign and death; the spirited transactions of M. Crequi, the battles of Mount Cassel and St. Denis, the negotiations of peace, and the circumstances which at length gave birth to the treaty of Nimeguen.

A. D. 1674.
The stadtholder-ship rendered perpetual in the family of Orange.

THE Dutch owed the whole of their good fortune to the prudence, the courage, and the indefatigable perseverance, of the prince of Orange. Their gratitude was proportioned to his merit. They determined to make the dignities of stadtholder, captain general, and high admiral, hereditary in his family; in a word, they bestowed every thing upon this house that a free people could give; they surrendered all besides their liberty, and conferred every honour but sovereignty. Raised to this pitch of power and glory, William exerted his utmost abilities wholly to draw off the elector of Cologne and bishop of Munster from the alliance of France; and he succeeded. His intrigues at Berlin prevailed on the elector to violate the treaty he had signed with France; and he drew on to a league with the Dutch, the electors of Triers and Palatine, the landgrave of Hesse, and the dukes of Brunswick. In a word, all the powers of Germany were engaged in treaty with the republic, except the elector of Bavaria, and the duke of Hanover, who remained neutral. Lewis, notwithstanding this formidable confederacy, relinquished none of his great designs. He knew his own power, and the capacity of his ministers and generals. Resolving to compensate himself for the loss of the United Provinces by the conquest of Franche Comte, he sent marshal Turenne, with 10,000 men, to defend the frontiers on the side of the Rhine; marshal Schomberg he detached with an army to the frontiers of Spain; Conde, at the head of a third army, watched the prince of Orange in Flanders; and the king's own army, the most numerous, plunged into Franche Comte.

Turenne's glorious campaign.

THIS campaign was the most glorious to Turenne of his whole life, if we are to estimate reputation by the greatness of the difficulties surmounted, in which every faculty of the most consummate general was displayed. First he made a long and brisk march, passed the Rhine at Philipsburgh, marched the whole night to Sintzheim, forced the town, attacked and defeated Caprara, the imperial general, and the old duke of Lorraine, Charles the fourth, that prince whose life was spent in levying troops and losing battles, who had now come with his little army to join the emperor. In the space of four hours this important affair was concluded, with an army fatigued, harrassed, and scarce half the number of the enemy, who left 2000 dead upon the field. Astonished at his boldness, the enemy assembled all their forces, to the amount of 70,000 men, which Turenne opposed with a body of 20,000, afterwards reinforced by a detachment of cavalry sent by Conde. But his genius was to supply the want of numbers, and it effectually answered that purpose. With this little army he ravaged the Palatinate; pursued the enemy into Alsace, over mountains covered with snow; continued his operations in Alsace, contrary to the express orders of Louvois and the murmurs of the court, who dreaded the loss of Lorraine; obliged the enemy to fly every-where before him, by dint of superior skill in encampments, and choice of situations; and finally, without fighting one decisive battle, dispersed and disordered the enemy's army, obliged the imperialists to repass the Rhine, and preserved Alsace and Lorraine. Even Louvois was forced to confess his error, the court seemed abashed, and all united in admiring the extraordinary abilities of the marshal Turenne. It must be acknowledged, that the barbarities he was forced to commit in the course of his operations diminish the lustre of his great actions. All his expeditions were marked with horror and desolation. After the battle of Sintzheim, the Palatinate, a fertile country, covered with towns and villages, was laid in ashes; and the unfortunate elector beheld from the citadel of Manheim two cities and twenty-five villages in flames. These excesses might have been necessary to retard the progress of the enemy; but they must impress an idea no way favourable to the humanity of Turenne, who would seem to deserve the appellation of father of his soldiers, and scourge of the vanquished. Whatever pains the French historians in general, and his own biographers in particular, have taken to vindicate this conduct, we are of opinion it proceeded from a coldness of constitution, that damped every emotion of pity, and sacrificed the principles of humanity to the rules of war and the duties of a general. What redounded chiefly to the marshal's honour was the cool determined resolution he displayed in the action at Sintzheim, and the engagement at Mulhausen, with which last transaction he concluded the operations of the year. As these battles will necessarily be related in another part of our work, it is just sufficient to mention them.

WHILE

a WHILE Turenne was gaining the most important advantages in Germany, without any signal action, Conde was fighting bloody useless battles in Flanders. As his genius was in nothing inferior to the marshal's, we must attribute his little success to the unfavourable circumstances of his situation, and the capacity of the general opposed to him. The prince of Orange commanded the united armies of the empire, Spain, and Holland, and meditated nothing less than the conquest of Picardy and Champagne; but he must first defeat Conde, who had assembled a considerable army, by withdrawing the garrisons out of the conquered towns which he ordered to be demolished. On the 11th of August he posted himself near Senef; the enemy attempted to force him, a bloody conflict ensued, in which the French claimed the honour of the field, tho' neither side could pretend to a victory. Feuquieres, who delights in finding out blunders, blames the prince of Orange's disposition in the first part of the engagement; but he does justice to that admirable prudence and intrepidity with which he repaired the mistake, notwithstanding such a general as Conde pushed the advantage. After the allies had retreated to their intrenched camp they were attacked by Conde, who seems by this error to have balanced the mistake committed by the prince of Orange, and to have compensated it by the same astonishing valour and presence of mind. Both generals indeed, if we are to credit the French critic, appeared greater from their errors, and, of all the battles they ever fought, this in the most distinguishing manner tried all their powers and faculties. There were 7000 slain and 5000 prisoners on the side of France; that of the enemy was nearly equal; and so much bloodshed answered no other purpose than rendering either army incapable of undertaking any considerable enterprize for the remainder of the campaign. The prince of Orange, to make the world imagine he had gained a victory, laid siege to Oudenarde; but Conde, to convince them he had not lost a battle, obliged him to relinquish the attempt.

TURENNE, after the engagement at Mulhausen, gave no breathing to the enemy. Even the rigours of winter could not stop his operations. After several advantages obtained in consequence of the check the enemy lately received, he marched directly to Colmar to give their united forces battle. From the town of Turkeim, flanking the enemy's right, this action has been called the battle of Turkeim. By the reinforcements received from Flanders, the marshal's army amounted to 30,000 men, and that of the enemy to 40,000. He drew up in a manner that incurred the censure of all his officers, who could, before the battle was over, discover the propriety and judgment of his disposition. In one respect only the action was decisive; it forced the enemy to repass the Rhine, and abandon all thoughts of quartering in the territories of France.

It was now that Turenne took a little respite, in order to return to the campaign with redoubled vigour. He went to court, and received the honours due to his extraordinary merit. The negotiation of peace set on foot during the winter proving abortive, all sides prepared for renewing the war. The imperial army was quite chagrined and distracted with losses; to raise their drooping courage it was necessary to send Montecuculi once more to oppose Turenne. He was indeed the only general in the emperor's service worthy of the employment. As well as Turenne he had reduced the art of war into a system. Both generals indeed were so well persuaded of each other's merit, that they could not rely upon mistakes or blunders: every advantage must be fought by some stroke of superior genius. Each judged of the operations and designs of his antagonist, by what himself would have done in the same circumstances; and he was never deceived. Subtlety, penetration, patience, and activity, were opposed to the same qualities, and the world is now divided which merited the greatest share of reputation in this famous campaign.

In the preceding year Lewis singly maintained war against the Spaniards, imperialists, and Dutch. He conquered Franche Comte, defended his frontiers, and defeated the designs of the enemy to penetrate into his dominions. This year he gained an ally, and prevailed on the king of Sweden to declare war against the elector of Brandenburgh. This produced a favourable diversion, by employing the elector in his own quarrel, and obliging the princes of Brunswick and Lunenburgh to retire from the banks of the Rhine, and with the troops of Munster enter the country of Bremen. Six great armies, led by generals of distinguished capacity, appeared then in action on the continent of Germany. Montecuculi opposed Turenne in Suabia; and Conde returned to fight the Spaniards and Dutch in Flanders, under the prince of Orange. The elector of Brandenburgh put himself at the head of his troops to watch the motions of the Swedish general Wrangel.

MONTPECUCULI formed the design of passing the Rhine at Straßburgh, and reaping in the Higher Alsace those advantages, of which the multiplicity of councils, and the bad conduct of the generals, had hitherto deprived the imperial army. He endeavoured to seduce the in-killed.

<sup>c</sup> Siecle, p. 160.

<sup>d</sup> P. L. I. s. t. iii. p. 240.

Turenne

habitants of Strasburgh; but Turenne, though he could not prevent his passing the Rhine near Spires, kept the Strasburghers in their duty, and deprived Montecuculi of those advantages he proposed from this movement. Near three months were spent in feints, marches, countermarches, dark designs, and artful stratagems; the whole military science was exhausted, but no advantage was gained by either. At last the marshal determined to attack the enemy near Acheren; but in reconnoitring them he was killed by a cannon ball, and his death soon produced a change in the campaign. Instead of attacking the imperialists, count de Lorges, who succeeded to the command, retired, and, after a slight defeat, suffered Montecuculi to penetrate into Alsace, in which attempt he had been so long foiled by Turenne. Lorges indeed displayed the talents of a great general. When his rear was attacked, he faced about with great intrepidity, drew up his troops with judgment, and fought such a battle as was not unworthy of the pupil of Turenne, though the fortune of Montecuculi prevailed<sup>a</sup> (B).

Campaign in Flanders and Catalonia.

MARSHAL Crequi was still more unfortunate. He was defeated in attempting to relieve Treves. Capable of the most daring enterprizes, he threw himself with a few attendants into the city, which he defended with the most obstinate bravery. When the enemy were going to storm the breach, the townsmen revolted, and capitulated; but Crequi could not be brought to sign the capitulation. He retired to a church, defended himself for a while, and was taken prisoner, when he sought death. The prince of Conde said, that Crequi wanted nothing but this disgrace to deserve a place among the most illustrious generals of Europe. This year nothing considerable was undertaken in Flanders. Mionterey, governor of the Netherlands, would not suffer the prince of Orange to come to a battle, and the prince of Conde's weakness obliged him to keep on the defensive. In Catalonia count Schomberg gained considerable advantages. He reduced Iguera, Baschara, and Bellegarde, and obtained by his conduct the dignity of marshal<sup>f</sup>.

A. D. 1676.

ALL the powers at war being tired of their losses and disappointments, no party succeeding in the schemes they had formed the beginning of the campaign, they mutually agreed to send plenipotentiaries to Nimeguen; but the negotiations there being protracted long beyond the time expected, the armies took the field, and the operations of war went on with vigour. Every side hoped for some favourable blow that would turn the scale, and give weight to their claims. Early in the year De Ruyter quitted the coast of Holland with a large fleet, to assist the Spaniards, and to prevent the French admiral Duquesne from succouring Messina. The combined fleets of Spain and Holland amounted to forty-three ships of the line. Formerly the French and English fleets found it difficult to cope with De Ruyter; now Duquesne alone ventured to give him battle. This admiral, like De Ruyter, raised himself by dint of merit, and became the best naval officer in France, before he had ever commanded a fleet; but he now served under the duke of Vivonne. The fleets came to an engagement on the 8th of January, and the Dutch admiral found himself so roughly handled, that, rather than hazard a second engagement, he would have permitted Duquesne to relieve the city; but he received orders to the contrary. This brought on a second engagement on the 12th of March, in which, after an obstinate conflict, De Ruyter fell, and with him the hope of victory. Duquesne a third time attacked the enemy, sunk, burnt, and destroyed, the greater part of the combined fleet, while all Europe was in astonishment at the rapid progress made by France in naval affairs.

Naval affairs.

Siege of Valenciennes.

In the very beginning of the campaign, the French arms were successful in Flanders; Conde, Bouchain, Valenciennes, and Cambray, being reduced. The king commanded in person, having under him the marshals d'Humieres, Schomberg, Feuillade, Luxemburgh, and de Lorges, each taking the command in his turn, Vauban directing the operations of the sieges. At the siege of Valenciennes, great disputes arose between Vauban and the other officers. Vauban insisted that the place should be stormed at mid-day, to prevent confusion: Louvois and the five marshals were for surprizing it by night, and mounting the breach while the enemy were unguarded. Both urged good arguments, but those of Vauban carried the most weight; the king preferred them, and the event justified his election. Perhaps the French never displayed the fire and intrepidity of genius more than in this attack, which is celebrated as a master-stroke by all their writers on the art of war. Marshal d'Humieres took Aire, while the prince of Orange was besieging Maeſtricht, defended by the brave Calvo, a Catalan, who

<sup>a</sup> HAINAULT, an 1675. Siecle, p. 166.

<sup>f</sup> HAINAULT. PELIS. ibid.

(B) After this campaign, Montecuculi retired, saying, that the general who had opposed the vizier Cupriali, the prince of Conde, and Turenne, ought not to risk his reputation against any other commander. Conde was sent to succeed Turenne. After keeping Montecuculi at bay until the end of the campaign, he retired, not imagining any other competitor his equal (1).

(1) PELIS. t. iii. p. 241.

a told his engineers, that he did not understand the defence of places, but he would fight to the last drop of his blood. Calvo kept his word; he obliged William to raise the siege, after having spent forty days, and lost a great number of men before the walls <sup>g</sup>. To ballance those losses, the young duke of Lorraine, a prince that inherited all the virtues without the defects of his father, took Philipsburgh in sight of the duke of Luxembourg, who tried every stratagem of war to relieve the place. It was defended for seventy days open trenches, by de Foy, after having before been blocked up for six months. At last it surrendered, through the blunders of marshal Rochefort, who permitting the enemy to take possession of all the passes, rendered it impossible for the duke of Luxembourg to penetrate to the town. However, the duke of Lorraine was baffled in all his endeavours to pass the Rhine, and prosecute the design of recovering his paternal dominions, and entering Franche Compté <sup>h</sup>.

The duke of Lorraine takes Philipsburgh.

b THE negotiations as usual went on during the winter. All the parties were tired of war, except the prince of Orange, yet none would grant or receive equitable terms of peace. Accordingly the armies took the field; and the French, commanded by Monsieur the king's brother, and the Marshals Humieres and Luxembourg, invested the strong fortrefs of St. Omer. Spain put the highest value on this place, and pressed the prince of Orange to hazard a battle for its relief. His majesty, knowing that William would omit no expedient to oblige monsieur to raise the siege, sent him a strong reinforcement, with orders to meet the combined army. He advanced to Mount Cassel, and had scarce arrived, when the enemy were perceived to advance in order of battle. As the armies were separated by a deep rivulet, both halted till next morning, and then joined battle, which continued with great fury for the space of three hours, when victory declared for the French. William sustained a very considerable loss in the field; but his retreat was so masterly, that the duke of Orleans did not venture to pursue: however, the surrender of St. Omer was the consequence. It held out but a few days after the battle, though the garrison made a brave defence, and obtained an honourable capitulation. The prince of Orange, to shew that his defeat was of little consequence, re-assembled his forces, and invested Charleroy, before which he was baffled in 1672, by the same marshal who was now governor: but the excellent disposition made by Luxembourg, so distressed his army, that he was forced to relinquish the enterprize, after the siege had been far advanced <sup>i</sup>. In the mean time the marshal Crequi confirmed the prognostic of the great c Conde. Just released from prison, he was opposed with a small army to the duke of Lorraine, and soon retrieved his character by a series of the most spirited conduct. He defeated a corps of the enemy in the bushy skirmish at Kokersberg in Alsace: he harrassed and fatigued the main body of their army by the suddenness of his motions, and impetuosity of his attacks: he took Friburgh in sight of the duke's army; and soon after defeated another of his detachments at Rheinfeldt. In a word, he not only raised his character to the highest pinnacle of fame, by defeating the schemes of the duke of Lorraine, but he obliged that prince to lay aside all thoughts of re-possessing his paternal dominions, which he so eagerly desired, that it was the chief object of all his projects. The consequence ended with the taking of St. Guilain by de Humieres, and the defeat of Monterey by the marshal de Noailles <sup>k</sup>.

A. D. 1677.

Battle of Mount Cassel.

Crequi's famous campaign.

e DURING the winter the king of England renewed the negotiations as mediator. The people in general were for his declaring war; but he considered the bulk of the nation as an unruly, turbulent, factious people; the Dutch as a mean penurious set of merchants, from whom he could not expect large grants of money to supply his extravagancies; and Lewis as his affectionate kinsman, his warm friend, and generous benefactor. It could not therefore be expected that his mediation would be impartial. In fact, Charles inclined so much to the side of France, and Lewis gave law in so absolute a manner, that his terms were rejected, and a resolution taken by the allies once more to try their fortune in the field. Their success did not correspond with the spirit exerted to bring France to reasonable conditions of peace. Lewis's armies on the very same day invested Mons, f Namur, Charlemont, Luxembourg, and Ypres. Ghent likewise was besieged by d'Humieres, and taken on the 9th of March, having sustained a siege only four of days. The citadel capitulated on the 12th. Ypres, after a siege of seven days, capitulated on the 25th, notwithstanding the difficulties thrown in the way of the besiegers by the inundation of the country, and the brave defence of M. Conflans, who held the place for his catholic majesty. Luxembourg commanded the siege, and gave two assaults at the same time, with so much intrepidity, that Conflans beat a parley, and received honourable conditions. Upon this his majesty returned to St. Germain, leaving the army in quarters of refreshment.

1678.

Several towns surrender to the French.

<sup>g</sup> HAINAULT, an. 1676.
<sup>k</sup> PELISON, ibid.

<sup>h</sup> PELISON, t. iii. p. 260.

<sup>i</sup> Idem ibid. Etiam Le Siecle, p. 172.

Crequi's second campaign.

THIS campaign was still more glorious to marshal Crequi than the last. In every thing he foiled the duke of Lorraine, though that prince had the reputation of an expert general. From the marshal's operations on this occasion, the finest lessons in the military art may be drawn. His marches, countermarches, encampments, and attacks, all tended to harass and destroy the duke's army. They succeeded so happily, that the enemy were reduced to near an equality in strength; upon which he defeated them, having forced the duke, by his artful dispositions, to give battle<sup>1</sup>.

The French evacuate Sicily.

IN Sicily matters went less successfully for Lewis. Nothing can be more fickle than the temper of the Sicilians, always rebelling, and always in a state of servitude; their seditions produced nothing but a change of fetters. France had delivered Messina out of the hands of the Spaniards, and were, in return, treated with ingratitude. The people conspired against the duke de Vivonne, who treated them with kindness; and every day produced new plots and cabals, which all his foresight and vigilance could neither prevent nor punish. As the Dutch fleet hovered round the coast, it was difficult to withdraw the French troops; yet the rebellious, turbulent humour of the people rendered it necessary. Accordingly Vivonne embarked them, and determined to run all hazards, rather than be exposed to the insults and ingratitude of a set of burghers, insensible of friendship. He set sail on the 8th of April, and arrived in France, without having once seen the enemy<sup>m</sup>.

The policy of
the Dutch.

THE prince of Orange having espoused the princess Mary, daughter to the duke of York, obtained great credit with the English parliament, who determined to force the king to renounce the alliance of Lewis. William would have willingly continued the war; but the states deducing no solid advantage from all the efforts of Spain and the empire, entertained thoughts of concluding a separate peace. That politic republic found means to become auxiliaries in a war undertaken to save her from perdition, and to render Spain and the emperor principals in a quarrel, upon which they entered from motives of compassion. The plenipotentiaries of all the powers were met at Nimeguen, and the Dutch deputies were negotiating for themselves and the catholic king. France insisted upon keeping Bouchain, Conde, Ypres, Valenciennes, Cambray, Maubage, Aire, St. Omer, Cassel, Charlemont, and a great part of Flanders, but consented to restore Charleroy, Courtray, Oudenarde, Ath, Ghent, and Limburg, to the Spaniards. The ministers of the catholic king demanded of the French plenipotentiaries, to appoint a day for the restitution of those places; but they were given to understand, that the king would detain them until the allies should have restored all the places wrested from the crown of Sweden. By this declaration the treaty was retarded<sup>n</sup>.

Congress at Nimeguen.

CHARLES II. was incensed at the conduct of Lewis. He sent Sir William Temple to the Hague, with ample powers to sign a mutual league with the republic, by which the contracting powers would oblige themselves to compel France to restore the six towns in Flanders. Had Charles firmly adhered to this resolution, the treaty would have met with no obstruction; but after Sir William Temple had concluded the treaty, to the intire satisfaction of all those states who wished to curb the ambition and power of Lewis, he wavered, from his usual principle of timidity and inconstancy. Du Croix, the Swedish agent at London, was dispatched to Sir William Temple, ordering him to declare to the Swedish plenipotentiaries, in the king's name, that if they would consent to the immediate evacuation of the six towns in Flanders, he would, after the conclusion of the peace, use all his interest in procuring justice to his Swedish majesty. The conduct of his Britannic majesty indicated his unsteadiness; Sir William Temple was ashamed of it; and the states-general plainly discerned the king's meaning: however, they resolutely refused to sign the treaty, unless France immediately made the restitution demanded. Lewis agreed to restore to the emperor either Friburgh or Philipsburgh; the choice he left to him. He re-established in the bishopric of Strasburgh, and their dominions, the two Furstembergs, stripped by the emperor, and one of them imprisoned. As to Lorraine, he offered to restore the young duke Charles V. provided his majesty should be put in possession of Nanci, and all the great roads. Lewis indeed prescribed with the air of a conqueror; the allies differed among themselves; each blamed the other, and complained, that the whole load of the war was left upon his shoulders; but they all, except the spirited duke of Lorraine, accepted the terms offered by France, with very little variation. The French ambassadors seemed inflexible with respect to the restitution of the six towns; nor did they yield before the very last day of the congress, when, all of a sudden, they desisted from their pretensions, as if they had a mind to make a compliment of the concessions. As for the duke of Lorraine, he preferred wandering a vagrant thro' the empire, to mean submission, and the possession of dominions without honour or dignity<sup>o</sup>.

Conditions granted to Lewis.

<sup>1</sup> HAINAULT, an. 1678, p. 790.
Siecle, t. i. p. 178.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid.

<sup>n</sup> PELISSON, t. iii. p. 2-1.

<sup>o</sup> VOLTAIRE

<sup>a</sup> DURING the sitting of the congress, the duke of Luxemburgh kept Mons blocked up, and Lewis endeavoured to protract the treaty, until that place should be reduced. While he was at dinner with the intendant, relying upon the faith of treaties, his quarters were suddenly attacked by the prince of Orange. A long and obstinate conflict ensued, in which, after much blood-shed, William remained master of the field. All writers exclaim against this attack, as a perfidious breach of faith. The treaty, say they, had been signed four days before; the prince was perfectly acquainted with that circumstance, though he had hitherto received no formal intimation of the peace. It was therefore inexcusable to shed the blood of so many brave men, and sacrifice to resentment so many innocent victims, after peace had spread her healing influence, and closed up those wounds, occasioned by a long and cruel war<sup>p</sup>. But prejudice seems to dictate these sentiments. William had certainly as much right to attempt the relief of Mons, as Luxemburgh had to keep it blockaded. He was sensible the design of Lewis in protracting the treaty was to gain possession of that important fortress. If Luxemburgh knew that the treaty was signed, why did he not withdraw his forces, and give the prince of Orange notice of what had been done? From his conduct, it is almost certain, that Lewis would have taken advantage of the surrender of the town, had that event happened before a regular intimation of the peace had been sent to both commanders. Disappointment made him exclaim against the prince's conduct. French writers have imbibed their sovereign's resentment; and the spirit of party, and strong prejudices, have occasioned English writers to close with their sentiments. The battle of St. Denis did not alter a single article in the treaty, which was signed by all parties, except the emperor, on the 1st of August, and peace once more restored to Europe. It was remarkable that Holland, against which the war was undertaken, that in the very beginning was reduced to the verge of destruction, lost nothing. The Dutch even gained a barrier; whereas all the other powers, who stood up in their defence, were losers. As to Lewis, he had the honour of supporting a war against the most formidable powers of the continent, of giving his own terms to Christendom, and of having extended his dominions by the conquest of Franche Compté, Dunkirk, and a great part of Flanders; though it must be acknowledged that he impoverished his people, and sacrificed real felicity to empty glory.

Battle of St. Denis.

Reflections on that battle.

Conclusion of the treaty of Nimeguen.

<sup>p</sup> Aucl. supra citat.

S E C T. XVI.

Lewis erects courts of judicature in the empire; he augments his marine, bombards Algiers and Genoa, and at length involves Europe in a general war about the Spanish succession. The confederacy formed against France; and the events of the first campaign related.

<sup>d</sup> AS the emperor had not yet acceded to the treaty of Nimeguen, the war still continued. Nuitz was besieged and taken, but restored to the elector of Cologne, as soon as the court of Vienna consented to sign the peace, which happened towards the end of the year. It was now that Lewis began to exert that despotism, and assume that superiority over other princes, which marked the insolence of power more than all his conquests. Courts of jurisdiction were established at Metz and Brisac, to re-unite to his crown all those territories which had been deemed appenages and dependencies on Alsace, notwithstanding they had, by several late treaties, been adjudged to other masters. The king of Spain, who claimed several baillages in this district, the elector palatine, and several princes of the empire, were cited before this tribunal, to do homage to Lewis, or be punished with the confiscation of their estates. The electors palatine and Treves were stripped of several lordships; they carried their complaints to the diet of Ratisbon, and received the empty satisfaction of vain protests. The intrigues of France, and the dread of her power, which had opened the gates of so many other cities, gained the magistrates of Strasburgh. The inhabitants, whose love of freedom for so many ages enabled them to preserve their liberties, saw themselves, in the midst of profound peace, the subjects of a despotic king, and their ramparts lined with 20,000 men<sup>q</sup>.

The power which Lewis assumes in the empire.

<sup>q</sup> HAINAULT, sub ann.

A. D. 1681.
His application to domestic affairs.

1682.
He obliges the piratical states of Africa to make submissions.

1684.
He bombards
Genoa.

His quarrel with the apostolic see.

A. D. 1688.

The origin of the war between France, the states general, Spain and Britain.

WHILE Lewis was thus extending his dominions by fraud and intrigue, he did not forget the internal security and interest of his kingdom. The harbour of Toulon was constructed at an immense expence, made capable of containing 100 ships of war, and adorned with a fine arsenal, and magnificent magazines. Brest, Dunkirk, and Havre de-grace, were filled with men of war; and nature was forced, to convert Rocheport into a convenient sea-port. The marine of France was among the most formidable in Europe. Lewis saw himself master of near 100 ships of above forty guns, and many of them first rates. He gave proofs of his maritime power that tended to the general good of Christendom. The Mediterranean was covered with corsairs, and commerce interrupted. Duquesne was sent with a squadron to Algiers; he bombarded the city, and reduced the ferocious inhabitants to the necessity of making proper submission. On this occasion it was that France had made the first trial of bomb ketches, the contrivance of one Bernard Renard, a man dragged from obscurity by the penetration of the great Colbert, who never omitted an opportunity of rendering genius useful to society. Tunis and Tripoli made the same acknowledgements as Algiers. The terror of seeing that city laid twice in ashes, by the new contrivance of bombs, struck with dread all the piratical states, who, in compliment to Lewis, released all their Christian slaves, except the English, whom Dumfreville, the French officer sent to receive the prisoners, put again on shore, because they boasted that the Dey set them free out of respect to the king of England (A). Lewis's indignation next fell upon the republic of Genoa. In the late war that city had assisted Spain with a small squadron; she had likewise sold ammunition to the Algerines, contrary to the express request of the king. Lewis demanded reparation by the mouth of M. Saint Olon; and the republic relying on the protection of Spain, refused to make concessions. Incensed at her insolence, the French monarch determined to chastise Genoa. A fleet of fourteen ships of the line, twenty galleys, ten bomb ketches, and a great number of frigates, put to sea, under Duquesne, and appeared before the city. Seignalay, who succeeded his father Colbert as secretary of the marine, was on board, and forwarded the expedition with all that vigour, fire, and activity, for which he was distinguished. Fourteen thousand shells were thrown into the city, and many of its superb edifices set on fire and reduced to ashes. Four thousand soldiers debarked at the gates, and burnt the suburb of St. Peter d'Arena. Every thing tended to the ruin of the republic, and to prevent it, the senate was forced to alter their tone, and descend to the most mortifying concessions. It was demanded that the doge, and four principal senators, should implore the king's clemency at Versailles; and that the doge should be continued in his place, notwithstanding the perpetual law which divested him of all his authority, the moment he set foot out of the city. Necessity obliged the republic to grant every thing. The doge and senate appeared at the court of Versailles, made their apologies to Lewis, and were treated by him with great dignity, and haughtiness of carriage, extremely mortifying to those spirited republicans.

In the same stile of despotic arrogance did Lewis treat the apostolic see; his ambassador Lavardin entering Rome in an hostile manner, at the head of some hundreds of armed guards. Innocent XI. in vain poured out the thunders of the Vatican upon Lavardin; his impotent endeavours were despised, and the head of Christ's church mortified with the contempt shewn to his spiritual authority, because he could not support it with temporal power. The extensive privileges which foreign ambassadors enjoyed at Rome, extremely disturbed the police of the city. Innocent had a mind to retrench these privileges; Spain, and several other courts, consented to his resolution; but Lewis would hearken to no proposals, however reasonable, that could detract from the glory and dignity of his crown. This was the dispute which the pope was forced to compromise, in a way not very satisfactory to the pride of Christ's vicar.

WITH the same haughtiness of conduct would Lewis raise his creature cardinal Furstemburgh to the see of Cologne, void by the death of the incumbent. The power of election was in the chapter; and Lewis's gold, distributed among the canons, had gained them to his interest: but as the immediate nomination was in the power of the pope, and the confirmation in that of the emperor, the most christian king foresaw that he should meet with opposition, and * Le Siecle, t. i. p. 189.

* Vid. auct. supra citat.

(A) Soon after the bombardment of Tunis died Colbert, the greatest minister France ever produced, and the most faithful servant Lewis ever possessed. His vigilance, industry, and genius, had raised France to a powerful maritime power, and extended her commerce to every quarter of the globe. To his abilities Lewis owed the faculty of sustaining those manifold and hazardous wars, in which Europe has since been engaged. Colbert it was who furnished him with the capacity of becoming the common disturber of Christendom. Lewis abused the great talents of his minister, so well calculated to render him powerful, amiable, a blessing to his subjects, and the admiration of mankind.

therefore

a therefore determined to support the election of the chapter by force of arms. He accordingly seized upon Avignon, as soon as pope Innocent declared his intention to espouse Clement of Bavaria, brother of the late elector; and at the same time prepared an army to march into Germany, now exhausted by a long and bloody war with the grand signior, in which Vienna, the capital, sustained a siege of six weeks. This dispute, the infractions of the treaty of Nimeguen, the high hand assumed by Lewis with respect to the demesnes belonging to Alsace, the death of the queen of Spain, the prevalence of German councils at the court of Madrid, the aspiring ambition of the French monarch, the rancorous animosity which the prince of Orange, now William III. of England, bore to that sovereign, the assistance lent by France to the unfortunate James II. Lewis's refusal to acknowledge the prince of Orange king of England, the jealousy of the surrounding states, their desire to retrench the power of France, and the apprehensions of the empire, England, and Holland, lest the crowns of France and Spain might be one day united to the house of Bourbon, with a variety of other circumstances, produced a war between the kings, the emperor, and the Dutch. Before the prince of Orange had left the Texel, to take possession of the crown of England, Lewis had armies advancing to the Rhine and the frontiers of Holland. The dauphin, a prince of a mild and amiable disposition, was sent to command an army of 100,000 men, with the marshals de Duras, Catinat, and Vauban, under him. But before we proceed to the military operations, it will be necessary we should concisely relate the confederacy formed to oppose Lewis <sup>1</sup>.

THE courage, vigilance, and conduct, which the prince of Orange had exerted in the last war, raised his reputation and influence to the highest pitch in Holland. Policy, prejudice, and disposition, all contributed to confirm him the inveterate enemy of France. Before his accession to the throne of England, William had projected a confederacy to clip the soaring wings of the most Christian king. His influence had prevailed upon the princes of the empire, assembled in the diet, to exhort the emperor to avenge Lewis's infractions of the treaty of Nimeguen. They therefore besought his imperial majesty to make peace with the Turks, and come to an open rupture with the French monarch; in which case they promised to consider it as a war of the empire. Accordingly the emperor negotiated an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the states general, binding the contracting parties to co-operate, with their whole power, against France and her allies; to engage in no separate treaty upon any pretence whatsoever; and to hearken to no terms of accommodation, until the treaties of Westphalia, Osnaburgh, Munster, the Pyrenees, and Nimeguen, should be fully vindicated. It was agreed, that Spain and England should be invited to accede to this treaty; and in a separate article the parties stipulated, that in case his catholic majesty Charles II. of a puny and infirm constitution, should die without issue, the alliance should be exerted to the utmost to procure the Spanish monarchy for the house of Austria, and the dignity of the king of the Romans for the emperor's son Joseph. William, while only prince of Orange, was the soul of this alliance; after his accession to the throne of Great Britain, he exerted his utmost abilities to bring the parliament to accede to the treaty, and he proved successful. A variety of reasons were easily suggested for coming to a rupture with France; and, to cloak the real designs of William, several arguments were advanced in the declaration of war relative to Great Britain, though in fact the war was undertaken from views merely continental.

FULLY to understand the reasons which drew Spain into this confederacy, we must go a little back. The catholic king's marriage with princess Mary Louisa, daughter of the duke of Orleans, seemed to confirm, in the strongest manner, the treaties between France and Spain. During the life-time of this princess, and in the year 1685, the emperor demanded of the king of Spain the sovereignty of the Low Countries, for the archduchess his daughter, lately married to the elector of Bavaria. Lewis, persuaded that if such a settlement took place, it would be a violation of the truce, gave orders to the marquis de Feuquieres, his ambassador at Madrid, to declare his sentiments to the catholic king. In consequence the Spanish ministers, alarmed with the apprehensions of a rupture, gave Feuquieres the strongest assurances of their sincere intention to avoid every thing capable of offending the most Christian king. Baffled in this expectation, the court of Vienna tried, in 1687, whether they could not prevail on the king of Spain to suffer the archduke, second son to the emperor, to be educated at the court of Madrid, as heir presumptive to the Spanish monarchy. This negotiation was carried on with great secrecy, but it could not escape the penetration of Lewis, who immediately sent orders to his ambassador to demand a private audience of the catholic king, and likewise to present into that prince's own hands a memorial, representing, "That if the king of Spain, influenced by evil counsellors, should subvert the order of succession, the king in that case could not avoid executing whatever he thought most effectual for main-

<sup>1</sup> Siecle, t. i. p. 213. HAINAULT, sub ann. 1688.9.

" taining the dauphin's rights, and must consider every thing done in favour of the archduke a
 " as an infraction of the peace between the two crowns." Charles gave an answer in general terms; but he permitted the prince to assure the ambassador, that he would never nominate a successor until he was on his death-bed. In the year 1689 Mary Louisa of Orleans died, and with her sunk the influence of France at the court of Madrid. The emperor gained ground in proportion; and his councils had an intire sway over the mind of Charles II. upon the marriage of that prince with the duke of Neuburgh's daughter, who was sister to her imperial majesty. These were the circumstances which brought his catholic majesty into the confederacy against Lewis, and obliged his most Christian majesty to declare war, first against the emperor and the states-general, next against Spain, afterwards against England, though in fact hostilities had been committed against this last crown previous to any declaration of b war <sup>u</sup>.

In consequence of Lewis's declaration, the marquis de Castanaga, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, issued a counter declaration, couched in very bitter terms, accusing the French king of having erected arbitrary courts in the empire, of having laid waste the dominions of the house of Austria, without regard to the obligations of religion or humanity, or even to the laws of war; of having countenanced the most flagrant acts of tyranny and oppression; and of having intrigued with the enemies of Christ for the destruction of the empire. This alluded to the good understanding which Lewis constantly maintained with the grand signior.

A. D. 1688. LEWIS had, previous to this declaration, come to blows with the imperialists and Dutch. c
 The grand army, commanded by the dauphin in person, invested Philipsburgh about the middle of October, and Vauban directed the operations of the siege. It surrendered nineteen days after the trenches were opened. This event was succeeded by the reduction of a variety of other places. Manheim was taken in two days; Frankendal in two; Spires, Treves, Worms, Oppenheim, Heidelberg, and Mentz, surrendered before the king's armies approached the walls. The palatinate, doomed to perdition whenever a war happens in the empire, was now laid d
 The ravaging of the palatine. desert, and its flourishing cities and villages reduced to ashes, to revenge that spirit and activity exerted by the elector palatine, in forming the league of Augsburg against France. Nothing could equal the inexpressible misery of that country: men, women, and children, driven, in the depth of winter, out of their habitations, to wander naked, and starved with cold and hunger, round the fields, while they saw their houses stripped and set on fire by the fury of the soldiers, who are always sure to exceed in barbarity the most rigid and cruel orders. This terrible persecution began at Manheim, the seat of the electors. The tombs of those princes were opened to seek for hidden treasures, and their ashes scattered abroad. Such indeed was the savage rage and avarice shewn in executing Lewis's instructions, that it ever will remain an indelible stain on his memory. Some blamed Louvois, but unjustly, as Lewis certainly had it in his power to reject the minister's counsel. Nations, says Voltaire, who had hitherto only blamed his ambition while they admired his character, now exclaimed against the barbarity of a monarch, who, drowned in the pleasures of the most luxurious court in Europe, could give orders for the total destruction of a whole principa- e lity <sup>w</sup>. Twice in the same reign had those cruelties been committed in this electorate; but the conflagration raised by Turenne, however dreadful, was but a mere spark of fire, when compared to those flames which universally reduced the palatinate to a heap of ashes, and the inhabitants to a multitude of the most distressed beggars.

1689. THE emperor had three armies in the field against France, besides the army opposed to the Turks. One, under the duke of Bavaria, acted on the Upper Rhine; another, and the main army, led by the duke Charles of Lorraine, on the Middle Rhine; and a third, commanded by the elector of Brandenburgh, with his own troops and those of Westphalia, on the Lower Rhine. Prince Waldec, in Flanders, was at the head of a body of 33,000 Dutch, f
 The operations of the allies. who were joined by 10,000 English auxiliaries under the earl of Marlborough, and a body of Spaniards detached by the governor of the Netherlands. Such were the forces opposed to France, to check the rapidity of her conquests, which had already spread terror and desolation through the empire. Lewis wisely concluded, that the unanimity of the powers of Germany would be of no long duration. Instead therefore of facing the imperial forces with armies capable of giving battle in the open fields, he threw strong garrisons into the principal towns, and sent several different corps, under the conduct of Sourdis, Boufflers, Monclaire, Choisseuil, the chief command of the whole being vested in the duke de Duras, who had orders to seize every opportunity of harrassing the enemy, by intercepting their convoys,

<sup>u</sup> Ibid. Etiam Memoires de TORCI, t. i. p. 3.

<sup>w</sup> Le Siecle, t. i. p. 215. HAINAULT, sub ann. surprizing

- a surprising their parties, burning their towns, and ravaging the countries through which they must pass, to prevent the possibility of their subsisting. The first enterprize formed by the allies, was to drive the French out of the electorate of Cologne. Rhinbergh submitted without the necessity of a siege. Keyserwaert was next invested by the elector of Brandenburgh: the governor capitulated three days after the trenches were opened. In the month of July the duke of Lorraine sat down before Mentz, and was joined by the duke of Bavaria; the siege was obstinate; the marquis de Uxelles making the best dispositions of defence within, while the duke de Duras, with his little army, was by every means harassing and disturbing the enemy's operations without. Boufflers likewise attacked and defeated a detachment of imperialists, most of whom were put to the sword, on their refusal to lay down their arms. Mentz, however, was forced to surrender by the 6th of September, after having cost the allies above 5,000 men. Bonne had for some time been blocked up by the elector of Brandenburgh, who was on the point of relinquishing the enterprize, when the news of the surrender of Mentz arrived. Soon afterwards he was joined by the duke of Lorraine, and the city was besieged in form. Baron Asfeld, who commanded the garrison, being mortally wounded, the place surrendered on the 15th of October, after having sustained a siege of five weeks open trenches; and been blocked up for the space of three months. In Flanders the marshal d'Humieres received a check at Walcourt, where he engaged prince Waldec with a superior army. This affair proved of little advantage to the allies; but it hurt the reputation of the marshal, who was deprived of the command by Louvois his intimate friend, and succeeded by Luxemburgh, with whom that minister had always been at variance. This promotion does great honour to Louvois, as it indisputably shewed his readiness to sacrifice his private resentment and prejudice to the glory of his master and the good of his country. In Catalonia the king's army had taken the field so early under the command of the duke de Noailles, that several advantages were gained before the Spaniards had assembled a force sufficient to oppose him. The campaign ended to the advantage of the allies, Noailles being defeated in his attempt to raise the siege of Campredon *.

M. de Humieres defeated by prince Waldec.

- Lewis* was now under the necessity of sending an army to Italy. The duke of Savoy, either from a natural inconstancy of disposition, or the jealousies entertained by the French monarch, who demanded security for his conduct, acceded to the confederacy, and signed a treaty of alliance with the emperor and king of Spain, by which he was appointed captain-general of the forces in Italy. Catinat, one of the most enterprising, expert, and judicious officers in the king's service, opposed him. Catinat united the fire of a hero to the phlegm of a philosopher. Bred to the law, he quitted it in disgust, and rose to the highest rank in the army by dint of merit. Every where he shewed himself superior to the duke, who had acquired considerable military reputation, at the same time that he was esteemed the most artful and politic prince in Italy. Catinat gave battle to Victor Amadeus at Staffarda, and obtained a complete victory. The superiority of his capacity appeared by the fine disposition he made, and the inequality of the losses sustained, for while Catinat had no more than 300 men killed, the duke left above 4000 dead upon the field. The consequences of this victory were still more important. All Savoy, except the fortress of Montmelion, was soon reduced. His highness retired every where before the French general, without daring to attempt the relief of the most important towns in his dominions. Indeed, the whole of this campaign was a series of fortunate events, that gained Catinat a reputation little inferior to that of Conde and Turenne †.

A. D. 1690.
The duke of Savoy joins the confederates.

- THE face of affairs in Flanders was wholly altered by the arrival of the duke of Luxemburgh, the pupil and friend of Conde, whom he greatly resembled in many of the lineaments of his character. His genius was vast, his judgment correct, and his imagination fertile. Every quality of a hero were united in Luxemburgh, and he improved his natural talents by indefatigable application and long experience under the greatest commanders. He admired Turenne; but he imitated Conde, possessing, like him, that noble ardor, and quick intuitive apprehension, which seemed to form him a general from his birth. Luxemburgh, to retrieve the spirit of his troops, and prove himself worthy of the preference given him, determined to make prodigious efforts before the allied army was formed. His various movements produced the famous battle of Fleuris, in which he obtained a complete victory over the allied army commanded by prince Waldec. That general had shewn his superiority over de Humieres in the last campaign; he was now forced to yield the palm to Luxemburgh, and confess that his success flowed wholly from his merit. Of the confederate army 6000 were left dead on the field, 8000 were taken prisoners, together with their artillery, baggage, and 200 pair of colours and standards. In this battle the Dutch infantry acquired immortal honour, the duke of Luxemburgh acknowledging that their firmness and intrepidity exceeded the bravery <sup>a</sup> of the Spanish infantry at Rocroy. The allies took so effectual measures to repair the loss sustained at Fleuris, that prince Waldec was soon greatly superior to Luxemburgh, who now was forced to act defensively, until the severity of the winter obliged both armies to retire into winter quarters <sup>2</sup>.

Duke of Luxemburgh retrieves affairs in Flanders.

* Vid. aut. supra citat.

† Le Seicle, t. i. p. 218.

Death of Seignalay.

Naval affairs.

On the Upper Rhine nothing extraordinary occurred. Here the dauphin opposed the elector of Bavaria, and frustrated all the schemes of that prince to open a way into the French dominions, by gaining possession of the strong fortrefs of Hunningen. The year concluded with the loss of St. Christophers, a valuable sugar island, which has ever since remained in the hands of the English, and the death of that able and faithful minister Seignalay, secretary of the marine, who was succeeded in his office by M. Pontchartrain, comptroller-general. At <sup>b</sup> sea the king's squadrons had been twice victorious over the combined fleets of England and Holland. The preceding year Lewis sent Chateau Renaud with a strong squadron, to make a diversion, in favour of king James, on the coast of Ireland. King William had notice of the destination of Renaud, and ordered admiral Herbert, with twelve ships of the line, to intercept the French admiral. Stress of weather having prevented Herbert from meeting his enemy at sea, he steered directly for Bantry-bay, and there found Renaud, who immediately stood out to give him battle. The skill and artifice of this officer baffled the attempts of Herbert to gain the windward. An obstinate action for two hours was maintained with equal valour; but fortune declared in favour of the French. The English squadron stood off, keeping up a running fight for some hours, when Renaud, satisfied with the honour he had gained, tacked <sup>c</sup> about, dropt the pursuit, and returned to the bay. The naval transactions of the present year redounded still more to the honour of Lewis. Tourville having joined Renaud, and taken the chief command, set sail from Brest to insult the coasts of Great Britain. His fleet was the most formidable that France had ever put to sea; it amounted to seventy-eight ships of war, and twenty-two fireships. So powerful a fleet could not fail to alarm Mary, queen-regent of England, in the king's absence. She sent orders to lord Torrington to put to sea with all possible expedition, and join the Dutch squadron. The combined fleet did not exceed fifty-five ships of war; but as Torrington had express orders to intercept the enemy, he came to an engagement off Beachy Head. The Dutch squadron, which composed the van, bore down on Tourville about nine o'clock. In half an hour the rear of the French was closely engaged with <sup>d</sup> the blue division of the English squadron. The action was exceeding warm, and both the English and Dutch ships engaged behaved with the utmost intrepidity; but not being seconded by Torrington, who led the center, they were almost surrounded by Tourville. Night happily interfered, and prevented the total destruction of the Dutch, who were pursued to Rye, where a ship of sixty guns was drove ashore, and narrowly escaped being burnt by the French frigates. Six Dutch and two English ships of the line were destroyed. Dick and Brackel, the Dutch rear admirals, were slain, together with a multitude of inferior officers and seamen. In a word, the victory was complete, and the English nation so incensed at their disgrace, that Torrington was committed a prisoner to the tower. Tourville pursued his blow, and insulted the enemies coast by a descent on Tingmouth, where, according to the French writers, d'Etrees <sup>e</sup> burnt four men of war, and several merchantmen <sup>2</sup>. All English writers however assert, that only a few small craft fell into the hands of the enemy. Be this as it may, certain we are, that this victory gained immortal honour to the marine of France, and put the whole English nation into the greatest panic and consternation (B).

A. D. 1691.
King William held a congress
at the Hague.

WILLIAM III. having settled the affairs of his kingdom, passed over to Holland in the depth of winter, presided at a congress of the confederate princes at the Hague, and took the most vigorous measures for retrieving the affairs of the allies in Flanders and Italy. He agreed to support the alliance with 20,000 men, and so liberally supplied the duke of Savoy, that his affairs soon assumed a more promising aspect. Lewis was no less diligent to oppose a proper force to the mighty armies assembling to blight his glory. The siege of Mons was <sup>f</sup> formed by the king in person, before the allies imagined the French had quitted their winter-quarters. Luxemburgh directed the operation, and the dauphin, with the dukes of Orleans and Chartres, were present. The garrison consisted of 6000 men; but the besiegers, encouraged by the presence of their monarch, and the princes of the blood, carried on the works

<sup>2</sup> HAINAULT, t. ii. sub an. 1690.

<sup>a</sup> HAINAULT, p. 799. SMOLLET's Hist. vol. iv.

(B) Before we conclude the transactions of the year, we cannot help mentioning the aspersions thrown on the character of Lewis, who was violently suspected of being accessory to the death of his inveterate enemy the brave and unfortunate duke of Lorraine. That prince had threatened to enter France at the head of 40,000 men; and this amazing declaration gave colour to the suggestions of Lewis's enemies, that his highness was poisoned, to prevent the execution of his vast designs. It is certain that no proofs ever appeared to fix the accusation, which seems to have its whole foundation in rancorous malice.

a with such rapidity, that the prince of Bergue, governor of Mons, was forced to surrender, before prince Waldec could assemble an army sufficient to attempt raising the siege. Lewis made his triumphant entry, and then returned to Versailles, leaving Luxembourg to finish the campaign. The superiority of the enemy obliged him to act with caution: however, while the prince was encamped at Leuze, he seized the opportunity of a thick fog to attack him unprepared. The combat was obstinate; but in the end prince Waldec was forced to retreat with loss, notwithstanding his army was double the number of the enemy <sup>b</sup> (A).

In Italy the king's troops, after a short intermission of success, resumed their former superiority. The maritime powers paid their proportions of money; but the emperor and king of Spain, who had undertaken to furnish troops, were dilatory. Catinat seized the opportunity, and pushed his advantage with the utmost vigour. He made himself master of Villa Franca, Nice, Villana, and Carmagnola. The marquis Feuquieres was sent to invest Coni; the passes of the valley Aoste were forced by la Hoquette, and free admission granted to the Milanese and Vercellois. Turin was threatened with a bombardment; the people became clamorous, and the duke of Savoy was reduced to the brink of ruin. Prince Eugene, however, changed the scale of fortune: he approached Coni with intention to relieve it; and Bulonde, who commanded the operations, no sooner was informed of his design, than he precipitately raised the siege. In consequence, Catinat was under the necessity of retiring with his army towards Villa Nova d'Aoste. The miscarriage before Coni, and the retreat of the French army out of Piedmont, so deeply affected Louvois, that he could not help shedding tears when he communicated this event to the king, who told him with great composure, that he was spoiled by good fortune <sup>c</sup>.

The French retreat out of Piedmont.

Lewis laboured with indefatigable diligence to fill the vacancy in the papal throne; but the retreat of his army out of Piedmont had such an influence on the conclave, that all the power and intrigue of the French faction could not prevent the election of the cardinal Pignatelli, a Neapolitan, supported by the interest of the emperor and king of Spain. The new pontiff assumed the name of Innocent, in honour of the last pope known by that appellation, and adopted all the prejudices of Alexander VIII. against Lewis and the French government. Catinat, though greatly inferior to the confederates after the arrival of the elector of Bavaria, found means, however, to undertake the conquest of Montmelion, which he effected after an obstinate resistance. Louvois did not live to see this change of affairs in Italy. He died in the month of July, with the reputation of an intelligent, active, enterprising, and faithful minister. He established the same order in the army that Colbert had in the marine. Attentive only to the interest of his country, he subdued his prejudices, and sacrificed his friendships, to promote merit, and perform the duty of a faithful servant. His penetration was exceeded by nothing but his profound secrecy, and that astonishing dispatch which he shewed in the most difficult affairs. Informed of every thing, he connected and compared circumstances so happily, that he struck out the finest and most extensive projects, which he executed with a rapidity peculiar to himself. In a word, with his death we may date the decline of Lewis's glory, which owed its rise to the abilities of Colbert, and progress to the vast talents of Louvois.

Louvois's death and character.

e On the Rhine the king's army attempted to surprise Mentz: they maintained a correspondence with one of the imperial commissioners, but a timely discovery frustrated their designs. However, all the schemes projected by the emperor were rendered abortive by the death of his general the elector of Saxony, while the French army, after crossing the Rhine, took possession of Portzdeim. As to the affairs in Catalonia, though not very important, they were favourable to the king. The duke de Noailles besieged and took Urgel in Catalonia; while the count d'Etrees, with a squadron of men of war, bombarded Barcelona and Alicant <sup>d</sup>.

f THE next year was ushered in by an obstinate engagement between the king's squadron, commanded by M. de Tourville, and the combined fleets of England and Holland, under the conduct of the admirals Russel, Delaval, Carter, Allemande, Callemberg, and Vandergoes. Tourville's force did not exceed sixty-three men of war, while that of the enemy consisted of ninety-nine ships of the line. He had received a positive order to fight, on the supposition that the English and Dutch had not joined; and, notwithstanding circumstances were altered, he determined to obey the mandate. On the 19th the two fleets met in the channel by three o'clock in the morning. The enemy threw out the signal, and Tourville immediately forming his squadron, bore down along side of Russel's own ship, which he closely engaged. He fought him for five hours with great fury, until his ship, the Rising Sun, a first rate, was so much damaged, that, shifting his flags, he ordered her to be towed out of the line. At three in the

A.D. 1692. Naval affairs.

<sup>b</sup> Le Siecle, p. 220.

<sup>c</sup> HAINAULT, sub an. 1691.

<sup>d</sup> HAINAULT, ibid.

(A) Almost all writers, besides Voltaire, say, that Waldec was attacked in the rear in his march to Cambron, and defeated. Certain it is, that he was surprised, and once more out-general'd, by the vigilant and active Luxembourg, who never lost one opportunity.

afternoon the two fleets were parted by a thick fog. Tourville took this opportunity of getting clear; but the blue squadron of the English came up, and engaged part of his fleet for half an hour, in which time the French admiral lost four ships. The Royal-Sun and Admirable, first rates, and the Conquerant a second rate, were drove ashore near Cherbourg, and burnt by admiral Delaval. Eighteen ships more run into la Hogue, where they were destroyed by Sir George Rooke. This was the first signal blow the marine of France received, and it was too severe to be easily recovered by an infant maritime power<sup>c</sup>.

The battle of Steenkirk.

Lewis determined to avenge this disgrace by the utmost efforts in Flanders. At the head of 100,000 men he invested Namur, one of the strongest fortresses in the Netherlands, the citadel fortified by a new work, contrived by the famous Coeborn, who defended it in person. However, the duke of Luxembourg carried on his works with so much spirit, that the town capitulated in seven days after the trenches were opened, and the garrison retired to the citadel. The king of England, who commanded the allied army in person, and the elector of Bavaria, determined, if possible, to raise the siege of the citadel; but Luxembourg took his measures so judiciously, that all their attempts were baffled. It was a noble spectacle to behold the two greatest engineers Europe ever bred, exhaust the whole science of attack and defence. Vauban made his approaches against Coeborn fort, defended by Coeborn. Several sallies and assaults were made; the besieged performed wonders; but the fortune of the besiegers prevailed, and the citadel surrendered in sight of king William's army. Lewis retired in triumph to Verfailles; and Luxembourg, having secured a strong garrison in Namur, detached M. Boufflers with a body of forces to la Bouffiere, and encamped with the rest of his army at Soignies. William, who was posted at Genap, resolved to seize the first opportunity of repairing the shock his reputation sustained by the loss of Namur. He passed the Senne to prevent the enemies seizing the post between Steenkirk and Engbien; but he was anticipated by the activity of Luxembourg. Here William attacked his enemy with such impetuosity, as it required the utmost courage and intrepidity to resist. The whole camp was a scene of tumult and confusion; without the vast abilities of Luxembourg, all must have been lost. He had been deceived by false intelligence, and it required an excess of heroism to repair the consequences of his error. At this critical moment he forgot a severe indisposition under which he happened to labour; he changed his ground, rallied his broken battalions, drew up his forces in order of battle, and led them three times in person to the charge. In the French army were the duke of Chartres, then in the fifteenth year of his age, Lewis de Bourbon, grand nephew of the great Conde, and Arnaud, prince of Conti, all princes of the blood, and rivals in reputation. They put themselves at the head of the household troops, and a number of volunteers of quality, and charged the English with such irresistible fury, that the king retreated. The event of the battle, however, appeared doubtful, until Boufflers rejoined the army with his detachment. The strength of the allies sunk under the additional pressure of this reinforcement; but the good conduct of William enabled him to make a regular retreat, and to prevent a pursuit. His disposition was the same as when he attacked, and he appeared formidable even when vanquished. The young princes, to whose bravery this victory was attributed, were received in France amidst the acclamations of the people, who every where crowded the roads as they passed. The ladies of the court contrived new fashions of dress, which they called Steenkirks; and the men, ever ready to copy the follies of the fair sex, wore cravats of the same appellation. In this action the allies were computed to lose 7000 men, in which were included the earl of Angus, general Mackay, Sir John Lanier, Sir Robert Douglas, with many other officers of rank and merit; and the French purchased the advantage dear, as, besides 3000 private men, the prince of Turenne, the marquis de Bellefonds, Fermaçon, Tilladet, and many other gallant officers, lost their lives. Luxembourg indeed acknowledged, that the misbehaviour of count Solmes, who refused to support the prince of Wirtemberg, contributed more to his good fortune than all his own endeavours, and that, if that officer had discharged his duty, it would have been impossible to escape a total defeat<sup>f</sup>.

Affairs on the Rhine, in Italy, and Spain.

In Germany Lewis was equally successful as in Flanders. The duke de Lorges surprised, defeated, and took prisoner, the duke of Wirtemberg, posted with 4000 horse near Spirebach, and the dauphin took possession a second time of Heidelberg, which the enemy had retaken; afterwards he was forced to act on the defensive<sup>g</sup>.

In Italy the king's affairs bore a less favourable aspect. Lewis indeed had persuaded the pope to an accommodation; but the terms proposed to the duke of Savoy were rejected, and that prince invaded Dauphiny, took Ombrune after a siege of nine days, overwhelmed the whole country with consternation, and then evacuated the province, without any apparent reason. In Catalonia the duke de Noailles performed nothing of consideration, and the Spaniards were equally inactive.

<sup>c</sup> RALPH. t. ii. an. 1692.

<sup>d</sup> Le Siècle, t. i. p. 221.

<sup>e</sup> HAINAULT, sub an. 1692.

a THE ensuing campaign in Flanders was a series of successes and victories. The designs formed by king William on Brabant were defeated by the vigilance of Luxembourg. The count de Tilly, posted near the king with a strong detachment, was dislodged, and three squadrons taken prisoners. Huy was invested by marshal Villeroy, and Luxembourg covered the siege, and secured himself by lines of contravallation. William advanced to relieve the place; but the garrison capitulated before his approach. The duke next resolved to attack the allies in their camp at Neerlanden, while they were weakened by the different detachments made from the army. A feint he made deceived William, and orders were immediately given to begin the attack in three different quarters. The French were repulsed three several times; but the duke in person, the prince of Conti, and the count de Marfin, renewing the charge with the flower of the French infantry, penetrated to the heart of the allied camp, where the English infantry and cavalry sustained all their efforts with incredible valour, until the arrival of the marshal de Harcourt with twenty fresh squadrons from Huy. This reinforcement produced a total rout of the allied forces, who were driven in great confusion off the field, with the loss of 8000 men, sixty pieces of cannon, and such a number of standards and ensigns, as made the prince of Conti call Luxembourg the upholsterer of Notre Dame, a church in which those trophies were displayed. Nothing was talked of in France but victories; however, the address of king William prevented their drawing any important advantage from these successes. Luxembourg was forced to remain a fortnight inactive at Worms, while the king, recalling all his detachments, was in a condition to hazard another engagement; and to suspend the designs of the French general, to lay siege to Brussels. At last, being joined by Boufflers, towards the end of the campaign, he invested Charleroy, and took his measures with such caution and dexterity, that the enemy could not retard his operations, without attacking his lines to great disadvantage. In a month the garrison, despairing of relief, capitulated, after having made a glorious defence. Thus ended the campaign in this quarter, during which Lewis reaped nothing but empty glory. He had gained three successive victories, but could not penetrate the frontiers of Holland, though he had before, without a battle, conquered half the United Provinces, Flanders, and Franche Compté. Battle of Lan-den.

AGAIN the miserable Palatinate was made a scene of desolation by de Lorges, which he ravaged, without sparing, what ought to have been sacred, the tombs of the dead, and places of public worship. Heidelberg was pillaged and reduced to ashes. De Lorges was twice repulsed by the prince of Baden in attempting to cross the Necker; but being joined by the dauphin, the French army, amounting to 70,000 men, crossed the river, found the prince of Baden advantageously posted, repassed the river, put a garrison into Stugard, and finished the campaign.<sup>a</sup> Palatinate a third time laid w. ste.

LEWIS's armies in Italy had better fortune. The allies blocked up Casal, and invested Pignerol, which last place the duke of Savoy bombarded. Catinat, receiving a reinforcement from the Palatinate, descended into the plains, and struck such terror into the duke by his approach, that he abandoned the siege with precipitation. On the 4th of October the two armies came to an engagement, and both sides fought with incredible obstinacy and courage. The French were once repulsed; but Catinat rallied, and led them with such impetuosity to the charge, that the enemy's cavalry were put in confusion; and they, falling back upon the foot, threw the whole wing into disorder. In vain their second line was brought up to sustain the first; in vain did the duke of Schomberg, at the head of the British forces, exert every duty of a great general and valiant soldier. Nothing could retrieve the day; all was a scene of tumult. Schomberg was wounded in the thigh, and taken prisoner, the allied army defeated, and a fruitless victory gained at an immense expence of blood. Catinat displayed all the virtues of a great commander in this battle; but the obstinate resistance of the enemy so weakened his army, that he was forced to repass the mountains, after reinforcing the garrisons of Casal, Susa, and Pignerol.<sup>b</sup> Campaign in Italy.

f THE intrigues of Lewis had been for some time successful at Rome and Constantinople. The grand vizier, a pensionary of the king's, was now deposed, to appease the clamours of the people: the English and Dutch envoys renewed their endeavours to effect an accommodation betwixt the emperor and grand signior; but all their proposals were rejected. Lewis was labouring, by means of the pope, to detach the duke of Savoy from the confederacy. A variety of means were tried; but as the right method had hitherto escaped both Lewis and the pope, his highness was deaf to all their remonstrances.

In Catalonia the duke de Noailles invested Roses, which capitulated in a few days. The fortrefs of Ampurias had the same fate; and the power of Spain was reduced so low, that Noailles might have proceeded to any length with his conquests, had not his army been greatly diminished by large detachments sent to reinforce Catinat. The power of Lewis was now at the height of grandeur. He maintained a war against all the powerful states of Europe, and actions.

<sup>a</sup> HAINAULT, sub ann. 1693.<sup>b</sup> Le Siècle, p. 222.

Naval trans-

four vast armies in as many different parts of Europe. His navy was formidable, and generally triumphant over those powers who assumed to themselves the sovereignty of the ocean: and nothing could be more glorious than the naval transactions at this juncture. After the late defeat of Tourville's squadron, astonishing efforts were made to repair the heavy blow the French marine had sustained. Several large ships were bought up, and converted into men of war. An embargo was laid upon all the shipping in the kingdom, until the king's fleets were manned; and the channel was covered with privateers, to the great detriment of the English commerce. Extraordinary promotions were made in the navy, to excite a spirit of emulation among the officers and seamen; and in the month of May a fleet of seventy capital ships, besides bomb-ketches, fireships, frigates, and tenders, sailed to the Mediterranean, under the command of Tourville. Here he discovered Sir George Rooke on the 16th day of June, with a squadron of twenty-three men of war, convoying a fleet of 400 English, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, and other merchant-men. Immediately he plied up to the enemy, burnt, took, and sunk, three men of war, and about eighty merchant-ships. Tourville was blamed for not making the proper use of his superiority, and he cleared himself by fixing the blame on M. Gabaret. Before his return he bombarded Gibraltar, made an unsuccessful attempt on Cadiz, and destroyed a great number of English and Dutch vessels at Alicant and Malaga. To avenge this disgrace, the English admiral Bembow bombarded St. Maloes for three days successively; but the town received no considerable damage. England was discontented with defeats, and France was miserable by victories. The prodigious armies set on foot drained the country of inhabitants, and produced a famine. All the diligence and providence of the ministry, their care in importing corn, regulating the markets, and relieving the indigent, could not prevent multitudes from perishing with hunger. The kingdom pined under the pressure of want, while every church in Paris rung with thanksgivings; and Lewis, amidst the grandeur of power, and the utmost luxury of a polite court, was ready to sink under misfortune, poverty, and distress. It is actually affirmed, that, hedged round with victory, and adored as a divinity, he would have purchased peace by extraordinary concessions: but all terms were rejected by the king of England, who had not yet gratified his revenge<sup>1</sup>.

The miserable
state of France.

Campaign in Catalonia.

THE transactions of this year began with a descent made by the English on the coast of France. Lord Berkeley, who commanded the enemies fleet, entered Carmarel bay, landed a body of forces, but was so warmly received, that he was forced to withdraw with precipitation. Afterwards the English fleet bombarded Dieppe, and reduced the greatest part of the town to ashes. Havre met with the same fate, and the whole coast was overwhelmed with terror and consternation. These attempts were made with a view to draw the king's forces out of Catalonia, where Lewis had resolved to act vigorously; but they produced no effect. The duke de Noailles passed the Ter in the face of the Spanish army, and attacked the viceroy of Catalonia with such impetuosity, that he was totally defeated. Noailles then undertook the siege of Palamos, while the fleet blocked it up by sea. The garrison made a good defence; but, the town being stormed, the inhabitants were put to the sword, without distinction of age, sex, or condition. Gironne and Astoric surrendered after a short resistance, and measures were taken for investing Barcelona, which were frustrated by the English admiral Russel: however, Noailles's success obtained him the viceroyalty of Catalonia<sup>2</sup>.

In Flanders.

LUXEMBURGH, who commanded in Flanders under the dauphin, was obliged, on account of his inferiority of troops, to act defensively; but he took his measures with so much caution and address, as raised his reputation above his victories. His conduct here has been called a perfect copy of that fine campaign of Turenne's against Montecuculi: every scheme of the enemies was discovered by dint of penetration, and every attempt baffled by force of activity, and that promptitude in action for which Luxembourg was celebrated. That fine march, by which he prevented the king of England's taking possession of Courtray, and establishing winter quarters in that territory, obtained the thanks of Lewis, in a letter wrote by his own hand, and is mentioned as a master-piece in war by all the writers on the military art. He could not, however, save Huy, which William attacked with so much vigour, that in ten days it capitulated. Upon the Rhine no memorable action was performed. De Lorges gained a slight advantage over the prince of Baden; after which, both armies, afraid of each other, retired into winter quarters. A secret negociation, carrying on between the king and the duke of Savoy, made the war languish in Italy, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the other confederates, and especially of the earl of Galway, who succeeded Schomberg in the command of the English forces. The Dutch took Pondicherry in the East Indies, by which means a heavy blow was sustained by the infant East India company, cherished with so much care by Colbert and his successors. There seemed indeed a fatality attending the affairs of this company, which eternally crushed them, as they were on the point of rising to a level with those of the other commercial powers in that country<sup>3</sup>.

Upon the Rhine.

<sup>1</sup> VOLT. p. 225.

<sup>2</sup> HAINAULT, ibid.

<sup>3</sup> Le Siècle, p. 229.

- a THE decline of Lewis's glory became every day more apparent. His most able ministers were gone, and Luxembourg, who till now had kept up the credit of his arms in Flanders, was no more. He heard the clamours of his people, which he could not appease; he saw his propositions of peace rejected with disdain. Francis de Montmorency died at Versailles in the 67th year of his age, and Lewis lamented him as the support of his crown, and the only general, except Catinat, in whom he could confide. He was forced to appoint Villeroy, an officer of far inferior reputation, to command in Flanders, while Boufflers led a separate army, but subject to Villeroy's directions. The change of generals became soon apparent. Villeroy was forced to secure himself behind lines, though Luxembourg, with an inferior army, stood in such a manner on the defensive, that he awed and intimidated the enemy. King William ventured to invest Namur, deemed almost impregnable by late additional works, defended by a marshal of France, distinguished by his valour and conduct, with a garrison of 15,000 men, and protected by Villeroy's army. On the 11th day of July the trenches were opened, and the batteries began to play with incredible fury. Several assaults were made; the garrison behaved with great intrepidity, disputed every inch of ground; but the conduct of the assailants, and particularly of the British forces, was altogether unprecedented. Actuated by a kind of enthusiasm, they fought with irresistible fury under the eye of their monarch, who, leaning on the shoulder of the elector of Bavaria, exclaimed in a rapture, "See my brave English!" On the 4th of August count Guiscard capitulated for the town, and marshal Boufflers, with the garrison, retired to the citadel; against which twelve batteries, erected under the direction of Coeborn, played by the 13th. The marshal exerted amazing diligence and intrepidity; but, that, in despair, he formed a scheme for forcing a passage through the confederate lines. Villeroy, after having taken Dixmude and Deynse, bombarded Brussels; and being reinforced with draughts from all the garrisons, advanced with 90,000 men to relieve the citadel of Namur. However, upon viewing the position of the allied army, he retired without noise in the night towards the Mahaigue. Boufflers still refused to capitulate; he expected Villeroy would exert his utmost ability for his relief; he sustained another grand assault, and at length capitulated on the first of September, upon honourable conditions. As he was marching out of the citadel, he was arrested in the name of his Britannic majesty, by way of reprisal for the garrisons of Dixmude and Deynse, detained by Villeroy contrary to the cartel. While he remained prisoner at Hanover, he was treated with the utmost respect and reverence, and, after his return to Versailles on his parole, Lewis embraced him in public with the warmest expressions of regard, created him a peer of France, and presented him with a very large sum of money, in acknowledgement of his signal services (A.) This was the only transaction that merits notice in the Netherlands; the affairs upon the Rhine deserve still less attention, as both armies employed themselves wholly in ruining and laying waste the country. In Italy the conduct of the duke of Savoy was so equivocal, that all operations seemed suspended, except the siege of Casal, which he undertook, contrary to the advice of the allied generals, and took, it is supposed, with the connivance of Lewis; this being the sacrifice made to the inconstancy of that prince<sup>m</sup>.
- e VENDOSME succeeded the duke de Noailles in Catalonia. He made the utmost efforts to maintain the reputation of the king's arms; but was foiled in all his attempts by the vigilance and conduct of Ruffel, the English admiral. Upon the whole, Lewis appeared enfeebled in every quarter. In Flanders he lost ground; upon the Rhine he gained nothing; Italy was a scene of intrigue and negotiations; and Catalonia of vain attempts and fruitless efforts. The coast of France was insulted by the combined fleets of England and Holland; and the king's settlements in the West Indies lived in perpetual terror from the English squadrons hovering round the islands. Such was the state of France at the close of the year 1695<sup>n</sup>.
- f IN the winter the allies destroyed the vast magazine erected for the use of the French army at Givet. Lewis was forced to act defensively this campaign in the Netherlands; but king William was disabled by the want of money to prosecute the advantage. All the wealth and patience of the French nation being now exhausted, Lewis at length perceived he was not invincible; he now for the first time entertained a diffidence of his arms, and perceived the emptiness of that adoration paid by his subjects, while their eyes were dazzled by the glare of victory from seeing the real misery of the kingdom. He had recourse to all the arts of intrigue and negotiation. He treated privately with the States general, with Spain, and the duke of Savoy; indeed with this last prince a treaty was on the carpet the whole preceding year.

A. D. 1695.
The decline of Lewis's glory.

Namur taken by king William.

Affairs of Catalonia.

A. D. 1696.

Lewis concludes a peace

<sup>m</sup> HAINAULT sub an. RALPH's Hist. Eng. sub. an.

<sup>n</sup> Vide supra.

(A) Notwithstanding this public approbation of Boufflers's conduct, the marquis de Fénelon, that severe critic in the art of war, taxes the marshal with numberless blunders, committed both in the defence of the town and citadel of Namur. He is equally severe upon his defence of Lille, which gained Boufflers so much honour. Mem. p. 198.

with the duke of Savoy. Callieres was dispatched to Holland with proposals for settling preliminaries. To give a weight to his negotiations with Spain, the king pursued active measures in Catalonia. Vendosme attacked the Spaniards in their camp at Astalic; he gained an advantage, but it was not decisive. With the duke of Savoy the long agitated treaty took effect. His highness closed with the offers of Lewis, and signed a peace at Loretto, to which he repaired on a pretended pilgrimage. France, upon the whole, got nothing by this peace. Four millions of livres were given to repair the damages sustained by the duke, a promise to assist him against all his enemies, and a marriage was set on foot between his daughter the princess of Piedmont, and the duke of Burgundy. The republic of Venice and the apostolic see guaranteed this treaty, from a hearty desire of seeing the imperialists driven out of Italy. Amadeus wrote to all the courts engaged in the confederacy, except that of London, apologizing for his conduct; and, after soliciting their concurrence, and meeting with a refusal, publicly owned the treaty. One of the conditions of this peace was, that if the allies did not, at the expiration of a certain time, evacuate the duke's dominions, he should join the king to compel them by force of arms. A neutrality was offered to the confederates; but, they rejecting it with disdain, the contracting parties proposed to attack the Milanese. The duke, in quality of the king's generalissimo, entered that duchy, and laid siege to Villena. This he prosecuted for thirteen days with uncommon vigour, and would have carried the city, had not Spain put a stop to his operations, by accepting the neutrality for Italy. A suspension of arms ensued, and the confederate troops returned to their respective countries. We need only mention, that the coast of France was likewise this year insulted, and kept in continual alarm by Berkeley the English admiral. Several places were bombarded; but, as no extraordinary damage was sustained, these exploits only shewed, that England had again resumed her ancient naval superiority. We shall conclude the occurrences of this year with observing, that Europe, at the close of a long war, was nearly again embroiled by the death of the brave John Sobieski king of Poland, for whose crown the prince of Conti was a competitor. However, as this transaction will more properly fall under the occurrences of the ensuing year, we shall defer it until we have finished the negotiations set on foot for a general peace °.

A. D. 1697. CALLIERES, the French ambassador, had conducted his negotiations with the States with so much address, that, before king William's arrival at the Hague, preliminaries were adjusted, and the Swedish minister's mediation accepted. After various altercations, it was agreed by all parties, that a congress should sit at Newbourg house, a palace belonging to king William, near Ryswick. Lewis, besides the fatigues of a tedious ruinous war, was actuated by other motives for desiring peace. He had an eye to the succession of the Spanish monarchy; but his aim could not be accomplished while the confederacy subsisted. The emperor had the same designs, and therefore laboured to continue the alliance. The English wished to see the end of a burdensome fruitless war, and king William only required that Lewis should acknowledge his title. As to the States, they wanted to secure to themselves a sufficient barrier; for this only they fought, and would gladly finish the war, could it be obtained. Lewis consented that the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen should be the basis of the present negotiation; that restitution should be made of Lorraine, and William acknowledged king of Great Britain, without reserve; that Strasburgh should be delivered to the emperor, and Luxembourg, Charleroy, Mons, and all his conquests in Catalonia to the king of Spain; that the courts erected at Mentz and Brisac should be abolished; that Fort Lewis, Trierbach, Montroyal, and other places, in fortifying which Vauban had exhausted his great talents, should be demolished: in a word, Lewis received terms as if he had been vanquished, and all that air of authority and despotism, which he assumed at Nimeguen, was vanished at Ryswick °.

Lewis makes farther efforts by arms, and is successful. HOWEVER, while the negotiations were on the carpet, he resolved to make his last efforts in Catalonia and the Netherlands, in hopes of obtaining better conditions. Catinat, Villeroy, and Boufflers, were in the field with a numerous army before the confederates had assembled, and opened the campaign with the siege of Atb. The town surrendered in a few days, and William was forced to content himself with protecting Brussels. The duke of Vendosme gained a more considerable and glorious advantage in Catalonia. He invested Barcelona, and carried on his works with such impetuosity, that though the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, with 10,000 men, made a gallant defence, he was obliged to accept a capitulation. The court of Madrid had sent an express order to this purpose, to prevent the ruin of the city, upon receiving advice that the army under the viceroy, intended for the relief of Barcelona, was defeated. Spain now became eager for peace, and her impatience was more inflamed by the success of Pointis, the king's admiral in America. This officer had taken Carthagena, pillaged the town, razed the fortifications, and arrived safe in France with a booty of eight millions of crowns °.

° HAINAULT sub an. 1696.

° Le Siecle, p. 236.

° HAINAULT, an. 1697.

THE spirits of the French nation were highly elated by these successes, and Lewis would probably have again given law to the confederates, had he been as fortunate in Poland, as he had been in Flanders, Catalonia, and America. The popular qualities of the prince of Conti,<sup>The prince of Conti's pretensions to the crown of Poland.</sup> and the insinuating address of the elegant Poligniac, afterwards cardinal of that name, obtained him a majority in the Polish diet. He was elected king of Poland, and proclaimed by the primate of the kingdom; but he was supported only by his own talents and reputation. On the contrary, Augustus, elector of Saxony, was proclaimed two hours after by his party, assisted by large resources of money, and numerous forces. The other competitors united their interests with his; he was espoused by the late king's son, and had gained over many of the prince of Conti's friends by a generous distribution of money. Lewis persisted in maintaining the pretensions of Conti, and equipped a fleet at Dunkirk to convey him to Dantzic; but the magistrates of that city refusing to admit his troops, he was forced to return to France, highly chagrined and disappointed.

His imperial majesty, who had taken part with the elector of Saxony, balanced the advantage gained in Poland against the king's late successes. He receded nothing from his first demands, and insisted that France should restore all her acquisitions from the empire since the peace of Munster. Spain followed the example, and demanded the confirmation or renewal of the treaties of the Pyrenees and Nimeguen, and called upon the mediator and Dutch to support her pretensions. While this affair was debating, the duke of Portland and marshal Boufflers held five successive conferences in sight of both armies, and at last signed a paper, whereby the peace between England and France was adjusted. This alarmed the confederates, and obliged all the allies, except the emperor, to sign the proposals presented by the French plenipotentiaries.<sup>The peace of Ryswick, Sep. 20th.</sup> The imperial ambassadors exclaimed against this transaction as perfidious, and protested against it as unjust to their master; but in the end they were forced to accede. Accordingly a treaty was signed between the emperor and Lewis; whereby the king agreed to restore Treves, the Palatinate, and Lorraine, to their respective owners; to confirm Francis Lewis Palatine in the electorate of Cologne; to refer the claim of the duchess of Orleans on the Palatinate to arbitration; to cede the county of Spanheim to the king of Sweden; in a word, to give up some of the chief points for which the war was undertaken, though they were different from what the emperor required. This treaty was signed on the 30th day of October.

THE treaty with England imported, that Lewis should, on no account, dispute William's pretensions to the crown of Great Britain, or in any shape assist the claim of James II. his competitor, and father-in-law. By the treaty with Spain, the king made restitution of all his conquests in Catalonia, of Luxemburgh, Charleroy, Mons, and all his acquisitions in the provinces of Luxemburgh, Brabant, Flanders, and Hainault. With respect to the States General, a general armistice, a perpetual amity, a reciprocal renunciation of all pretensions on each other, and a mutual restitution of all acquisitions took place. The Dutch had, besides, concluded a treaty of commerce with France, which was immediately put in execution. Such was the issue of a long and bloody war, so little to the credit of Lewis, and so destructive to France. Her blood, her treasure, were exhausted, her lands left uncultivated, her commerce ruined, domestic industry lost, her glory faded, her arms in disgrace, and that spirit of enterprise, which had spurred her sons to the boldest undertakings, extinguished. The ministers, who had signed the peace, never dared appear at court, or at Paris; they were loaded with reproach and ridicule, as if they had not received orders from the sovereign; but few were politicians enough to penetrate the views of the administration, and foresee that, in this apparently ignominious treaty, Lewis would lay the foundation of the most elevated grandeur.

* HAINAULT, an. 1697.

• Auct. ut supra.

S E C T. XVII.

Containing the various negociations about the succession to the Spanish monarchy; the intrigues at Madrid; the origin of the war that ensued, and the operations thereof; the naval expedition against Rio de Janeiro; and the changes in the English ministry, which paved the way to a general peace.

The treaty of partition signed by the kings of France and England, and the States General.

FRANCE no sooner obtained a short respite from war, than it was probable the disputes <sup>a</sup> about the Spanish succession would again involve her in difficulties, and embroil all Europe. The pretensions which the two most ambitious and powerful families in Christendom formed to that crown, after the decease of the reigning prince, could not, it was apprehended, be adjusted by negotiation. The sword alone must untie those knots which had puzzled the civilians. Lewis and Leopold were both grand-children of Philip III. of Spain; both had married daughters of Philip IV. Thus the dauphin, and Joseph king of the Romans, the fruits of those marriages, were doubly allied in the same degree to the catholic king. The right of inheritance was undoubtedly in the house of Bourbon. Queen Maria Theresa, the eldest daughter of Philip IV. was mother to the dauphin; but this princess was excluded <sup>b</sup> from the succession, as well by her own renunciation at her marriage with Lewis XIV. as by the testamentary disposition of her father. In consequence of this exclusion, the immediate right was vested in the second daughter Margaret, the fruits of a second marriage, and the wife of the emperor Leopold. From this marriage issued an only daughter, who was married to the elector of Bavaria; so that this princess, and after her the electoral prince her son, were the legitimate heirs to the whole Spanish monarchy, in default of male issue by Charles II. the present sovereign, had the testament of Philip IV. been valid. But the emperor, who wanted to preserve the Spanish monarchy intire in his own family, and procure the crown for his second son the archduke, as great-grandson of Philip III. disputed the pretended right of his daughter the electress, founded upon the will of her grand-father Philip; and the renunciation of her aunt Maria Theresa. <sup>c</sup>

It was generally believed, that the intrigues of Lewis at the Spanish court had obtained from the sickly king Charles II. a will in favour of the dauphin a year before his death; but this opinion is expressly contradicted by the marquis de Torcy; and indeed the whole conduct of the marquis de Harcourt, the French ambassador at Madrid, demonstrates, how badly this suggestion was founded. Lewis was well apprised of the influence the queen of Spain, sister to the empress, had over the mind of the king her husband. He knew that the bulk of the Spanish nation favoured the claim of the Bourbon family; but he was sensible, that the court in general was in the emperor's interest, and that the king was hedged round with the creatures of the court of Vienna. Emasculated in mind and body, equally infirm in his person and understanding, that prince had no will of his own. Every thing was dictated by the queen, <sup>d</sup> her minion the admiral, and count Harrache the imperial ambassador. He scarce gave expression to one passion, except that he always shewed an utter aversion to the appointing a successor. This subject always threw him into fits of rage or of melancholy; it was therefore with the greatest delicacy it was mentioned; and count Harrache incurred his hatred by once pressing him to invite the archduke into Spain. Lewis was perfectly aware, that supporting his family in their claims to the succession of the whole Spanish monarchy would be opposed by all the powers in Europe. Jealous already of the power of France, they would certainly take the alarm at this vast acquisition, and join their forces to prevent the union of the two crowns. The confederacy so lately extinguished by the treaty of Ryswick would be revived, and Europe involved again in flames more dreadful than the former. He was sensible of the <sup>e</sup> difficulty of preserving the several dominions of that monarchy from being dismembered. Exhausted of money, and destitute of fleets and armies, Spain alone could not maintain those dominions. She was a lifeless body, which France must animate and support at her own expence, while the French dominions, already drained and exhausted, would be wholly emaciated by infusing life and cherishing the inert carcase. Necessity probably, and not the desire of maintaining the repose of Europe, dictated the scheme of a partition of the Spanish monarchy, which indeed was not a new project; for something of this nature had been devised as early as the year 1668, in case king Charles died without issue. The public imagined that this subject formed part of the agreement between marshal Boufflers and the earl of Portland at the congress of Ryswick; but the public were mistaken. The privileges of the city of Orange, and the security demanded by William, with respect to his unfortunate father-in-law, <sup>f</sup> were the points deliberated in all the meetings of these two ministers<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> Negociat. Marq. DE TORCY, pass. Le Siecle, 241, & seq.

- a LEWIS, taking all circumstances into consideration, determined, as the most adviseable measure, to propose a partition of the Spanish monarchy to king William, nearly on the same plan as that concluded with the emperor Leopold in the year 1688. It was mentioned to the earl of Portland, then the English minister at Versailles, and in the month of March, 1698, count Tallard set out for London with similar proposals. For the whole summer the treaty was in agitation, and at length concluded at the Hague, and signed by the plenipotentiaries of France, Great Britain, and the States General. Agreeable to this partition, Naples and Sicily, the sea-ports of the Tuscan coast, the marquissate of Final, and the province of Guipuscoa, were assigned to the dauphin. To the electoral prince of Bavaria were adjudged the kingdom of Spain, the empire of the Indies, and the sovereignty of the Netherlands, while the dukedom of Milan formed the portion of the archduke, second son of the emperor. The treaty guarded against the death of the electoral prince, and, in case of this event, substituted the elector his father. The same was done with respect to the archduke, at whose death the duchy of Milan should be sequestered, and governed by the prince of Vaudemont. This must be acknowledged one of the most flagrant schemes of encroachment that tyranny ever planned. Three powerful states engaged in a project for dismembering a kingdom, in despite of the sovereign and people, and in direct violation of every law human or divine. We cannot, however, wholly agree with those writers who charge this as a crime upon Lewis. Justice required that the whole Spanish monarchy should devolve upon his posterity. It was therefore an extraordinary concession in him to accept of a part, dictated possibly by necessity; but then such a necessity as arose from the jealousy of other powers, who, he knew, would dispute his right, merely to prevent the aggrandizement of France, and from views of policy set aside equity and justice. The emperor himself resolved to dispute the will of Philip the fourth, and all civilians were of opinion, that Maria Theresa, queen of France, could not, by any act of renunciation, give away the rights of her children (B).
- THE treaty was to have been communicated to the emperor and elector of Bavaria, but kept a profound secret from the court of Madrid. However, it was impossible to conceal a transaction to which so many nations were privy, and it is probable that the emperor, who was displeased with the partition, gave notice of it to the court of Madrid. Torcy says, that the first account reached the Spanish ministry by the way of Holland<sup>b</sup>. The whole court took fire at the indignity, an extraordinary council was immediately assembled, and the result was the king's making a will, by which the electoral prince of Bavaria was instituted sole heir to the Spanish monarchy. Lewis and William complained, at the court of Madrid, of the injustice done to the other competitors; and fresh disputes were rising, when the electoral prince died suddenly at Brussels on the 9th of January 1699, not without violent suspicions of treachery<sup>c</sup>. As this event changed the whole face of affairs, Lewis dispatched count Tallard a second time to the court of London, with propositions for a new convention. The court of Spain imagined, that such a measure would ensue. The people were exasperated at the insolence of three foreign powers, who assumed the right of parcelling out their dominions; their pride was alarmed at this second attempt to dismember their monarchy; and the nobility fired at the thoughts of losing the lucrative governments. But the king's life was in imminent danger, the ministry weak and divided, the *grande*s factious, and the whole nation discontented. They were disgusted with the house of Austria by the insolent carriage, the rapacity, of queen Mariana, and the contempt she shewed for the Spanish nation. How to avoid the impending blow that threatened the dissolution of the monarchy, was a task surrounded with a thousand difficulties. Should a disposition in favour of the archduke take place, Spain would be oppressed by German favourites, the nobility deprived of all offices of profit and honour, and a bloody war, supported by France, England, and Holland, entailed upon the succession. On the contrary, preferring the claim of the house of Bourbon would be losing the revenge they owed to Lewis for having projected the partition-treaty, and at the same time making Spain a province of France, and incurring the resentment of the emperor, the king of Great Britain, and the States General, who would never tamely submit to the union of the two crowns<sup>d</sup>.
- In the mean while the marquis de Harcourt conducted himself with so much address, that he gained over to the interest of his master the cardinal Portocarrero, the marquis de Monterey, with many other persons of influence and distinction. Lewis, though he had projected the second treaty of partition, kept aloof, in order to observe the change which the civil commotions at Madrid might produce. Portocarrero and the French faction, perceiving the sen-

<sup>b</sup> P. 49.<sup>c</sup> TORCY, p. 54.<sup>d</sup> SIECLÉ, p. 244.

(B) Many writers affirm, that Lewis entered into this treaty merely to amuse king William, and that he knew of a will made by Charles II. in favour of the dauphin;

but these are conjectures fully refuted by the intelligent marquis de Torcy, and the king's whole conduct in the

iments of the people so averse to the house of Austria, employed their emissaries to propagate a notion, that Lewis alone was in a condition to preserve the Spanish monarchy intire; that the house of Austria was feeble and exhausted; and that any prince of that line must owe his support to detestable heretics. The cardinal used spiritual weapons, and tampered, with true ecclesiastical cunning, with the weakness of his sovereign. He advised him to consult the holy see on the important business of appointing a successor, knowing well that the pontif was a creature of Lewis. The catholic king obeyed the primate; a college of cardinals was assembled by Innocent XII. and the renunciation of Maria Theresa declared void, as founded upon compulsion, contrary to the laws of God and man, and in direct violation of the principles of the Spanish monarchy. Whatever the motives of the apostolic see might have been, certain it is, that the decree was agreeable to the dictates of equity. His holiness pressed the king to make a new will in favour of a grandson of the French monarch: he made it a case of conscience, and said, that the repose of Christendom depended on his resolution. When the king was in extremities, Portocarrero touched this string with great address. Charles believed the salvation of his soul depended on this transaction; he yielded, framed a will, appointing the duke of Anjou sole heir to all his dominions, and soon after expired. Lewis pretended ignorance of the means used to bring his catholic majesty to this determination. All this time his ambassador count Tallard was negotiating with William and the States General about a second convention; but the uncertainty of the emperor's resolution had served as a pretext to retard the execution of the treaty. At last, hearing it was signed, most of the powers in Europe were displeased with the new partition-treaty; many of them would side with the emperor to dispute it; and this they only could do, now that France was strengthened by the whole power of the Spanish monarchy, and Lewis's cause rendered popular, by an absolute testament of the late king of Spain in favour of his grandson.

A second partition treaty signed.

Duke of Anjou left sole heir to the Spanish dominions by the will of Charles II.

He sets out for Spain.

Lewis apologizes for his breach of the partition-treaty.

WHEN the king's death and last will were notified to the court of Versailles, Lewis seemed to hesitate between his inclination and engagements to his allies. The ministry were divided. The dauphin, madam de Maintenon (C), and certain persons of the ministry, persuaded the king to accept the will; a greater number declared for the treaty of partition. Lewis affected a kind of neutrality; but the dauphin spoke with such an air of resolution, and advanced such arguments, as gained the whole ministry, and convinced Lewis. As soon as the will was accepted, Lewis clapped the duke of Anjou on the shoulder, and told him, in the presence of the marquis de Rios; "Sir, the king of Spain has made you a king; the grandes demand you; the people wish for you, and I give my consent. Remember you are a prince of France. Love your people, gain their affection by the lenity of your government, and render yourself worthy of the throne you are going to ascend." The young monarch was congratulated on his elevation, and he set out on the 4th day of December for his new dominions.

It was now Lewis's chief care to apologize for this measure to his allies, and excuse his breach of an engagement so lately contracted. This business was left to the marquis de Torcy, who plied the earl of Manchester, the English minister at Versailles, with all the arguments that eloquence, artifice, and refinement in politics, could suggest. He concluded with affirming, that the partition-treaty would have been more agreeable to his master than the will, which the king accepted purely from a desire of preserving the peace of Europe. The States General, who had presented a memorial to Lewis, expressing their astonishment at his breach of the treaty, were answered with the same apologies used to the earl of Manchester. He replied to their memorial, and dispersed his replication through all the courts in Europe; declaring, that what he chiefly considered was the ultimate intention of the treaty, the preservation of the repose of Europe; and that, true to this principle, he departed only from the words, the better to adhere to the spirit of the treaty. These arguments, indeed, appeared to most people too refined and casuistical; they exclaimed against Lewis as perfidious, false, and treacherous; but they did not consider, that the end he furthered was just, though the path he pursued had deviated from that rectitude which ought to govern the conduct of private persons, though it cannot always be admitted into the cabinets of princes.

It was now king William's turn to dissemble. He artfully concealed his resentment, and behaved with such apparent indifference, that it was universally imagined he had been privy to

* TORCY; p. 60. HAINAULT sub an. 1700.

(C) De Torcy denies, that madam Maintenon assisted at this council, which, he says, was opened by the secretary of state. The duke de Beauvilliers, the chancellor, and the dauphin, spoke next, and all of them in favour of accepting the will. Lewis gave his assent, but desired it might be kept secret for some days. No division appeared, according to our author, amongst the ministers: but these are facts, that not only madam Maintenon assisted at the council, but that several warm debates arose; and that the king, after balancing between two opposite opinions, was at last swayed by the resolution of the dauphin, and the influence of madam Maintenon, attested by such a croud of authorities as admit of no hesitation.

the

a the transaction. His aim was to sound how the other powers of Europe stood affected before he unboomed himself. Some time after his envoy was impowered to treat with the French and Spanish ambassadors about maintaining the tranquillity of Europe, for which he demanded security, insisting that the French troops should evacuate the Spanish Netherlands; that the cities of Ostend and Neuport should be put into the hands of his Britannic majesty; that the subjects of Great Britain should retain all the privileges, rights, and immunities, they ever enjoyed in their commerce with Spain; and the same as France or any other state possesses; that all treaties between England and Spain be renewed; that no part of the Spanish dominions should ever, upon any account, be transferred to France; and that a treaty, formed on these demands, should be guaranteed by the powers in friendship with the contracting parties. The States General demanded the same conditions, and all the strong fortresses of the Netherlands as cautionary towns. Lewis's ambassador was so astonished at the proposals, that he said they could not have been more exorbitant, had his master lost four successive battles. The king was filled with indignation at the insolent strain of these demands; he foresaw the war would be renewed, and made the suitable preparations. He formed a treaty with the king of Portugal, the dukes of Savoy and Mantua, the latter of whom received a French garrison into his capital. In Germany he contracted an alliance with the dukes of Wolfenbuttle and Saxe Gotha, and the bishop of Munster. The elector of Saxony likewise was on the point of acceding to the same alliance, when the situation of affairs obliged him to keep aloof. The elector of Bavaria, at that time governor of the Netherlands, declared his resolution to support the duke of Anjou. Reasonable concessions were made to secure so powerful an ally, and the elector was put into so good humour, that he prevailed with his brother the elector of Cologne to embrace the same engagements. They were both the uncles of Philip V. they resolved to maintain the rights of their nephew, and they steadily adhered to his cause after the loss of their estates and dignities<sup>f</sup>.

In the mean time the emperor was exerting every expedient to hasten the measures of the king of Great Britain and the States General. He was determined to support the archduke; but, force having gained several princes of the empire, he was too weak alone to maintain a war against the powerful united monarchies. King William had the same intentions as the emperor; but he was thwarted by the Tory party, and indeed the general aversion of the English nation to accumulate their debts, and enter upon a fresh quarrel. He received a letter from the new king of Spain, notifying his accession to that throne, and expressing his desire of cultivating the friendship of the king and crown of England. William was at this time in treaty with the emperor and States General; but the new ministry importuned him so strongly not only to return a civil answer, but to acknowledge Philip, that he was obliged to comply. This was an alarming incident to the emperor, who had ordered his army to march into Italy, to take possession of the duchy of Milan. He renewed his instances to the States General, and they so powerfully solicited the king and parliament of Great Britain, that the grand alliance took place, and a treaty was signed at the Hague, on the 7th of September, between the ministers of the emperor, the king of England, and the States General. The objects proposed by the confederates were to procure the emperor satisfaction in the Spanish succession, and sufficient security for the dominions, navigation, and commerce, of the allies; indeed to restrain the power of Lewis, effect a partition of the Spanish monarchy, or wrest the whole out of the hands of the Bourbon family<sup>g</sup>.

A. D. 1701.

Lewis, apprized of the march of the imperial forces, ordered a powerful army to move towards Italy. The prince Vaudemont, governor of Milan, obeyed the last will of Charles II. and his example was copied by all the other governors of the several dominions that compose the Spanish monarchy. The duke of Savoy was appointed generalissimo of the French forces, and, had his sincerity been equal to his valour, France and Spain would have had reason to promise themselves success in Italy. However, before the arrival of this army, prince Eugene, the imperial general, had entered Italy by the Venetian territories, forced the strong post of Carpi, defended by M. Saint Fremont, reduced the whole country between the Adige and the Adda, and obliged Catinat to retire behind the Oglio, the better to cover the Milanese. Catinat acknowledged the ability of prince Eugene; but, suspecting some secret cause of the misfortunes of the campaign, he requested to be recalled: the king granted what he solicited; M. Villeroy was sent to relieve him; but, before his departure from the army, the unfortunate battle of Chiari was fought on the 1st of September. No-thing could be more extraordinary than the conduct of the duke of Savoy in this action. He fought with the utmost bravery, exposed his person to the most imminent danger, and seemed to be actuated by a spirit of resentment against that very enemy with whom he had a secret correspondence, to which all the French writers attribute the loss of the battle (D). It was by his persuasion, that the enemy were attacked in their intrenched camp, and to his obstinacy was owing the general loss sustained, which exceeded 5000 men. In a word, to the coldness and backwardness of the duke of Savoy do the writers of this country attribute all the future success of the imperial general during the campaign, the loss of all the Mantuan territories, the towns on the Oglio, and the enterprize on Cremona, in which M. Villeroy was made prisoner. Still, however, Lewis entertained no suspicion of his ally. He attributed the whole to the activity and fine military genius of prince Eugene, and therefore sent the duke of Vendome, a general of the highest reputation, to oppose him. He pressed the duke of Savoy effectually to perform his engagement, and soon discovered the reality of Catinat's suspicions <sup>a</sup>.

The imperial forces march to Italy.

Battle of Chiari.

<sup>f</sup> SMOLLET, t. iv. b. 8.<sup>g</sup> HAINAULT, an. 1701. 2.

The triple alliance formed.

WILLIAM was the avowed enemy of Lewis. He passed over to Holland to adjust the operations of the campaign, and the proportion of troops which each of the allies was to support. Had each of the confederates performed their engagements, the alliance would even proved too powerful for France, exhausted by the late war, and now rather incumbered than reinforced by the clumsy inanimate weight of the Spanish monarchy, but England alone acted up to the spirit of the confederacy, and, instead of an auxiliary, became the principal in the quarrel. Before the time for action arrived, William was no more; but queen Anne, who succeeded to the crown, resolved, by the advice of her people, to pursue the measures he had planned. The transports, which the court of France could hardly restrain when the news of king William's death arrived, proved what a dangerous enemy he was esteemed. The Parisians made public rejoicings at the event; and such indecent raptures did it produce in France, that cardinal Grimani complained of them to the pope, as an insult on his master the emperor, connected to William by the ties of friendship and alliance. Lewis set all engines to work to detach the Dutch from the confederacy; but the earl of Marlborough, ambassador extraordinary from the new queen, kept their councils steady, animated them to a full exertion of their power, concerted the plan of operations, and agreed with the imperial and Dutch ministers, that war should be declared against France, on the same day, at Vienna, London, and the Hague <sup>1</sup>.

State of
France.

LEWIS was now upon the eve of a war, the most important of his life, without councils to direct, or generals to execute. Chamillard, the creature of M. Maintenon, was at the head of the administration, with no other talent than honesty, perhaps not the most essential to a minister. Unfortunately he thought himself able to sustain the whole weight of that vast government, which had often proved too heavy for the united shoulders of the great Colbert and Louvois. Lewis was now old; but he imagined that his experience would enable him to direct his ministers and generals. The latter were tied down like ambassadors to certain instructions, from which they were not to deviate. The operations of the field were planned by Lewis and his minister, in the cabinet of madame Maintenon. The spirit of enterprize was extinguished, and that promptitude in seizing opportunities, that forms the military art, lost, while couriers were detached to obtain a latitude in the orders. Besides Chamillard had the disposal of all military preferments. Regiments were given to boys, which used to be the reward of long distinguished services. Discipline, so strictly maintained by Louvois, relaxed under Chamillard. All the corps were incomplete, and Lewis had frequently no more than the name and expence of large armies. Such was the situation of France when war was declared against her monarch by the formidable confederacy we have mentioned, when the duke of Savoy dropt off from his alliance, and the whole kingdom of Portugal, in treaty with Lewis, joined with his enemies, and declared for the archduke; when even many parts of the Spanish dominions began to express a dislike to the government of the house of Bourbon, and an open revolt had appeared in the kingdom of Naples. Lewis received the first checks in Italy from the great abilities of prince Eugene, the powerful combination raised out of jealousy against Catinat, and the desertion of the duke of Savoy. His armies in Germany had received little repulses, he had lost some towns, and several of his lesser allies were crushed before they could have performed any service; but it was not before England and Holland exerted their vigour, that he perceived the sad reverse of fortune which he had to experience. Then only it was that he saw his armies every day defeated, his allies ruined, his cities reduced, France every-where insulted, threatened with an invasion from without, exhausted, spiritless, and desponding within <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Siecle, t. i. p. 255.

<sup>i</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>k</sup> Siecle, ibid. & seq.

(D) M. Voltaire is extremely favourable to the reputation of M. Catinat. That officer was superseded by Villeroy, but he did not quit the army immediately. Catinat expressed his astonishment at the resolution formed to attack prince Eugene in his intrenchments. The post was of no consequence could it be gained, and a repulse would not only sink the spirits of the soldiers, discredit the arms of the king, but open a path to the enemy to extend their conquests. Finding, however, that his orders to charge were express, he turned round to his officers, crying out, "March on, we must obey." P. ii. c. 3.

a IN the month of July, the earl of Marlborough took the command of the confederate army in Flanders. He had learned the art of war from Turenne, after he had distinguished himself under the eye of that great general, whose discernment soon discovered in him all the qualities of a hero; that he was cool, patient, penetrating, and persevering; that his genius was vast, and his application indefatigable. Lewis, to oppose this general, sent the duke of Burgundy, his grandson, and marshal Boufflers, in whose valour and experience he reposed great confidence. The judicious marches and encampments of the British general obliged the French every-where to retire. In the space of a month all Spanish Guelderland was evacuated, several towns taken, and the duke of Burgundy, to save his reputation, forced to return to Versailles. After Venlo, Ruremonde, and other places, had surrendered, Boufflers, confounded with the rapidity of Marlborough's conquests, determined to cover Liege; but, on the approach of the allied army, he retired to Brabant, leaving the earl to pursue his success. In a word, Liege was taken, the French were driven back to their own dominions, Lewis's reputation was faded, Marlborough's character established, and Boufflers sunk in the esteem of his master, who judged of merit by success, and of actions by the event<sup>1</sup>.

A. D. 1702.
Campaign in the Netherlands.

b IN Germany, the allies took Keyserswaert in the month of June; but this loss was balanced by the elector of Bavaria's seizing upon Ulm. Lewis had two armies on the Rhine, commanded by the marquis de Villars and count de Guiscard. After reducing Newbergh, they were frustrated in a design of surrounding prince Lewis of Baden, by his retreat. Villars, however, pursued, crossed the Rhine, and attacked the prince at Friedlingen. The conflict was c obstinate; victory had already declared for the king; but an unaccountable panic seized the French troops, which had almost produced a defeat. The intrepidity of Villars alone retrieved the day, inspired the forces with fresh courage, and secured that victory which he had already gained by his conduct. This event obtained him the dignity of marshal, and so won the confidence of his master, that he resolved to oppose him in Flanders to the earl of Marlborough. To the victory of Friedlingen it was owing, that the allied army was obliged to finish the campaign after the reduction of a few inconsiderable places, and that the French were in a capacity to balance their losses by the conquest of Triers and Traerbach.

In Germany.

d THE intrigues of the French court at Vienna, weaned the attention of the imperial court entirely from the affairs of Italy. Prince Eugene was neglected, and forced to act defensively. Indeed his forces were so much reduced, and himself so badly supplied with money, that it required the whole strength of his genius to keep any footing in the country he over-run the preceding year. It was supposed, on good authority, that count Mansfield, president of the council of war at Vienna, was bribed to withhold supplies from prince Eugene; and it is certain that the grand vizier fell a sacrifice to the inclination he expressed of obliging the French king, by renewing the war in Germany. Eugene had nearly triumphed over all difficulties; but a fine scheme he had formed to surprise the French at Luzzara was disconcerted by mere accident. Even the vigilant, cautious Vendome had almost been caught napping, and the new king of Spain defeated on his arrival in Italy. After all, the battle was fought with such equal fortune, that both sides claimed the victory, tho' indeed the consequences seemed to e determine it in favour of the French general. Luzzara and Guastalla surrendered to the catholic king, and Philip, proud of this conquest, returned triumphant to Spain<sup>m</sup>.

In Italy.

f THE transactions at sea were no way favourable to the most Christian king. After the attempt on Cadiz had miscarried, Sir George Rooke, the English admiral, entered the harbour of Vigo, forced the strong booms and chains laid across the entrance, defeated Chateau Renaud, drove eight men of war on shore, took ten ships of the line and eleven rich galleons, and set sail for England with a booty of four millions of pieces of eight, having destroyed near double that sum in six galleons that perished. In the West Indies a fifty-gun ship was driven ashore by the brave English admiral Bembow, and destroyed. M. Du Casse likewise narrowly escaped being defeated. With ten sail of the line he engaged the English admiral with an equal number of ships. The fight was maintained for the whole day by Bembow, and renewed the next morning, tho' deserted by almost all his captains; but his force was too small; he returned to Jamaica with the loss of a leg, granted a commission for trying several of his officers, had two shot for cowardice, and received this honourable testimony of his valour from Du Casse<sup>n</sup>; "Sir, I had little hope on Monday last, but to have supped in your cabin; but it pleased God to order it otherwise. I am thankful for it. As for those cowardly captains, who deserted you, hang them up; for by God they deserve it."

Naval trans-
actions.

THE confederates had made considerable progress in a treaty with the king of Portugal, A. D. 1703. and the emperor was trying many expedients to detach the elector of Bavaria from the king's alliance. Lewis regarded that prince as the most faithful and able of his allies, and took

<sup>1</sup> HAINAULT sub an. TORCY, p. 169.
iv. §. 25.

<sup>m</sup> VOLT. t. i. p. 265.

<sup>n</sup> SMOLLET Hist. Eng. vol.

Campaign on the Rhine.

vigorous measures to support him. The dilatory measures of the imperial court enabled him to defeat all their projects for shaking the elector's fidelity. It was resolved to continue Villars upon the Rhine, and powerfully to reinforce the elector; by which the emperor would be under the necessity of detaining the troops destined to join the confederates in Flanders. Villars took the fortrefs of Kehl; and the elector, dividing the imperialists by a feint, defeated general Schilk near Passau, attacked the Saxon troops that guarded the artillery with such impetuosity, as intirely routed and dispersed them, reduced Newburgh on the Inn, and obtained a complete victory over another body of imperialists near Burgenfeldt; in which action the young prince of Brandenburgh Anspach was killed. Pursuing his good fortune, he advanced to Ratisbon, where the diet was sitting, took possession of the city, joined M. Villars, who had penetrated the black forest at Offingen. Villars was unsuccessful in his attempt to force the imperial lines at Stolhoffen; but after his junction with the troops of Bavaria, he obtained a victory over count Stirum, who commanded a body of 20,000 imperialists at Donawert, in despite of the remonstrances of the elector, who was for declining an engagement<sup>o</sup>. In the mean time the duke of Burgundy, assisted by count Tallard, laid siege to Old Brisac, which, after a brave defence, surrendered in fourteen days. The army was now left to the sole command of Tallard, who had express orders to invest Landau. His lines were not quite finished, when he received advice that the prince of Hesse resolved to attack him and raise the siege. Tallard suddenly quitting his lines, fell unexpectedly on the prince near Spirebach, and obliged him, after incredible efforts, and the noblest proofs of courage, to yield the victory, and relinquish his design, with the loss of 3000 men left upon the field of battle. In this action Lewis lost the brave Pracontal, one of his best officers; but the siege was resumed, and Landau surrendered by capitulation. Some retribution was made by the enemy; but the elector of Bavaria concluded the campaign with the reduction of Augsburgh<sup>p</sup>.

Battle of Spirebach.

Campaign on the Lower Rhine.

ALL these advantages were more than counterbalanced by the repeated losses and disgraces on the Lower Rhine. Villeroy and Boufflers took possession of Tongeron with design to relieve Bonne, besieged by the duke of Marlborough. This strong city surrendered within sight of the French generals, who retreated with precipitation at Marlborough's approach, blew up the works of Tongeron, took shelter behind their lines, and were forced by generals Coehorn and Spaar in two different places. Boufflers, however, gained some advantage over Opdam in the neighbourhood of Antwerp. Te Deum was sung at Paris, but the victory remained so doubtful, that Boufflers was soon after disgraced by Lewis, and Opdam deprived of his command by the States General. Both lost the fruits of long services, during which they manifested their zeal, courage, and capacity, in divers instances. Villeroy gave some intimations that he would wait for the confederate army in his camp at St. Job; but on the approach of the duke of Marlborough, he set fire to his camp, and retired within his lines with precipitation. In consequence Huy, Limburgh, and Gueldres, were successively besieged and taken by the confederates.

Lewis is successful in Italy.

ITALY afforded a happier prospect. There the ill managment of the court of Vienna obliged the imperialists to act defensively. The king's troops, after reducing the fortrefs of Barfello, took possession of the duke of Modena's territories; and Vendome having discovered a secret treaty between the emperor and the duke of Savoy, disarmed all the forces of the latter. Exasperated at this insult, the duke put the French ambassador under arrest; upon which Lewis sent him a menacing letter, giving him to understand, that as neither religion, honour, interest, or the most solemn obligations, had been able to influence his conduct, the duke of Vendosme would acquaint him with certain propositions, to which he must, in the space of twenty-four hours, put in his definitive answer. This peremptory letter widened the breach, and the duke concluded a treaty with the court of Vienna, acknowledged the archduke Charles king of Spain, and sent envoys to England and Holland, intimating his inclinations of acceding to the confederacy. Soon after the duke was joined by a body of imperial horse under Visconti, and afterwards by count Staremburg with 15,000 men, who effected this junction in despite of all the difficulties consequent on a march through an enemy's country, secured by an officer of Vendosme's ability.

The king of Portugal declares for the confederates.

THE year concluded with the open declaration of a new enemy to Lewis. The Portuguese ministry, reflecting on the danger that would result to the kingdom from the union of the crowns of Spain and France, over-awed by the power of the combined fleets which hovered upon their coasts, flattered by the splendor of a match between the infanta and the archduke Charles, the competitor for the Spanish monarchy, embraced the confederacy, signed a treaty with the emperor, the queen of Great-Britain, and the States General. Here it was stipulated, that king Charles should be conveyed by the combined fleet into Portugal; that he should be attended by 12,000 land forces, with a strong supply of money, arms, and ammunition; and that he should, immediately on his landing, be joined by any army of 48,000 a Portuguese. Accordingly the emperor declared his son, the archduke, king of Spain; and that prince, after a conference with the duke of Marlborough at Dusseldorp, set out for England, from whence he was to be conveyed to Portugal. On his arrival at Lisbon, he found that court overwhelmed with sorrow for the death of the infanta, the intended spouse of king Charles (A).

<sup>o</sup> Le Siecle, p. 276. HAINAULT, an. 1703.

<sup>p</sup> TINDAL'S Continuat. p. 622. t. i.

Portuguese.

Lewis ballanced the loss of his Portuguese majesty's alliance with the lucky incident of the revolt in Hungary, artfully fomented by the court of Versailles, and now grown to such a pitch, as to endanger the safety of the house of Austria. Had the Hungarian malcontents acted in concert with the elector of Bavaria, Vienna must have been infallibly lost, and the emperor driven out of his hereditary dominions. The elector was master of all the places on the Danube as far as Passau. Thirty thousand French, under count Marfin, who succeeded Villars, sent to quell the rebellious Cevennois, menaced the imperial capital on the other side the Danube, Ragotzki, at the head of the Hungarians, supported by Lewis and the grand signior, was fighting for liberty, and threatening the invasion of Austria. In a word, the emperor's affairs were on the brink of destruction, when the duke of Marlborough formed that bold military stroke, which will be the admiration of all ages, of marching to the relief of the empire with an army of no more than 10,000 British infantry and twenty-three squadrons<sup>a</sup>. While Villeroy was preparing to frustrate the design of the confederates to penetrate by the Moselle into France, Marlborough was hastening, by forced marches, to the heart of the empire, and had actually fought the battle of Schellenberg, before the French general was apprised of his intentions. The expedition with which he arrived before the elector of Bavaria's lines, at Donawert, the impetuosity with which he forced those lines, and the advantage he drew from his victory, are scarce credible. He quitted Maestricht on the 8th of May, and had restored the security of the empire by the 2d day of June, after overthrowing the combined armies of France and Bavaria, taking the town of Donawert, and driving the elector of Bavaria to seek shelter under the cannon of Augsburg. Pity it is that such heroic actions should be stained with brutal inhumanity, and the fine electorate of Bavaria reduced to a desert, out of resentment to the noble spirit that prince had shewn in refusing terms of accommodation, and remaining fast to his engagements<sup>b</sup>.

A. D. 1704.

The duke of Marlborough marches to the relief of the empire.

MARSHAL Tallard crossing the black forest with the utmost expedition, joined the elector at Biberach, and crossed the Danube at Lawingen, with intention to attack prince Eugene, who commanded a separate army at Hochstedt. The duke of Marlborough joined prince Eugene; but the elector and Tallard, having still a superiority, maintained their first resolution of fighting the confederate army. Their forces amounted to 82 battalions and 160 squadrons; those of the enemy did not exceed 64 battalions and 152 squadrons. Tallard commanded the right wing, the elector and count Marfin were on the left. Tallard was esteemed an active penetrating officer, fertile in expeditions and resources; Marfin a general of experience and application, rather than of genius. In the village of Blenheim were posted 20 battalions and 12 squadrons, from a presumption that there the confederates would push their chief attack. At noon the village was furiously attacked by a body of English, supported by a corps of Hessians; the French performed wonders, and repulsed the enemy in three successive attempts. Part of the enemies center and right wing crossing the rivulet, were charged so impetuously by the French horse, and so miserably galled in the flank by the troops posted in the village of Blenheim, that they fell in disorder, and retreated with precipitation. In the mean time the left wing of the confederates charged the cavalry in the right, and were vigorously opposed by Tallard in person, who rallied his troops three several times as he retreated. Feuquieres indeed affirms, that he was made prisoner before the left wing of the enemy engaged; but Voltaire with good reason asserts, that he is mistaken, as the marshal was wounded, and his son killed, in this retreat. The infantry were disordered by the falling back of the cavalry, and being unsupported, gave way to the vigorous efforts of the enemy. Marlborough pushed between the battalions placed in Blenheim and the wing of the army commanded by Tallard. Thus the army was separated and almost surrounded; for prince Eugene, in the fourth attempt, had succeeded, and drove the electoral and French troops before him. All was in

Battle of Blenheim.

<sup>a</sup> HAINAULT, ann. 1704.<sup>b</sup> VOLTAIRE, p. 279.

(A) The better to influence the court of Portugal, the archduke consented to dismember a kingdom, in which he had not a single village, in favour of Peter II. his Portuguese majesty, to whom he ceded Vigo, Bayonne, Alcantara, Badajoz, part of Estremadura, all that country situated to the west of the Rio de la Plata, in the southern part of America, and some other territories, by one of those treaties which never was put in execution. Voltaire asserts, that the king of Portugal and the prince of Hesse-Darmstadt invited the emperor of Morocco into Spain, but that the politic Muley Ismael refused their proposals, and designedly insisted upon terms that could not be accepted (1).

(1) Tom. ii. p. 269.

The French
defeated,

Reflections on the defeat.

The king successful in Italy and Portugal.

confusion; and Tallard, who had mistaken a squadron of the enemy for his own, taken prisoner, as he was endeavouring to draw off the troops from the village of Blenheim, who were now forced to capitulate, lay down their arms, and surrender prisoners of war. The remaining part of the army fled in consternation. Officers and soldiers threw themselves in the Danube, and lost their lives to escape the disgrace of captivity. The greater part of 30 squadrons perished in the river, 10,000 men were left dead in the field, 13,000 were made prisoners, 100 pieces of cannon, 22 mortars, above 100 pair of colours, near 200 standards, 17 pair of kettle drums, upwards of 3000 tents, 34 coaches, 300 laden mules, two bridges of boats, 15 pontoons, all the French baggage and the military chest, fell into the hands of the enemy. This indeed was the most disgraceful and decisive blow Lewis ever sustained, and Feuquieres attributes it to a variety of errors committed by the king's generals. Tallard is blamed for weakening the center by detaching such a number of troops to Blenheim, in consequence of which Marlbrough pierced the center, and divided the two wings of the army. It is likewise objected to him, that he suffered the enemy quietly to pass the rivulet, and form unmolested on the opposite side; but we are of opinion that this oversight, if it was one, contributed nothing to the defeat that ensued, as the confederates were thrice repulsed, and forced to repass the rivulet. The truth is, the superior genius of the confederate generals, and valour of their troops, rather than any material blunders, occasioned the defeat of the French army. In this manner ended the celebrated battle of Blenheim or Hockstet, by which the German empire was relieved, and all France thrown into the utmost consternation. Accustomed to a rapid course of victories, the whole court sunk into the deepest abyss of despondency on the news of this signal defeat. Every one dreaded acquainting the king with the melancholy truth; but at last M. de Maintenon undertook the disagreeable task, and told him that Lewis was not invincible. He bore the tidings with a fortitude that reflects more honour on his magnanimity, than a victory gained by his own personal bravery. He determined to retrieve the face of affairs by the most vigorous efforts; sent orders to marshal Villeroy to march to the relief of Landau, invested by the confederates, and recalled Villars from the Cevennes to command his forces on the Rhine. Villeroy obeyed his orders, but found Marlbrough and Eugene posted so advantageously, that he was obliged to retire without coming to an action. Landau capitulated, and Trierbach was soon after reduced; but Lewis owed his safety more to the jealousy of prince Lewis of Baden, than to all his own endeavours. It was even supposed that the prince was the king's pensioner, since nothing could be more inconsistent with his acknowledged abilities, than the obstinacy with which he opposed the most salutary, and pursued the most pernicious measures. It was justly condemned as a most impolitic step to lose time in besieging towns, when the enemy were seized with universal consternation; yet were Eugene and Marlbrough forced to comply with the insurmountable obstinacy of the prince of Baden <sup>a</sup>.

LEWIS's disgraces in Germany were, in some measure, retrieved by the active and prudent conduct of Vendome, who reduced the duke of Savoy to extreme difficulties. He drove him out of the field, forced his highness to take shelter in Cbivas, there to remain an inactive spectator of the reduction of his cities, and ruin of his country. Vercelli, Forea, Verac, and other strong fortresses, were taken. In a word, the whole territories of the duke, except a few cities, were over-run before the end of the campaign. Nor was Philip V. less successful in Spain and Portugal. His general, the duke of Berwick, entering Portugal, surprized the town of Segura, reduced Cerebras without much opposition, had Zebredo surrendered to him on the first summons, and took the town of Ilhana la Viella by assault. Two Dutch battalions were surrounded and made prisoners at Soldreira Formosa. Portalegro was invested by king Philip in person, and an English regiment, commanded by colonel Stanhope, taken prisoners of war; and Castle David met with the same fortune. These advantages were not gained without some retribution on the side of the enemy. The marquis Las Minas entering Castile, at the head of 15,000 men, took Fuente Grimaldo by assault, defeated a body of French and Spaniards, under the conduct of Don Ronquillo, and made himself master of Manseinto. King Charles and his Portuguese majesty repaired to the earl of Galway's camp at Almeida, with intention to penetrate Castile with the main army; but finding the Agueda well guarded by the duke of Berwick, and winter approaching, he returned, and put the army in quarters. In the Mediterranean the combined crowns were so unfortunate as to lose Gibraltar, a fortress deemed impregnable; but the count de Thoulouse, high admiral of France, had the glory of engaging for several hours a superior fleet of the enemy, commanded by Sir George Rooke, without sustaining a defeat. It redounds indeed but little to the honour of the French king that he publicly claimed the victory, and published such an account of the action, as proves that he was reduced to the mean necessity of deceiving his subjects by false and partial representations <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> QUINCY'S Military Memoires, p. 194. VOLT. ibid. SMOLLET, TINDAL, ibid. HAINAULT, 2n. 1704.
<sup>b</sup> Vide auct. supra citat.

a BEFORE we close the transactions of the year, it will be necessary we touch upon the rebellion in the Cevennes, a mountainous country in the south of France. The inhabitants of the Cevennes met with protection during the administration of Colbert. He cherished them as bold, industrious, and useful subjects, whose enthusiasm gave no disturbance to the states, while it was suffered to discharge freely, and was not repressed by harsh and severe edicts, that laid restraint on conscience and opinion. He was sensible that the strength of kingdoms consisted in the number of people, and observed with what harmony a variety of sects in England and Holland co-operated for the good of the public, merely because every man was allowed to think after his own manner. At the death of Colbert, the clergy, the court of Rome, the chancellor Tellier, and his son Louvois, both enemies to the memory of that great and faithful minister, were continually animating the king against the protestants. In consequence, gradual encroachments were made on their liberties, and Lewis was brought to consider them as a mob of rebels, who would seize the first opportunity of throwing off the yoke of government, and were now only restrained by the dread of power. Basville, intendant of Languedoc, and Broglie, commander of the troops in that province, excited by Louvois, harassed them by the most cruel extortions and military executions. They were prohibited the public exercise of their religion: they fled to the woods to perform their devotions: their persecutors posted troops in certain places, with orders to fire upon every little assembly they found employed in divine worship, and to burn, pillage, and destroy, the houses of all they could not seize. The Cevennes was in a short time laid waste; the Cevennois rendered desperate, and their zeal inflamed in proportion to the cruelty with which they were persecuted. The abbot Cheilat, subdelegate of the intendant, had under his care a number of protestant prisoners, upon whom he committed the most inhuman barbarities. M. Esprit, a calvinist preacher, determined on revenge. Marching at the head of sixty men to the abbot's house, he demanded the prisoners; was refused, and fired at by the guard, by which two of his people were killed; upon this he forced the house, released the prisoners, seized the subdelegate, gave him an hour to prepare for death, and then executed military justice on the tyrant. The intendant endeavoured to punish the rioters; but they stood in their defence, run through the towns and villages brandishing their swords, crying Liberty, and multiplied daily. At last they became so formidable, as to draw the attention of the court. They were often defeated, but not suppressed. The best generals in France were employed against them without success: marshal Villars was under the necessity of coming to a treaty with Cavalieri, a journeyman baker, and Lewis of sending hostages to him, granting him a colonel's commission, and receiving a visit at Versailles from the military tradesmen. This Cavalieri afterwards passed over to England, was formally received by the administration, and appointed governor of Guernsey. The revolt of the Camisars continued for some years; they were countenanced by the court of England, and took refuge in mountains and inaccessible places, out of which they could not be forced by the whole power of Lewis. We chose, however, to give this general sketch of that event, to avoid interrupting our narrative.

THE defeat at Blenheim, and its consequences, required the presence of marshal Villars on the Moselle. His arrival soon produced a happy change. Joining the army at Treves, he resolved to try his fortune in battle against Marlbrough. The English general did not decline the offer; but the conduct of the prince of Baden obliged him to retreat. He soon found himself under the necessity of apologizing to Villars for this conduct, the blame of which he threw on the imperial general<sup>w</sup>. Such at least is the account of the French writers, in which they differ widely from the English. All agree, indeed, that Villars distinguished himself in this campaign, and shewed he was worthy of being opposed to Marlbrough, whom he obliged to decamp on the 16th of June, relinquish all his magazines, and retire to Flanders.

BEFORE the arrival of the confederate forces in the Netherlands, Villeroy had besieged and taken Huy, and was preparing to besiege Liege, when the approach of the duke of Marlbrough obliged him to abandon the enterprize, and retire behind his lines at Tongeren. By this means Huy again fell into the hands of the enemy, and Villeroy's lines were soon after forced. The body of forces commanded by M. d'Alegre was totally routed, and the elector of Bavaria and Villeroy compelled to repass the Geete and the Dyle with precipitation. It was certainly, however, a masterly stroke in the king's generals, and an oversight in the allies, that the French should gain possession of the camp at Park, by which the operations of the enemy were greatly obstructed. A few inconsiderable places fell into their hands; but Villeroy amply compensated the losses sustained at Tongeren by the reduction of Diest, and some other advantages gained over the allies.

<sup>u</sup> VOLTAIRE, t. ii. p. 191.

<sup>w</sup> VOLT. t. i. p. 287. HAINAULT, an. 1709, t. ii. p. 845.

Villars's further operations. MARLBOROUGH's return to the Netherlands left an open field to Villars. The prince of Baden lay inactive with a fine army, while the marshal took possession of Triers, after the enemy had destroyed their magazines, boats, and fortifications. He next joined Marfin, and drove the imperialists from the lines of Croon Wissenberg. General Thungen even found it difficult for him to maintain himself in the lines of Lauterburgh. Villars having taken the garrison of Croon Wissenberg prisoners, demolished the fortifications, consumed the forage between Lauterberg and Laudon; and, by a detachment, besieged and took Honerburg. On the 6th of August he crossed the Rhine, and obliged general Thungen to repair that river; but having now greatly weakened his army by detachments, he was forced to retire before the prince of Baden, who had orders to advance with a superior army. In consequence of this retreat, Drussenheim and Haguenau fell into the hands of the confederates: but Villars obtained great honour by preventing the numerous armies of the empire from gaining any considerable advantage, or undertaking any important enterprize during the whole campaign. His exploits are magnified by French writers, and diminished or flurred over by the English, in a manner equally unjust to his real merit. The campaign certainly deserved praise; but it did not set Villars upon a footing with Turenne, Conde, Luxemburgh, Eugene, or Marlborough.

The French successful in Italy

THE transactions in Italy furnished an astonishing proof of the fortitude of the duke of Savoy, and the constancy with which he adhered to the confederacy, in despite of the natural fickleness of his disposition, and the distressed state of his country. Vendome pushed prince Eugene so vigorously, as to produce the undecisive battle of Cassano, for which both sides chanted Te Deum, though in fact it answered no other purpose than the destruction of the human species. The duke of Feuillade, however, reduced Chivas and Nice, after they had made an obstinate defence. Conti and Turin were the only places of consideration that remained to the duke; his army was reduced to 12,000 men, whom he could hardly maintain; his capital was threatened with a siege; his duchess, his clergy, and his subjects in general, urged the necessity of his making the best terms in his power; he withstood their importunities, excluded the clergy from his councils, and adhered to his engagements, unshaken by adversity, and firm under the pressure of the heaviest misfortunes.

Barcelona taken by the allies.

WITH respect to the campaign on the frontiers of Spain, it began to the advantage of the two kings, but ended greatly in favour of the confederates. Nothing could withstand the impetuosity, the address, and the astonishing rapidity of the earl of Peterborough, who laid siege to Barcelona, hardly superior in number to the garrison, and reduced it by mere dint of activity and courage. In consequence, all Catalonia submitted to king Charles, and the finest province in Spain was, by a military stroke, torn from king Philip. Previous to this transaction, which produced an intire change in favour of the confederates, marshal Tesse was obliged to raise the siege of Gibraltar, after having wasted much valuable time before that fortress, and the Portuguese general La Minas reduced Salvaterra, Valencia d'Alcantara, and Albuquerque. In the bloody action at St. Estevan de Litera, count de Asfeldt justly claimed the victory; and Lewis was so successful at sea, as to have the whole English Baltic fleet brought into the harbour of Dunkirk, with their convoy of three men of war. The count de St. Paul, the best naval officer in France, lost his life on this service, and was so highly regretted by the king, that he replied with a sigh, when he was informed of the news, "I wish the ships were safe in an English port, provided the count de St. Paul could be restored to life."

A. D. 1706.

Battle of Ramillies.

THE successes of the confederates in Spain determined the king to make the most vigorous efforts on the Rhine, and in the Netherlands. He laboured to enable his generals to act offensively, to put Villars in a capacity of pushing the advantages he gained the preceding year over the prince of Baden, and Villeroy in a condition to stop the rapidity of Marlborough's conquests. Some writers allege, that while the marshal was encamped at Ramillies, he received orders from court to attack the confederate forces, before they should be joined by the Danes and Russians. Voltaire attributes all the consequent misfortunes to the ardour of Villeroy. He might have declined an engagement, but he sought it, under all disadvantages of ground and disposition. The fire and impatience of his genius, his eager pursuit of glory, would seem to have blinded his judgment. An impervious morass secured the left wing, extending along the Mebaigne to Little Gette; but Villeroy did not avail himself of this circumstance. While Marlborough was filing off troops to supply the left, Villeroy permitted his right to be attacked by the whole strength of the enemy. His new raised troops were in the center, and the baggage of the whole army placed between the lines. Marlborough, like an experienced general, took advantage of every blunder committed by Villeroy, who was repeatedly admonished by M. Gassion to support his right. The attack was made on the village of Ramillies with so much fury, that the French were soon defeated in the a center ; but the bravery of the household troops on the right, defeated the Dutch and Danish horse on the enemies left, and would have totally routed them, had not Marlborough come seasonably to their support, with a body of reserve of twenty squadrons. The household troops now gave way to the additional weight of this reinforcement ; they were broke and disordered ; the troops in Ramillies were all taken or killed ; the rout became general, and the elector of Bavaria and Villeroy saved themselves with difficulty. The baggage obstructed the retreat of the fugitives, the enemies horse pressed upon them, multitudes were crushed to death, 8,000 slain in the field, 6000 taken prisoners, the glory of France was ruined, and the finest army that Lewis had sent into the field for several campaigns ; an army raised as the last effort of despair. All the Spanish Netherlands fell into the hands of the enemy, b France was overwhelmed with shame and consternation, no military transactions were ever mentioned but in whispers, the court was wrapt up in sullen silence and profound melancholy, while Lewis alone supported adversity like a hero, received Villeroy with tokens of respect, set every engine at work to repair his losses, and seemed even resolved to stem the torrent of misfortune by perseverance, activity, and courage <sup>r</sup>.

* VOLT. p. 290. SMOLLET'S Hist. p. 307.

Vendome was recalled from Italy, and placed at the head of the army in the Netherlands, while the duke of Orleans and count Marsin were left to pursue the conquests of the duke in Piedmont, and to give the finishing blow to the destruction of the duke of Savoy, by the reduction of his capital. Had fortune been propitious to his spirited efforts, the glory of France might have been retrieved ; but a kind of fatality obstructed all his attempts, and frustrated every endeavour. c

As soon as the duke of Savoy had rejected every proposition for a separate peace, vast preparations were made for laying siege to Turin. The operations of the siege were committed to the duke de Feuillade, son to the marshal of that name, and son-in-law to the marshal Chamillard. He inherited the courage of his father, possessed the affections of the public, was stimulated to the undertaking by the promise of the dignity of marshal, and supported in it by the utmost efforts of Chamillard to procure success. Four hundred pieces of cannon, many of them of prodigious magnitude, vast quantities of ammunition, in a word, the greatest abundance of every thing, requisite for carrying on a siege, was provided ; the nation, says Voltaire, was put to an expence that would have established and raised the most flourishing colonies. Feuillade, full d of activity and valour, pressed the siege, contrary to all the rules of the military art. Vauban offered to serve as a volunteer to assist with his advice, but the pride of Feuillade rejected the proposal ; he declared he would have the whole merit of taking Turin from Coehorn, the best engineer in Europe, except Vauban. When the lines of circumvallation and contravallation were finished, Feuillade sent a trumpet, offering passports and a guard for the removal of the duchess of Savoy and her children ; but the duke replied, that he did not intend to remove his family. Immediately the batteries began to play with uncommon fury, and red-hot balls were poured into the city so thick, that his highness was forced to send his family to Quirasco, from whence they were conducted, through a variety of dangers, to the territories of the republic of Genoa. Soon after the duke sallied out, to put himself at the head of a body e of cavalry, in order to annoy the besiegers ; but he was pursued by a superior detachment from place to place, and obliged to place his security in his knowledge of the country. The siege went on with vigour, but little progress was made in the reduction of Turin. Immense quantities of ammunition were expended in vain ; and the officers of the army began to attribute Feuillade's want of success, not to the unskilfulness of his measures, but to his passion for the duchess of Burgundy, to whom he had made declarations that he would respect the capital of her father ; a popular mistake, that gained credit for many years, and was first refuted by Voltaire. Fourteen thousand French perished before the walls of Turin ; but as the garrison was likewise diminished, as their ammunition was expended, and all hopes of relief cut off, except the faint hopes derived from the ability of f prince Eugene, it was concluded it must fall into the hands of Feuillade. Vendome, before his departure, had secured all the passes, by which the prince could have access to the capital, and had formed such lines and intrenchments, as he imagined would baffle all the endeavours of Eugene, but that prince surmounted all opposition, removed every obstruction by dint of genius and perseverance, passed four great rivers in the face of the enemies batteries, and reached the neighbourhood of Turin on the 13th day of August. There never was a finer march than this, or a transaction that more fully displayed the happy union of the finest talents, the most ardent courage, and indefatigable patience. He joined the duke of Savoy at Asti, and put the enemy into as much consternation as if they had been defeated. The duke of Orleans joined Feuillade at his camp ; a council of war was held, and it was debated whether they should march out of their lines to attack the enemy, or to defend themselves within their intrenchments. The duke of Orleans, and the lieutenant-generals Feuillade, Albergotti, and St. Fremont, were of the former opinion; but count Marsin was for remaining within the lines, and he pulled out the king's order, whereby, in case of any difference of opinion, they were to be directed by his sentiments. On the right was the Stura, on the left the Doria, and the convent of Notre Dame de la Maria was in the centre of the French army. Prince Eugene marched up to the intrenchments, and, by his disposition in eight columns, greatly perplexed the king's generals, who imagined he would make his attack in several quarters. The duke of Orleans was of one opinion, Marsin and Feuillade of another; they disputed, but concluded upon nothing. Albergotti refused to part with the reinforcement required to support the first furious onset of the enemy: he had a body of 20,000 men, was opposed only by militia, but gave specious reasons for his refusal. Amidst a terrible fire from forty pieces of cannon, prince Eugene formed within a short space from the intrenchments. His attack was impetuous, but he was repulsed; upon which he put himself at the head of the battalions on the left, and forced the lines at the first charge. The duke of Savoy was equally successful on the right and in the center. The French were broke, and the whole army defeated in less than two hours. The duke of Orleans, after exhibiting the most shining proofs of courage and conduct, was wounded; Marsin, having his thigh-bone shattered, was taken prisoner, 5000 men perished in the field, and 7000 fell into the hands of the conquerors; the lines and trenches were abandoned, the whole army dispersed, and the enemy permitted to enter triumphant into that city, which but a few days before was reduced to extreme necessity. The booty was immense; the vast military stores, all the cannon, 10,000 horses, and the mules of the commissary-general, so richly laden, that they were estimated at three millions of livres, were taken. Marsin died a few hours after he lost his liberty: Metbuen, the English envoy, visited him; and Voltaire asserts, that the count told that gentleman it was contrary to his opinion the French waited in their lines to be attacked; a declaration quite opposite to what has been asserted by all former writers<sup>2</sup>. The difficulty is, however reconciled, by supposing the count had orders to that purpose from court, with which he was forced to comply, though contrary to his own opinion.

<sup>r</sup> Le Siecle, t. i. p. 265. HAINAULT, sub. an. 1706.

Prince Eugene defeats the French before Turin.

The French driven out of Italy.

Lewis had hitherto supported all his misfortunes with astonishing fortitude: but it was feared this last shock would overthrow his magnanimity. It happened at the most critical juncture, and was too decisive not to prove fatal to his affairs. M. de Maintenon only ventured to tell him, that the duke of Orleans had raised the siege of Turin on the approach of prince Eugene; and even this disappointment she qualified, by making the king at the same time acquainted with the victory obtained by Medavy Grancy over the prince of Hesse in Mantua; a victory which, though complete, produced no advantage. It was wholly absorbed in the more important battle of Turin, in consequence of which the French and Spaniards were driven out of the duchies of Mantua and Milan, the Piedmontese, and the kingdom of Naples. The pride of the towering and ambitious Lewis was now so humbled, as might excite the compassion of his most implacable enemies. His vast armies were swept away by the sword, his conquests on both sides the Danube wrested from him, his forces driven out of Flanders and Italy, and his grandson king Philip forced to yield his capital to a competitor, who might easily have subdued all Spain, had he known how to pursue his good fortune. He employed the elector of Bavaria to write letters, in his name, to the duke of Marlborough and the States General, soliciting a congress; he besought the pope to interpose with the emperor in his behalf; he absolutely evacuated Italy, to have liberty to withdraw the broken remains of the duke of Orleans's army, and the little victorious corps under Medavy Grancy. One stroke of his pen ceded all the conquests obtained at the expence of rivers of blood. It is even asserted, that, to procure peace, Lewis proposed to resign Spain and the West Indies to the archduke Charles; to grant a barrier to the Dutch in the Netherlands; to indemnify the duke of Savoy; with such other conditions as prudence ought to have accepted; but they were rejected by England and Holland, intoxicated by success, and under the influence of the duke of Marlborough and the pensionary Henfius, whose particular interest it was to continue the war, by which their vanity and ambition were equally gratified. Lewis was aware that he should gain some advantage from these moderate proposals, and that by signing terms with the emperor for Italy, he should foment jealousy and division among the allies. Indeed the schemes of opposition formed by the Tories in England against the duke of Marlborough, afforded glimmerings of hope, that Great Britain would tire of a war that had cost her immense treasures, without gaining her a single advantage, either in revenue, commerce, or dominion<sup>3</sup>.

Schemes for raising money in France. A. D. 1707.

In the mean time, though the allies seemed to have acquired new strength by their successes, though Lewis was pressed on every side by sea and land, though his subjects were almost spent with taxes, his frontier towards Germany exposed, and Alsace open to the incursions of the enemy, yet France retained innate strength; it was only her conquests she had lost; the here-

<sup>2</sup> Le Siecle, t. i. p. 301.

<sup>3</sup> HAINAULT, ann. 1706.

a ditary dominions of the crown remained untouched. His Christian majesty therefore, relying upon the justice of the conditions he offered, and equity of his cause, determined upon further efforts to bring the confederates to reason. To supply the deficiency of coin, and support the credit of the government, mint bills were issued, in imitation of the paper credit of England; but all the precautions taken, and all the security he was able to give, could not gain them currency, but at a discount of above 50 per cent. However he had the pleasure to see marshal Villars victorious in Germany, forcing the lines of Stolboffen, dispersing the several corps of the enemy, and raising contributions all round that country, extending from the Rhine to the Danube; to see Toulon, invested by prince Eugene by land, and blocked up by an English squadron, relieved by the terror of his arms; and the affairs of the confederates Military transactions.

b in Spain fall into confusion, by the fatal defeat at Almanza. Inspired by these successes, he formed the great design of invading England, and replacing James on the throne of his ancestors. This invasion would at least make a powerful diversion, and, if it succeeded, intirely change the face of affairs. Emissaries were employed in England and Scotland to form a party; a squadron of eight men of war and seventy transports were equipp'd at Dunkirk, and 6,000 land forces embarked under the conduct of the count de Gace and the marshal Mantignon. Fourbin Janson, one of the best sea officers in France, was appointed to the command of the fleet; and the greatest expectations of success were entertained, as there were not above 3000 regulars at that time in Scotland. This armament set sail from the port of Dunkirk on the 17th day of March, steered for the frith of Edinburgh, and overwhelmed Great Britain with consternation: but adverse winds, and the vigilance of Sir George Byng, the English admiral, frustrated the intention of the expedition, and obliged Fourbin to return to port, after he had made several unsuccessful attempts to effect a debarkation<sup>b</sup>.

Not discouraged with the miscarriage of the projected invasion, Lewis resolved to improve the advantages gained the preceding year on the continent. It was supposed that the presence of the duke of Burgundy, the presumptive heir of his crown, would animate his troops, excite emulation, give life to his drooping affairs in Flanders. Incredible efforts were made to raise an army worthy of the prince, assisted by the duke of Vendome; the elector of Bavaria, seconded by the duke of Berwick, was destined to command the forces on the Rhine; and d marshal Villeroy appointed to conduct the forces in Dauphine. Early in the campaign a prodigious army was assembled in the Netherlands. It exceeded 100,000 men, while that of the confederates hardly amounted to 80,000. Notwithstanding this superiority, it was determined to take advantage of circumstances, and act less by force than stratagem, for the recovery of Spanish Flanders. It was well known that the inhabitants of the great cities in the Netherlands, naturally turbulent, mutinous, and inconstant, were greatly dissatisfied with the Dutch government. The count de Bergeyk, who had great influence in the Netherlands, was devoted to the house of Bourbon; and the elector of Bavaria had rendered himself extremely popular in the great cities. Upon this foundation the scheme was formed of recovering the losses sustained in the preceding campaigns; and in consequence the brigadiers

e la Faille and Pastence surprized the city of Ghent, while the count de la Motte made himself master of Bruges without opposition. But all the schemes of the cabinet were soon overturned by the operations in the field, and the vigilance, genius, and activity of Marlborough and prince Eugene, as well as the divisions in the French councils. The confederate generals had taken the resolution of attacking the duke of Burgundy near Oudenarde, and were for that purpose preparing to cross the Scheld. Vendome proposed falling upon them while one half of the army only had crossed the river; but he was thwarted by the duke of Burgundy, who seemed confounded and perplexed at this critical juncture, on which his reputation, and the security of France, depended. When it was too late, the duke of Burgundy acceded to Vendome's opinion, and declared for an engagement, after almost the whole allied forces had f crossed the river, and were formed on the banks. Vendome then remonstrated that the opportunity was lost; however, he at last submitted with great reluctance. Grimaldi was ordered to begin the charge with the king's household troops; but finding the rivulet marshy, he refused to advance, and retired to the right. The enemy immediately fell on with incredible impetuosity, and took the village of Heynem, in which eleven battalions were posted. The main body of the army sustained the whole shock of the confederate infantry with great bravery, and the battle continued for an hour with dubious success, until the prince of Orange with the Dutch infantry made a motion, by which he came on the flank of the French army. Count Tilly and general Overkirk had likewise made an impression on the right wing; then they began to fall into disorder, nor could all the endeavours of the duke of Vendome longer retard the fortune of Marlborough. Alighting from his horse, he flew among the ranks, called the officers by name, implored them to maintain the honour of their country, and animated the men with his voice and example. His great military talents had never appeared a to greater advantage than upon this occasion; but they proved useless. His men were driven back on each other with such fury, that the whole army became a scene of confusion. Several regiments were cut in pieces among the inclosures, others threw down their arms. Night interposing saved the greater part of the army, and furnished Vendome with an opportunity of drawing off his broken forces towards Ghent. Seeing the troops give way, he prognosticated a defeat, and had provided a rear-guard of twenty battalions to secure the retreat. To this precaution the French owed their safety; for the enemy sent detachments of horse at day-break in pursuit; but they found the hedges and ditches that skirted the roads so well lined with grenadiers, that they found it impossible to form. In this action the king lost 3000 men, had 7000 taken prisoners, and owed to the conduct of Vendome the safety of the whole: but as it b proved unsuccessful, the public, judging by the event, threw reflections upon his character, which before was unsullied by suspicion; but Lewis did justice to his merit, well knowing that the occasion of the defeat was not in Vendome, who did all that courage, tutored by conduct, could effect c.

A. D. 1708.

The duke of Burgundy takes the command of the army.

Battle of Oudenarde.

The allies reduce Lille.

THE allies, pressing their advantage, invested Lille, the strongest town in the Netherlands, supplied with all kinds of necessaries, and reinforced with twenty-one battalions of the best troops in France, under the command of marshal Boufflers, whom the king found it necessary again to employ. This enterprize was thought by all Europe to favour of rashness and inconsiderate conceit; but the event justified the confederate generals. Vendome cut off their communication with the magazines at Antwerp; but they drew their convoys from Ostend; they c surmounted every difficulty, and pursued their plan with such admirable steadiness and perseverance, that Boufflers was under the necessity of capitulating, after sustaining a siege of near four months. A great number of gallant actions were performed by the allies during the siege; but the most extraordinary, was the defeat of a detachment of 15,000 French sent to attack a convoy coming from Ostend. General Webb, with 6000 English foot, guarded the convoy, who made so admirable a disposition, and fought with such spirit, that the French retired in confusion, leaving near 5000 men killed on the field of battle. The reduction of Lille astonished all Europe; for it was universally believed that the duke of Burgundy had so d cooped up the allied army, that he would reduce them to extreme necessity, before they could make themselves masters of the city. He had even publicly boasted of this; and, now that he was disappointed, he threw the odium on Vendome. One of the duke's courtiers told that great general, "Now, sir, you see the consequence of not going to mass." "What then e" (says Vendome), do you believe that Marlborough goes to mass any more than I?" In consequence of the reduction of Lille, the enemy seized upon Ghent, Bruges, Plassendal, Leffingen, and other places. The emperor persuaded himself that he had opened a way to the heart of France, and a party from the Dutch garrison of Courtray had the boldness to penetrate quite to Versailles, where they seized one of the household officers, mistaking him for the dauphin, father to the duke of Burgundy a.

The French unsuccessful in Savoy.

ON the side of Dauphine the king was not more successful. All the vigilance and activity of Villars could not hinder the duke of Savoy from possessing the important towns of la Perouse, Fenestrelles, and the valley of St. Martin. The French general had forced the two e towns of Sanzana in sight of the duke's army; but his highness had, notwithstanding, formed to himself a strong barrier before the end of the campaign, opened a direct path to the French provinces, and made a powerful diversion in favour of the archduke, by obliging the king to reinforce Villars by weakening his efforts in Catalonia.

Sardinia and Minorca seized by the English.

IN Spain, after the victory of Almanza, fortune seemed to declare wholly in favour of the king. Moboui had possessed himself of Alcoi as early in the season as the month of January; the duke of Orleans reduced Tortosa in July, and the sieur d'Asfeldt took Denia, in the kingdom of Valencia, in November, and Alicant in December. Those successes were, however, f more than balanced by the losses in the Mediterranean, where the English fleet, under Sir John Leake, seized upon the islands of Sardinia and Minorca, the latter of which continued in their hands until the present war, when it was reduced by the duke de Richelieu. Though, in consequence of the fatal battle of Oudenarde, the king's affairs suffered extremely, though he lay exposed on the side of Dauphine to the insults of his enemies, though he lost Sardinia and Minorca, and could balance his misfortunes only by a few inconsiderable advantages in Spain, yet he supported all these vicissitudes, so different from the successes which had formerly attended his arms, with firmness and magnanimity. Yet, though his courage seemed to be proof against the schemes of fortune, he felt a real and just concern for the intolerable misery of his subjects, and tried by every method to set on foot a negotiation. Though Holland led the only path to a general pacification, and no expedient was left untried to bring the pensionary Henfius to admit of proposals, or at least of the residence of a French envoy in Holland, this

c Le Siecle, c. xx.

d VOLT. c. xx. SMOLLET, l. vii. c. 9.

- a point had been unsuccessfully laboured since the year 1706; the most advantageous terms were offered to the States; they were left to fix their own barrier, to prescribe a treaty of commerce, to set what limitations to the encroachment of France they thought necessary, and had even the offer of keeping a great part of the Spanish Netherlands sequestered in their hands, as a security of the king's sincere intentions to perform his engagements. The haughty republic, intoxicated with prosperity, and the consideration allowed them of becoming the arbiters of Europe, rejected every proposal, and raised her terms to a pitch of insupportable insolence. Lewis, however, was not discouraged in his designs. He saw the necessity of procuring peace at all hazards, and was sensible that a republic, whose very existence depended on her trade and navigation, would not long continue deaf to the advantageous proposals offered with respect to her commerce. Lewis's conjecture was well founded. The States first admitted inferior agents, and this year they expressed no dislike to the king's pressing solicitations, that Rouille might confer in person with Hensius and Vanderdussen, the two great oracles of the United Provinces, the favourites of the late king William, and placed by him in those offices which they held with the concurrence of the public. Rouille conducted himself with great address; but the operations of war broke through all the schemes of pacific intentions. The negotiations met with so many difficulties, that the campaign opened, the uncertain issue of which rendered all that had been hitherto concerted very precarious. It is probable, indeed, that the conferences, which Marlborough and prince Eugene held with Hensius and Vanderdussen at the Hague, greatly retarded all the king's schemes for a treaty of peace. They were not satisfied with the demolition of Dunkirk, the king's abandoning the pretender, and acknowledging queen Anne's title, his ceding the Spanish monarchy, granting the Dutch a sufficient barrier, and England and Holland the greatest commercial advantages; they demanded restitution of the Upper and Lower Alsace to the empire; they insisted the king should restore Strasbourg, and the town and castellany of Lisle, demolish Dunkirk, New Brisac, Fort Lewis, and Hunningen: in a word, that he should make such concessions, as they ought to have been ashamed to mention, and such as he would not have suffered to be repeated in his presence, had he not been reduced to the lowest distress. The marquis de Torcy posted in disguise to the Hague, on the faith of a common passport. He soothed, solicited, he supplicated, and made concessions in the name of his sovereign; he attacked the duke of Marlborough on the side of his avarice; his offers were rejected. In a word, one can hardly reflect on the unhappy circumstances of Lewis, who had lately given law to Europe, without feeling sentiments of compassion for a monarch so long accustomed to conquests. Lewis, however, had the courage to reject the insolent preliminaries, and his subjects approved the noble resolution. He published his own proposals, and the demands of the enemy. All France took fire at the indignity. Every one exclaimed against the injustice, the arrogance of the allies, and determined to perish for the glory of their monarch. The kingdom was severely afflicted by famine; but this procured soldiers. Those, who had not the honour of their sovereign at heart, were forced, however, to insist from necessity. Many were actuated by more generous motives: impoverished and half-starved, they resolved to expend the last drop of their blood in support of their sovereign. Animated by these sentiments, France made such efforts as astonished those who believed her at the last gasp. A prodigious army was assembled in Flanders under Villars; and though the confederates exceeded 100,000 men, it was expected he would have acted offensively. But Villars well knew the superiority of veterans, flushed with victory, over raw undisciplined troops, whose eagerness of revenge would only increase their tumult and disorder.

As soon as Lewis had rejected the proposals, Rouille was ordered to quit Holland in twenty-four hours, and Villars to open the campaign with all vigour and expedition. He was, however, so incapable of acting offensively, that he found it necessary to intrench himself in the plain of Lens. The fate of France and Spain depended on the issue of the campaign. A defeat would be attended with the most dreadful consequences, the apprehension of which had prevented his making attempts to relieve Tournay, until his new-raised forces had been accustomed to the sight of an enemy. The confederates were no sooner in possession of Tournay, than they cast their eyes on Mons, and passed the Scheld with intention to invest that strong fortress. Villars marched to cover Mons, and posted himself advantageously behind the woods of La Merte and Tanieres, in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet; where he fortified his camp, naturally strong, with triple intrenchments. Voltaire affirms, that his army did not exceed fourscore thousand combatants; English writers augment his numbers to one hundred and twenty thousand soldiers, and perhaps they were nearer the truth, if we consider that he was joined by Boufflers, who stifled all rivalry out of regard to his country, and consented to act in an inferior capacity, though he was the senior commander. Villars took every possible precaution, yet his disposition is blamed. He so covered his camp with lines, intrenchments, * Marq. DE TORCY, t. ii. pass.

Battle of Mal-plaquet.

Mons taken by the allies.

hedges, batteries, and trees laid across, that it seemed quite inaccessible; but he ought, in the opinion of some military critics, to have marched beyond a hollow way that lay in the front of his camp; a circumstance of which this experienced officer must have judged better in the field, than they could in their closets. In this situation he was attacked with great fury by the enemy, and so eager were the French soldiers to engage, that they flung away the bread just given them, of which they had not tasted for a whole day. The Dutch, on the left, were three times repulsed with prodigious slaughter, and as often led on by the prince of Orange, who persisted in his efforts with incredible perseverance and intrepidity. On the right, the English forces were more successful; after an obstinate engagement the French were driven from their intrenchments into the woods of Saart and Tanieres. The marshal, in leading back the troops, was dangerously wounded; and thus the honour of a victory, attended with scarce any advantage, belonged to the enemy. The French had fought with an obstinacy of courage bordering on despair, and they now made a fine retreat towards Valenciennes, under marshal Boufflers, that prevented a pursuit. Twenty thousand of the confederates fell in the field of battle, whereas the loss on the side of France scarce amounted to eight thousand. In a word, the enemy gained a victory so bloody and dear bought, as would have made a repetition of it fatal to the confederacy. When Villars retired to Valenciennes, the allied army laid siege to Mons, which capitulating about the end of October, both armies were distributed into winter-quarters<sup>f</sup>.

On the Rhine, Lewis's affairs were successful. General Merci, having meditated an invasion of Franche Compté, was happily prevented by marshal Dubourg, who attacked, defeated, and obliged him to repass the Rhine, with the loss of 2000 men. In Italy, the duke of Berwick frustrated all the projects of the imperial general; the Camisars were entirely defeated in the Cevennes, and the affairs in Spain in general bore a favourable aspect. The English and Portuguese were defeated at Caya, by the marshal de Bay; and the strong fortress of Alicant had, after a tedious siege, surrendered to count d'Asfeld.

Negotiations of peace renewed;
ed;

and again
broke off.

NOTWITHSTANDING the campaign was, on the whole, more favourable than the most Christian king had reason to expect, peace became every day more necessary. The finances were so totally exhausted, and the kingdom impoverished, that Lewis resolved to sacrifice every consideration, and even the interest of his grandson, to procure the blessings of repose to his miserable subjects. He demanded passports, by virtue of which his ministers might repair in safety to Holland. When these were obtained, the marshal d'Uxelles, and the abbe Polignac, the finest genius in France, were pitched on to carry the king's supplications to Gertrudenberg, where conferences were appointed. The marquis de Torcy renewed his attempts on the integrity of Marlborough, and proceeded so far as to offer four millions of livres for that nobleman's interest in procuring terms, which the king would, but four years before, have rejected with disdain. Lewis now offered to renounce his grandson; he even agreed to pay the allies a subsidy to support their armies in driving Philip out of Spain, in case he should refuse to deliver the Spanish monarchy to the archduke Charles in the space of two months. At Gertrudenberg the French ministers were exposed to every kind of insult. Injurious libels were every day published; their accommodation was mean, and the language of the Dutch deputies such as might be expected from brutal burghers, exalted to treat upon an equality with the ambassadors of a great monarch. They insisted upon the king's declaring war upon his own grandson; and Lewis, after trying many other expedients, broke up the conference, recalled his ambassadors, and resolved to try the fortune of another campaign. He entertained hopes, that some fortunate incident in the event of war, and the approaching revolution in the English ministry, would be productive of more reasonable conditions, or such at least as would have stained his character with less infamy, than the unnatural act of taking up arms against his own grand-child. Measures were taken for opening the campaign, and the whole kingdom of France espoused, with warmth, the generous sentiments of the monarch. Without ever repining at the ambition that had reduced the nation to the most deplorable circumstances, the people imputed all their calamities to the insolence and pride of the confederates. Not a murmur of complaint broke forth against the sovereign, while they were under the pressure of extreme misery; on the contrary, all his subjects flocked to his banners, and fought under them with great spirit, attachment, and perseverance. They yielded the tenth penny of their whole substance for the services of the war; but all their loyalty and affection could not have preserved the kingdom from destruction, had not a body of merchants, with permission from the catholic king, made repeated voyages to South America, from whence they returned with immense treasures<sup>g</sup>.

A. D. 1710.

A NUMEROUS and well-appointed army was assembled by marshal Villars. His intention was first to cover Doway; and afterwards, finding the enemy had invested it, to relieve the garrison at the hazard of a battle. Their strong situation, however, prevented his designs:

<sup>f</sup> QUINCY, p. 205. SMOLLET, VOL. ibid.

<sup>g</sup> TORCY, ibid.

- a Doway surrendered, and the armies went into quarters, without undertaking any other considerable enterprize. Both sides remained inactive on the Rhine and in Italy, the duke of Berwick having thrown up intrenchments that baffled count Tbaune's intention of penetrating into Dauphine. Spain alone was fruitful in military incidents. The beginning of the year had been extremely unfortunate to king Philip. He had lost the battle of Saragossa, and was forced to retreat, with the shattered remains of his army, to Madrid, and from thence to Valladolid. But the arrival of Vendome soon retrieved matters, and changed the fortune of the war. All Spain demanded this general, and Philip, who entertained the highest opinion of his ability, believed him alone capable of stemming the rapidity of Staremborg's successes. Vendome acquired great glory in Italy; nor had the unfortunate campaign before Lisse in the least obscured the lustre of his reputation in the eyes of the Spaniards. His affability, openness, generosity even to profusion, and confessed intrepidity, had gained him the hearts of the soldiers. The moment he set foot in Spain, volunteers flocked to him from every quarter, and Vendome's popularity was as valuable to Philip as an army. A spirit of enthusiasm actuated the whole nation. Cities and corporations, villages and monasteries, offered all they had to their darling general, who soon approved himself worthy of their confidence and affections. In less than three months after the battle of Saragossa, Philip was in a condition to march in quest of his rival, who might have been confirmed on the throne, had he made the proper use of his victory; or rather, had he been duly supported by the allies. Vendome would not suffer the ardor of his troops to cool by delay. He led them straight to Madrid, pursued the enemy to Portugal, crossed the Tagus, and obliged general Stanhope, with 5000 English forces, to surrender prisoners of war at Brihuega (A). Next day he attacked count Staremborg at Villa Viciosa; king Philip led the right wing, and Vendome commanded on the left. The conflict was long and obstinate, and the victory disputed; though, if we may judge from consequences, it declared fairly on the side of Philip. Certain it is, that Staremborg's left wing was intirely defeated, and all the infantry cut in pieces. English writers allege, that the enemy's left wing fought with desperate fury, until night separated the combatants; but the French and Spanish writers more fully agree, that Staremborg was routed, with the loss of all his artillery, baggage, and upwards of 5000 men. Beyond dispute he was pursued by Vendome, who took Balaguar in his way, and forced the imperial general to take shelter under the cannon of Barcelona. Gironne surrendered to the duke de Noailles; and thus Philip, from a fugitive, became absolute master of all Spain, except Catalonia, in less than one campaign, the beginning of which had been extremely unfortunate<sup>b</sup>.
- But these exploits, however fortunate to Philip, and glorious to Vendome, were less advantageous to France than the intrigues at the court of London. While the signal revolution in Spain astonished all Europe, and dazzled with its lustre, another more silent and decisive in Great Britain laid the foundation of such a peace as Lewis could not expect. In vain would the industry of man, the vain policy of kings, endeavour to produce such effects; in the circumstances of affairs they were so truly extraordinary, that whoever would have pretended, a few months before, to have predicted them, would justly be treated as a visionary. Philip's unhoped for success weighed powerfully with the allies; it convinced them, that, to dethrone that prince, would be a work of more time and difficulty than was imagined. The war, which had lasted so many years, became so burdensome, that nothing but the rapid course of conquest supported the spirits of the people; the least check made the English in particular turn their eyes to their own situation. This nation, the most violent and potent enemy of Lewis, was now divided into factions, more serviceable to France than all her armies and generals. The Whig and Tory parties, for some years past, seemed to unite in efforts to advance the glory of the kingdom; of a sudden they determined to rob the nation of the fruits of all her gallant victories. During the reign of queen Anne, the Whigs had got the whole management of affairs into their hands. Marlborough governed the state, and his haughty, artful duchess possessed the queen's most intimate confidence. By this means they had the disposal of the revenue, and of all places and preferments. The earl of Godolphin, closely connected to Marlborough by the ties of interest and of marriage, was lord treasurer of England, and his reputation was as high in a civil as the duke's in a military capacity. Marlborough's credit at the Hague was superior to the pensioner's; his influence was very great in the empire, of which he was created a prince. Equally successful in the cabinet and the field, no subject ever enjoyed more power or glory. Hedged round with victory, popularity, and potent friends, it was impossible for the Tory party, now discovering symptoms of ambition, to shake his fortune, or establish their own, but by depriving him of the queen's confidence. The duke's avidity, and the insolence of his duchess, were the instruments destined to produce

<sup>b</sup> VOLT. t. i. p. 331. HAINAULT, t. ii. p. 864. SMOLLET, t. viii. p. 372.

(A) The English writers affirm, that Stanhope's army did not exceed 2000 men; among whom were three lieutenant-generals, one major-general, one brigadier, and several colonels. Smollet, 371.

this effect ; which could never be accomplished, could that consummate hero have moderated a his passion for money, and his ambitious consort been contented with holding the queen in gentle bondage. She had long been regarded with tenderness by Anne, which in time degenerated into submission, and a servile complaisance for the will of Sarah Jennings. The queen and duchess had long corresponded by letter under feigned names ; the intercourse was the most familiar possible between women, and, used with discretion, would have perpetually held the queen in those fetters forged by the duchess. A pair of gloves, says the lively Voltaire, of a new fashion, which the duchess refused the queen, and a cup of water insolently spilt on the cloaths of Mrs. Masbam, a rising favourite, changed the politics of Europe. The queen was piqued at these insults ; an altercation ensued, letters passed, Anne made submissions ; but the haughty duchess replied imperiously, “ I demand justice, not answers.” b

THE influence of the duchess of Marlborough over the queen’s mind had been the means of the duke’s elevation, and the principal support of the Whig faction. No sooner had she lost this ascendancy, than the lord Godolphin was deprived of his office of treasurer, and earl Pawlet, Mr. Harley, Mansel, Paget, and Benson, were made commissioners of the treasury. Lord Sunderland, to avoid the disgrace of being superseded, resigned the place of secretary of state. Mrs. Masbam, related to the duchess of Marlborough, and first introduced by her to court, rose in the queen’s favour, in proportion as the interest of her benefactress declined. She had the address to please the queen ; and, finding herself beloved, she converted to her own purposes the affections of her mistress, and the imprudence of the duchess, whose insolence, pride, disrespect, and ingratitude to the queen, became now as detestable as before c they were dreadful. The duchess did not appear at court, and the new favourite seized this opportunity to heighten the queen’s just indignation, and to paint the character of the discarded favourite in the strongest colours. Besides her own immediate promotion, which depended on the intire disgrace of the duchess, Mrs. Masbam had another reason to enter strenuously into the opposition against the duke of Marlborough. She had a brother, for whom she solicited a regiment ; the queen urged the duke, and he represented to her majesty the prejudice that would redound to the service by preferring a young man to several old officers, who had exhibited repeated proofs of valour and capacity. He expostulated with the sovereign upon this partial instance of regard, which he considered as a declaration against his own family ; but, his remonstrances producing no effect, he retired in disgust to Windfor. Harley d secretly directed these intrigues, and made a proper use of the earl of Sunderland’s motion, that the parliament would address the queen to remove Mrs. Masbam from her presence. He laboured from these circumstances to exasperate the queen, and by means of her favourite to destroy the credit of his enemies. He artfully bewailed the ingratitude and power of the Churchill family, which seemed to engross the whole conduct of affairs, and every place of trust, profit, and honour. His insinuations had already introduced him as a partner in power, and he now applied the whole force of his genius to improve the advantage. He demonstrated the little emolument derived by the nation from the unsubstantial victories of Marlborough ; the commerce of England was daily declining, her finances were exhausted, the people loaded with taxes, and the public debts augmented ; but every prospect of peace was remote, and would ever remain so while it was the interest of those in power to continue a ruinous and expensive war. These were the conferences which Harley held with Mrs. Masbam ; they were by her reported to the queen, and the sentiments were so congenial to her own, that she desired Harley might be privately introduced. He soon convinced the queen of his ability, gave her cause to rely on his loyalty, and thus gained her confidence b.

A SERMON preached about this time by Dr. Sacheverel before the queen, was a severe blow to the power of the Whigs. He was violently persecuted, though in fact his discourse contained nothing more than the bold absurd propositions of an enthusiastic party-tool. Harley is said to have told the queen, that Sacheverel was set to work by the Tories, from the double motive of inducing the Whigs to make public declaration of their sentiments, and oblige the lord treasurer to give an account of his administration. The queen had been present at the debates upon this subject in parliament. She had heard the violent declamations of the Whigs against the royal prerogative, and it was sufficient for this artful minister to remind her of what had equally excited resentment and horror. He alleged, that no other reason than the apprehension of a scrutiny into the conduct of affairs could have raised so violent a persecution against a silly, vain, and ignorant parson, and discourses which would have been forgot as soon as delivered, if they had not immediately pointed at Godolphin, and the administration of the revenue. The solemnity of Sacheverel’s trial, and the uncommon virulence of his persecutors, gave strength and probability to Harley’s suggestions. The queen thought it high time to change the ministry, and to use Harley’s counsels in the alterations, which her power and dignity, she imagined, rendered necessary. These were the reasons why the staff of high treasurer was f a taken from Godolphin; why Harley had the appointing commissioners to execute that office, by which he got the management of the revenue into his own hands; why the disgrace of Sommers, president of the council, succeeded that of the treasurer; why Mr. St. John was raised to the department of secretary of state; in a word, why Marlborough alone, of all the party, remained in office. It was dangerous to attempt any thing against a nobleman possessed so strongly of the confidence of the allies; yet to continue him at the head of the army was a point of dangerous consequence to the stability of the Tories. The Dutch immediately took the alarm, not doubting but a change in the administration would produce a change of measures, and work the disgrace of Marlborough. The new ministry, to remove their apprehensions, published a report of their resolution to adhere more steadily than the former to the interests of the allies of Great Britain; and the queen ordered her ambassador at the Hague to assure the States, that, in chusing new ministers, she inviolably preserved the same sentiments for the common cause, and confidence in the abilities of Marlborough. The ministry, however, ventured to circumscribe the authority of this great commander; but in such a manner as shewed they were afraid: he was provoked at the usage; but he stifled his sentiments in hopes of revenge.

<sup>a</sup> SMOLLET, t. iv. b. 8. VOLT. t. i. c. 21.

<sup>b</sup> HAINAULT Hist. t. ii. sub ann.

No sooner were the new ministers established than they shewed their inclination for peace, chiefly in order to ruin the duke of Marlborough and the Whig faction. It was now that a kind of secret negotiation was set on foot between the courts of Versailles and London, by means of the abbe Gaultier, a Frenchman, who had insinuated himself into the family of the earl of Jersey, ambassador in France after the treaty of Ryswick, and was left by marshal Tallard in England upon the last rupture between the two kingdoms. The marshal, imagining this ecclesiastic might be able occasionally to furnish useful intelligence, directed him to reside in London, carefully to observe every occurrence, and transmit, with the utmost discretion, whatever could contribute to the service of his country. Gaultier punctually executed his commission, and performed his duty without suspicion. He was now proposed by lord Jersey to the new ministry as a proper messenger to the court of France, with the first intimation of their pacific inclinations. Gaultier arrived at Versailles, reported his commission, which, however, was only verbal. He gave an exact account of the English government, and the state of affairs in that country. He desired a letter to lord Jersey, expressing nothing more than a general compliment to that nobleman; upon which he undertook to open the way to a negotiation. He obtained the letter, set out for London, and wrote back, that the English ministry, finding her majesty was averse to renew the negotiations by means of Holland, desired he would please to communicate the proposals for a general pacification, which they would transmit to Holland, their intention being to conclude a treaty in concert with their allies. A memorial accordingly was drawn up, approved of by the English, and sent over to Holland. The queen wanted cautionary towns in the West Indies for the security of that trade, the fortresses of Gibraltar and Corunna, and the island of Minorca, for the protection of the Mediterranean commerce. These were the immediate advantages demanded for Great Britain; but it was necessary the court of Spain should be consulted. Philip made no scruple about the cession of places, inconsiderable in respect to the security of his crown, and which would cost the English nation more to maintain garrisons than the commercial advantages they produced would reimburse.

As the article relating to the cautionary towns was of a delicate nature, in which the court of Madrid was deeply interested, Lewis chose to be silent on that head, until he was perfectly informed of the sentiments of his grandson; but Gaultier was permitted to assure the queen's ministers, that his most Christian majesty would use his utmost influence with Philip, that nothing might obstruct the peace so necessary to Spain, France, England, and indeed to all Europe.

In the mean time the Dutch, knowing it was not the interest of Holland, that England should either make a separate peace, or that any other power should hold in her hands the means of a general pacification, gave intimations to the French court, that if the king would resume the negotiations in Holland, he should not find the States backward. Thus the two powers, the most opposite to reasonable terms of accommodation, the most vigorous prosecutors of the war, and strenuous enemies of France, became competitors for the great work of establishing peace, envying each other the honour of contributing to its happy issue. It was the request of the English ministry, that Lewis should listen to no propositions from the States, which should tend to bring the conferences back to Holland; and the king faithfully complied, which obliged the Dutch to make application to Great Britain, that they should be consulted in the general scheme of pacification.

In the midst of these preliminaries to a negotiation, the season for action approached. Marlborough still continued at the head of the confederate army. The Tory ministry did not

<sup>c</sup> HAINAULT Hist. t. ii. sub ann. TORCY, Mem. v. ii.
MOD. HIST. VOL. IX.

<sup>d</sup> TORCY'S Negociat. let. ii part 3.

The English ministry send Gaultier into France.

A. D. 1711.

Death of the emperor.

yet think themselves firmly enough established, or sufficiently advanced in their negotiations, a to venture superseding a general who possessed the whole confidence of the empire and Holland. Such a measure would in particular give umbrage to the latter. He was therefore permitted to set out for the Hague in the month of February, to make preparations for the ensuing campaign. Before either army was ready to take the field, the emperor Joseph died, leaving his Austrian dominions, the empire of Germany, and his pretensions to the Spanish monarchy, to his brother the archduke Charles, once crowned king of Spain, and now obliged to quit the capital by the late success of his rival Philip. This event, it was imagined, would greatly facilitate a peace. The objects of England and Holland were to preserve the balance of power, and to prevent the aggrandizement of the house of Bourbon by the accession of the Spanish monarchy; the same reasons now prevailed with respect to the house of Austria, whose pride, b ambition, and lust of empire, would be equally dangerous, were the Austrian dominions, the imperial dignity, Naples, Sicily, Lombardy, Spain, and America, to be united in one family, and composing one intire monarchy. To prevent this was the design of Lewis; it ought to have been that of all the allies: that he had no desire to unite the French and Spanish monarchies appears by the reciprocal renunciation made by the catholic king to the crown of France, and the princes of the blood to that of Spain, immediately after the treaty of Utrecht.

Campaign in Flanders.

THE death of the emperor made no alteration in the mutual preparations for trying the fortune of another campaign. The efforts made by Lewis were extraordinary, considering how long he had supported the war, contended with the greatest powers in Christendom, and that he was, for the two preceding campaigns, supposed on the verge of destruction. His c eager desire to restore the blessings of peace to his subjects had indeed occasioned the confederates to conclude, that all his attempts to bring on a negociation proceeded from despair. His army in Flanders this year, commanded by M. Villars, was not inferior to any he had yet set sent into the field, and his subjects still espoused the cause of their monarch, and supported his glory with astonishing spirit and attachment. The spirit and activity of Villars had rendered him so very popular, that he found means to assemble a very numerous army, with which he encamped behind the river Sanset. His situation was so strong, that he could not be attacked with any prospect of success. He had drawn lines from Bouchain on the Scheld, along the Sanset and the Scarpe, to Arras, and from thence to Canche. They were defended by redoubts, and would indeed have been impenetrable, had not the marshal been d weakened by the strong detachments necessarily made from his army to the Rhine, to reinforce the elector of Bavaria. It was Marlborough's design to force this line, and upon his success his reputation depended. From the 15th of June to the 12th of July the two armies remained incamped, separated only by the Scarpe. The French army formed a kind of circle on the other side of Arras, the right at Mouchin-Preu, and the left at Duisan; while the confederate camp extended along the Lens, the right at Lieven, and the left at Henin-Lister. Villars's situation greatly incommoded the confederates, who twice attempted to carry a small fort and redoubt, which covered a mole raised at Arlicu, by which the mills of Doway were rendered useless, and the navigation of the Scarpe interrupted. A third time they returned to the charge with a body of 8000 chosen troops; when, after an obstinate conflict, they at e length succeeded. Intending to fortify these posts, Marlborough left twelve battalions to cover the workmen, and marshal Villars formed the resolution of surprising their camp. The count de Gasson was pitched upon to execute this project, and he took his measures so well, that he arrived at day-break, within a small distance of the enemy, without being discovered. He had ranged his horse in four lines; the first of which attacked the camp with such fury, that the confederate detachment was defeated, dispersed, and pursued to Doway. In this action the loss was inconsiderable, the victory complete, but fruitless. Marlborough made a feint, which deceived even the vigilance of Villars, and was, perhaps, the most masterly stroke of that consummate general. Advancing within two leagues of the French lines, he ordered a great number of fascines to be made, declaring he would attack the enemy. Villars drew his chief f force on that side, in full expectation of an engagement, and was astonished when he heard that generals Cadogan and Hompesch had passed the Sanset at Vitri, and that the duke of Marlborough was in the neighbourhood of Arlicu. Now, certified of the design formed, Villars decamped with his whole army by break of day; and, putting himself at the head of the household troops, marched with such expedition, that, by noon, he was in sight of the duke of Marlborough, who had by this time joined count Hompesch. This junction obliged him to retreat to Courtray, by which manœuvre he got within the lines, encamping upon the Schelde, between Oisy and Esstrun. French writers endeavour to qualify this disgrace of Villars; but the marshal shewed that he deserved better fortune, by the ingenuousness with which he acknowledged himself baffled by the superior talents of the English general.

<sup>c</sup> VOLT. t. i. c. 21.

<sup>e</sup> HAINAULT, sub ann. DONIELB. sub ann.

- a It was after this enterprize that Marlborough formed the hazardous design of investing Bouchain, a town small indeed in extent, but strong by situation, surrounded by morasses, well fortified, and defended by a numerous garrison. Villars took every precaution for the security of Bouchain, and used his utmost address to defeat the designs of the confederates, and retrieve the shock his reputation had lately sustained. His detachments gained several advantages over the foraging parties of the confederates. A body of French Hussars attacked and defeated, not far from Cambray, a body of the enemy's cavalry. The count de Landrecy was no less successful in an attack upon seven squadrons detached by Marlborough to cover a forage in the neighbourhood of Poix. The greater part of the foragers, with the counts d'Herback and Wafenar, were made prisoners. On the last day of August another advantage was gained by the marquis de Chateau-morand. Villars had laid two bridges over the Schelde, between Iwey and Estrun. At night he detached the marquis, with 3000 foot, to fall upon four battalions of the enemy posted at Hordain. Chateau-morand executed his orders; he attacked with great impetuosity, put the confederates into confusion, and took several prisoners, among whom was major-general Bock. These efforts were seconded by several brisk sallies of the besieged; they served to retard, but could not ward off, the fate of Bouchain. The duke Bouchain of Marlborough had exerted his utmost abilities in this siege. He formed lines, erected forts, <sup>taken by the allies.</sup> raised batteries, completed a causeway through a deep morass, and carried on his approaches with such rapidity, that, in twenty days after the trenches were opened, the garrison, consisting of 4000 men, were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. French historians, indeed, allege, that the means by which the reduction of Bouchain was completed tended little to the glory of that hero. According to them, the garrison demanded a capitulation, but were refused, unless they submitted at discretion. This they declined, and renewed their defence, when about midnight the besiegers, perceiving the obstinacy of the governor might yet cost them some trouble, consented they should have the honours of war, provided they were immediately put in possession of one side of a gate. The proposal was accepted, they forced the barriers, and thus gained possession of the place. Without attempting to reconcile accounts so very different, in which national prejudice seems to have a great share, we shall only observe, that the conquest of Bouchain was the last military enterprize of the great duke of Marlborough, whose resignation removed that cloud, which for some time had obscured the lustre of Villars's reputation. The opposite armies began now to separate; but, before Villars put his troops into quarters, he cut off the communication by water between Lisle, Doway, and Tournay. This enterprize was executed by marshal Montesquieu. Sept. 13.

In Germany nothing memorable was transacted since the death of the emperor. All the care of the generals seemed directed to watch each others motions; and provide convenient encampments. Europe was now intent on the election of a new emperor; and, on the 12th day of October, the archduke Charles was chosen, but was not recognized by the courts of Ver-sailles or Madrid, the electors of Cologne and Bavaria likewise protesting against the election. Campaign in Germany, Italy, and Spain. In Italy, the duke of Savoy, having passed mount Cenis, attacked the French army commanded by the duke of Berwick, near Montmelian, and was repulsed after a bloody conflict. During the rest of the campaign, the superior talents of Berwick prevailed. He baffled all the projects of Amadeus, who, with a superior army, could do nothing more than recover the insignificant castle of Miolons, garrisoned only by fifty men. As to the transactions in Spain, they were equally unimportant. Vendosme's army was in a wretched condition, notwithstanding the astonishing rapidity of his successes the preceding campaign. At length, however, he ventured to attack general Staremborg, who had advanced to the pass of Prato de Rey. This post was disputed with obstinacy, but at last relinquished by the enemy. He afterwards, by a strong detachment from the main army, invested the castle of Ardena, which was vigorously defended, and at last relieved by the imperial general; who, after a bloody engagement, defeated the besiegers, with the loss of 2000 men, all their baggage, ammunition, and cannon.

WITH respect to naval affairs, the French king was more fortunate, though his marine was in a ruinous condition. The Sieur Saus, with a squadron of three men of war and three privateers, set sail from Calais in the month of January, and in the channel fell in with a fleet of English merchantmen homeward bound from Virginia, under convoy of two men of war. Saus gave chase to the men of war, ran two of the merchantmen aground, and brought fourteen rich prizes into Dunkirk. The attempt on the English convoy at Vado was not less glorious, though not equally successful. M. L'Aigle, with four frigates, fell upon three English men of war sent to protect a fleet of transports destined for Barcelona. The engagement was warm, and so obstinate, that the English were ready to strike, when six more sail appeared, and obliged the French commodore to relinquish his prize and victory. One of M. L'Aigle's ships, commanded by M. Marquisan, was pursued by an English man of war of 60 guns as far as the gulph of La Specie, where an obstinate fight ensued, that so disabled both sides as to make them draw off by mutual consent. On the coast of Corfica, two of the king's frigates took a Dutch man of war of 36 guns <sup>b</sup>.

* Auct. sup. citat.

Expedition to Rio de Janeiro.

THE affairs in South and North America bore in general a favourable aspect; the English squadron under admiral Walker, being disappointed in the attempt on Quebec, and the Sieur du Guay-Trouin more fortunate than could be expected in the expedition to Rio de Janeiro in the Brazils. Trouin commanded a squadron, consisting of seven ships of the line, six frigates of 40 and 30 guns, and a bomb-ketch, with near 3000 land forces on board. He arrived in the bay of Rio de Janeiro on the 12th of September, and made the proper dispositions for a descent. The town, built along the bay, surrounded by three high mountains, was well fortified, and supplied with cannon and the necessary outworks. Every part of the road, accessible to boats, was defended by intrenchments and batteries, erected by the Portuguese governor, who was some time before apprized of the destination of the French admiral. The French writers allege, that he had assembled an army of 13000 regular troops, a number that would seem to be greatly exaggerated, and that he had taken every precaution for his defence. Amidst the continual fire from forts and batteries, the French squadron passed the straits; the Magnanime, conducted by the chevalier Courserac, led the van; the entrance of the harbour was forced, though it was surrounded with batteries, and defended by three ships of the line under da Costa, general of the Portuguese fleet. The Portuguese ships were run aground and lost, and the enemy driven from the isle of Chevres by the sieur Guyen, with a detachment of 500 men. Next day the troops were debarked, and a camp formed on the eminences before the town. While batteries were erecting, frequent skirmishes passed, in which the Portuguese were generally worsted. As soon as the works were finished, the batteries began to play so furiously, that about midnight the enemy deserted the town, and retired to the mountains with their most valuable effects. Trouin sent notice to the Portuguese general, that unless he immediately ransomed the place, he would lay it in ashes, as it was not the intention of the king his master to maintain the colony. Six hundred and ten thousand crusadoes were offered, accepted, and paid, in fifteen days: upon which the French troops embarked. Upon the whole, this expedition did not bring much treasure into France; but it cost the Portuguese above fifteen millions of livres <sup>c</sup>.

Death of the
dauphin.

BUT no military advantage could repair the loss which France this year sustained by the death of the dauphin, the only son of Lewis, who was swept off by the small-pox, in the 50th year of his age, and lamented by the people, as the best son, the best father, and the most amiable and promising prince of his country. By his death the title of dauphin descended to the duke of Burgundy, who died soon after, greatly regretted. Next the title came to the duke of Britany, who dying when but five years old, his brother the duke of Anjou, an infant, became dauphin of France, and presumptive heir to Lewis's crown and dominions. To these afflictions was superadded the loss of marshal Boufflers, one of the most experienced officers in France, who expired at Fontainebleau, after having faithfully served his king and country for forty years. His son, the young duke of Boufflers, was continued in the government of Flanders and Hainault by signing the treaty of Utrecht. <sup>d</sup> resumed.

Negotiations

DURING the operations in the field, the preliminaries to a negotiation were adjusting between the courts of Versailles and London, by means of Gaultier, who was now returned to France, accompanied by Mr. Prior, who had formerly been secretary to the earls of Portland and Jersey, ambassadors at the court of Lewis. Prior had distinguished himself by his poetical talents: his wit, address, insinuating manner, and ardent desire to promote peace, rendered him exceedingly acceptable to the French ministry; but his instructions were extremely limited, and his inclination and abilities thereby rendered fruitless. He was only empowered to communicate the preliminary demands of the English nation, to receive the French king's answer, and to know whether king Philip had delegated a power of acting to his grandfather. Prior arriving incognito at Fontainebleau, punctually executed his commission, communicated the pretensions of England, and demanded a clear and determinate answer, previous to his entering upon any negotiation. The queen's memorial required a barrier for the Dutch in the Netherlands, and another for the empire on the Rhine; restitution for the duke of Savoy, and cession to that prince of such places as had been stipulated in his treaties with the allies; an acknowledgement of the succession of the crown of England, as established in the protestant line; the demolition of the fortifications and filling up the harbour of Dunkirk; cession of Gibraltar, Minorca, of the negro trade, and certain cautionary towns in America to the crown of England; security for the English subjects trading in Spain; restitution or cession of Newfoundland and Hudson's bay; security that the French and Spanish monarchies should never be united in the same person; and, lastly, full and ample security for the commerce of the United Provinces. The death of the emperor made an intire change in the politics of England; and the expulsion of king Philip was no longer desired, notwithstanding that measure had cost rivers of blood. <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup>

<sup>b</sup> HAINAULT, t. ii. sub ann.

<sup>c</sup> Ibid. DANIEL, ANAR, t. ii. p. 294.

a These demands were to be kept secret, and revealed only by the mutual consent of the contracting parties. They were such, however, as it was impossible for the king to grant, without promoting the commerce of England at the expence of France, and indeed of all Europe; yet absolutely to reject them, would be at once to break off the negotiation. In these circumstances the French monarch was forced to temporize; and indeed he had lately been well accustomed to that practice from the necessity of his affairs<sup>k</sup>.

SENSIBLE that a negotiation, where the parties are desirous of coming to an agreement, dispels a cloud of difficulties, and that the powers granted were too limited for this purpose, Lewis resolved to remove the seat of negotiation to London. He chose for this important business Menager, deputy from the city of Rouen to the board of trade, a person of equal b knowlege, ability, and prudence. Menager was accordingly dispatched to England, with full power to adjust the preliminaries of the treaty, and he was attended thither by the English envoy. As the cession of Newfoundland and Hudson's-bay was an article of the utmost consequence to the marine and commerce of France, Menager had particular directions to use the king's power with discretion, and to give up Placentia and Newfoundland upon certain conditions, when he found it absolutely necessary to the great design of restoring the public tranquillity. As soon as the French minister set foot in London, he began his conferences with the duke of Sbrowsbury, the earls of Jersey, Dartmouth, Oxford, and Mr. St. John. After long disputes and various altercations, in which Menager acquitted himself with great address, certain preliminary articles were signed; upon which the French minister was privately introduced to c the queen at Windsor. This was done in consequence of an order he received, in case decency should require that he paid his respects before he quitted England. The only difficulty was, that Lewis had not yet acknowledged that princess as queen of Great Britain; but such punctilios were not at this time to stand in the way of a treaty so essential to France. He was received graciously, charged with the queen's compliments to the king, and an assurance that she would neglect nothing in her power to accelerate the negotiations. Her majesty concluded with saying, "I do not like war; I shall do all I can to conclude a peace with all possible expedition. I should be glad to live upon good terms with the king, to whom I am so nearly " allied in blood; and I hope there will be a closer union after the peace between us and our " subjects, by means of a perfect correspondence and friendship." It was about this time d that marshal Tallard was released from his confinement, and permitted to return to France on his parole: a circumstance which has made some writers imagine, that the marshal made the first overtures of peace. However probable this suggestion may appear, it is false, and positively contradicted by Torcy, the most intelligent writer upon the subject<sup>l</sup>.

THE earl of Strafford, lately recalled from Holland, where he resided in quality of ambassador, was, on the departure of Menager, sent back to the Hague, to communicate to the pensionary the preliminaries signed by France and England, to signify the queen's approbation of them, and determine a place where the plenipotentiaries of the several powers should assemble. He was instructed to assure the pensionary, that the queen had granted nothing prejudicial to e Holland, and that she was determined to conclude peace in conjunction with her allies. The same was done to count Gallas, the imperial minister in London, who resented the preliminaries with such indecent warmth, that, to inflame the minds of the people, he had them translated into English, and inserted in the public papers; upon which he was forbid appearing at court. Nor was Holland less alarmed at a transaction carried on with so much privacy. Buys was immediately sent to London, in quality of envoy extraordinary, to intercede with the queen to alter her resolutions. He set out on his embassy with the most sanguine hopes of success, flattering himself that he should either break off the negotiation, or at least employ such artifices as might prolong the war by ruining the new ministry. The States could not think with temper of the preliminaries being settled by England; and Buys was fixed upon as the best qualified person to bring the negotiations back to Holland. No decency was observed in the declamations poured f forth by Dutchmen against the English ministers, who were represented as traitors to their country and to their allies. Upon the queen's declaration that she would regard any delay on the part of the States as a refusal to comply with her propositions, Buys entered into the sentiments of his country, and spoke with vehemency and indiscretion against the English administration. He entered into all the factions of the Whigs, to retard the treaty and ruin the ministry; connected himself intimately with Bothmar, the Hanoverian ambassador, and engaged in all the intrigues said to have been set on foot for immediately calling over the duke of H-r, and inviting prince Eugene into England. The queen's firmness, and the miscarriage of all the projects set on foot, intimidated the Dutch, and obliged them to consent that the general conferences should be opened at Utrecht on the first day of January<sup>m</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> TORCY Negot. t. ii.<sup>l</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>m</sup> HAINAULT sub an. TORCY, ibid.

S E C T. XVIII.

Containing the negotiations at Utrecht; the conclusion of the peace; the operations of war against the emperor, until he acceded to the conditions accepted by the other allies, and gave peace to Europe by signing the treaty of Rastadt.

Conferences at Utrecht.

AT the time when the conferences for a general peace were opened at Utrecht, Lewis had a no reason to be uneasy about the chimerical pretensions of the Hollanders, or the extravagant demands of the emperor. A free intercourse was carried on with Great Britain; he was upon good terms with the queen, and was assured that the allies must in time necessarily acquiesce with the conditions which the British ministry would judge equitable. Britain had supported the chief burden of the war: neither Holland, Portugal, the princes of the empire, or the emperor, had paid their contingencies; all were in arrears: it would therefore be impossible for them long to continue the war without the queen's money, troops, and general. Matters, however, went on slowly; and it was not before 29th that the conferences were opened at Utrecht, though the 1st day of the month was the time appointed. The marshal de Uxelles, the abbot Polignac, and M. Menager, appeared in quality of plenipotentiaries from the king; the queen of England granted the same powers to the bishop of Bristol and the earl of Strafford; and the Dutch deputies named for the congress were Buys and Vanderdussen; ministers from the emperor, the duke of Savoy, and the other allies, appeared reluctantly at the congress, and all seemed to be actuated with sentiments very opposite to those of the French monarch and her Britannic majesty. The Dutch behaved as a people forced to consent to a conference for which they had no inclination. A spirit of war seemed to prevail in the United Provinces; nor was there any hopes that the deputies would alter their behaviour, until Britain spoke with more resolution, and her plenipotentiaries expressed themselves in a language more nervous and peremptory. Prior was impatiently expected by the French ministers, as the angel of peace, intrusted with the queen of England's secret sentiments, which she had not communicated to her plenipotentiaries. But in his room came Mr. Harley, cousin to the lord treasurer, with such instructions as obliged the plenipotentiaries to the queen to declare, that Mr. Harley had demands so important to all the powers in Europe, that unless they were granted the negotiation must necessarily be at an end. It was signified that this demand was already couched in a memorial presented by the abbe Gaultier. It respected the security which the courts of France and Spain should give, that the crowns of the two kingdoms should never be united in the same person. But of this the king's plenipotentiaries had no power to treat; a circumstance that greatly astonished the English plenipotentiaries. Lewis indeed had wrote to Mr. secretary St. John, that the renunciation demanded was contrary to the fundamental laws of France; but that he had desired his grandson's sentiments upon this important difficulty. Gaultier therefore acquainted the congress with the occasion of the delay, Philip d having not yet returned his answer.

LEWIS, foreseeing the difficulties that arose from the death of the dauphin, and of so many princes of the blood, imparted his thoughts as early as the month of March to his catholic majesty, referring the election of prosecuting the war, or renouncing the crown of France, to his own breast. In this letter he advised him to consider the situation of affairs in France and Spain, their ability to continue the war, to consult his own inclinations, and then to take his resolution. In expectation of Philip's answer the negotiations were suspended, this being deemed a fundamental article, to prevent the exorbitant growth of the house of Bourbon. The king urged his grandson to hasten his determination; but, the plenipotentiaries growing impatient, he proposed, that the regulation of the Spanish succession, accepted and promulged at the assembly of the Cortes, or States of Castile and Arragon, should be received by the allies as sufficient security against the union of the two monarchies; but this proposal was refused, as an insufficient barrier against so great and imminent a danger. To prevent the congress from breaking up, his majesty proposed, by a letter to the English ministry, another alternative; it was, that in case of Philip's refusal to renounce his birthright and pretensions to the crown of France, the most christian king would, in conjunction with the queen of England, enter into such measures, as should be necessary to determine him, and to secure the conclusion of a peace, in which they had already made so considerable progress. We may judge of the difficulties to which Lewis found himself reduced, before he could be brought to this alternative. The answer was penned by Mr. St. John. It contained assurances, that her majesty would be glad of such a peace as the king ought to think reasonable. It was with a view of rendering every thing more agreeable to the king of Spain, that she now left it to that prince's choice, either to renounce his birthright, and preserve the Spanish monarchy with the Indies, or to renounce a renounce these, in order to secure his succession to the crown of France, and to receive, in exchange for Spain and the Indies, the kingdom of Sicily, of which he was now in possession, the kingdom of Naples, the dukedoms of Savoy, Montferrat, and Mantua; on condition that when he, or any of his descendants, should succeed to the crown of France, all those dominions should be united to the same crown, except Sicily only, which should be ceded to the house of Austria. By this project the duke of Savoy was to make the advantageous exchange of his dominions for Spain and the Indies. But the whole evaporated by the determination of king Philip, which was to renounce all pretensions to the crown of France, rather than quit those of Spain, in which it had pleased God to place him, after struggling with innumerable difficulties.

b THE most christian king, from the established harmony between him and the queen of England, was now in a condition to talk to the Dutch in a different stile than he had done at Gertrudenberg. Finding the States still obstinately attached to their first chimerical preliminaries, he wrote to the plenipotentiaries, acquainting them with the king of Spain's answer, and that the English would now be no longer puzzled to propose a cessation of arms; adding, that it would be needless to look for expedients which might prove pleasing to the other allies. "It would be a very bad one (said he) to offer any cautionary towns to the Dutch; the time for flattering their pride is past; and henceforward, while I treat with them bona fide, I must do it with the dignity that becomes me." A stile very different from that of the conferences at the Hague and Gertrudenberg.

c BEFORE the conferences made any further progress, the season came on for taking the field. Villars still commanded in Flanders, and the king had put his army in the best posture which the circumstances of his kingdom would permit; but the chief reliance was upon the change of measures and a general in England. Marlborough was superseded by the duke of Ormond, who was sent over with instructions which must have proved extremely disagreeable to a nobleman of spirit. Previous, however, to his taking the command, the earl of Albermarle, general of the Dutch forces, bombarded Arras, laid the suburbs in ashes, set fire to some houses in the city, and then retired. Ormond joined prince Eugene at Tournay, but with express orders not to hazard a battle, or engage considerably in any offensive measures; a circumstance well known to Villars, who therefore abated of his usual vigilance, and permitted prince d Eugene to invest Quesnoi. The trenches were opened, under cover of the army commanded by the duke of Ormond; but an amnesty being now signed between the king and the queen of England, the duke was preparing to withdraw the English forces, and the foreigners in the pay of Great Britain. Prince Eugene, however, prosecuted the siege with such vigour and ability, that the garrison surrendered on the 4th of July, after sustaining a siege of three weeks. Soon after this, to dazzle the confederates with some bold enterprize, prince Eugene detached general Grovesstein, with 1500 horse, to penetrate into the very bowels of France. Grovesstein advanced into Champagne, passed the Noire, the Maese, the Moselle, the Saar, and retired to Traerbach with a rich booty, and a great number of hostages, after having levied contributions to the gates of Metz, and spread terror and consternation to Paris and Versailles. Marshal Villars was no sooner acquainted with the march of this partisan, than he retaliated, sending Pasteur with a detachment, who penetrating beyond Bergenopzoom, ravaged the island of Tertola belonging to Zealand, and overwhelmed the seven provinces with dismay.

Operations of the campaign in Flanders:

The cessation of arms between France and England having been proclaimed, the fortifications of the town, the citadel, and the forts of Dunkirk, were consigned to the English troops, who landed there, under the conduct of general Hill. The king's fleet, vessels, and galleys remained in the port; the intendant and the magistrates continued to exercise their several offices in the town, but the garrison retired to Winexberg.

In the mean time prince Eugene laid siege to Landrecy, and had prevailed on the foreign troops in the British pay not to obey the orders of the duke of Ormond; but his inferiority in point of strength, and the activity of Villars, obliged him to relinquish the enterprize. The earl of Albermarle was incamped with seventeen battalions and fourteen squadrons at Denain, to cover the lines. He was separated by the Scheld from prince Eugene's right wing. Eugene had drawn these lines from the Scheld to the Scarpe, to cover his convoys against the garrisons of Cambray and Valenciennes, and his grand magazines near Marchiennes. Villars, having formed the design of seizing upon these magazines, and forcing the camp at Denain, advanced to Chastillon, as if he intended to attack the confederates before Landrecy. To confirm the enemy in this opinion, he had thrown bridges over the river; and prince Eugene, no longer doubting that an attack was meditated, raised an intrenchment before his left wing, posted general Fagel behind with forty battalions, and advanced his right towards Landrecy, by which means he was three leagues distant from Denain. Villars, having thus attained his aim, lost no time in the further execution of his project. He ordered the count de Broglie in the evening to advance with forty squadrons along the Selle, and guard all the posts of this small river so carefully, that the enemies out-parties should not be able to discover the march of the main army. He threw a bridge over the Schelde at Neuville, and was ready the next morning to march his army over, before prince Eugene was apprized of his motions. A measure so prudently concerted, could not fail of success in the hands of the spirited and active Villars. Before the imperial general could bring up any part of his army, the marshal had stormed and forced the lines between Neuville and Denain. After seizing a convoy of 500 bread waggons that lay behind the lines, and taken prisoners the guard, composed of 500 horse and an equal number of foot, he led his infantry against the intrenchment at Denain, lined by seventeen battalions. The resistance of the enemy was great; but the marshal attacked them so impetuously, that, after a bloody conflict, the French entered the camp, put all to the sword, and made a terrible slaughter. Part of the enemy had retired to the village and abbey, they were again assaulted, and pressed so vigorously, that several battalions, endeavouring to save themselves by flight, were drowned in the Scheld. In a word, of seventeen battalions only 400 men escaped, all the rest having been killed, taken, or swallowed up by the waters. At the close of the battle prince Eugene arrived with fresh troops, and presenting himself before the bridge of Prouvi, defended by Albergotti, attacked it with great impetuosity, and was so warmly received, that he dropt the attempt, after losing four battalions. French writers allege, that if he had persisted longer in the attack it would have cost him his whole army: Germans, on the other hand, are positive he would have carried it; but both agree that the remonstrances of the Dutch deputies prevented the prince from making further efforts. In number the loss of the French was inconsiderable; but the marquis de Tourville was slain, and several officers of distinction dangerously wounded. By this action the spirits of the French nation were elated; they had not been accustomed to victory in the Netherlands, and every advantage gained over so renowned a general as prince Eugene, was an uncontested addition to the lustre of Villars's character, at the same time that it shewed the confederates how inadequate was their strength, now they were deprived of the assistance of England.

<sup>a</sup> TORCY. HAINAULT, et Script. super citat. ibid.

<sup>c</sup> HAINAULT, sub. an. DANIEL, sub. an.

Villars obtains a victory at Denain.

Doway and Bouchain taken.

IN consequence of the victory of Denain, the strong post at Marchiennes was forced, after an obstinate resistance, by which Villars gained possession of 100 pieces of cannon, 300 waggons, and an immense magazine of stores and provisions. The projects of the allies were now wholly disconcerted, and the Dutch began to think more seriously of peace. To accelerate their resolutions, marshal Villars encompassed Doway and the fort of Scarpe. After twelve days open trenches the fort was taken, and the garrison made prisoners of war. The sluices were then opened, the waters drawn off, and the approaches to the town pushed with vigour. Though the garrison consisted of 3000 men, the besieged surrendered in thirteen days prisoners of war, and just upon the same conditions granted to the French at Quesnoy. At this siege the duke de Bourbon was present; his liberality, magnificence, and courage, contributing greatly to animate the soldiers.

Sept. 8th.

ON the very day that Doway surrendered, Quesnoy was invested by a large detachment, commanded by the marquis St. Fremont. Villars arrived next day, and covered the siege with his army, which he posted so advantageously, as to frustrate all prince Eugene's attempts to succour the besieged. The defence was obstinate, but fruitless. On the 4th of October the garrison, consisting of 2000 men, surrendered prisoners of war, and Villars completed one of the most important, if not the most brilliant, conquests of the war. Prince Eugene had here laid up his artillery, after raising the siege of Landrecy; it fell into the hands of marshal Villars, and amounted to 116 pieces of heavy cannon, an infinity of a smaller calibre, 40 mortars, 400,000 weight of powder, and a prodigious quantity of balls, bombs, grenades, and other military stores. Though the season was now rigorous, Villars thought the reduction of Bouchain necessary, to fill the measure of glory acquired in this successful campaign. The garrison consisted of four battalions, and the fortifications had been considerably enlarged and improved by the confederates; but nothing could withstand the activity of Villars, and the impetuosity of a French army flushed with success. All the retribution made by the enemy, consisted in the reduction of Fort Knocque, garrisoned with 150 French soldiers, and surprized by a German partizan.

Affairs in Germany, Spain and Italy.

IN Germany nothing occurred besides an attack made by the duke of Wirtemberg on the French lines at Weissenburg, in which he was repulsed. In Italy the Germans were more successful; they reduced the garrison of Fort Philippe to the necessity of surrendering at discretion. Porto Ercole met with the same fate, after withstanding for two months the utmost efforts of the enemy. Nor did the campaign in Spain furnish any very material transactions. The archduke's party now acted intirely on the defensive; yet did Philip neglect pushing the advantages in his power from his superiority. Several sieges were formed, but relinquished; the most considerable was that of Campo Major in Portugal, invested on the 27th of October by the marquis de Bay. After the marquis had pressed the garrison vigorously for three weeks a weeks open trenches, he effected a breach, but was prevented by deluges of rain from rendering it practicable and giving the assault. An attempt, however, was made to storm the breach; but the valour of the besieged rendered it fruitless, and obliged the marquis to raise the siege with precipitation. Soon after a suspension of arms between Spain and Portugal was proclaimed at Madrid and Lisbon, by which an intire stop was put to the progress of the campaign.

LEWIS'S chief attention was employed in removing every obstruction to the treaty with England, and, by vigorous efforts in the Netherlands, to reduce the emperor and States of Holland to accede to the propositions for re-establishing the tranquility of Europe: but he did not neglect his marine, now more capable of acting with vigour, since the armistice with England. An expedition was projected against the island of St. Jago, one of the principal of the Cape de Verdes, and a squadron for this purpose was equipped at Toulon, under the conduct of sieur Cassart. Cassart anchoring at the Fort de la Braye, debarked 1000 men, summoned the garrison, and received their submission without exchanging a shot. Next day he came before the town of St. Jago, landed his men, and assumed so determined a countenance, that the governor surrendered at discretion, though the place was difficult of access, and the island in a condition to raise 10,000 men. The governor agreed to surrender the town and fort at 60,000 piasters; but, without regarding the capitulation, he escaped with the chief inhabitants into the mountains. Cassart gave six days for recollection; but receiving no answer, he blew up the forts, burst 40 pieces of iron cannon, carried off 17 brass ones, with 200 barrels of powder, a great quantity of merchandize, and 400 negroes, giving the town to be pillaged by the soldiers, after which he laid it in ashes. Afterwards Cassart set sail for Surinam, a Dutch colony in South America, laid siege to the place, and obliged the governor to purchase his security at the price of 900,000 florins. The Medusa frigate, detached from his squadron, levied a contribution of 315,000 florins on Brabin, another Dutch colony <sup>p</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING these trivial successes, it was high time for Lewis to put an end to a war which had ruined his people, impaired his own health, sacrificed his felicity, and worn out the lives of his best officers, grown old in prosecuting his ambitious projects. This year the active and experienced marshal Catinat, whose name will ever be memorable in Italy, yielded up his last breath at his castle of St. Gratian. He was soon followed to the grave by the renowned, the amiable, and the philosophical hero, Lewis Joseph duke of Vendosme, after he had, by his glorious victories, firmly established king Philip in possession of the Spanish monarchy, and, in the course of one campaign, raised him from a fugitive to the throne of a powerful kingdom. The king's main object was to terminate all differences with Great Britain; this, however, was retarded by some unforeseen difficulties that arose in adjusting the commerce, and the limits of the countries possessed by both nations in America. A long dispute ensued, and the French plenipotentiaries held frequent conferences with the duke of Shrewsbury and Mr. Prior. At length matters were compromised greatly to the advantage of France, and satisfaction of the king and people. Both sides were ready to sign their respective treaties on the 11th day of April. Notice was given by the English to the other plenipotentiaries of the allies; but count Zinzendorf now exerted himself to raise fresh obstructions. Lewis granted to the intercession of the British ministers, that his imperial majesty should have time to consider whether he would accept the proposals made by France; but this was extended no further than the 1st day of June; nor could Lewis in the mean time check the ardour of his troops by consenting to an armistice.

WITH respect to Holland, the States were highly incensed at the conduct of the queen of England. As soon as the duke of Ormond had withdrawn his army from Quesnoy, they concluded, that all the troops in the British pay would be lost to the confederates, and whatever the prince's success might prove, the United Provinces would be exposed to danger. In this critical juncture they reproached the English plenipotentiaries with the treacherous conduct of the ministry. They already imagined themselves exposed to all the ravages of a justly incensed enemy, and reflected with horror on the disrespectful behaviour shewn at the conferences of Gertrudenberg to the most christian king. They took heart, however, on advice that the foreign auxiliaries had refused to obey the duke of Ormond: but this glimmering of hope was soon extinguished. The miscarriage before Landrecy, the defeat at Denain, and the reduction of Doway and Bouchain, evinced the king's superiority, and the inability of the allies to continue the war without Great Britain. All these expectations, with which prince Eugene had fed their obstinate aversion to peace, were now blasted, their eyes opened, and their ministers bent to measures, very different from that insolence and pride with which their success had formerly inspired the republic. Holland was now forced to have recourse to the British plenipotentiaries to intercede with France, that the long interrupted conferences might be renewed. a

<sup>p</sup> HAINAULT, sub. ann. DANIEL, t. v. sub. ann. VOLT. t. i. c. xxii. p. 340.

 This interruption was occasioned by the obstinacy of the Dutch deputies, who refused admitting any answers from the king's plenipotentiaries that were not put in writing. They now dropt this pretension, and Lewis, at the request of the British ministers, consented to resume the conferences. Zinzendorf, at that time at the Hague, posted away to Utrecht, upon hearing that the deputies had recourse to the mediation of the English for renewing the conferences. He repeated his exhortations and promises, to raise the drooping spirits of the republicans. He endeavoured to demonstrate, that it was the interest of Holland to temporize, and assured them, that prince Eugene was in full march to give battle to Villars. His remonstrances had some weight with the deputies; but what chiefly contributed to prolong the delay in the renewal of the conferences, was the following incident, in itself immaterial, but important, as it b retarded the negotiations for giving peace to Europe. Richteren, deputy of the province of Overyffel, alleged, that in passing M. Menager's house, his servants were insulted by the footmen of that minister, by ridiculous grimaces, and indecent gestures. He complained to M. Menager, and demanded satisfaction. Menager answered in writing, that he should be far from permitting his domestics to insult the servants of the count de Richteren; that he was ready to give up any of them that were seen committing these indecencies, or his people could prove guilty. Before this answer was brought back, Richteren was gone to the Hague; it was therefore left with one of his colleagues. On the count's return, he sent his secretary to demand satisfaction of Menager, and received the same answer as before. He now acknowledged that he was not an eye witness of the offence, but insisted for the liberty of sending to the c French minister's house, in order to fix upon the offenders. Before any thing further happened, Menager, taking a walk with the other plenipotentiaries, met Richteren, who, after mutual compliments, said he still demanded satisfaction, and insisted upon searching the French minister's house. This was refused; upon which Richteren with vehemence exclaimed, that the master and the servants would do themselves justice. "I represent (said he) a sovereign as well as you, and am not a man that will bear with such insults". After this he spoke something in Dutch to his servants behind, who immediately fell upon Menager's footmen, struck them on the face, and threatened to stab them with their long knives. Complaint was made to Richteren; and he immediately replied, "Every time they behave thus I will reward them, and if they had not done so, I should turn them away." His colleagues en- d deavoured to excuse this extravagant behaviour; but finding their apologies insufficient, they took the same method of denying that he had spoken words, which all of them had heard, and which they laboured to excuse. They intreated, that the whole should be looked upon as a quarrel among their menials, and begged of the French plenipotentiaries, that they would leave the affair to the arbitration of the English ambassadors, without either acquainting the king or the States General with the dispute. The mediation of the English was not refused; but Menager persisted in demanding satisfaction, and rejected the excuses made by the deputies. They pretended that Richteren was drunk when he expressed himself so unguardedly; but the French minister insisted he should now make reparation when he was sober. Difficulties multiplied, and Menager acquainted the king with the whole transaction. It must be e acknowledged, that this was an artful shift of both parties to procrastinate the conferences, to which Menager and Richteren were equally averse. The former knew his master's inclination to humble the Dutch, and the necessity of delaying the conferences with the deputies, until every thing was fully adjusted with the queen of Great Britain. Richteren, on the other hand, from motives of gratitude to the emperor, who had created him a count, and of interest, his brothers enjoying lucrative employments in the army, by no means desired peace. On the contrary, he was continually dissuading the province of Overyffel from consenting to any treaty, but in concert with the emperor. Of all this Menager took care to acquaint the king.

In consequence of the minister's representations, Lewis insisted that the States General should declare, whether Richteren had followed their orders in approving of the violent behaviour of his domestics, in expressing himself with such vehemence and indecency, or whether he had only been directed by his own passions, heated and inflamed by the ministers of the house of Austria. If he had acted in obedience to his instructions, it was obvious the French plenipotentiaries could remain no longer in safety at Utrecht. If he was actuated by passion and private interest, it was reasonable the States General should disavow the behaviour of a minister, who so grossly abused their confidence. In the end Lewis presented the terms, which consisted in recalling Richteren, and nominating another deputy. f

HOLLAND being now sufficiently mortified, the conferences were resumed. The king commanded the restitution of Lisse, as an equivalent for the demolition of Dunkirk. He excepted g
Tournay, Conde, and Maubage, out of the barrier demanded by the States. He demanded that all the fortresses taken since the year 1709 from the French should be restored. Nor did he forget the interests of his faithful ally the elector of Bavaria; they were implied

- a in those restrictions. Lisle accordingly was ceded by the deputies; but the restitution of Tournay created difficulties, as the English plenipotentiaries, as well as the Dutch, seemed to oppose this measure. At last, in compliance with the queen of England's remonstrances, the king yielded up his pretensions to that town, tho' he might have maintained them with some hopes of success. He was eager to secure peace, which the circumstances of his kingdom, his declining health, his old age, and the apprehensions of a minority, rendered every way necessary. Accordingly, on the 29th day of January, the plenipotentiaries proceeded to give the finishing stroke to the barrier treaty demanded by the Dutch, and settling the succession of the crown of Great Britain in the protestant line. Not long after, contracts for the neutrality of Italy, for the evacuation of Catalonia, and the islands of Majorca and Ivica, were signed. As the emperor and several princes of the empire still refused to accede to the scheme of peace proposed, and the treaties between Spain and the other powers required debate and deliberation, it was determined to conclude matters with Great Britain, Holland, Savoy, and the other allies<sup>a</sup>.

ON the 11th of April, the treaties with the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, Savoy, Portugal, and the States General, were signed. Two days before, the treaties of commerce between France and England had been ratified by the queen and parliament. In the treaty with the king of Portugal, it was agreed, that whatever places were taken, or forts built, in the colonies out of Europe, the places should be restored, and the forts demolished. The full property and sovereignty of the two banks, and the navigation of the river of the Amazons, was acknowledged to belong to his Portuguese majesty; and Lewis desisted from his pretensions to the lands of the Cape de Nord. To the king of Prussia cession was made of the town of Guelders, with part of the upper quarter of the Spanish Guelderland, the country of Kessel, and the balliage of Kreckenbeck. He was likewise acknowledged sovereign lord of the principality of Neufchatel and Vallengin, and the inhabitants were granted the same privileges in France as the other Swiss cantons. On the other hand, the king of Prussia renounced all pretensions to the principality of Orange, and the lordships of Chalons and Chastelbelin, undertaking to satisfy the late prince of Nassau Frise with an equivalent. By this article liberty remained to his Prussian majesty to call that part of Guelderland, ceded to him, by the name of the principality of Orange, and to retain the title and arms of the principality. Besides these, there were two other articles which merit observation. The one was, that Lewis and Philip consented to give his Prussian majesty the title of king, and to pay his ministers the honours due to the ministers of a crowned head. The other, that the king of Prussia should cede to the archbishop of Cologne the town of Rhineberg, as soon as peace between the empire and France should be concluded; but without prejudice to his claim on the archbishopric.

Conclusion of the conferences.

Treaties with Portugal and Prussia;

By the treaty with Savoy, the island of Sicily, with the title of king, were given to that prince. He was likewise secured in the succession of the Spanish monarchy and the Indies, for himself and his heirs male, in case of failure in the king of Spain and his posterity. The frontiers of France and Savoy were so regulated, that the summit of the Alps was to be the fixed boundary. Pursuant to this determination, Savoy yielded to the king the valley of Barcelonetta, with its dependencies; and the king restored to the duke the duchy of Savoy, the county of Nice, the valley of Ragelos, with the forts of Exilles and Fenestrelles; in a word, all the country along the Alps, towards Piedmont.

His catholic majesty's renunciation of the crown of France, and the solemn cession of all pretensions to the crown of Spain and the Indies, by the dukes of Berry and Orleans, formed the basis of the treaties with Great Britain and the States General. Each of these treaties had also their particular conditions. Those with Holland may be reduced to four heads. The first and second comprehend what the king promised to restore to the house of Austria in the Netherlands, and what the States General agreed to cede to Lewis. The third and fourth regard the elector of Cologne and the landgrave of Hesse Cassel. His majesty promised to sequester in the hands of the States General, for the house of Austria, all that France or her allies possessed in the Spanish Netherlands at the conclusion of the treaty of Ryswick. But it was stipulated, that Austria should not be put in possession before she had consented to the barrier received by the States; that his Prussian majesty should retain what was granted in the treaty with him; that a portion of land, to the yearly value of 30,000 crowns, should be reserved in the duchies of Luxemburgh and Limburgh, and erected into a principality for the princess de Ursino, that ambitious woman, who had more than once, with her airy projects, broke off the negotiations for the tranquillity of Europe; that the elector of Bavaria should be compensated for his great losses; that he should be restored to the rank of ninth elector, and to the estates he formerly possessed in the empire, except the Palatinate; that he should be put in possession of the island of Sardinia, with the title of king; and that in the mean time he should hold, as an equivalent, the sovereignty and revenues of the city and duchy of Luxembourg, the city and county of Namur, and Charleroy. Other cessions besides were deposited in the hands of the States, for the use of the house of Austria; but upon this express condition, that the Roman catholic religion should, in all these places, be preserved in the same condition as at the commencement of the war; that the magistrates should be catholics, the clergy religious, and that the knights of Malta should enjoy their revenues. The States General reciprocally consented to restore to the king the town and castellany of Lisle, Lalen, Lagorgue, Aire, Bethune, St. Venant, and Fort Francis. As to the elector of Cologne, the king promised he should demolish the fortifications of Bonne in three months after his establishment. It was further agreed, that the States General should maintain garrisons in Huy and the citadel of Liege at their own expence; that the town of St. Goar and the fortress of Rhinfeldtz should remain to the landgrave of Hesse Cassel, and his successors, provided they maintained the catholic religion. An equivalent was to be given to the prince of Hesse Rhinfeldtz.

<sup>a</sup> Torcy Neg. t. ii. DANIEL, t. v. HAINAULT. sub. ann.

with England.

WITH respect to Great Britain, the king consented to the succession of that crown in the protestant line of the house of Hanover; to the demolition of the fortifications and harbour of Dunkirk; to the cession of certain places in America, such as Newfoundland, Hudson's Bay, and Acadia. Gibraltar and Minorca was ceded to the crown of Great Britain by Spain, and certain privileges with respect to the American trade were granted by Philip to British subjects, which were denied to the French, who had placed him on his throne. We may reckon among the articles most glorious to the queen, that she obtained the liberty of such of the king's subjects as were imprisoned on account of conscience and religion. This indeed was turning victory to noble purposes; it was dictating to a great monarch how to govern his own subjects, and pursuing the feelings of humanity amidst the labyrinths of politics.

The emperor refuses the terms of accommodation.

PEACE was now happily restored to all Europe, except the empire and Spain, from whence the emperor refused to withdraw his forces, either from a confidence in the great abilities of prince Eugene, or the mistaken councils of his ministers. Charles VI. denied his consent to the treaty of Utrecht, hoping, notwithstanding the misfortunes of the preceding campaigns, to obtain better conditions. Had he acceded to the proposals then made, he would have avoided the mortification of experiencing how unequal the strength of the house of Austria is to that of France, when unassisted by Great Britain and Holland. He persisted in war, and he met with disappointments and disgraces. Villars, loaded with glory from his late victory over the most renowned general of the empire, took the field once more, to oppose the celebrated Eugene, and, by additional conquests, to restore the tarnished lustre of the French arms. The prince was encamped near Philipsburgh, beyond the Rhine; and Villars, by a long and secret march, posted himself on the opposite bank of the same river, extending his wings from the causeway of Philipsburgh to Spire, thus cutting off from Landau, upon which he formed a design, all possibility of succour.

Progress of the war.

ON the 12th of June the town was invested, and twelve days afterwards the trenches were opened, and the siege pushed with vigour, under the direction of marshal de Bezons. At the same time the town and castle of Keiserlautern were attacked and carried by detachments made from the main army; Mr. Dillon obliging the garrison, composed of 700 men, to surrender at discretion; and immediately afterwards he reduced the castle of Wolfstein. These excursions did not retard the siege of Landau; Bezons pressed the garrison so closely, erected his batteries so judiciously, and plied the enemy so warmly with his cannon, that by the 20th of August he was preparing to storm the breach; which obliged prince Alexander of Wirtemberg, with his garrison of 5500 men, to surrender prisoners of war. Every post was taken, and a lodgment made sword in hand; so that the French lost above 3000 men in this siege: but it augmented the reputation of Lewis's arms, and paved the way for a blow more decisive and fatal to the emperor.

Villars successful in Germany.

THE next object that attracted the notice of the victorious Villars, was the strong town of Friburg; but it was not possible to invest this place without forcing the enemy's lines, extending from Hornberg to the outworks of Friburg. General Vaubonne was intrenched at Roscof with seventeen battalions and a body of cavalry, in a situation almost inaccessible; but marshal Villars, determined to conquer all difficulties, after several feints, arrived on the 20th of September within sight of the lines, on the side of Friburg. Dispositions were immediately made for an attack. The left was conducted by the count d'Estrades and the duke de Mortemar; the chevalier d'Asfeldt and sieur de Guerchois commanded in the center; and the count de Bourg was on the right, while Villars took post where-ever glory was to be acquired, and his presence could be useful. The imperialists sustained three attacks with great firmness; but the fourth was pushed with such impetuosity, as baffled all resistance; the lines were forced, and the enemy driven back with prodigious slaughter. Still, however, a the greatest obstacle remained; the right line, supported by the intrenched camp, was untouched. A steep mountain must be climbed; and Villars, who had received a wound, could retard the French soldiers, eager to gain a complete victory, and whetted only by the success already obtained. Animated by the presence of the marshal, and the example of their officers, they proceeded with such resolution, as diffused a panic through the imperial army, made them desert their posts, and suffer the French to take possession of the camp, without making scarce any resistance. Thus were prince Eugene's lines forced, marshal Vaubonne's camp taken, and the way opened for the siege of Friburg, the capital of Anterior Austria.

* TORCY, ibid. VOLTAIRE, t. i. p. 342. SMOLLET, l. v. ii. c. ii.

b On the 1st day of October Friburg was invested. No city was ever attacked or defended with greater valour. The baron d'Arfeh commanded the garrison, and shewed, by his vigilance and courage, how deserving he was of being opposed to Villars. It was not before the last day of the month that the trenches were opened: then begun a furious discharge of artillery from the batteries, while the besieged made frequent and vigorous sallies. In one of these they were so successful as to recover a lodgment, and gain possession of the head of the trenches; but they could not maintain their ground; they were briskly charged and driven thence by the chevalier de Peseux. While the French grenadiers were marching out to attack a half-moon and the covered way, the besieged sallied out with great impetuosity, and produced a bloody conflict, in which, after great slaughter on both sides, they were defeated. The attack of the covered way was not disturbed by this accident; it was led on by the count de Bourg and Valori, engineer-general, who met with an obstinate resistance: at length, on the arrival of the marshal, it was stormed, and the enemy put to the sword. A lodgment at the same time was effected on the half moon, not without great effusion of blood; in both attacks above 2000 men perished, among whom were some general officers. The rest of the month was employed in drawing off the waters, filling up the ditch, making a breach, and building bridges for the assaults, during which time the besieged kept up a terrible fire. At length, on the 1st day of November, every thing being in readiness for a general assault, baron d'Arfeh retired to the citadel, sending notice to the marshal, that he left the town to his discretion, and 2000 sick and wounded he was forced to leave behind.

d Villars, having taken possession of the city, began his approaches against the citadel; and pushed them so vigorously, that the baron surrendered on the 26th by capitulation, after he had sent a courier to prince Eugene, and found he could expect no relief. By the reduction of Friburg, Villars had the honour of restoring the military reputation of France, of terminating the war, and of concluding peace with the emperor, by a treaty signed with prince Eugene at Rastadt. This was perhaps the first time that two opposite generals quitted the field, to negotiate in the names of their sovereigns. But, before we come to the particulars of their treaty, it will be necessary to relate the transactions in Catalonia, where the emperor still maintained an army.

e COUNT Staremburg had kept Gironne closely blocked up from the month of October, the preceding year. He was now forced to retire, on advice that marshal Berwick was in full march to give him battle. Philip's general had already passed the Ter, which obliged Staremburg to retreat with so much precipitation, that he left behind a part of his artillery, several loaded waggons, and great store of provision and ammunition. He had lost near 2000 men during the blockade; and the arms of the imperialists were not more fortunate in Spain than in Germany. Berwick's sudden approach made the enemy evacuate Cervera, and excited a commotion in Barcelona in favour of the catholic king. So violently were the people set against the house of Austria, that the empress, who still continued here, found it necessary to her security to introduce several more regiments into the city. Nor could this terrify the mutineers; cries were heard in the night, alarms given, Philip's standards erected, and pasquinades fixed on the palace; but the arrival of an English squadron quieted the people. The empress then declared to the magistrates, that the circumstances of affairs obliged his imperial majesty to renounce his pretensions to the Spanish monarchy. This declaration produced a tumult; the Catalonians, ever inconstant, suddenly dropped their resentment against the house of Austria, and were now as eager for the stay of the Germans as they were a little before for their departure; nor could the sedition be appeased but by menaces of introducing the French and Spanish troops*. But the reader must consult the preceding volume of our history for the transactions in Spain at this period.

f HAPPILY for Europe, and particularly for Germany, the war was now drawing to a conclusion. Charles VI. finding all his efforts against France baffled, was forced to accept of worse terms than had been offered at Utrecht. His towns had been reduced, his armies defeated in two successive campaigns, and his general, the first in reputation in Europe, had the mortification to see his laurels, collected with toil, blighted by the rancorous breath of a malice and envy. It was the jealousy of the imperial council, not the superiority of Villars's genius, that triumphed over Eugene. This gave Villars occasion to tell the prince, on their meeting at Rastadt, "Sir, we are not enemies; your enemies are at Vienna, mine at Versailles." Both indeed were persecuted by factions and cabals at their several courts. The very names of these ministers were sufficient testimonials of their characters. They had tried strength in the field, now they measured genius in the cabinet. No mention was made of the emperor's vain title to the Spanish monarchy; peace was too essential to the empire, to be deferred for parade: however, it must be observed, in honour of Lewis, that, at three several treaties, at the conclusion of as many general wars, he seemed the principal support of the Germanic liberties. At Munster, he procured an eighth electorate in favour of the house of Bavaria. The treaty of Nimeguen confirmed that of Westphalia. By the treaty of Ryswick, cardinal Furstemberg was restored to all his estates and titles; and, lastly, by the treaties of Utrecht and Rastadt two electors were established. In a word, Lewis gave law to the empire, and he had it prescribed to him by Great Britain. The particular conditions, signed by Eugene and Villars, were, that Lewis should yield to the emperor the fort of Kell; the city Friburg, with all its appendages; Old Brisac, with all its dependencies; but that fort Mortier, with some other places upon the Rhine, should belong to the Christian king: that the fortifications of Hunningen, Homberg, Selingen, and la Pile, should be demolished; but that fort Lewis should remain the property of France: that the king should execute the treaty of Ryswick, and restore his conquests in the empire, except the places stipulated: that Lewis should hold Landau, and its dependencies, as before the war, his imperial majesty taking upon himself to obtain the consent of the empire: that the king should acknowledge the electoral dignity in the house of Hanover: that the electors of Cologne and Bavaria should be restored by the emperor to their estates, dignities, rights, rank, and prerogatives, which they enjoyed before the war; by virtue of this article, the Palatinate, excepted in the treaty of Holland, was now given to the elector of Bavaria; but the following article stipulated, that Sardinia, designed for him, should remain to the emperor: that the king should leave the emperor in the quiet possession of the estates he actually enjoyed in Italy; but that the emperor should do speedy justice to the dukes of Guastalla and Mirandola, and the prince of Castiglioni: that conferences should be held in Switzerland, for regulating and reducing to form the treaty with the empire, when all the princes of the empire should give their consent to the present agreement. Afterwards the peace with the emperor was proclaimed at Paris, on the 19th day of April. Thus Lewis, by his constancy and perseverance, obtained conditions, after numberless defeats and misfortunes, more favourable than some years before he could procure, after a rapid course of the most brilliant victories recorded in history. It will appear, indeed, from comparing the treaties of Utrecht and Ryswick, that not a single acquisition was made by any of the parties, in consequence of a tedious war which had almost desolated Europe, and for a series of years subjected it to every kind of calamity. As we propose concluding the French history with the death of Lewis XIV. it may be agreeable to the reader that we take a concise survey of the civil policy of a reign, in which science and arts met with the utmost encouragement, and the human mind was cultivated to the highest degree of perfection.

* VOLT. t. i. c. 22. DANIEL, t. v. HAINAULT, t. ii. sub ann.

S E C T. XIX.

Containing a survey of the civil policy of France, the progress of arts and sciences, during the reign of Lewis XIV.

THE reign of Lewis the Great effected a total revolution in the arts, genius, manners, and civil policy, of the French nation. For nine centuries before this æra, France was sunk in barbarism, and rent with factions and civil wars; the laws, the language, and the manners, were ever fluctuating; the nobility were resigned to sloth, except when they were engaged in war against the sovereign; the clergy were immersed in ignorance and superstition; and the people, overwhelmed with wretchedness and poverty, were groaning under the weight of oppression. The politics of Richlieu and Mazarine broke the stubborn insolence of the nobility, and fixed their dependence on the crown: this was the first step towards the aggrandizement of France. The regal authority had been almost annihilated; each of the nobility assumed a sovereign authority, were tyrants within their jurisdictions, and paid only the mere tribute of homage to the sovereign: even this was frequently refused. France, as we have seen, was parcelled out into fiefs, the laws were feudal, and the whole kingdom governed governed rather as one immense fief, than as a monarchy. The sword alone was insufficient to work the necessary alteration; the manners, the habits, and the prejudices, of the people, must be changed. This was what Lewis XIV. and his able ministers boldly attempted, and happily accomplished. It was by enlightening the mind, introducing science, and removing that dark cloud of ignorance, in which the greater part of Europe was still enveloped, that these great purposes were effected. The experimental academy at Florence, founded by Leopold de Medicis, and the royal society in London, furnished the French king with the idea of a philosophical institution, which soon became an incorporated society of the utmost utility to knowledge. No pains, no expences, were spared, to engage persons eminent in science to honour the new academy with their presence; Cassini was brought from Italy, and Huygens from Holland, by the offer of large pensions and a fine philosophical retreat. Darkness was dispelled from the human mind, and jargon banished the schools; the philosophers stone was no longer the pursuit of naturalists; nor the prediction of future events the study of astronomers. Every part of knowledge was accurately examined, and those particularly which regarded the conveniency of mankind, the interests of society, and the promoting of commerce: the schools of civil law were again opened, and professors of French law established in all the universities of the kingdom. In a word, the spirit of good sense that now prevailed, destroyed insensibly those silly prejudices and superstitious notions which had so long enthralled reason, and fettered the mind in shackles, which could only be removed by the influence of science. To these first dawnings of good sense, Voltaire attributes that celebrated declaration of Lewis, prohibiting the tribunals of justice from receiving informations of witchcraft. In the reign of his predecessor, such an edict might have produced dangerous consequences; now it was considered as an instance of the monarch's good sense and humanity.

FRANCE, however, hardly kept pace with some other nations in philosophy; that the people made any progress, was owing to the king and Colbert, who never failed to drag merit out of obscurity, and modesty to the exertion of talent. England had considerably the start of the French in geometry, mechanics, natural philosophy, and astronomy; but in eloquence, in polite learning, and works of taste, the latter may be considered as the legislators of Europe. England, indeed, produced a Spenser, a Sidney, a Shakespeare, and a Milton; but taste was so far from becoming universal, that the merit of the lofty blind bard was neglected, until Mr. Addison's critique first discovered it to the public: still there are scholars in England, who pique themselves on asserting, that Milton is inflated, harsh, stiff, and unnatural. In France, poetry, oratory, and the eloquence of the bar, pulpit, and historian, were pushed to the summit of perfection under the auspices of Lewis. Corneille and Racine gave birth to fine poetry; Bourdaloue, Bossuet, Fenelon, and the abbe de St. Real, to eloquence and history. Moliere was the legislator of French politeness; the archness of his comic muse banished affectation, as far as it could be separated from a lively presuming people. As to music, painting, sculpture, and architecture, they were in the womb at the accession of Lewis XIV.; it was the obstetric hand of Colbert which brought them to light. The simplicity and exquisite taste of Sully then first charmed the ear; Colbert, the Mæcenas of all the arts, laid the foundations of an academy of painting, a school that has produced pieces not unworthy of a Raphael or a Titian. The same encouragement was given to the study of architecture, though with unequal success. As to sculpture, the equestrian statue of the present most Christian king at Bordeaux, the tomb of cardinal Richlieu in the chapel of the Sorbonne, and the baths of Apollo at Versailles, are proofs of the progress of the French nation in this elegant art.

BUT Colbert did not confine himself to the culture of the mind; to render a kingdom respectable, it was necessary to introduce riches, and, to perpetuate the felicity of the people, ease, conveniency, order, and industry, were indispensable. Colbert had regard to each; he began with relieving the subject from the burden of oppressive taxes, at the same time that he augmented the revenue by introducing regularity and œconomy. All the great roads were levelled and repaired, and the canal of Languedoc formed merely to assist industry. The year 1667 was at once the epoch of Lewis's first laws and first conquests; he alone possessed the happy art of making foreign victories and domestic policy go hand in hand. The civil ordinance appeared first; then the statutes of manufactures, the criminal edicts, the commercial and marine codes. His severity against duelling proved most beneficial to the nation, by giving a check to the remains of barbarism and ignorance, which allowed, that right, innocence, and opinion, should be adjudged by strength of arm.

IN a former volume of this work, the reader will find an explicit account of the rise and progress of the French East India company; about the same time a company was formed to traffick to the West Indies. The encouragement given to both was nearly equal; not so their success. Frequent bankruptcies, in despite of the assistance of the government, interrupted the progress of the former, while the latter flourished beyond the most sanguine expectation. The king furnished a tenth of the West India stock: he granted a bounty of thirty franks per ton upon upon exportation, four on importation, and five livres per ton on every vessel built in the ports of the kingdom. All this was owing to the public spirit of Colbert; yet did that great minister labour for the ungrateful. A clamour was raised against his administration: these new establishments were condemned, because they were not understood; they were termed ideal, because they exceeded the narrow comprehensions of shallow politicians. But the philosophical spirit excited by Colbert in France at length corrected the vulgar prejudices; the people were forced to acknowledge, that with all the œconomy, correctness, and regularity of Sully's judgment, he possessed the most extensive talents, a genius for improvements, projects, and the most useful establishments. This however, is an honour granted only to his memory; the body of that great minister, after his death, hardly escaped being torn in pieces by the mad multitude.

To encourage industry, and render the kingdom populous, Colbert persuaded the king to encourage marriages in the provinces, by exempting all those who should marry at a certain age from paying taxes for the space of five years. Even this most popular of all institutions had its opposers, because it proceeded from Colbert. It was likewise an excellent regulation of the same minister, that every father of a family of ten children should for life be exempted from taxes, because the labour of his family contributed more to the state than the taxes he would have paid. In short, every year of Colbert's administration was distinguished by some wholesome ordinance, some useful establishment and improvement. Silks were manufactured in different parts of the kingdom, and fine broad-cloths made at Abbeville, the king advancing 2000 livres, besides other gratifications, to the manufacturer for every loom he employed. The carpets of Turkey and Persia were rivalled in the Savonnerie, and the tapestries of Flanders were equalled at the Gobelins; in design and pattern they were superior. In a word, laces, stockings, fine glasses, earthen-wares, and all the variety of new manufactures, were diligently cultivated, and rapidly attained in perfection; and this ought to be stiled the age, not only of improvement, but of creation.

MILITARY improvements were not neglected; every day introduced some new manœuvre or weapon. Lewis first armed musquets with bayonets, and rendered infantry impenetrable. To this monarch posterity owes the proper use of artillery: he instituted academies for this purpose at Douay and Metz; and the regiment of artillery was at last, says Voltaire, filled with officers who were almost all capable of conducting a siege. He likewise formed a regiment of bombardiers, and another of hussars. Companies of cadets were maintained in most of the frontier towns, where they were taught geometry, drawing, and the military exercises. To encourage merit, the order of St. Lewis was established; and to shelter the infirm, wounded and decrepid veteran, the hospital for invalids was founded. To these regulations Lewis owed the strength, the union, and the spirit, of his forces. Officers and soldiers were actuated equally by motives of interest and glory to the discharge of their duty. Louvois was the spring of military changes; sometimes indeed he abused the power lodged in his hands, by preferring interest and consanguinity to merit; in general, the good of his country and the king's honour prevailed.

LEWIS was not more remiss in settling his marine on a respectable footing. The increase of commerce and navigation formed a seminary for sailors; and his fleets, in return, secured and promoted trade. The civil wars, and the policy of Mazarine, suffered the French navy to fall into decay. When Colbert came to the administration, all the ports in France afforded but a few crazy worm-eaten vessels. Even before the talents of this minister had been distinguished, the king himself perceived the necessity of a marine. On his accession he made some essays towards raising the maritime power of his kingdom; and, as early as the third year of his government, we read of a French squadron making conquests on the coast of Africa. In the year 1667 France had sixty ships of war in her harbours. These were glorious efforts, and such as enabled Lewis to dispute, with the masters of the ocean, that superiority they claimed. His admirals were ordered not to pay the usual homage of lowering the flag to the English. Charles II. and his council vainly insisted on this prerogative; their necessities were forced to yield to the firmness of the Christian king: a British monarch, more tenacious of his honour, would, however, have greatly embarrassed Lewis. In virtue of the solemn precedency granted a few years before, France maintained her naval superiority over Spain, while she insisted on equality with England. The Spaniards were forced to lower the flag to the king's ships; and the French refused to acknowledge that homage demanded by the English.

NOTHING could exceed the industry and spirit with which the French court pushed the marine. The sailors of the merchantmen and royal navy were registered, and found to exceed 60,000 men. Every year the number was increasing; and in the year 1681, France had a fleet of 200 sail of men of war, exclusive of smaller vessels, and 30 galleys in the port of Toulon, which might soon be equipped for action. In a word, 166,000 men were classed for the various services of the navy; 1000 young gentlemen of family performed duty on board, and were instructed in the art of navigation; they were in the marine, what the cadets were a were in the army; the port of Rockfort was formed, councils for building ships in the most advantageous manner were established in the several ports; and five marine arsenals were erected at Toulon, Dunkirk, Havre, Brest, and Rockfort (A). To give dignity to the navy, marshals of France were appointed to the sea service; and the favours of the monarch indiscriminately dispensed among the sea and land officers. Before the reign of Lewis XIV. military honour was confined to the land service; the nobility never thought of reaping laurels on the ocean. The fruits of this spirit of emulation were soon perceived. France, the most feeble maritime power in Europe, became formidable to England and Holland; her fleets often triumphed over the joint squadrons of the sovereigns of the sea; and her power might have been of longer duration, had not a mistaken order from court obliged the gallant b Tourville to hazard the fortune of France at La Hogue. Here a severe blow was sustained, to which all applications have proved inadequate. The marine lingered, and only faint gleams of its former vigour ever since appeared: they were extinguished almost as soon as visible. Now the disease seems to have touched the vital parts, and even the success of a Colbert's art would be very dubious.

WITH respect to a marine, we have seen France struggling with extreme difficulties when Colbert was called to the helm. Exhausted and oppressed with civil and foreign wars, the subject was squeezed; yet the revenues of the crown did not exceed 70 millions of livres, at 27 livres to the mark; at his death they rose to 117 millions, by which Lewis XIV. was richer than his great grandson with 200 millions, allowing for the difference of specie. Colbert c was the first minister who studied and understood the constitution of the finances; but the situation of affairs would not suffer him to practise all his knowledge. To answer the continual expences of wars, improvements, and the pleasures and luxuries of the court, he was forced to have recourse to expedients very opposite to his system. It was not possible to adhere to the measures his own judgment approved, while the monarch was ambitious, and the court luxurious, effeminate, dissolute, and necessitous. This obliged him to revive, what he had determined eternally to abolish, provisional imposts, annuities, and other pernicious temporary expedients. The demesnes of the crown were trifling, commerce almost forgot, industry extinguished, and no remedy left to augment the revenue, but by taxes easily collected and proportioned. The spirit of this minister's politics is obvious from d the pains he took to increase the number of the inhabitants, promote the culture of the lands and industry of the people; the edict for the establishment of the chamber of justice, and after the dissolution of the chamber, the arrest of council, declaring it capital for any one to advance money upon new taxes. While the revenues were farmed, he was sensible the people must be fleeced and oppressed; yet did the necessities of government overturn all the fine-concerted schemes of Colbert. After his death, the long war to maintain the duke of Anjou's right to the Spanish succession obliged the ministers, less faithful and able than Colbert, to use every expedient to remove the present necessity. Alterations were made in the value of coin; a mark of silver was rated at 40 imaginary livres; the king was eased for a time, that his necessities might return with redoubled pressure. Under Chamillard, e the king received little more than half a mark for a whole mark of silver; the debtor, who owed 27 marks in the beginning of his administration, paying to the crown a mark, and the debtor who owed 40 livres, paying no more than a mark at the death of that minister. His successor Moret, nephew to the illustrious Colbert, found it impossible to heal a disorder which circumstances concurred in rendering incurable. It was in vain to attempt renewing the scheme formed by Chamillard, of issuing payments in bank-bills; that was already condemned, and the bills discounted at 50 per cent. The disease now proceeded without endeavour to restrain its progress: and Lewis, notwithstanding he treated upon an equality with the confederates at Utrecht, and gave law to the emperor at Rastadt, left at his death a debt of two thousand six hundred millions of livres, at 28 livres to the mark.

f WE shall close this review of the celebrated reign of Lewis XIV. with a few remarks on the conduct he observed towards the clergy. In all the countries in Europe, where the catholic religion prevails, it has been found difficult to restrain the ambition of ecclesiastics, without lessening that reverence and respect, without which the sacred function would produce no effect on morals, and the church would prove a mere inanimated excrescency on the state.

(A) The intelligent M. Savary reckons the number of royal ships in France, in the year 1681, including frigates, fire-ships, bomb-ketches, and pinks, at 294 sail. The expence of supporting which amounted, in six months, to 7,272,081 livres, equivalent to 12,993,920 livres, at the present value of money. Yet it is apparent, that France might now maintain an equal fleet at the same expence it then cost, as the salaries of the sea-officers have not increased with the diminution of the value of specie. All the additional expence, if there be any, will only regard the equipment and construction of the fleets. However, if the difficulty of raising a marine, where it is the interest of more powerful maritime states to suppress it, the diminution of the French commerce, the loss of territories in North America, and the security of the cod fishery be considered, we may reasonably conclude, that the repeated efforts only of a series of years can again render France formidable on the ocean.

No prince knew better than Lewis how to subject the clergy to the civil power, without diminishing their dignity, and oblige them to contribute to the necessities of government, while he preserved their privileges inviolate. Stability, moderation, delicacy, and sovereign authority, were all necessary ; Lewis would assume these at pleasure. He always mentioned the right of appealing to the parliament, in which he attained an undisputed authority, from the decrees of ecclesiastical courts, whenever such decrees affected the royal prerogative. Thus he frequently supported the national privileges against the clerical ambition, and maintained the right of the Gallican church against the usurpation of the pontiffs. In this he was considered sometimes as the enemy, sometimes as the protector, of the church ; Lewis was indifferent by which name he passed, provided he was sure that his cause was popular. His right of enjoying the revenues of bishoprics, and disposing of the dependent benefices during the vacancy of the episcopal chair, was once disputed by the two most eminent and virtuous prelates in France. Lewis exerted his prerogative, and the prelates thundered out excommunications. They engaged the pope in their quarrel, and the king, disregarding both, seized their temporalities, and confirmed his authority. The conduct of Lewis towards the Hugonots is not to be defended ; policy and religion vigorously opposed so cruel a persecution. Colbert perceived and turned the stream of fanaticism in the Cevennes to the good of the public ; his successors, as well as those who preceded him in the administration, took a different course. France was depopulated, and England and Holland filled with ingenious artizans. The truth is, Lewis's disposition was soured with ecclesiastical disputes ; Calvinists, Jansenists, and Quietists, had in their turns disturbed the government ; he desired uniformity in religion, for the sake of peace ; but unhappily pursued measures productive only of eternal war and bloodshed.

FROM this general view it appears what changes were made during this reign in the kingdom. Lewis found France divided with factions, the laws neglected, industry extinguished, the finances disordered, commerce almost unknown, arts and sciences plunged in obscurity, and the whole nation a scene of confusion, intrigue, poverty, and oppression. He abolished that spirit of rebellion which had possessed the nation, rendering the state one regular and consistent body ; he reformed and improved the laws ; he introduced industry, promoted commerce, cherished and cultivated science ; he infused different morals, gave birth to politeness and taste, and was the founder of that elegance of sentiment, that splendor of luxury, and refinement of understanding, for which France has ever since been distinguished and imitated. In a word, with all the faults consequent on ambition, Lewis was the most magnificent, munificent, and splendid prince of his age and country.

C H A P. V.

The history of Italy.

- THE ambition and conquests of the Lombards, together with the negligence of the emperors of the East, having obliged the popes to have recourse to the kings of the Franks for protection, Charlemagne, after taking Desiderius their king prisoner, and reducing Pavia, their capital, caused himself to be crowned king of Italy, at Monza, by the archbishop of Milan; and having confirmed to the popes the dominions first granted to them by his father Pepin, he received the allegiance of the rest of Lombardy, which included not only Piedmont, the Milanese, the Mantuan, the territory of Genoa, Parma, Modena, Tuscany, and Bologna, but also the dukedoms of Friuli, Spoletto, and Benevento, which last comprehended the greatest part of the present kingdom of Naples, and, on account of its extent, was called Longobardia Minor. Italy subdued by the Franks, A. D. 774. Charlemagne crowned king of Italy.
- CHARLEMAGNE having thus conquered all Italy, excepting some of the southern provinces, which still continued under the dominion of the emperor at Constantinople, he returned to France, taking Desiderius with him a prisoner, who, according to Blondus<sup>a</sup>, was banished to Liege; but others say he was confined in the monastery of Corbie. Upon the departure of Charles, the dukes of Friuli, Spoletto, and Benevento, who had submitted to the Franks only because they were not able to resist them, revolted from their allegiance, and declared themselves sovereigns in their territories<sup>b</sup>; but Charlemagne, who was then engaged in a war with the Saxons, being informed of their rebellion by pope Adrian, marched, though in the middle of winter, with his army into Italy, and having defeated Rotgand, duke of Friuli, whom he afterwards beheaded, by this victory stopped the progress of the revolt, and forced the dukes of Spoletto and Benevento to a submission. As they had not openly appeared in arms, he continued them in their dukedoms, and contented himself with a renewal of their allegiance; but he added the cities of the dukedom of Friuli to his kingdom, and gave the command of them to Franks and Austrasians. The Lombards revolt, but are again reduced by Charlemagne. 776.
- CHARLES having thus settled the affairs of Italy, returned to France, and was engaged the three following years in reducing the Saxons, and opposing the Saracens in Spain; but hearing that the Lombards threatened to revolt in favour of Adalgise, the son of their former king Desiderius, whom they expected with a fleet and army from Constantinople, he resolved again to visit Italy; and taking his wife Hildegarde, and his two youngest sons along with him, he arrived at Pavia about Christmas<sup>c</sup>. Soon after he called an assembly of the states, both clergy and laity, and with their advice published a body of laws, which are still extant, for the punishment of murder, robbery, and perjury, and to regulate the superiority of lords over their vassals. After the publication of these laws, he dismissed the assembly, and continued his journey to Rome, being received with many honours by all the cities through which he passed. At Rome pope Adrian was no less solicitous to receive him in a royal manner: Charles desiring both his sons to be crowned, the eldest of them was baptized by the name of Pepin, and the day following, being Easter Sunday, they were both crowned by the pope, Pepin being declared king of Lombardy, and Lewis king of Aquitain<sup>d</sup>. This ceremony being over, Charles quitted Rome, and caused his son Pepin to be again crowned at Monza, with the iron crown, by the archbishop of Milan; and leaving him in Italy, with a governor, and the officers necessary for his household, he himself returned to Germany, to be present at the diet at Worms. A. D. 780. Charlemagne causes his second son Pepin to be crowned king of Lombardy. 781.
- THE first years of the reign of Pepin were remarkable for their tranquillity, and for the many salutary laws which were then published; but this calm was soon interrupted by the intrigues of the empress Irene; who being jealous of the growing power of Charlemagne, and displeased to see the Franks masters of Italy, resolved to give assistance to Adalgise, to enable him to recover his father's kingdom: for this purpose she concluded a secret treaty with Archis duke of Benevento, and Tassillon duke of Bavaria, both brothers-in-law to Adalgise, who promised to take arms in his favour, as soon as he appeared in Italy with an army of Greeks. Charlemagne being informed of this league by the pope, immediately marched with his army over the Alps, and arrived at Florence, where he celebrated his Christmas, and ordered the city, A league formed by Irene for the restoring of Adalgise; which is prevented by the arrival of Charlemagne in Italy.

<sup>a</sup> BLOND. D. ii. l. i.<sup>b</sup> Codex Car. c. 59.<sup>c</sup> SIGON. l. iv. p. 91.<sup>d</sup> BARON. ad an. 781.

which

which had been ruined by Totila, king of the Goths, to be rebuilt. From Florence he marched to Rome, and was there met by Romuald, the eldest son of Arechis, who was sent by his father to beg for a peace; but Charles, by the advice of the pope, refusing his request, detained Romuald, and marching with his army into Campania, took the city of Capua. Arechis being informed of the taking of Capua, quitted Benevento, and retired to Salerno, upon the sea coast, from whence he sent a second embassy to Charles, suing for peace, which was granted him, upon condition of paying a yearly tribute to Pepin, of delivering up his treasure, and of giving his second son Grimoald and his daughter Adeleisa, as hostages for his fidelity. Arechis did not long survive this peace, but died the August following, and his eldest son being likewise dead, Charlemagne sent Grimoald from France, who was received by the Beneventans with the utmost demonstrations of joy.

CHARLEMAGNE, upon his return to Germany, resolved to punish Tassillon, and ordered an army of Franks and Saxons to assemble at the Danube, while he himself with another body marched to the river Lech, and his son Pepin, with an Italian army, marched into the Trentine. Tassillon finding himself surrounded, came and submitted to Charles, who pardoned him upon his renewing his allegiance, and giving his son Theodon, and twelve other persons, as hostages: but the year following, being accused by the diet of having invited the Hunns to invade the Franks, in consequence of his league with Arechis and Irene, he was condemned to be shut up in a cloyster the rest of his life, with his son Theodon. The Hunns, who had been solicited by Tassillon, raised two armies, and this year, according to their promise, invaded Germany and Friuli; but were defeated in both countries, and obliged to return to Pannonia with great loss.

The Hunns invade Germany and Italy, but are defeated. A. D. 788.

Adalgise invades Italy with a Grecian army, but is defeated and put to death.

Grimoald revolts, but is reduced by Pepin and Lewis. A. D. 793.

WHILE Pepin was engaged in opposing the Hunns, he was informed by Grimoald, prince of Benevento, that the Greeks intended to invade Italy, in favour of Adalgise, because Charlemagne had refused to give his daughter to Constantine, though she had been betrothed to him several years before (A). In revenge for which affront, the emperor determined to expel the Franks from Italy; and hoping the Italians would take arms to support the son of their former king, he gave orders to Theodore the patrician, prefect of Sicily, to transport a strong army into Calabria, along with which went Adalgise. Soon after the landing of the Greeks, Grimoald, who had preferred his allegiance to Pepin to his affinity with Adalgise, being joined by Hildebrand duke of Spoletto, and Vinigise general of Pepin, with the forces under their command, he attacked the invaders in Calabria, where, after an obstinate dispute of several hours, he entirely routed them, and took all their baggage; and many prisoners, among whom was Adalgise, who was put to death by torments. Notwithstanding this great service of Grimoald, we find, that four years afterwards, by the persuasion of his mother, he renounced his allegiance to the Franks; which Charlemagne being informed of, he sent his son Lewis, king of Aquitain, against him, who passing the Alps by mount Cenis with his army, and joining his brother Pepin at Ravenna, they marched together into the country of Benevento, where they plundered and burnt every thing before them, and returned home with their army towards the end of winter.

Two years afterwards pope Adrian dying, Leo was chosen in his stead, who, the day after his consecration, sent an embassy to Charlemagne, acquainting him of his election, and at the same time sent the keys of the confession of St. Peter, and the standard of the city; and Sigonius adds, that he likewise desired Charlemagne to send one of his nobles to Rome, to take the oath of allegiance from the Romans: by which it appears, that notwithstanding the great patrimony granted to the see of Rome by Charlemagne, and his father Pepin, the popes had not yet assumed to be independent sovereigns; but as they had renounced their allegiance to the emperor, they sheltered themselves under the protection of their benefactor the king of the Franks.

The duke of Friuli invades Pannonia.

THE Hunns at this time, by their frequent incursions, infesting Italy, Charlemagne created one Henry, a Frank by nation, duke of Friuli, who soon after raising an army, marched into Pannonia, and having defeated several of their generals, took and plundered the royal palace, sending the wealth he found there to Charlemagne. The same year Pepin likewise invaded Hungary, and having driven the enemy beyond the Thyffe, and enriched his army with spoil, he afterwards went to Aix la Chapelle, and returned the beginning of the next year to Italy, where

<sup>c</sup> LEO Ost. l. i. c. 16.

<sup>f</sup> SIGON. l. iv. p. 94.

<sup>g</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

(A) This is the account of Sigonius; but Eginbard and Theophanes say, that the match was broke off by the emperor's mother Irene, who being afraid lest the young empress should ruin her authority, and persuade Constantine to rule by himself, rejected the alliance of the Franks, whom she hated, and obliged her son, contrary to his inclination, to marry an Armenian woman of obscure birth. But from Theophanes it appears to us, that this rupture with the Franks was owing to the intrigues of Adalgise at the court of Constantinople, who hoped, that if he could prevent the intended match, and prevail with the emperor to declare war against the Franks, he might by that means recover the kingdom of his ancestors.

a he was soon after informed, that Irene had caused her son Constantine to be imprisoned, and his eyes to be put out, by which he died three days after.

THE following year great disturbances happened at Rome, a conspiracy having been formed against the pope by some relations of Adrian, who were offended at his promotion. The conspirators having formed their plot, attacked the pope in the church of St. Stephen, on St. George's day, as he was preparing to celebrate the service for that saint; and having thrown him down, they stripped him of his robes, and wounded him in several places; after which they thrust him, half dead, into the monastery of St. Erasmus, under a strong guard: but Alcuin, one of the domestics of Leo, having found means to deceive the guard, brought his master from thence at night, and conducted him to the church of St. Peter. In the mean time the news of the assault being carried to Vinigise, the duke of Spoletto, who had succeeded Hildebrand, he hastened to Rome with an army, and brought the pope safe to Spoletto, from whence he went to Germany, where he was received with great honour by Charlemagne, and after staying some months was sent back to Rome, with an honourable escort of nobles and bishops<sup>a</sup>.

Pope Leo is assaulted in Rome, and obliged to seek protection of Charlemagne. A. D. 799.

CHARLEMAGNE, being afraid lest the faction that opposed Leo might apply to the emperor for protection, resolved to quiet the disturbances at Rome in person; therefore having settled the affairs of Germany, in the beginning of autumn he marched into Italy; but before he proceeded to Rome, he went to Tarstz in Illyricum, where he punished the murderers of Henry duke of Friuli, who had been assassinated in that city the year before. Having appointed Cadolachus duke of Friuli, he marched from thence to Ancona, where he sent Pepin with a part of his army against Grimoald, who had again revolted, while he himself went to Rome, to determine the cause of Leo. On the day appointed for the trial, the bishops refusing to judge their superior, the pope cleared himself, by swearing upon the gospels that he was not guilty of the crimes laid to his charge. The pope, after this oath, being declared innocent, by the voices of the whole assembly, afterwards consulted with the senators of Rome, how they might express their gratitude to Charlemagne; and having agreed to revive in his favour the title of emperor of the Romans, on Christmas-day, when he had entered the Vatican church, and was kneeling at the altar, the pope threw a rich cloak over his shoulders, and putting a crown upon his head, proclaimed him, Augustus, crowned by God, the great and most pious emperor of the Romans, which was thrice repeated by the people with loud acclamations. After this ceremony, the emperor applied himself to regulate the affairs of Italy, and of the church, having during the winter added some new laws to the former edicts of the Lombards, and likewise increased the institutions of the church. About the middle of April he left Rome, and having given audience to the Persian ambassador near Vercelli, he passed the Alps and returned to Germany. In the mean time the war in the duchy of Benevento was carried on with various success; though Pepin had taken and plundered some towns, yet Grimoald having taken Luceria, and made Vinigise prisoner, Pepin concluded a truce with him for some time, in consequence of which Vinigise was set at liberty, and Pepin spent the winter with his father at Aix la Chapelle. During his absence, the Saracens from Africa and Spain, having infested the coast of Italy, and seized on the island of Corfica, Pepin upon his return sent a fleet to Corfica, which attacking them unexpectedly, forced them to retire with loss. Soon after Nicetas the patrician arriving in the Adriatic with a fleet from Constantinople, to support a faction of the Venetians, who inclined to the eastern empire, Pepin resolved to protect those who continued faithful to his father; but Nicetas hearing of his preparations, concluded a truce with him, and returned to Constantinople. The same year he sent another fleet against the Saracens, who still infested Corfica, and an engagement ensuing, the infidels were entirely defeated, with the loss of thirteen ships. The following year the truce being expired with the Greeks, Nicephorus sent a strong fleet into the Adriatic, and likewise another into the lower sea, which took and plundered Populonium, a city of Ettruria<sup>1</sup>, while the other landing their forces, and being joined by the Venetians, attacked Comaclo; but after an obstinate dispute, they were repulsed by Pepin's army, upon which the Greeks retired to Venice, and endeavoured to conclude a peace with Pepin, by means of the republic, which was prevented by the intrigues of Obalerius, or, according to Blondus, Ubelarius, formerly duke of Venice, but at this time in banishment, on account of his favouring the Franks<sup>k</sup>. The Saracens, encouraged by these dissensions among the Christians, again invaded Corfica and Sardinia, and attacking the city of Aleria, after having plundered it, they carried off all the inhabitants as captives, leaving only the bishop and a few old men.

Charlemagne marches into Italy, 800.

and is crowned emperor of the Romans by the pope. A. D. 801.

Pepin goes to Aix la Chapelle, 804.

but returns to Italy, and sends a fleet against the Saracens. A. D. 806.

The Greeks and Venetians attack Comaclo, but are defeated.

The Saracens invade Sardinia. A. D. 809.

THE following year the war betwixt Pepin and the Venetians was carried on with great vigour; Pepin, according to Blondus<sup>1</sup>, being offended that the Venetians, on account of their commerce, had renewed their alliance with Nicephorus, the eastern emperor, without his

A war betwixt Pepin and the Venetians.

<sup>a</sup> SIGON. l. iv. p. 95. BARON. ad an. 799. l. iv. p. 902.

<sup>1</sup> BLOND. ubi supra.

<sup>1</sup> BLOND. Dec. ii. l. 2.

<sup>k</sup> BLOND. ubi supra. SIGON.

knowledge, resolved to attack them by sea and land; though other writers affirm, that Pepin undertook this war at the desire of his father, with a design of restoring Obalarius and Valentine, the banished dukes<sup>m</sup>. Whatever was the occasion of the war, the issue of it was not favourable to Pepin, who having assembled his forces at Ravenna, embarked his troops, and immediately took Brondulum, Clodia, Palestrina, and Albiola, and from thence sailed to Metamaucum, which was then the residence of the dukes. The inhabitants of this city being astonished at the rapid progress of the enemy, quitted their habitations, and putting their effects on board their boats, they retired to the islands of Rialto and Olivola, which were protected from the attack of great vessels by the shallowness of the water around them. Pepin finding nothing but empty houses at Metamaucum, and being informed whither the Venetians had retired, he resolved to attack those islands; but as they were inaccessible to his ships, he assembled all the boats he could from the neighbouring rivers, and adding some rafts, put his men on board, and sent them forwards. The rafts being rowed by the boats, advanced pretty nigh the islands, but upon the ebbing of the tide, the Venetians fallying out in little skiffs, cut the rafts from the boats, many of which they sunk and destroyed, while those in the rafts trusting to the shallowness of the water, leapt overboard and were drowned. Pepin being thus shamefully defeated, retired with the remains of his army to Ravenna, from whence he went to Milan, where he soon after died, in the flower of his age, leaving behind him only one natural son, named Bernard, and five daughters, whom Charlemagne caused to be educated in his palace as his own.

Pepin dies,
A. D. 810.

and is succeeded ed by his son Bernard.

Grimoald sub- mits and be- comes tribu- tary.

812.

Lewis is crowned empe- ror, and Ber- nard crowned king of Italy,
at Monza.

813.

Charlemagne
dies, and is succeeded by
Lewis.

Stephen IV. succeeds Leo,
and crowns
the emperor in Germany.

816.

THE death of Pepin greatly affected the emperor, who, from the affection he bore him, determined to give the kingdom of Italy to Bernard; and as Italy was threatened with an invasion from the Saracens, he concluded a peace with the emperor Nicephorus, and ceded to him all the sovereignty over Venice<sup>n</sup>. Two years afterwards, being informed that the Moors were making great preparations to invade Italy, he immediately sent Bernard with an army into that kingdom, joining with him Wala, governor of Saxony, and brother of Adalard, abbot of Corbie, who had distinguished himself for his administration during the reign of Pepin. The Moors hearing of Bernard's arrival in Italy, turned their arms against Corfica and Sardinia, but were almost entirely cut off in Sardinia, very few of them escaping to Spain and Africa. This same year likewise, Grimoald, prince of Benevento, concluded a peace with the emperor, consenting to pay a yearly tribute of 27,000 crowns of gold<sup>o</sup>. Notwithstanding the great loss the Saracens had sustained in Sardinia, the next year they invaded Corfica; but in their return to Spain, were attacked at sea by Ermengarius, governor of Majorca for the king of Italy, who took eight of their ships, and recovered five hundred christian captives. To indemnify themselves for this loss, they sailed to Civita Vecchia, which they took and plundered; and afterwards landing in Provence, they attacked and plundered Nice; but in their return landing upon Sardinia, they were defeated and repulsed to their ships, several of which they lost. The western empire at this time enjoying a profound peace, Charlemagne, affected with the loss of his two sons Charles and Pepin, sent for his only surviving son Lewis king of Aquitaine, and declaring him his heir, caused him to be crowned emperor at Aix la Chapelle; at the same time he ordered Bernard, who was in Italy, to be crowned king at Monza, by the archbishop of Milan. Charlemagne did not long survive this ceremony, but being attacked with a fever, which turned to a pleurisy, he died on the 28th of January, in the 70th year of his age. Upon the news of the death of Charlemagne, Lewis left Aquitaine, and repaired to Aix la Chapelle, where he was met by Bernard, king of Italy, and the ambassadors of Leo emperor of Constantinople, who renewed the treaty that had been concluded with his father. He confirmed likewise the peace with Grimoald, duke of Benevento, on condition of his paying the same tribute as formerly.

THE Romans, who had ever had an aversion to pope Leo, being informed of the death of Charlemagne, his protector, again began to oppose his authority, and several of the nobles conspired his death; which plot being discovered to Leo, he seized the conspirators, and ordered them to be put to death. A complaint being made to Lewis of this proceeding of the pope, he sent his nephew Bernard, who was still with him, into Italy, to enquire into the disturbance at Rome. Bernard, upon his arrival at Rome, having enquired into the disorders, sent an account of the whole to Lewis, along with the ambassadors of Leo, who satisfied the emperor concerning the false accusations of their master. Leo dying the year following, was succeeded by Stephen IV. who immediately after his election ordered the Romans to take the oath of allegiance to Lewis; and two months afterwards went himself into Germany, attended by Bernard, where he was received with great respect by the emperor<sup>p</sup>, whom he crowned at Rheims, together with his queen Hermingarde. Stephen returning to Rome, died soon after, and was succeeded by Pascal, who immediately sent an embassy to the emperor, excusing himself for assuming that dignity before he had acquainted him. Lewis admitting of his ex-

<sup>m</sup> Sicon. ubi supra.

<sup>n</sup> Vita Dud. c. 38 & 39.

<sup>o</sup> 1THÆVUS Ann. Frank. Sicon. l. iv. p. 103.

<sup>p</sup> Sicon. ubi supra.

a cuse, renewed the grant of his father and grandfather in favour of the see of Rome; and having called a very full assembly of the states at Aix la Chapelle, with their approbation caused his eldest son Lotharius to be crowned emperor, Pepin his second son king of Aquitain, and Lewis king of Bavaria.

BERNARD, king of Italy, who had begun to aspire to the empire, to which he thought he had the preferable right, as his father Pepin was the elder brother of Lewis, being informed of this division of the empire, by which he was consequently excluded, revolted from the emperor, and having fortified the passes of the Alps, made all the cities of Italy take the oath of allegiance to him. Lewis no sooner was acquainted with the proceedings of Bernard, but he raised a great army, and advanced with it towards Italy, which news so confounded the conspirators, that they quitted the part of Bernard, who finding himself abandoned by those who promised to assist him, resolved to have recourse to the emperor's clemency, and accordingly went and threw himself at his uncle's feet, acknowledging his crime, and making a full confession of the conspiracy. Lewis, who was then at Chalons on the Soane, by this discovery, having secured the chief conspirators, returned with them to Aix la Chapelle, where they were condemned to death, which sentence the emperor mitigated, ordering the eyes of the laics to be put out, and the bishops to be deposed. Bernard survived this operation only three days, and died on the 17th of April, having reigned only four years and five months. While these things were transacting in Germany, Radelchis count of Campania, having revolted, slew Grimoald, prince of Benevento, and procured Sico to be elected in his stead, who sent ambassadors to the emperor, promising to pay the same homage and tribute as his predecessor had done, which submission being accepted, his election was confirmed. The following year, Cadolach the duke of Friuli dying suddenly, Lewis conferred that dukedom upon Balderic, who the next campaign passing the Alps with an army, acted in conjunction with the emperor against Lindentus, who headed the rebellious Hunns. Having ravaged Pannonia, the emperor returned to Aix, and Balderic led his army back into Italy, after reducing Carniola and Carinthia <sup>1</sup>.

Bernard revolts against the emperor, but loses his kingdom and his life.
A. D. 817.

Grimoald prince of Benevento is assassinated by Radelchis.

THE year after, Vinigise duke of Spoleto resigning his principality, and taking on the monastic habit, Suppo count of Brescia succeeded him, as he had left no male issue. As the nobles in Lombardy were committing a great many disorders, Lotharius was sent into Italy, d received there with great joy by the people, and crowned at Monza by the archbishop of Milan; and the Easter following being invited to Rome, he was there crowned by the pope king of Italy, and afterwards emperor. Rome was at this time greatly divided by two opposite factions; the one endeavouring to support the pope's authority, the other that of the emperor; therefore Lotharius returned to Pavia, with the design of assembling some troops, to suppress the insolence of the opposite faction; but his affairs calling him into Germany, he went to his father's court at Frankfort, and sent Adelard count of the palace, and Maurinus count of Brescia, to put a stop to the disorders at Rome <sup>2</sup>. Before their arrival, Theodore, a dean, and Leo his son-in-law, a nomenclator, having been seized for preaching up obedience to the emperor, had their eyes put out, and were afterwards put to death, by order, as it was supposed, of the pope himself. The emperor Lewis, displeased with this proceeding, immediately sent commissioners to Rome to enquire into the affair; but before they set out, ambassadors arrived from the pope, who disclaimed their master's having any concern in the murder. Pascal, in the mean time, having assembled the bishops in the neighbourhood, in their presence cleared himself from the accusation, by swearing that he was not guilty; but he likewise declared the two persons deceased to have been lawfully put to death as traitors to their country, and therefore absolved those who had committed the murder. The emperor's commissaries upon their arrival not being able to convict the murderers, Lewis rested satisfied with the excuses of the pope <sup>3</sup>, who dying the year following, occasioned by his death fresh disturbances at Rome, where two were chosen to succeed him; but Eugenius being supported by the nobles, obtained consecration, though in a tumultuous manner. Lewis being informed of these new disorders, sent his son Lotharius into Italy, to settle the affairs of that kingdom with the pope.

Lotharius crowned emperor at Rome.
823.

He puts an end to the tumults and disorders in that city.
825.

LOTHARIUS, upon his arrival in Italy, appointed Adelard count of the palace, duke of Spoleto, in the room of Suppo, lately deceased; but Adelard dying five months afterwards, that dukedom was conferred upon Maurinus count of Brescia, who survived his investiture only a few days; Lotharius afterwards proceeding to Rome, settled the affairs of that city in conjunction with the pope; and having restored those who during the late disturbances had been deprived of their possessions, he published several new laws, especially one relating to the election of the popes, by which it was ordained, that the consecration of the pope, for the future, should always be in the presence of the king, or of his ambassadors'. The affairs at Rome being thus settled, Lotharius returned to Germany, being jealous of the ascendancy which the empress Judith had over her husband, who had already promised to alter the former partition of his dominions, in favour of her infant son Charles, and by that means excited his three eldest sons to cabal against his government. In the mean time pope Eugenius dying, Valentine was chosen in his room, who scarcely enjoyed the papal dignity a month, and was succeeded by Gregory IV.; but as the emperor had no ambassador in Rome, his consecration was deferred till the arrival of one, who enquired into the election, before they proceeded to the ceremony of the consecration". Lotharius, who had still continued at the emperor's court, being at last offended, that Allemain, Rhetia, and a part of Burgundy (B), was given to Charles, with the title of king, he complained loudly of this partition, and set out for Italy; his two brothers Lewis and Pepin retired likewise to their own dominions, equally dissatisfied with the proceedings of the emperor. In the mean time, the empress having turned out those bishops and lords who opposed her schemes, supplied their places with her own partisans, and prevailed with the emperor to trust the administration of the empire to Bernard count of Barcelona, who was supposed to be her gallant. These proceedings, far from strengthening her cause, served only to spirit up the malecontents to an open rebellion; and the nobles, and many of the bishops, having entered into a conspiracy, they addressed themselves to Pepin king of Aquitain, complaining, that the emperor neglected all the care of the empire, and trusted the administration of affairs to Bernard, who being engaged in an intrigue with the empress, designed not only to destroy the emperor, but likewise to cut off his sons, that he himself might succeed to the throne; that therefore it was his duty to undertake the protection of the empire, and redress the grievances which his father's bad administration had introduced". Pepin, fond of the preference which the malecontents had shewn, by chusing him for their chief, willingly entered into their measures; and assembling an army, marched to Verberie, with a design to seize the empress and Bernard. The emperor, astonished at the news of this rebellion, sent Bernard to his government in Catalonia, and desired Judith to take sanctuary in a monastery, while he himself went with a small army to Compeigne. Pepin with his army advancing into the neighbourhood of Compeigne, commanded Judith to be brought out of the monastery whither she had fled, and ordered her, as she valued her life, to go and persuade her husband to become a monk. Judith being thus allowed to speak in private with the emperor, persuaded him to seem consenting to what the rebels desired; and returning to their camp, they obliged her to take the veil in the abbey of St. Rade-gond.

<sup>1</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>2</sup> BLOND. Dec. ii. l. 2.

<sup>3</sup> SIGON. ubi supra. BLOND. ubi supra.

A rebellion against the emperor.
A. D. 830.

The rebels are joined by Lotharius, who seizes on the person of the emperor.

The emperor recovers his authority at the assembly at Nimeguen.

LOTHARIUS being informed of these disturbances in the empire, immediately marched out of Italy with an army; and though he was not greatly offended at the revolt, yet he was uneasy to see any other besides himself at the head of the malecontents; he therefore, upon his arrival, assumed a superiority, in which he was supported by the chief of the malecontents, who declared for him as heir to the empire, and already crowned by the pope. This behaviour of the malecontents was far from being acceptable to Pepin, who quitted Compeigne, and retired to his own kingdom. In the mean time Lotharius having seized the emperor, treated him with great respect, but retained the power of government in his own hands; and having seized Herbert, brother of count Bernard, he ordered his eyes to be put out, notwithstanding the intercession of the emperor, whom he now trusted to the guard of some monks, advising them to prevail with him to quit the world. The monks, far from assisting the designs of Lotharius, advised the emperor to take courage, and promised to assist him to the utmost in recovering his dignity. One of them, more enterprising than the rest, under a pretence of religion, got leave to withdraw, and going to Pepin and Lewis, he prevailed with them to undertake the protection of their father, by promising them an enlargement of territory; he likewise prevailed with a great many bishops and counts of the empire to return to their allegiance. The party of the emperor being now superior to the malecontents, a diet was appointed at Nimeguen, which was frequented by great numbers from Germany and France. Lewis finding himself well supported, began again to resume his authority, and deprived the abbot Hilduin of his abbey, because, contrary to his command, he came to the diet with an armed force. This, and other instances of firmness in the emperor, disconcerted the malecontents, who seeing Lewis surrounded with his friends, among whom were Lewis and Pepin his sons, began to be anxious about their own safety, and consulted with Lotharius what was best to be done; but the emperor sending for him, laid before him in an affection-

* SIGON. l. iv. p. 3.

† Idem. ibid.

‡ SIGON. ubi supra.

(B) By Allemain is understood the country situated between the Rhine, the Main, the Necker, and the Danube; by Rhetia is meant the province of the Grisons; and by the part of Burgundy is understood modern Switzerland, and the territory of Geneva.

a ate though serious manner the heinousness of his crime, and advised him to submit voluntarily to a power which he might perceive was greatly superior to his. Lotharius, touched with the affectionate reproof of his father, threw himself at his feet, and asked pardon, which was freely granted by the emperor. The rebels, impatient at the delay of Lotharius, and thinking him detained a prisoner, ran to arms, and determined to hazard all upon an engagement. But the emperor and Lotharius appearing, and declaring that they were reconciled, the face of matters was quickly changed, and the chief malecontents being seized, peace was again restored to the empire. Lotharius, though he was pardoned by his father, yet was deprived of the title of emperor, and all the subjects of the empire absolved from their allegiance to him; he was likewise obliged to promise upon oath, never to undertake

b any thing against the empire; on these conditions he was allowed to return to Italy. Notwithstanding these precautions, the peace was of a very short continuance, for Bernard count of Barcelona, upon his return to court, finding that he was not again to be trusted with the administration, and that he had lost the favour of the empress, retired to his government, but in his way stopped at Aquitain, where he engaged Pepin in a new conspiracy against his father. The emperor, who had sent for Pepin to court, suspecting by his delay that he was meditating a revolt, appointed a general diet at Orleans, and ordered his three sons to be present. But he was soon after surprised with the news, that his son Lewis of Bavaria was again in arms; therefore quitting his design of convoking a diet, he immediately assembled an army, and marched against his rebel son, who finding himself unable to resist the emperor, came and submitted; and upon swearing that he would never again swerve from his duty, he obtained his pardon. Lotharius, though he was suspected of being concerned in this conspiracy<sup>x</sup>, yet, as he saw it stifled in the very beginning, came to his father at Frankfort, and assured him that he had no part in the revolt of his brother. His submission being accepted, the emperor marched against Pepin, who had refused to appear at the diet which was held at Orleans in September, and was now in arms. Pepin being summoned to appear before his father, on pain of being disinherited, thought proper to submit, as he had not forces sufficient to oppose the army of the emperor. On his arrival he was made prisoner, and conducted under a guard to Triers: but making his escape on the road, he posted into his own kingdom, where assembling some troops, he harassed the army of the emperor in its return to Aix la Chapelle. This behaviour so exasperated his father, that he at last yielded to the solicitations of Judith, and disinheriting Pepin, gave his kingdom to her son Charles. That Lotharius might not be offended at this advancement of Charles, the country of the Grisons and Switzerland was added to his dominions, and the empress promised to procure the imperial dignity to be again restored to him.

c But as Lotharius found no effect from her promises, he publicly espoused the cause of Pepin; and having raised an army in Italy, he even prevailed with the pope to accompany him into Germany. He entered Alsace, and being joined by his brothers, with their forces, he every where published, that the pope had espoused his cause, and was come to excommunicate his father. This report, though it had great influence on the common people, and several bishops of low extraction, yet served only to attach the greatest part of the bishops of Germany and France to the emperor, who wrote to the pope, that if he came to excommunicate, he would be excommunicated himself. Gregory replied in a high style, and affirmed, that he only came into Germany as a mediator betwixt the emperor and his sons; nevertheless he still continued in the army of Lotharius<sup>y</sup>. In the mean time the emperor having raised an army, marched against the rebels, who were encamped betwixt Basil and Colmar. When he came within view of their camp, the pope with his retinue came over to his army, where, according to Pascale Radbert, he continued three days; but his mediation being unsuccessful with the emperor, he returned to Lotharius, who, in the mean time is said to have debauched the soldiers of his father, so that the night following almost the whole army deserted to the rebels. Lewis finding himself abandoned by his friends, surrendered to Lotharius, on condition of his life and liberty; but he was no sooner in his son's camp, than he was made a prisoner, and in a tumultuous assembly deposed; the pope, protesting against the proceeding, returned to Italy<sup>z</sup>. Lotharius having called an assembly at Compeigne, was there declared emperor, and his father condemned by the bishops to do public penance; after which he was confined to a very strict imprisonment<sup>a</sup>. The greatness of his misfortune at length procuring Lewis many friends, his two other sons were prevailed upon to demand the liberty of their father. Lotharius finding that his violent proceedings were condemned by the whole empire, left his father in the monastery of St. Denis, and retired into Switzerland, where he assembled an army, and marched against the imperialists. But the army of the emperor be-

His sons again rebel against him.
A. D. 832.

Lewis is pardoned.

but Aquitaine is taken from Pepin, and given to Charles.

Lotharius marches from Italy with an army against the emperor.
833.

The emperor is delivered from Lotharius.

<sup>x</sup> Vita Lud. pii.
ad an. 833.

<sup>y</sup> Epist. Greg. IV. apud Agobard. BARON. ad ann. 833.

<sup>z</sup> See the History of France.

<sup>a</sup> BARON.

who is obliged to sue for pardon. ing greatly superior, he thought proper to submit, and obtained pardon, on condition of returning into Italy, and not repassing the Alps without leave of the emperor. a

The coasts of Italy are infested by the Saracens.

A. D. 835.

Lotharius succeeds to the empire.

A final partition agreed to. 843.

Lotharius declares his eldest son Lewis king of Italy. 844.

Who is crowned by the pope of Rome.

Benevento is divided by Lewis into two dukedoms, in favour of the two competitors. 851.

WHILE Lotharius was thus employed in dethroning his father, the Saracens infested the coasts of Italy, and committed such ravages, that the bishops were even obliged to march to the protection of the coasts: but Lotharius upon his return, far from putting his kingdom in a posture of defence against the infidels, seized upon many places belonging to the see of Rome, under pretence that they were part of his kingdom of Lombardy. Pope Gregory complaining to Lotharius, without receiving any satisfaction, sent an embassy to the emperor, who being displeased with his son's proceedings, ordered him to desist, and likewise to prepare for his reception, as he proposed soon to make a journey into Italy. Two years afterwards, Pepin king of Aquitain dying, Lotharius was sent for from Italy: the whole empire, b excepting Bavaria, being divided into two lots, he had the one, and the other was conferred upon his half brother Charles, who was warmly recommended to his protection, both by the emperor and empress. After this partition, Lotharius returned to Italy, where he continued till the death of the emperor, which he was no sooner informed of, than he assembled an army and marched into France, where he was acknowledged as emperor: but not satisfied with this dignity, and the dominions left to him by his father, he quickly began to usurp those of his brother, who thereupon entered into an alliance against him: joining their forces, they engaged his army near Fontenay; and after an obstinate dispute, in which a hundred thousand men are said to have fallen on both sides, they obtained a complete victory, and forced Lotharius to retire to Lyons and Vienna. In consequence of this victory, the two brothers made c themselves masters of Austrasia and Burgundy; and to secure their conquests, called an assembly of the bishops, in which Lotharius was declared to have forfeited his kingdom, which was divided betwixt Lewis and Charles. Lotharius finding that his brothers were not only superior in arms, but likewise supported by the spiritual power, he sued for peace, and begged a new partition of the empire. His brothers reflecting that they only held their territories from the good-will of the people, consented to his demands, and a congress being held at Coblentz, the empire was at last divided among the three brothers, in which partition, all that is situated d betwixt the Rhine and the Scheld, all the countries situated on the Maese, and the provinces on both sides the Rhine, fell to the share of Lotharius, together with the kingdom of Italy, and the title of emperor. All beyond the Rhine was ceded to Lewis, who took the title of king of Germany; and Charles had the third division, with the title of king of France.

THE following year Lotharius being engaged in settling the affairs of Germany, appointed his eldest son Lewis king of Italy; and being informed that Sergius II. who succeeded Gregory IV. had been consecrated without waiting for his confirmation, he sent his son with an army into Italy, to be crowned in that kingdom; and desired his uncle Drogo, bishop of Metz, to accompany him. Drogo had orders to assemble at Rome the archbishops of Milan and Ravenna, and as many Italian bishops as he could, to examine into the election of Sergius. The pope, that he might avert the threatening storm, received young Lewis with extraordinary honours, and waited for him upon the head of the steps of St. Peter's church, the doors of which were shut by his orders. After Lewis had been introduced to the pope, and e kissed his foot, Sergius told him, that, if he came for the good of the church, the doors should immediately be opened, but if otherwise, he should have no access. Lewis declaring that he came with a pure intention for the church's welfare, after the example of his father and grandfather, the doors were thereupon opened, and the pope and he entering the church, performed their devotions together <sup>d</sup>. This declaration of Lewis, however, did not prevent Drogo and the other bishops from enquiring into the election of Sergius, which they approved of, but condemned as a precedent; and to prevent the imperial right from being infringed for the future, they ordained, that the popes should not be consecrated before they were confirmed by the emperor. The day after this regulation, Lewis was crowned by the pope, king of f the Lombards, and the Romans afterwards took the oaths of allegiance to the emperor. During these transactions, the army of Franks and Lombards, that had attended Lewis, committed the same excesses in the neighbourhood of Rome, that they had done in their march through Italy: for being denied access to the city, they plundered the suburbs, and destroyed the fields. The Romans being under great apprehensions that Lewis designed to make a conquest of Rome, their fears were greatly increased by the arrival of Siconolphus, prince of Benevento, with another army; but that prince, after having had an interview with Lewis, concerning the present state of his affairs, returned to Salerno, and Lewis soon after marched with his army to Pavia <sup>e</sup>.

A FEW years afterwards Lewis marched with an army to Benevento; and to put an end to the civil disputes, made an equal partition of the dukedom betwixt Radelchis and Siconolphus; g Radelchis being appointed prince of Benevento, and Siconolphus having Salerno and its territory, a under the same title <sup>f</sup>. After this decision, the emperor returned with his army to Mantua; and two years afterwards he went into Germany, being sent for by his father, who, a few years before, had associated him into the empire. During his absence, the Saracens, who were still in possession of Bari, again made an irruption into Apulia, Calabria, and the dukedom of Benevento, destroying all before them with fire and sword. The Italians, unable to defend themselves from so barbarous an enemy, sent the abbots of Monte Cassino and St. Vincent into Germany, to represent their miserable condition to the emperor, and to beg the return of Lewis, with an army to protect them. Lotharius immediately ordered Lewis to return to Italy; and as he was informed that the ancient discipline of the church, established by his father Lewis, and grandfather Charlemagne, was greatly relaxed of late years, he desired him, as soon as his affairs would allow, to call an assembly of the nobles and bishops, to enquire into the disorders, and to put a stop to them by new laws. Lewis, upon his return to Italy, assembled an army, and being assisted by the Capuans, defeated the Saracens in several engagements; but the Capuans, for what reason is uncertain, proving unfaithful to him, he led his army to Salerno, where having turned out the son of Siconolphus, who had succeeded his father, he gave the principality to Ademarius, and afterwards he returned to Pavia, where he appointed an assembly of the states to be held soon after.

<sup>d</sup> BARON. ad an. 844. SIGON. ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> BARON. ad an. 844.

THE nobles and bishops assembling in January at Tesino, Lewis gave orders to Angilbert, archbishop of Milan, and Andrew, patriarch of Aquileia, to make enquiry into the lives of the bishops, and all the other clergy. After a diligent inquisition, they reported, that many of the bishops and inferior clergy lived unworthy of their profession; that, partly from the neglect of the bishops, and partly from the carelessness of the people, preaching was greatly disused; that the nobles having built chapels in their houses, neglected to attend divine service in the churches; and likewise employed persons of worthless characters, and even some that were not ordained, to officiate as their chaplains <sup>g</sup>. This report being given in to the king, a new edict was published on the 4th of February, ordaining, under severe penalties; the clergy and monks to live according to the laws of their institutions; that all causes should be judged according to the written laws; and courts established for that purpose in proper places, whither the people might be at liberty to resort, without any molestation.

d A FEW months after the publication of this edict, the peace of Italy was like to be disturbed by one Daniel, master of the soldiers at Rome, who, upon some disgust, went to Lewis, and accused Gratian, a master of the soldiers, and superintendent of the Roman palace, of advising the Romans to make an alliance with the Greek emperor, and to expel the Franks. Lewis, alarmed at this information, immediately went to Rome, without previously acquainting the pope of his journey. Being received in a respectful manner by Leo, a day was appointed to enquire into the affair; when Gratian, in the presence of the emperor and the pope; and a full assembly of the nobles and senators of Rome, proving himself innocent of the accusation, even by the accuser himself, Daniel was delivered over to his power, according to the Roman law, and Lewis returned satisfied to Pavia <sup>h</sup>. Leo likewise, in justification of himself, wrote to Lotharius, professing that he always had, and ever should observe his edicts, and those of his ancestors; but begged, that he would allow the Romans to use the Roman laws, which they had always hitherto observed. A few days after the determination of this affair, Leo died, and was succeeded by Benedict III. who immediately sent an embassy to the emperor Lotharius and Lewis, informing them of his election; but Lewis being offended that they had proceeded to the election before he was acquainted, encouraged the election of one Anastasi, whom his party at Rome elected in a tumultuous manner, and placed by force in the Lateran palace: not being able to prevail with the bishops to consecrate Anastasi, the imperial ambassadors at last consented to allow Benedict to enjoy the papal dignity, and he was accordingly consecrated in their presence <sup>i</sup>.

f DURING this contest at Rome, the emperor Lotharius died in Germany, having before his death assumed the monkish habit in the monastery of Prum, and made a division of his dominions among his three sons, by which division, only the kingdom of Italy and the title of emperor was assigned to Lewis, all on this side the Alps being divided betwixt Lotharius and Charles. Though Lewis was not satisfied with this partition, yet as he knew his brothers would join their forces to prevent him from making any conquests in their dominions, he submitted, without opposition, to the will of his father; and applied himself to the administration of the government of Italy, making progresses through the great cities of Lombardy, and enquiring into the grievances of his subjects. He went the following year with his empress to Venice, where he was received with great honours, and confirmed the peace subsisting with that republic. While Lewis was at Venice, count Lando, and

<sup>f</sup> SIGON. l. v. p. 122. LEO. Orien. l. i. c. 31. in vita Leon Pont. <sup>i</sup> Idem in vita Benedict.

<sup>g</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>h</sup> ANASTAS. Biblioth.

Landolphus bishop of Capua or Sicopolis, changed the situation of their city, and built a new one upon the river Voltorno, as the former city had been greatly ravaged by fires, upon account of its high situation. The papal see soon after becoming vacant by the death of Benedict, who enjoyed that dignity little more than two years, Lewis immediately repaired to Rome, to be present at the consecration of the succeeding pope; and Nicolas being elected with great unanimity, was accordingly consecrated in the presence of the emperor, on the 22d of April. A few days after, Nicolas being informed that the emperor was proposing to return to Lombardy, he came out to visit him in his camp, and was received with great respect by Lewis, who advanced to meet him, and from an excess of complaisance alighted, and, taking hold of the bridle of the pope's horse, walked in that manner for about fifty yards, which ceremony, whether the effect of weakness or complaisance, was turned into a precedent by the following popes. The year after, the archbishop of Ravenna having been deposed by the pope, for asserting his independency, fled for protection to the emperor, who wrote to Nicolas, desiring him to call an assembly of the bishops to decide that cause. Accordingly the patriarch of Gradisca, and the bishops from Campania, Tuscia, and the other provinces, assembling at Rome, the cause of the archbishop was tried, in the presence of Lewis's ambassadors. But as Lewis had only the vain title of emperor, without the power, his protection was but of small account. The archbishop was obliged to acknowledge his error before he was restored, and likewise ordered to appear every other year at Rome, unless prevented by sickness, or absolved from that obligation by the pope.

Lewis marches against the Saracens, and besieges Bari;
A. D. 867.

AFTER the determination of this cause, Lewis was engaged in a new war with the Saracens, who were still in possession of Bari<sup>k</sup>. Having assembled a formidable army, he marched into the dukedom of Benevento, where, according to the Greek historians, the emperor Michael ordered a body of auxiliaries to join him. Lewis, after visiting the monastery of St. Benedict, according to a vow by which he had engaged himself, marched against Capua, which he took, and in a great measure destroyed; from thence he advanced to Salerno, Amalfi, and Puteoli, and afterwards to Benevento, to secure the fidelity of Adalgise, who was said to have a correspondence with the Saracens. Early next spring, that he might exterminate the infidels from Italy, he marched and besieged Bari, their capital; but finding it too well fortified to be soon reduced, he sent to his brother Lotharius for assistance, and in the mean time marched against other places in the possession of the Saracens. Upon the arrival of the auxiliaries from his brother, he defeated the enemy in a pitched battle, and took Lucera, with several other places of strength in its neighbourhood. Marching afterwards against Bari, he besieged it a second time, but without effect; for the Germans becoming very sickly, by reason of the extraordinary heat of the climate, and many of them having died by the bite of the tarantula, they quitted Italy, and returned home<sup>l</sup>. Upon their departure, Lewis raised the siege of Bari, and retired to Benevento; but the Saracens sallying out upon his rear, cut off 2000 of his men, and marching afterwards to the mountain Garganus, now Monte di St. Angelo, they plundered and burnt the church of St. Michael.

In the mean time pope Nicolas dying, Adrian II. was elected in his stead; and the emperor's ambassadors, who were then in Rome, complaining that they were not invited to the election, they were answered, that this was not done out of any disrespect to the emperor, but to prevent for the future the ambassadors of any prince from pretending to interfere with the election of a pope<sup>m</sup>. This was a language which they had never used before; but Adrian was resolved to use none of the authority that had been usurped by his predecessor Nicolas: besides, as the popes protected themselves by the power of Charlemagne, when they withdrew their allegiance from the eastern emperors, they now saw, that, from the divisions among the descendants of that conqueror, they might safely renounce their allegiance to them. As Lewis had only the shadow of authority over the Romans, he acquiesced in the answer of Adrian, who was consecrated in the presence of his ambassadors. The following year Lewis began the campaign against the Saracens, with the siege of Bari, in which he was assisted by the Grecian fleet; but finding his efforts vain, he raised the siege, and marched against Matera, Venosa, and Canosa, which he recovered from the infidels. Having burnt Matera, he left strong garrisons in the other two places, and broke up his camp. The following campaign he made another attempt upon Bari, and being again assisted by the Grecians, he at last made himself master of the place, which he destroyed, and took Seodan, their chief, prisoner, whom, according to Leo Ostiensis, he put to death; but the Grecian writers say, that he imprisoned him in Capua. After the reduction of Bari, the emperor marched against Taranto, which was still possessed by the Saracens; but he was obliged to raise the siege, to punish the conspiracy of two counts, who finding their treason discovered, fled to Benevento, and implored the protection of Adalgise. Lewis in his march took Æsernia, and the city of S. Agatha; g which he takes

and destroys.
869.

<sup>k</sup> SIGON. l. v. p. 128.

<sup>l</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>m</sup> ANAST. Bibl. in vita Hadrian.

a but upon his approach to Benevento, Adalgise coming out to meet him, obtained pardon for the two counts, which Lewis the more readily granted, as he was hastening to Rome, to consult with pope Adrian how to obtain the possession of the dominions of his brother Lotharius, which were now fallen to him by his death, but were usurped by his uncle, Charles the Bald, king of France.

THE pope warmly espoused the cause of the emperor, and wrote to Charles, who had been crowned king of Lorrain, exhorting him to desist from the usurpation of his nephew's right, and threatening him with excommunication if he refused to comply. He wrote likewise to the bishops and nobles of France, urging the right of the emperor, and exhorting them to acknowledge him as their prince; but not being able to prevail with Charles to relinquish the possession, he sent for Lewis to Rome, where he solemnly crowned him king of Lorrain, hoping by that ceremony to strengthen his right<sup>o</sup>. Charles, though he paid no regard to the embassies of the emperor or the pope, was obliged to hearken to the claims of the king of Germany, and consented to a division of his new acquired kingdom with him, rather than risk the losing of the whole. Lewis at this time was not in a condition to make good his right by arms, for the Saracens were still in possession of a great many places in Italy, and Seodan, having escaped from his imprisonment, had assembled a new army, which was strengthened by a fresh body of Infidels lately landed<sup>p</sup>. Basil, likewise emperor of Constantinople, being disappointed in his hopes of marrying Lewis's only daughter, in resentment for the refusal had turned his bitter enemy, and had not only erased his title of emperor from pope Adrian's letters, but had also sent a threatening letter to him, ordering him to lay it aside; and had excited Adalgise to renounce his allegiance, and give assistance to the Saracens<sup>q</sup>. Lewis having sent a long letter to Basil, which is still extant, in justification of his right, marched with his army against Benevento, resolving to reduce that city, as it was the head of the whole revolt; but Adalgise, though he had entered into a secret alliance with Basil, yet publicly professed his attachment to Lewis. Hearing that he was marching to reduce Benevento, he went out to meet him, and by strong assurances of his fidelity, and that of his subjects, diverted him from his purpose. Lewis, being satisfied with the professions of Adalgise, turned his arms against the cities in possession of the Saracens, many of which he made himself master of in a short time; but Capua being fortified with a wall of square stone, made a long resistance. However, being reduced to great difficulties, the garrison at last offered to capitulate, but the terms being rejected by the emperor, they had recourse to their bishop, who marching out of the town with the body of St. Germain upon his shoulders, obtained pardon for his citizens, in consideration of that relique, which was afterwards carried into France<sup>r</sup>.

AFTER the reduction of Capua, Lewis dismissed his army into summer quarters, and went himself to Benevento, where he was treacherously surprized by Adalgise, who put him in prison, and refused to set him at liberty, before he promised by an oath, never again to enter the dukedom of Benevento. Upon recovering his liberty, Lewis went to Verole, where he assembled his army, and defeated the Saracens near Capua; in consequence of which defeat, they retired to Calabria, and from thence embarked to Africa<sup>s</sup>. The following year Lewis went to Rome, where he was absolved from his oath to Adalgise by pope John VIII. and Adalgise himself declared an enemy of the republic, who hearing that the emperor was marching against him, fled to Corfica, and left his country to the mercy of the enemy, who committed great disorders through the whole dukedom; nevertheless Aimonius relates, that Adalgise, by the mediation of the pope, was reconciled to the emperor that same year<sup>t</sup>. As the health of the emperor was now very precarious, and he had no male issue, his uncles, the kings of Germany and France, began to intrigue about his succession. Lewis, king of Germany, had secured the interest of the empress, by ceding his part of Lorrain to the emperor, and promising to protect her against the Italian nobles, to whom she was become odious, on account of her intermeddling with the affairs of state. They wanted to have her divorced, that the emperor might marry another, in order to have an heir to his kingdom. Charles king of France, was sensible that he had no interest with the emperor or empress, and that his brother Lewis had a preferable right; therefore, by large promises, he privately brought over a great many Italian nobles to his party, and likewise secured the favour of the pope, who nevertheless went to Verona, and was present at a conference betwixt the emperor and Lewis king of Germany<sup>u</sup>. While the emperor was employed in this congress, the Saracens again invaded Italy, under their prince Abdalla, and besieged Salerno; but Lewis sending an army to the relief of the place, the Infidels were repulsed with great loss<sup>v</sup>.

<sup>o</sup> ADRIANI Epist. 20. AINEM. Epist. 40. Epit. Paris an. 615.

gon. l. v. p. 131.

<sup>p</sup> BARON. ad an. 871.

<sup>q</sup> AIMON. l. v. c. 30. in fin.

<sup>r</sup> Annal PITHÆI hoc anno.

<sup>s</sup> Idem ad. an. 872.

<sup>t</sup> AIMON, l. v. c. 28

<sup>u</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>v</sup> HERMPERTUS de rebus gestis Longobard.

Lewis dies, and is buried at Milan.
A. D. 875.

THE following year his health daily decreasing, he fell dangerously sick in France, where a he died, in the month of August, and was buried in the church of St. Ambrose<sup>x</sup>, at Milan, leaving behind him only one daughter, named Hermengarde, who was afterwards married to Boson king of Provence. Lewis was greatly beloved by his people, on account of his personal qualifications and his love for justice, which he caused to be administered to the meanest of his subjects with great impartiality. Though in the beginning of his reign he manifested some spirit in opposing the encroachments of the popes, yet in consequence of his father's will, finding himself without the power belonging to his title, he afterwards submitted too quietly to their usurpations, and even gave a kind of sanction to them by his condescension. Charles the Bald, king of France, being informed of the death of the emperor, immediately marched with an army towards Italy, and passed the Alps on the first of September, b having been secretly invited by the pope, who promised to crown him emperor as soon as he arrived at Rome. Lewis, king of Germany, conscious of his superior right, and being informed of his brother's march, sent his son Charles the Gross with an army into Italy, to stop him; but he, being repulsed at first, was afterwards reinforced with another body of forces under Carloman, upon which the king of France, not chusing to hazard a battle, had recourse to negotiation, and at first endeavoured to prevail with Carloman, by the offer of large bribes, to betray the cause of his father; but, not succeeding in that attempt, he proposed that a partition should be made of the late emperor's dominions betwixt the king of Germany and himself, and that till then both armies should evacuate Italy. Carloman c consenting to this, immediately repassed the Alps: but Charles, finding his enemy gone, marched on to Rome, pretending that he could not refuse a message from the pope.

Charles the Bald is crowned emperor by the pope;

and likewise crowned king of Lombardy at Pavia.
A. D. 876.

WHILE these things were doing in Lombardy the chief of the Roman nobility went to the pope, and represented to him, that, as the emperor Lewis had died without leaving a successor, that dignity, which had been usurped by foreigners for so many ages, ought now to return to the Italians. The count of Tuscany headed this party of the nobles, being in hopes of obtaining the imperial dignity for himself; but the pope, who wanted no master in Italy, rejected their proposition, and continued firm to the interests of the king of France<sup>y</sup>, who arriving soon after at Rome, like another Jugurtha, says an author of those times<sup>z</sup>, he corrupted the senate and nobles of that city by his profuse bribes, having, in his march thither, plundered the treasures of the deceased emperor. The pope, finding that the king of d France was determined to have the title of emperor at any price, resolved to sell it to him as high as he could; therefore, before his coronation, he made him stipulate to acknowledge the independency of Rome, and its territory, and to confess that he only held the empire by the gift of the pope<sup>a</sup>. Charles condescending to the terms proposed, was accordingly crowned emperor by the pope, in the Vatican church, on the 25th of December, and having made many precious gifts to the churches at Rome, he left that city, on the 5th of January, and proceeded to Pavia, attended by the pope, who, in an assembly of the nobles and bishops, made a long discourse in praise of the emperor, full of specious falsehoods, declaring, that he was without ambition, and, like another Joseph, had entered Italy to save, not a single nation, but the universal church<sup>b</sup>. After this discourse, the bishops and nobles pre- e sent giving their consent, Charles was crowned king of Lombardy by the archbishop of Milan. Thus the same person that had been threatened with excommunication by pope Adrian for usurping the dominions of his nephew Lotharius, was confirmed in his usurpation of Italy by pope John; and the emperors, from being sovereigns of the popes, had now basely become their vassals.

WHILE Charles was thus securing the possession of Italy, Lewis king of Germany, enraged at his treachery, marched with an army into France, which he ravaged as far as Attigni in Champagne<sup>c</sup>; but being informed that Charles was actually crowned at Rome, he marched back, in the beginning of the year, to Germany, but continued, nevertheless, to make great preparations for war. In the mean time, Charles having received the allegiance of the Ita- f lian nobles, held a diet at Pavia, where he enacted several new laws, and renewed the privileges of several cities and churches, particularly of the church of Cremona. He likewise created his brother-in-law Boson a duke, and governor of Italy in his absence, and appointed Vido duke of Spoletto, and Berengarius duke of Friuli; after which he marched with his army into France, which he found ravaged not only by the Germans, but by deserters from his own troops, who still continued in arms in many places.

The count of Tuscany and several other nobles conspire
against the
pope.

AFTER Charles had quitted Italy, Albert, or Alberic, count of Tuscany, and some other nobles, entered into a conspiracy against the pope, in revenge for his refusing to hearken to their proposal for retaining the imperial dignity in Italy. They were joined by Formosus bi-

<sup>x</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>y</sup> SIGON. l. v. p. 132.

<sup>z</sup> Scriptor Anonym. ap. BARON.

<sup>a</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>b</sup> Post Annal. PITHÆI, p. 39.

<sup>c</sup> AIMON. l. v. c. 32. SIGON. ubi supra.

- a shop of Porto, and Gregory a nomenclator; but the pope, having deposed the two ecclesiastics, prevented the progress of the conspiracy for the present. Sending ambassadors to the emperor, he informed him of the commotions at Rome, and begged his assistance against the Saracens, who having again landed in Italy, and joined their countrymen at Tarentum, had forced the inhabitants of Salerno, Amalfi, and Naples, to make an alliance with them, and threatened to invade the Roman territories. But the ambition of Charles prevented him from going to the defence of Italy; for his brother Lewis, king of Germany, being lately dead, he seized upon Lorrain, and marched to the Rhine with a great army against the sons of the deceased; but, being surprized by Lewis, king of Germany, he was entirely defeated, and obliged to quit the kingdom which he had usurped. In the mean time the pope sent frequent letters to the emperor, pressing him to come into Italy; but Charles, since his disorders to Vido, duke of Spoletto, and his brother Lambert, to give their assistance to the pope against the Infidels. Accordingly, the pope having gone with them to Salerno and Naples, prevailing with Guaiferius, prince of Salerno, to quit his alliance with the Saracens; but Sergius, prince of Naples, refusing to abandon the Infidels, was taken by his brother Atkandus, the bishop, who put out his eyes, and sent him to the pope. In the mean time the Saracens continued their incursions with great barbarity, and, having received a reinforcement, they passed the Anio, and threatened the city of Rome.
- b THE pope, astonished at the near approach of the Infidels, wrote pressing letters to the emperor to come to his relief, who, at last, yielded to his solicitation. Having settled the affairs of France in a diet at Compeigne<sup>a</sup>, he set out for Italy, with his empress Richilde, and a splendid retinue, but with very few troops, having ordered his army to be in readiness to follow him when called. The pope, to hasten the deliberations about the war, went and met him at Vercelli, from whence they went together to Pavia, where they proposed to crown the empress; but being alarmed with the news, that Carloman, king of Bavaria, and brother of Lewis of Germany, had passed the Alps with a formidable army, with the design of making good his late father's right to the empire, they quitted Pavia, and repaired to Tortona, where the empress was crowned, immediately after which she retired to Morienne with the treasure, in her way to France. The emperor himself followed her soon after, being disappointed in the arrival of his army, which had been delayed by the treachery of his generals. As for the pope, he fled directly to Rome. Charles had scarcely arrived at the Alps when he was attacked with a fever, and, having recourse to a Jew physician, he received poison from him instead of a medicine, of which he died eleven days after, on the 5th of October, at a village called Brios, on Mount Cenis, in the second year of his reign over Italy. Before he expired he appointed his only son his successor, and sent him the regal and imperial ensigns, which were all the title he ever had of being king of Italy, for he died before the disturbances in that kingdom allowed any opportunity for his election.
- c CARLOMAN, who had made his appearance with an army in Italy, to accomplish what his father had only attempted, is said by Aimonius and Sigonius<sup>c</sup> to have marched immediately back into Germany, in consequence of a false rumour that the emperor was marching against him with all his forces; but, according to the annals of Fulde and Regino, he continued his march into Italy, and made himself master of several towns in Lombardy. However this be, he seems to have been out of Italy, by a letter of pope John<sup>d</sup>, written to him in November, in answer to one from him to the pope. While the north of Italy was alarmed with the irruption of Carloman, and the death of the emperor, the southern parts were disturbed by an insurrection of the Capuans, who had expelled their bishop Landulph, and chosen one Ladenulph, a person of great power, in his room, though he was married, and only lately baptized. The pope, by the advice of the abbot of Cassino, and the bishop of Fiano, refused to consecrate Ladenulph; but at last, overcome by the intreaties of the nobles of Capua, he consented to his consecration, which occasioned great tumults in that city, so that he was obliged, for the sake of re-establishing the peace, to replace Landulph as bishop, and to give the half of the revenues to Ladenulph, who soon after obtained from the pope the bishoprick of Cajeta<sup>e</sup>. The Saracens, taking advantage of these dissensions, again made an irruption into those provinces, plundering and destroying every thing before them; and Ladenulph, greatly oppressing the Cajetans, they invited the Saracens to their relief. The pope being informed of this, prevailed with Docibilis, duke of Cajeta, to renounce the alliance of the Infidels, and to declare war against them. Docibilis accordingly, at the intreaty of the pope, engaged with the Saracens, but, being defeated by them, was obliged to conclude a peace, and, in order to re-

A. D. 8-7.
The emperor has a conference with the pope at Pavia;

but dies of poison soon after in his return to France.

Carloman returns with his army to Germany.

The Capuans expel their bishop and choose another, who is consecrated by the pope.

<sup>a</sup> AIMON. l. v. c. 55.

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. SIGON. ub. supra.

<sup>d</sup> JOAN Epist. 63.

<sup>e</sup> SIGON de

reg. Ital. l. v. LEO Ostien. l. v. c. 43.

cover his friends that were made captives, he was forced to deliver up a fort on the river a Garigliano<sup>h</sup>.

A. D. 878. In the mean time the unexpected death of the emperor had given fresh spirits to the Italian nobles, who, proposing to retain the imperial dignity in their own kingdom, wanted the pope to crown Lambert, duke of Spoletto. John refusing to consent to their demand, Lambert raised an army, and marched towards Rome, hoping that the terror of his arms would make him comply; but the pope, being highly offended at the little respect shewn him by Lambert, who, in his messages to him, refused him his usual titles, and treated him as his vassal, continued firm in his former resolution<sup>1</sup>, and even declared, that he would oppose him to the utmost of his power. Lambert, incensed at this obstinacy, made himself master of Rome, and immediately imprisoned the pope; but finding that his interest was not yet strong enough to set up for himself, he pretended that what he had done was by order of Carloman. The pope still continuing inflexible, after a month's imprisonment was set at liberty, and soon after, not thinking himself safe in Italy, he sailed to Provence, taking with him the most precious relics<sup>k</sup>, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the Saracens, who, he heard, were invited by Lambert to come to his assistance against the church; at the same time he sent letters to Carloman, excusing himself for not coming to Bavaria as he intended, and blaming Lambert, who, he said, had set guards on all the roads<sup>l</sup>. The pope was received in Provence with great respect by Boson, son-in-law to the emperor Lewis II. whom he adopted as his son, and favoured so much that it was supposed he designed him for the empire: however, the pope was at this time so greatly embarrassed, that he knew not whom to fix upon as his protector, but, to secure the favour of each party, he kept all in suspense.

The pope is imprisoned, but is set at liberty, and goes to France.

Lewis the Stammorer is crowned king of France by the pope at Troyes. HAVING acquainted the king of France with his arrival, he went to Troyes, where, in a council of bishops, he published his excommunication of Lambert and his accomplices at Rome; and Lewis, who had been hindered by sickness, coming hither on the first of September, was crowned, a few days after, king of France, but not emperor, as some historians have asserted without foundation. At the conclusion of the council, the pope requested the king of France and the bishops, in an authoritative manner, to conduct him into Italy with an armed force<sup>m</sup>; but Lewis being then in a bad state of health, Boson willingly undertook that journey, hoping thereby to obtain the imperial crown. Italy having now been a whole year without a sovereign, fell into the utmost anarchy and confusion, the pope having been obliged, before his departure from Rome, to consent to pay an annual tribute of 25,000 marks of silver to the Saracens<sup>n</sup>; and the nobles and states of Lombardy, being under no subordination, began to appropriate to themselves the lands of their governments, and to claim an independency which some of them have ever since asserted. Nevertheless Sigonius seems to be of opinion that Carloman had some authority in Italy at this time, as he mentions many had charters granted to the churches in Lombardy, in which Carloman is stiled king of Bavaria and Italy; but these charters are all dated in Bavaria<sup>o</sup>, and the Lombard and German annals of this period are silent as to Carloman's exercising such an authority. The pope, after an absence of several months, being now arrived in Italy, attended by Boson with an armed force, called an assembly of the bishops at Pavia, on the 27th of November<sup>p</sup>, to provide for the security of the church, and settle the peace of Italy. Finding that Lambert and Albert, upon the news of his returning with an army, wanted to be reconciled to the church, he accordingly made his peace with them, and, dismissing Boson, without doing any thing for his promotion, he returned to Rome.

Italy being without a king, the nobles and states claim an independency.

The pope is conducted to Italy by Boson with an army, and returns to Rome.

A. D. 879. ingly made his peace with them, and, dismissing Boson, without doing any thing for his promotion, he returned to Rome.

The bishops of Italy assemble at Rome to elect a king, but nothing is concluded upon. A FEW months afterwards, being informed of the death of Lewis, who died on the 10th of April, leaving behind him two sons, Lewis and Carloman, both under age, the pope wrote to Anspert archbishop of Milan, ordering him to be present at Rome, on the first of May, at the election of a new king, since, as it is expressed in his letter<sup>q</sup>, Carloman, king of Bavaria, was prevented by his infirmities from enjoying the kingdom; he likewise forbade the archbishop to crown any one king of Lombardy without his consent. The pope designed to have proposed Boson to this assembly, who had lately assumed the title of king of Arles, or Provence, and who had a great party among the Italian nobles: however, as Anspert the archbishop of Milan had refused to appear at the assembly, nothing was concluded upon; and as Charles, king of Almain, and Lewis, king of Germany, both wrote to the pope, requesting the imperial dignity, he gave soothing answers to each, and sought only an opportunity of delaying the election, in hopes that, as they were at variance with each other, Boson might have an opportunity of coming into Italy. In the mean time, Lewis, king of Germany, had taken possession of Bavaria, which was ceded to him by his brother Carloman, who had some time before been seized with a palsy. Charles, king of Almain, as he was also

<sup>h</sup> SIGON ubi supra.
21. l. 3. ap. DACH.
ad an. 878.

<sup>1</sup> JOAN. Epist. 73, 84, 86, 87, 88, & 89.
<sup>m</sup> BARON. ad an. 878.
<sup>q</sup> JOAN. Epist. 155.

<sup>k</sup> AIMON. l. v. c. 57.
<sup>o</sup> SIGON. l. v. p. 135.

<sup>l</sup> JOAN. Epist.
<sup>n</sup> BARON.

a brother to Carloman, pretended to a part in this succession; but as he had not forces sufficient to make good his right, and was more intent upon obtaining the kingdom of Italy, with the title of emperor, he dropped his pretensions to Bavaria for the present; and resolving to prevent his competitor Boson from entering Italy, he made an alliance with the two young kings of France, and declared war against him, for his invasion of Burgundy.

Boson being thus engaged in defending his new kingdom against Charles and the kings of France, had not leisure to think of the affairs of Italy; and the pope, now expecting no assistance from him against the ambitious nobles and Saracens, wrote to Carloman, Lewis, and Charles, separately, inviting them to come to Italy, to assist him against the Saracens. Carloman had then lost the use of his body, and died in the beginning of the following year: Lewis, who had got possession of his kingdom of Bavaria, durst not leave Germany, lest Arnoul, or Arnolf, Carloman's natural son, should invade that kingdom, to which he made pretensions, tho' his father had only left him Tyrol and Carinthia<sup>r</sup>. Charles of Almain finding the other competitors engaged, entered Italy with an army, at which the pope seemed to be greatly alarmed, but after a conference held with him in his camp, in which Charles promised to grant extraordinary privileges to the holy see, he promised to crown him emperor, and returned to Rome, in expectation of his arrival. But Lewis king of Germany proposing an accommodation, Charles, instead of marching to Rome, repassed the Alps, and, in a conference with his brother, it was agreed that Lewis should have Bavaria and Sclavonia, and Charles should have Italy and Almain. During these contests about the succession to the empire, Italy was greatly harassed by the Saracens, many of the nobles having made alliances with them, to preserve themselves in the possession of their usurped power. The chief of those that entered into this alliance were Pulcherius governor of Amalfi, and Athanasius bishop of Naples, who, three years before, had put out the eyes of his brother Sergius for the same crime. Athanasius, not contented with the spiritual power in his bishoprick, had likewise invaded the civil authority, in which, by his alliance with the infidels, he supported himself, and greatly oppressed the subjects. The pope finding that his intreaties had no influence with the nobles to abandon the alliance of the Infidels, in the beginning of the following year wrote them a letter, threatening them with excommunication, if they continued that alliance after Christmas<sup>s</sup>.

d This year, according to Sigonius<sup>t</sup>, Charles came again into Italy, and, in an assembly of the nobles, was crowned king by the archbishop of Milan, soon after which he repassed the Alps, and went to the assistance of his brother Lewis and the kings of France, who were then besieging Vienne, which held for Boson. The siege of this place continuing longer than was expected, and Charles being afraid lest the Greek emperor should renew his pretensions to Italy, he quitted Vienne, and again marched for that kingdom. In the mean time the pope, having called an assembly of the bishops at Rome, in the month of March excommunicated Athanasius bishop of Naples, who, having refused to quit his alliance with the Infidels, had, together with them, ravaged Benevento, Capua, and Salerno, plundering and burning many monasteries and churches<sup>u</sup>. Charles, after having been delayed on his march by sickness, at last arrived at Rome, where he was received with great respect by the nobles, and on Christmas-day crowned emperor by the pope<sup>v</sup>. After his coronation, Charles continued two months at Rome<sup>x</sup>, consulting with the pope for the security of Italy, and, about the beginning of March, he left Rome and went for Lombardy. When he arrived at Ravenna he was met by the Venetian ambassadors, with whom he renewed the treaty of peace for five years, and agreed, in conjunction with them, to fit out a fleet against the Dalmatian pirates, who not only infested the Adriatic sea, but made descents upon the coasts. Upon the news of the emperor's departure from Rome, the Saracens immediately invaded the Roman territories, which invasion alarming the pope, he wrote several letters to Charles, intreating him to return to his assistance<sup>y</sup>. He sent an embassy to him likewise, with a present of the holy palm, observing to him, that, to merit it, he ought to return to the defence of the church, and shew the barbarians that Rome had an emperor; but Charles being intent upon repassing the Alps, continued his journey to Lombardy, and sent only a small body of troops to the pope. Rome at this time was not only in danger from the Saracens, but its territory was ravaged by Vido, duke or marquis of Spoleto, who, at Narni, caused the hands of 83 men to be cut off<sup>z</sup>, but for what reason is not mentioned. These barbarities, and the continual dangers to which he was exposed, made the pope again resolve to quit Italy, and retire to France; but this resolution was not executed, for he died at Rome the December following.

WHILE Charles was in Italy, his only brother Lewis king of Germany died without issue, by whose death Bavaria, Sclavonia, oriental France, and the two Lorrains, fell to the em-

<sup>r</sup> SIGON. l. v. p. 136.

<sup>s</sup> JOAN. Epist. 127.

<sup>t</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>u</sup> LEO Ostiens. l. i.

c. 42. <sup>v</sup> AIMON. l. v. c. 60. prope finem.

<sup>x</sup> Annales Bertin.

<sup>y</sup> JOAN. Epist. 269. 277.

279. 293. <sup>z</sup> JOAN. Epist. 299.

Charles succeeds to the kingdom of Germany.

A. D. 883.
Italy disturbed by the ambition of the nobles.

884.

Charles returns to Italy, and soon after succeeds to the crown of France.

The Saracens plunder Campania, and burn the monastery of St. Benedict.

The emperor's authority declines in Italy.

885.

peror; but as he was not present to defend them, the Normans, who had for several years before been ravaging the maritime provinces of France and Germany, hearing of the death of Lewis, immediately marched into his dominions, and having burnt Triers, besieged Metz, which they made themselves masters of. Charles returning from Italy, marched against them with a great army, and besieged them, some authors say in Metz, but others say in Haslou; but the Normans making a vigorous defence, a peace was agreed to on very dishonourable terms to the emperor, who consented to pay to one of the Norman princes 4,160 marks of silver, the other, who chose to turn Christian being put in possession of the principality of Friseland, and marrying Giselle, the natural daughter of Lotharius. Upon the death of pope John, the faction of the counts of Tuscany used their utmost endeavours to elect a successor in their interest, and accordingly chose Marinus Galefianus, commonly called Martin II. who was consecrated on the 25th of December, and immediately after restored Formosus bishop of Porto, and the rest who had been excommunicated by his predecessor. Notwithstanding the unity of the nobles with the pope, the state of Italy was now worse than ever, the great men renouncing all authority, and every one claiming to be sovereign in his own territories, the whole kingdom was harrassed by their ambition. The emperor, to remedy these disorders, came into Italy after Easter, and was met by the pope at Verona, from whence, on the 10th of May he went to Mantua. The duke of Spoletto at this time being accused of treason against the emperor, and refusing to appear, Charles ordered Berengarius duke of Friuli to seize his duchy, which order Berengarius endeavoured to put in execution, but was prevented by an epidemical sickness that seized his forces. Charles himself having been seized with a languishing distemper, and believing himself relieved by the assistance of St. Alexander, he went and visited his church at Bergamo, upon which he conferred many privileges, and spending the month of October at Pavia, he returned afterwards to Germany, to oppose the incursions of the Moravians. Pope Martin did not long survive the departure of the emperor, but dying on the 16th of January, three days after Agapetus was chosen in his stead, by the same faction of the nobles, and took the name of Adrian III.

CHARLES, hearing of the death of the pope, returned the beginning of the year to Italy, to have a conference with his successor Adrian, and to quell the insolence of the duke of Spoletto, who had joined the Saracens, and committed horrid ravages all over Italy. Upon the arrival of the emperor, with an army of Bavarians, the duke of Spoletto thought proper to submit, and went and threw himself at Charles's feet. Upon giving hostages for his future fidelity, and renewing his oath of allegiance, he was pardoned by Charles, who soon after repassed the Alps, being informed of the death of Carloman king of France, who had succeeded his brother Lewis two years before. The Normans, by the death of Carloman, thinking themselves absolved from the peace which they had sworn to with the French some months before, again invaded France, claiming the same sum from the successor of Carloman, which they had received from himself. The French, alarmed at their invasion, made an offer of their crown to the emperor, who received their allegiance at Gondreville, and thus united in his person all the dominions of his predecessor Charlemagne; but the height of his elevation served only to shew the narrowness of his talents, and; far from becoming more powerful by the enlargement of his dominions, he from that time declined in authority, and at last became quite contemptible.

WHILE the emperor was engaged in settling the affairs of his new kingdom, and opposing the Normans, Italy was desolated by the continual ravages of the Saracens, who, in the beginning of September, plundered and burnt the rich monastery of St. Benedict, on mount Cassino, and about a month afterwards attacked the lower monastery, which they likewise burnt, and slew Bertarius the abbot, after which they returned to their fort on the Garigliano, loaded with booty<sup>a</sup>. The Italian nobles, who had long despised the kings of the Carlovin-gian race, upon account of their mutual dissensions, and want of power, now began to think of throwing off a foreign yoke; and, as the emperor had no issue, they determined, after his death, to retain the imperial dignity in their own kingdom, hoping thereby to be in a condition of repelling the insults of their enemies: they therefore went to pope Adrian, and requesting him to join with them in asserting the independency of Italy, they obtained of him the two following decrees, "That the popes, after their election, might be consecrated without waiting for the presence of the king or his ambassadors; and that, if Charles died without sons, the kingdom of Italy, with the title of emperor, should be conferred on some one of the Italian nobles<sup>b</sup>." The emperor, being informed of these proceedings of the Italian nobles, came into Italy, and complained to the pope of the two decrees above-mentioned; but, notwithstanding his remonstrances, he could not obtain a revocation of them; and as the Normans had made an irruption into France, and were besieging Paris, he repassed a the Alps, in order to relieve that city, and upon his return to Germany sent an army under Henry duke of Saxony against the Normans. The following year Aio prince of Benevento, being informed of the death of Basil, emperor of Constantinople, renounced his allegiance to the Greeks, and caused himself to be acknowledged sovereign in his dukedom. Leo the successor of Basil, hearing of this revolt of the Beneventans, sent an army into Italy, which was defeated by Aio, and obliged to quit Italy.<sup>c</sup>

<sup>a</sup> LEO Ostiens. l. i. 45. SIGON. l. v. p. 138.

<sup>b</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

A. D. 886.
The duke of Benevento renounces his allegiance to the Greek emperor.

In the mean time Charles was employed against the Normans, who still continued to besiege Paris; as he found himself unable to force them to raise the siege, he consented to an ignominious treaty, by which he intirely ruined himself in the esteem of his subjects; for on his return to Germany he was deposed in a dyet held at Tribur, in November, and Arnoul, or Arnold, and by some Arnolph, natural son of Carloman king of Bavaria, was chosen in his room king of Germany. This reverse of fortune had such an effect upon Charles, who was then in a bad state of health, that he died on the 14th of January following, and in him ended the race of Carlovingian kings, who had been sovereigns of Italy upwards of 100 years. As they generally resided in France or Germany, Italy was accounted by them rather as an appendix to their other dominions, than as a sovereign kingdom of itself; so that the historians who wrote the account of the reigns of those princes are very silent with regard to the transactions of this kingdom; and had it not been for the authors who treat of ecclesiastical matters, the affairs of Italy, after the subversion of the Roman empire, would have lain under as much obscurity as those of the most barbarous nations of Europe.

Charles is deposed in a dyet held at Tribur, and dies soon after.

Arnolphus succeeds to the crown of Germany.
888.

c Upon the death of Charles, the French chose Eudes count of Paris and Orleans for their king, and Lewis the son of Boson obtained the kingdom of Provence; but the fate of Italy remained for some time uncertain. The nobles of this kingdom, at this time most eminent for wealth and power were Berengarius duke of Friuli, who by his mother was great grandson of Charlemagne, and Guido, or Vido, duke of Spoleto, who was the son of duke Lambert and a daughter of Pepin king of Italy, and son of Charlemagne.<sup>d</sup> These two nobles even while Charles was alive, had entered into a secret treaty, that, if he died without children, Vido should seize upon the kingdom of France, and Berengarius upon that of Italy. Immediately after the death of the emperor, Berengarius succeeded to the crown of Italy, without dispute, and Vido, with the concurrence of the pope, went to take possession of the kingdom of France.<sup>e</sup> But the French having chosen Eudes, or Otho, count of Paris, for their king, Guido returned disappointed into Italy. In the mean time Berengarius, attended by many of the nobles and bishops, went to Pavia, where he was crowned by Anselm archbishop of Milan, and making that city the place of his residence, he began his reign with granting privileges to the cities, monasteries, and churches. While Berengarius and Eudes were establishing themselves in their new kingdoms, Raul, or Rodolphus, son of Conrad count of Paris, who was grandson of Conrad, brother of the empress Judith, and wife of Charles the Bald,<sup>f</sup> seized upon Burgundy transjurane, which comprehends what at present is called Switzerland, and caused himself to be acknowledged king.

Eudes is chosen king of France.

Berengarius is crowned king of Italy.

In the mean time Guido, or Guy, duke of Spoleto, being disappointed in his designs upon France, began to form pretensions upon the kingdom of Italy; and having got the pope and the nobles of Rome to favour his interest, towards the end of the year he was declared by his faction king of Italy, which kingdom, by his ambition, was thus divided into two opposite parties, who persecuted each other with the utmost hatred and malice. Though the cause of Berengarius was the most just, yet Guido being countenanced by the pope, his party quickly became the strongest, which Guido perceiving, he assembled an army, and marched against Berengarius, who had likewise raised an army for his own defence, and had marched to the river Trebia, to oppose his competitor. The two armies engaged on the banks of that river, and after a desperate engagement, Berengarius was entirely defeated, and obliged to retire with the remains of his army. Two months afterwards, Berengarius having assembled another army, again marched against his enemy, whom he engaged at Bressa, but was so entirely defeated, that he was obliged to retire into Germany, and beg the assistance of Arnolphus. Upon the departure of Berengarius, Guido went to Pavia, and the year following reduced all Lombardy without much opposition. Having now obtained possession of the kingdom of Italy, he went to Rome, and was crowned emperor by pope Stephen, on the 19th of February. Guido, that he might shew himself grateful to the pope, confirmed the grants of Pepin and Charlemagne in favour of the holy see, and, upon his return to Pavia, held an assembly of the states, where he enacted several laws against robbers and disturbers of the public peace. Berengarius, who had fled into Germany, solicited assistance from Arnolphus, and promised to hold his kingdom from him, if he should be enabled, by his assistance, to recover it. Arnolphus, whose ambition aimed at the imperial dignity, accepted of this con-

Vido duke of Spoleto pretends to the kingdom of Italy.
889.

Berengarius is defeated by Vido, and obliged to retire into Germany.
890.

<sup>c</sup> Idem. ibid.

<sup>d</sup> Annal. Fuldens.

de France, M. de S. AUBIN. p. 202.

<sup>e</sup> SIGON. l. vi. p. 140.

<sup>f</sup> Antiq. de la Maison

Arnolphus
sends an army into Italy against Vido, but without success.

dition, and accordingly sent his son Zuentibold, with an army into Italy, who marched directly to besiege Pavia; but Guido having fortified the bank of the river Vervar, which runs near the town, and placed his troops in the fortifications, Zuentibold could not attack the town before he had engaged the enemy<sup>a</sup>. Notwithstanding these precautions, the army of Guido was soon reduced to great difficulties; for the inhabitants of the country, favouring the cause of Berengarius, carried all their provisions to the German camp, so that the Italians were quickly in great want of provisions and forage: but the armies continuing on both sides of the river without action, Guido at length corrupted Zuentibold with a large sum of money, and prevailed upon him to return with his army to Germany. Guido having now freed himself from the German arms, associated his son Lambert with him in the empire.

The Saracens
invade the northern parts of Italy.

WHILE Guido was engaged in defending his kingdom against Berengarius, the Saracens from Spain landing in the head of Italy, took possession of a castle near the Alps, which they held for many years afterwards, to the great damage of the neighbouring country, which they ravaged by their frequent incursions. During these disturbances in the northern parts of Italy,

Arnolphus
marches in person into Italy.
A. D. 893.

Aio was besieged in Benevento by Symbaticius, general of the Greek emperor, who, after a siege of three months, made himself master of the place, which now returned under subjection to the Greeks, after having been governed 130 years by Lombard dukes. Berengarius, who had retired with Zuentibold's army into Germany, after continuing a year and a half in that kingdom, at last prevailed with Arnolphus to march in person into Italy, against Guido; accordingly, an army being assembled, Arnolphus, taking Berengarius along with him, marched into Italy, and arrived at Verona about the middle of November; from Verona, in the beginning

But returns suddenly against Rodol-phus king of Burgundy.

of the year, he marched to Bergamo, which, trusting to the strength of its fortifications, shut its gates against him. Arnolphus, before he proceeded further, resolved to make himself master of Bergamo; accordingly, laying siege to the place, he took it soon after, and, as a terror to the other cities, he caused Ambrose the governor to be hanged before the walls. Upon the news of this severity, the inhabitants of Milan, Pavia, and Placenza, sent immediately and submitted to him. Arnolphus sent Otho the Saxon, the grandfather of Otho the great, to take possession of Milan, and marched himself for Pavia, where he replaced Berengarius, and afterwards pursued Guido, who had fled with his wife towards Spoletto: when he came to Placenza he stopped his pursuit, and repassed the Alps with his army against Rodolphus king of

Lambert succeeds his father Guido, and obliges Berengarius to leave Pavia.

Burgundy. Guido, being informed of the departure of Arnolphus, hastened back into Lombardy, but, when he came to Placenza, he was seized with a vomiting of blood, of which he immediately died. Berengarius, who was then at Verona with an army, hearing of the death of Guido, immediately returned to Pavia, and took possession of the government without a rival. But the nobles who had favoured the cause of Guido, despairing of being pardoned by Berengarius, continued still to oppose his government, and promised their assistance to Lambert, Guido's son, if he would claim the kingdom. Lambert, being excited by his mother Ageltrude, accepted of their offer, and assembling an army marched against Berengarius, who being deserted by most of his friends, quitted Pavia, and returned to Verona, leaving the kingdom to Lambert, without making any opposition. Berengarius being now unable to make disturbance, Lambert left Pavia and went to Rome, which at this time was disturbed by

The pope offers the empire to Arnolphus
king of Germany;

the ambition of Sergius, who, in revenge for the preference that was given to Formosus at the last election, continued to molest his government, in which he was assisted by many of the nobles, and especially by Adelbert count of Tuscany. Lambert, when he came to Rome, even joined the faction of Sergius, though he had been crowned by Formosus. This behaviour of Lambert alarmed the pope, who wrote letters to Arnolphus, offering him the crown, provided he would come with an army into Italy to oppose the insolence and tyranny of Lambert. Arnolphus willingly embracing this opportunity of satisfying his ambition, in the month of October, marched with an army into Italy, which, after he had passed the Po, he divided into two bodies, ordering the one to march by Bologna to Florence, the other he led himself by the sea-coast to P'Erice, where he kept his Christmas: marching afterwards to 896.

Rome, he encamped before that part of the city called Leonine, from Leo IV. who inclosed it with a wall against the invasions of the Saracens. Ageltrude, who had been left by Lambert to take care of the city, upon the approach of the Germans had fled to the dukedom of Spoletto; however, the Romans trusting to their own strength, refused to open their gates to Arnolphus, who thereupon resolved to get admittance by force, and immediately besieged the city. While these things were doing, Berengarius, who now perceived that Arnolphus was acting more for his own interest than to serve him, quitted the German camp. In the beginning of the siege the Romans made a pretty vigorous defence, but by a particular accident the Germans made themselves masters of the city without any resistance; for a hare starting,

who besieges and takes
Rome;

the Germans made themselves masters of the city without any resistance; for a hare starting,

<sup>a</sup> and running towards the city, as they were marching to the attack, the whole army raised a shout and ran after it. The Romans, not seeing the hare, but observing the enemy running at such a pace, were struck with a panic, and abandoned the walls; which being perceived by the Germans, they quickly filled up the foss, and breaking open the gates, got possession of the city <sup>b</sup>, and obliged those who were beyond the Tiber to surrender. Arnolphus, being now master of Rome, expelled Sergius, and slew all those of his faction who had opposed him; Sigonius says, that he neither spared women, children, priests, nor nuns.

Formosus, being thus delivered from the faction that oppressed him by the king of Germany, received him with great respect, and leading him to the confession of the apostles, crowned him emperor, giving him the titles of Cæsar and Augustus. After this ceremony, Arnolphus received the allegiance of the Romans, and leaving Farold, one of his officers, governor of the city, he marched to Camers against Ageltrude, who, finding herself unable to defeat her enemy by force, had recourse to deceit, and, by great presents, prevailed with a certain officer, an intimate of the emperor, to give him a potion, which, she told the officer, when she presented it to him, was quite innocent, and only tended to cause him to abate his resentment against her. The officer accordingly took an opportunity of administering the potion to the emperor, which he had no sooner drank than he was seized with a lethargic sleep, which continued for three days. When he awaked he did not recover the power of speech, and seemed also to have lost his understanding; so that his friends found it necessary to raise the siege, and continue their march to Lombardy. When they arrived at the mountain Bardo, the emperor began to recover the use of his faculties, and formed a design of seizing the kingdom of Italy, and putting out the eyes of Berengarius, who had been pardoned by him, and again returned to his camp. Berengarius, being informed of this design of the emperor, immediately left him, and fled to Verona, where he published the intended treachery; which so irritated the Italians, that, when the Germans came to Pavia, the inhabitants rose in the night, and killed great numbers of them. Arnolphus, finding himself odious to the Italians, made all haste into Germany; but, not daring to march by Verona, where Berengarius had assembled some troops, he took the road of Milan, and repassed the Alps at Montijoux.

<sup>c</sup> Soon after the emperor had returned to Germany, Formosus died at Rome, which city was thrown into the utmost confusion by his successors in the papal dignity. Boniface VI. who was his immediate successor, died fifteen days after his election, and was succeeded by Stephen VII. who was elected by the Sergian faction, to gratify whom he began his pontificate with judging his predecessor Formosus, whose body he caused to be dug out of the grave, and stripping it of the pontifical habit, ordered it to be thrown into the Tiber. Not contented with this revenge, he annulled all his acts, declaring Lambert emperor, and the ordination of all those ordained by Formosus to be void. Stephen is said by some to have enjoyed the papal dignity three years<sup>i</sup>; but others say, that, after he sat one year, he was thrown into prison, and strangled<sup>k</sup>, and was succeeded by Romanus, who reversed all his decrees, and caused the body of Formosus, which had been thrown up by the tide, to be buried in the Vatican church. Romanus, after five months, was succeeded by Theodore II. who died a few days after his election. Upon his death, the Sergian faction again endeavoured to elect Sergius, but the other party prevailed, and chose John IX. who, the following year, called a council at Ravenna, whither he invited the emperor Lambert. The council consisted of 74 bishops, and the pope and Lambert being present, they annulled the coronation of Arnolphus, and prohibited Sergius or his excommunicated associates to be restored: they likewise annulled the former decree of Adrian, and ordained, that the elected popes should not be consecrated but in the presence of the emperor or his ambassadors.

<sup>d</sup> During these transactions at Rome and Ravenna, Berengarius continued at Friuli, and was not without hopes of recovering the kingdom; for the Italian nobles hating the arbitrary government of Lambert, began to think of restoring Berengarius; and Mangifroy, count of Milan, not only opposed Lambert in that province, but also made irruptions into the territories subject to him. Adelbert, count of Tuscany, who was at that time by far the richest man in Italy, being joined by count Hildebrand, likewise declared against Lambert, and began secretly to raise troops. Lambert, who had seized and executed Mangifroy, thought thereby to deter the rest from favouring Berengarius; but as he was hunting in the forest of Marin, he was informed of the revolt of Adelbert and Hildebrand. Having intelligence where they were encamped, he took with him 100 men, and falling upon them at night, they immediately dispersed; but Adelbert and several other nobles were taken prisoners, and conducted to Pavia, there to be tried. But Lambert, being soon after engaged in hunting, and, upon account of fatigue, reposing himself under a tree, was slain by Hugo, the

and is crowned emperor by Formosus.

who dies soon after, where- by Rome is thrown into the greatest confusion.

The Italian nobles again favour Berengarius; A. D. 898.

<sup>b</sup> LUITPRAND, l. i. c. 8. SIGON. l. vi. p. 143. Epita. Stephani.

<sup>i</sup> BARON. in. vit. Serg.

<sup>k</sup> SIGON. l. vi. p. 144.

son of the count of Milan, who was then the only person attending him. Upon the news of the death of Lambert, Berengarius immediately quitted Verona, and came to Pavia; and having set Adelbert and the other prisoners at liberty, applied himself to the establishment of his government. But many of those who had hitherto opposed Berengarius, were not reconciled to him, even by the death of Lambert; but, desirous of setting up a competitor, and finding none whom they approved of in Italy, they sent a message to Lewis, the son of Boson, and king of Arles, offering him their kingdom, provided he would expel Berengarius. The author and chief of this conspiracy was Adelbert marquis of Ivrea, who had married a daughter of Berengarius, by whom he had a son of the same name. Lewis made no scruple of accepting the offered kingdom, but raised an army as soon as possible, for taking possession of what he reckoned his inheritance, in right of his grandfather Lewis II. Berengarius, in the mean time, was not idle in making preparations to oppose him; he went to Adelbert, count of Tuscany, and representing to him the detestable nature of the conspiracy, prevailed with him to give his utmost assistance in opposing the foreign invasion. Accordingly, the following year, when Lewis had entered Italy with an army, Berengarius, being joined with the count of Tuscany, and the nobles who were influenced by him, opposed his competitor by an army much stronger than his, and surrounded him in such a manner, that it was impossible for him to escape, so that he was obliged to sue for peace, and leave to retire, which was granted to him, upon his swearing never again to enter Italy, although he should be invited to be crowned emperor.

A. D. 899.

who is forced to renounce his claim upon oath.

Atenulphus seizes upon the dukedom of Benevento.

900.

Lewis is again invited into Italy;

and is crowned king of Italy at Pavia.
A. D. 901.

The Hunns enter Italy with an army.

Lewis obliges
Berengarius to fly into Bavaria.
A. D. 902.

WHILE Berengarius was thus engaged in opposing the king of Arles, Radelchis, prince of Benevento, was deposed by Atenulphus, Gastald of Capua, who seized his principality, which continued in his posterity for near 200 years. Soon after his taking possession of Benevento he raised an army, and went to attack the fort of the Saracens on the Garigliano, but, being surprized by them during the night, he was forced to retire to the river, with considerable loss; however, the next day, the fight being renewed, the Saracens were intirely defeated, and forced back into their town, and, for some time afterwards, did not venture to make any inroads into the country. In the end of this year died Arnolphus, king of Germany, and soon after, the states chose his son Lewis for their king; who, during his whole reign, had no concern with the affairs of Italy<sup>1</sup>.

In the mean time, the enemies of Berengarius used their utmost endeavours to recall Lewis, king of Arles; and his mother Hermengarde, finding that Berengarius was chiefly supported by the count of Tuscany, spared no pains to prevail with him to favour the interests of her son. Adelbert at last being influenced by means of his wife Bertha, abandoned the party of Berengarius, and the greatest part of Lombardy following his example, the crown of Italy was again offered to Lewis, who, having no regard to his oath, but being now sure of obtaining the kingdom of Italy, as he had now got the count of Tuscany on his side, immediately assembled a greater army than formerly, and marched towards Italy. He had no sooner passed the Alps, but he was joined by Adelbert and the greatest part of the nobles of Lombardy, which Berengarius being informed of, he did not think fit to hazard a battle, but quitted Pavia, and retired to Verona. Lewis, upon his arrival at Pavia, was received by the nobles and people with great demonstrations of joy, and being soon after crowned king of Italy, studied to secure the affections of the clergy, by granting privileges to several bishops; which means of conciliating the favour of the people was at this time likewise practised by Berengarius; for the charters granted by these princes, in the same year, to the bishops of Modena and Reggio, were extant six hundred years afterwards. The following year Lewis, attended by a great many nobles, went to Rome, where he received the imperial crown from pope Benedict IV. and having renewed the grant of former emperors to that church, he returned directly to Pavia. In the mean time the Hunns, who, three years before, had defeated the Germans near Augsburg, and had over-run Bavaria, Suabia, Franconia, and Saxony, pillaging and burning where-ever they went, invaded Italy with a considerable army, and encamped upon the Brenta near Padua, from whence they sent several spies to examine the populousness and fertility of the country. They reporting, that the country was exceeding rich, but very full of people, the Hunns quickly decamped, and marched back into their own country, to make greater preparations against the next year<sup>m</sup>.

Lewis, not being alarmed at the incursions of this new and unknown enemy, was wholly intent upon expelling his rival Berengarius, and for that purpose, in the beginning of autumn, marched with his army towards Verona, which Berengarius being informed of, he fled immediately into Bavaria, to wait for a more favourable opportunity of asserting his right. Having provided for the security of Verona, Lewis returned to Pavia, and the following year made a progress into Tuscany, and visited the count at Lucca. Being surprized

<sup>1</sup> See on. ubi supra.<sup>m</sup> Idem ibid.

- a at the magnificence of his entertainment, and the numerous and splendid retinue of Adelbert, he made the following reflection to one of his friends, "That Adelbert might rather be called a king than a count, for he seemed inferior to himself in nothing but the title." This expression coming to the ears of Bertba, she told her husband, who, from that moment, became his enemy, and favoured the interest of Berengarius. Lewis, having finished his progress through the kingdom, returned to Verona, and, by the advice of Adelard, the bishop, dismissed his army. Berengarius, who was watching every opportunity of recovering his kingdom, being informed that Lewis had disbanded his army, left Bavaria in the end of July, and came privately to Verona. Having corrupted the guards, he entered the city in the night-time, and being joined by a few of his friends, he passed the river Athesis, which runs through the town, and towards break of day attacked the palace, which was seated on a hill. Lewis finding himself thus surprized, fled for sanctuary to a church; but being observed by one of the soldiers of Berengarius, he was immediately seized, and his eyes put out<sup>n</sup>.

Berengarius surprizes

Lewis at Verona, and orders his eyes to be put out.

- BERENGARIUS*, having thus forced his rival to abdicate the throne, returned to Pavia, and took possession of his kingdom, which he governed for twenty years afterwards, without any opposition from his subjects, who now began to be sensible from the effects, how great calamity their country was exposed to by their civil discords. Berengarius had hardly got possession of his kingdom, when he was alarmed with an irruption of the Hungarians, who, with a numerous army, entered Italy by Friuli, and, passing Aquileia and Verona, marched towards Como and Bergamo, and having plundered and burnt the country as they passed, they directed their route for Pavia. Berengarius, having alarmed his whole kingdom, drew together an immense army, which terrified the Hungarians so, that they immediately resolved upon a retreat; but having lost a great many men in passing the Adda, they sent to Berengarius, offering to deliver up all their booty, and never again to enter Italy, provided they were allowed a safe retreat. The Italians disdain to grant them any terms, the Hungarians were driven to despair, and attacking their enemy, defeated them with great slaughter. After this victory, the Hungarians again over-run the country, and plundered Treviso, Vicenza, and Padua, without resistance, the inhabitants every where flying into the fortified towns for safety. During the winter, the barbarians made some unsuccessful attempts upon the islands of the Venetians, but in the spring, again over-ran the continent of Italy, plundering and destroying every place that was not fortified.

The Hunns invade Italy, and defeat Berengarius;

- BERENGARIUS* at last having prevailed with the barbarians to leave Italy, by paying them a large sum of money, applied himself the following year to repair the devastations which they had committed, as appears by the charters granted to him by some churches. This year died pope Benedict, who was succeeded by Leo V. a person of an abandoned character, but nevertheless acceptable to the prevailing faction of the Romans, who were governed by Theodora the concubine, and, by some authors, the wife of Adelbert, count of Tuscany, then in possession of the strong castle of St. Angelo, and who had prostituted herself and her two daughters to several of the popes<sup>o</sup>. Leo, forty days after his election, was seized by Christopher, who, forcing him to abdicate his dignity, caused himself to be declared pope without any election. Sergius, who twice before attempted to obtain the papal dignity, imitating the example of Christopher, seized upon him, with the connivance of the count of Tuscany, and forcing him to become a monk, declared himself his successor<sup>p</sup>. The transactions of Italy, during the rest of the reign of Berengarius, lie under very great obscurity. The following year the Hungarians invaded Friuli, and met with no resistance, the Italians being afraid to meet them in the field. They were scarcely gone, when the Saracens, who had settled at the foot of the Alps, made an irruption as far as Acqui, in the neighbourhood of Pavia, while the inhabitants, instead of opposing them, fled for security to some forts that had been erected in the country during the first irruption of the Hungarians. While the Saracens, from the Alps, invaded Apulia and Calabria, the emperor Leo not daring to resent the affront, Berengarius, in the mean time, employed himself in providing for the future security of his kingdom, and in causing the churches and monasteries to be rebuilt that had been burnt by the Hungarians.

who is obliged to purchase their departure by a large sum of money.

A. D. 904. Orders the devastations which they had committed to be repaired.

A. D. 905. The Hunns again invade Italy, which, at the same time, is infested by the Saracens.

POPE Sergius dying soon after, Anastasius IV. was chosen in his room, from whom Berengarius requested some privileges for the bishop of Pavia. As he could not procure the metropolitan dignity for that church, he obtained leave for the bishop of using an umbrella, of riding on a white horse, of having the cross carried before him, and of sitting on the left hand of the pope at a council. At the request likewise of the bishop of Padua, he ordered that church, which had been burnt by the Hunns, to be rebuilt, and conferred upon it a new charter, which is dated in the 25th year of his reign. This same year Anastasius dying,

A. D. 912.

<sup>n</sup> LUITPR. l. ii.

<sup>o</sup> BARON. an. in. vit. Christophori.

<sup>p</sup> SIGON. l. vi. p. 151.

John X. is elected to the papal dignity
by means of Theodora.

was succeeded by Lando, who survived his predecessor only a few months, and was succeeded a by John X. who was not chosen according to the canons, but intruded by the power of Adelbert, count of Tuscany, at the solicitations of Theodora. This most impudent and most powerful whore, says Luitprand<sup>a</sup>, having an intrigue with John, presbyter of Ravenna, caused him to be elected bishop of Bologna, and the archbishop of Ravenna dying soon after, she procured that archbishoprick for him. But, not contented with having him 200 miles distant from her, she took an opportunity, at the death of Lando, of obtruding him into the papal dignity.

He forms an alliance against the Saracens,

who are intirely extirpated by the allies.

Berengarius is crowned im-peror by the pope.

A. D. 915.
Adelbert, count of Tuf-
cany dies, and is succeeded by his son Vido;
who forms a conspiracy against the emperor. 917.

A new conspiracy is formed by the marquis of Ivrea.

Lambert
archbishop of Milan joins the conspirators.

921.

John having now arrived at the highest preferment, applied himself to regulate the affairs of the church, and provide for the security of Italy against the Saracens, who daily infested the Roman territories. While he was considering of the means of effecting this, one of the b Saracens, who had received an injury from his countrymen, fled to Rome, and offered to deliver the Romans from their incursions, if the pope would allow him a small body of men.
His proposal being hearkened to, 60 young men were chosen, and completely armed, who, being conducted by the Saracen into bye paths, attacked the Infidels as they were returning from their inroads, and several times defeated great parties of them. These losses affecting the Saracens, a general alliance was concluded among all their cities; and the fortified town on the Garigliano being judged the strongest, they abandoned the rest and repaired thither.
In consequence of this alliance, the Saracens became more formidable than before; which alarmed the pope, he consulted with Atenulphus, prince of Benevento and Capua, and sent ambassadors to Constantine, the Greek emperor, and to the Spoletans, and the inhabitants of c Camers, inviting them to an alliance against the Saracens. The Greek emperor, influenced by the activity of the pope, the year following sent Nicholas, the patrician, with a great body of Greeks, who being joined by the Capuans, Beneventans, and Salernitans, encamped near the Garigliano, while John, with the count Adelbert, the Spoletans, and the inhabitants of Camerino, besieged the place on the other side. The Saracens supported the siege for three months with great vigour; but, at last, being put to great distress for want of provisions, they set fire to the town, and sallied out to the neighbouring woods and mountains. The Italians pursuing them, forced them to an engagement, in which they were all cut off to a man. Some authors make no mention of a siege, but relate, that the Saracens, being defeated by the Italians, fled to a mountain near the Garigliano, which was immediately beset d by their enemy, who, by continual skirmishes with the Infidels, entirely extirpated them.
This victory was of so great importance to Italy, that the historians of those times say, that the apostles Peter and Paul appeared fighting for the Christians.

THERE is no mention of any assistance that Berengarius gave in this expedition, but it is more than probable, that he was greatly concerned, for, by charters granted by him, it is evident, that this year he obtained the imperial crown from the pope. The year following, being at Pavia, he granted new privileges to the church of Cremona, which had suffered greatly by the Hunns; and Adelbert, count of Tuscany, dying soon after, he confirmed his son Vido in the possession of his estates. Bertha, his mother, who had been greatly ambitious of the imperial dignity for her husband, now attempted the same in favour of her son, e and began to cabal against the emperor. Berengarius being informed of her secret practices, marched with an army into Tuscany, and taking her and her son prisoners, conducted them, under a guard, to Mantua; but, not being able to reduce any of the cities belonging to the count, he was reconciled to his two prisoners, and set them both at liberty. Bertha, in revenge for her imprisonment, formed a new conspiracy against Berengarius, which broke out a few years afterwards. The chief of the conspirators was Adelbert, marquis of Ivrea, who had formerly married the emperor's daughter, but, she being dead, he had now contracted an alliance with the count of Tuscany, by marrying his sister. He was joined in the conspiracy by Olderick, count of the palace, and another count, named Gilbert, and many other Italian nobles; but, their treason being discovered, Olderick was seized, and commit- f ted to the keeping of one Lambert, who, a few months before, by the favour of Berenga- rius, had obtained the archbishoprick of Milan.

SOME days afterwards Berengarius, demanding Adelbert to cause him to be put to death, Lam- bert refused to deliver him up, alleging, that it was unbecoming his profession to be concerned in the death of any one, and, dreading the resentment of the emperor for this refusal, he dismissed Olderick, and joined the conspirators, who were then considering of a fit person to be set up in opposition to Berengarius. Having at last fixed upon Rodolphus, king of Burgundy, they sent an embassy to him, inviting him to come into Italy, promising to assist him in expelling Berengarius. For this purpose they held frequent conferences, and began to assemble some troops in the neighbourhood of Brescia. In the mean time, the Hungarians

<sup>a</sup> LUITPR. l. ii. c. 13.

<sup>f</sup> SIEON. l. vi. p. 153. LUITPR. l. ii. c. 14.

a made an irruption into Italy, and advanced as far as Verona, being probably invited by Berengarius, who had some time before made an alliance with them. At his desire they unexpectedly attacked the rebels near Brescia, killed Olderic, and took Albert and Gilbert prisoners. Albert escaped in disguise, but Gilbert they stripped almost naked, beat in a most cruel manner, and brought bound to the emperor. Berengarius, instead of punishing him as a traitor, ordered him to be dressed, and, telling him that he trusted to his honour for his future fidelity, generously dismissed him. This lenity of the emperor had but a very bad effect upon Gilbert, for he directly joined the rebels, and being sent by them to Rodolphus, conducted his army over the Alps, within thirty days after.

who are unexpectedly attacked by the Huns.

b RODOLPHUS had no sooner entered Italy, than he was joined by the forces of the rebels; and by their assistance, having obliged Berengarius to retire to Verona, he was soon after crowned at Pavia by Lambert. The Italians received him with great appearance of joy; but he had not enjoyed his new dignity many months, before parties began to be formed in favour of Berengarius, who now returned with an army to Placenza, to dispute the crown with his competitor. The two armies engaged in the neighbourhood of that city, and, after an obstinate dispute, victory inclined to favour Berengarius, when a party of the enemy, that had been in ambush, renewed the dispute with fresh vigour, and, after a great slaughter, defeated the emperor, and obliged him to fly to Verona. After this victory, Rodolphus returned to Pavia, and, having settled the affairs of Italy, and created his brother-in law, Boniface, marquis of Spoleto and Camers, for his great services in the late action, he went to visit his kingdom of Burgundy. The following year, which was the 36th of the reign of Berengarius, was likewise the last of his life; for the inhabitants of Verona, who had hitherto continued always faithful to him, began now to plot against him. The chief of the conspirators was one Flambert, whose son Berengarius, some time before, had received from the sacred font; and being now informed of the conspiracy, he sent for Flambert, and told him, that the many instances of friendship that had passed betwixt them would not let him believe, that he had conspired against him, especially when he considered, that his future preferment depended wholly upon his prosperity. At the same time he presented him with a golden cup, and desiring him to drink what was contained in it to his health, he made him a present of the cup itself, and told him, that, if he found him faithful, Flambert would find him grateful. Flambert, having made such an answer as freed the king from suspicion, immediately retired, and consulted with his associates how to cut him off the following night. Early next morning, Berengarius having entered the church for his devotions, in his usual manner, without any guards, the conspirators rushed in after him; and Berengarius inquiring into the cause of the tumult, Flambert called out to him not to be concerned, for these armed men were only for his defence: accordingly he trusted himself among them without suspicion, but was immediately killed by one of the traitors, by a blow on the back part of his neck. The conspirators did not long survive their treachery, but were apprehended the third day after, by Milo count of the city, who ordered them all to be hanged.

Rodolphus is crowned king of Italy;

A. D. 932. and defeats Berengarius near Placenza.

924. Berengarius is assassinated at Verona.

e BERENGARIUS being slain, and Rodolphus absent, the Hungarians resolved to improve this opportunity for invading Italy; and accordingly having entered Lombardy under their general Salardus, they took and plundered Mantua, Brescia, and Bergamo. Marching afterwards to Pavia, they invested it on every side, and, about the middle of March, taking advantage of the wind, they set fire to the houses next the walls, and, during the confusion, broke open the gates, and got possession of the place, where they committed all manner of barbarity. Having burnt the capital of the kingdom<sup>s</sup>, they marched from thence to Placenza, and burnt the monastery of St. Sextus, in the suburbs of that city, and being loaded with booty, returned to Pannonia. Rodolphus, hearing of the death of Berengarius, and the irruption of the Hungarians, made haste into Italy, and arriving at Verona to support his faction in that city, he confirmed the privileges granted by former kings to the church of Padua. The death of Berengarius, and the absence of Rodolphus, gave the Italians an occasion of a new conspiracy, which was encouraged by Ermengarde, the widow of the marquis of Ivrea, in hopes of raising one of her sons to the kingdom. As she was possessed of great wealth, she got a party of the nobles to favour her, and raising some troops the following year, surprised Pavia. Rodolphus, alarmed at these hostilities, retired to Verona, and, by the assistance of the archbishop Lambert, raised an army, with which he marched to recover the capital, and encamped within five miles of that city, at the confluence of the Po and Texino. During the continuance of the siege, Ermengarde, finding herself too weak to defend the place, privately made her peace with Rodolphus, and, by a deceitful message, prevailed with him to abandon his own army, and come into the town. The nobles of his army, alarmed at the flight of their general, retired to Milan, as a place of defence, being informed that Rodolphus was intending to attack them at the head of his new friends<sup>t</sup>.

The Hungarians invade Italy, and take Pavia.

925.

Rodolphus returns to Italy, but is obliged to quit Pavia on account of a conspiracy.

<sup>s</sup> SIGON. l. vi. p. 155.

<sup>t</sup> Idem. ibid.

Adelbert count of Tuscany invites the Hungarians into Italy against the pope.

A. D. 926.
The archbishop of Milan offers the crown of Italy to Hugh count of Arles.

WHILE Rodolphus, by his imprudent behaviour, thus disoblige those friends who had a hitherto supported him, Adelbert count of Tuscany, having had some dispute with the pope, was obliged to quit Rome, and thereupon retired to Orti in Tuscany, and invited the Hungarians into Italy, to revenge his quarrel against the Romans. The Hungarians accepted of his invitation; but, instead of attacking the Romans, they fell upon Tuscany, and carried off a great booty, and many young men and women captives into Hungary; while the Romans, in revenge for the injury intended them, attacked Orti, and slew Adelbert. The Italians having now almost wholly revolted from Rodolphus, the following year the archbishop of Milan, by the advice of the pope and many of the nobles, offered the crown of Italy to Hugh count of Arles, the grandson of Lotharius king of Lorraine, by his daughter Berta, who was married first to Lotharius count of Arles, and afterwards to Adelbert count of Tuscany. Hugh, b during the life of Berengarius, had made some unsuccessful attempts to obtain the kingdom of Italy; but now having an invitation from the greatest part of the nobles, he made no doubt of succeeding, and accordingly made great preparations for his expedition. Rodolphus, having discovered the designs of the Italians, went immediately to Burgundy, where he raised an army, and, being joined by Burchard duke of Suabia, his father-in-law, he returned to Italy, before Hugh was in condition to move with his forces. Having advanced as far as Ivrea, Rodolphus sent Burchard to Milan, to try the inclination of Lambert. Burchard, before he entered the city, turned aside to the church of St. Laurence, upon account of devotion; and having observed a place proper for building a castle, he said to those of his retinue, when riding round the walls, "I am not Burchard, if I do not make the Italians content to c "ride upon bad horses with one spur." Some Italians, who understood the German language, overhearing this speech, immediately informed Lambert, who dissembling his knowledge of it, received Burchard very courteously, but at the same time excited the inhabitants of Pavia and the Italian nobles to conspire his death. Accordingly, upon his return towards Ivrea, they set upon him at Novara, and having slain him, they attacked his attendants, and dragging them from the church of St. Gaudentius, put them all to death. Rodolphus being informed of the fate of Burchard, thought it in vain to attempt any thing farther, but retreated with his army to Burgundy.

Hugh arrives at Pisa, and is soon after crowned at Pavia.

He concludes an alliance with the king of Germany and the emperor of Constantinople.

927.

In the mean time Hugh, being afraid of the land forces of Rodolphus, came by sea into Italy, and landed at Pisa in the month of July, and went directly for Pavia, where he was d crowned by the archbishop of Milan. Soon after he went to Verona, and from thence to Mantua, where he entered into an alliance with the pope, and then returned to Pavia. During these transactions, Marozia the daughter of Theodora, and widow of Adelbert count of Tuscany, being in possession of the castle of St. Angelo, married Vido marquis of Tuscany, whom she excited against the pope, with whom she had for some time been at enmity. In the mean time Hugh was employed in securing the possession of his kingdom by foreign alliances, and the following year he concluded an alliance with Henry king of Germany, and procured the friendship of Romanus the Greek emperor by many valuable presents, some of which had like to have been fatal to that emperor; for two large mastiffs, when they were brought into his presence, being struck with the imperial ornaments, attacked Romanus, mistaking him for a e wild beast, and with great difficulty were prevented from tearing him to pieces. Hugh likewise made an alliance with Ursus doge of Venice, and renewed the privileges formerly granted to that republic: besides, he had the good fortune to quell a conspiracy of some malecontents, which threatened his life, and, by his prudent management in that first commotion, struck a terror into the rest of his subjects. There was one Valpertus in Pavia, a lawyer of great wealth and high reputation, who had procured the bishoprick of Como for his son, and married his daughter to Gilbert count of the palace. This man had prevailed with one Eberhard a relation, and several others, to enter into a conspiracy against the life of the king; which being discovered to Hugh, he sent for Valpertus and Eberhard, and reproving them in a gentle manner, declared to them, that, if he had done them any injury, he would make them full satisfaction. f The traitors, unaffected with this gentleness of the king, were only more earnest in hastening the execution of their plot. Hugh, dissembling his knowledge of their designs, pretended a reason for leaving Pavia; but, having concerted his measures with Leo the bishop, and one count Sampson, a capital enemy of Eberhard, he soon after returned: the conspirators, thinking this opportunity proper for executing their purpose, went out in the usual manner to meet the king; but Leo having shut the gates, they were immediately attacked by Sampson, and taken prisoners. Eberhard had his eyes put out, Valpertus was executed, and the rest were imprisoned. By the punishment of these conspirators Hugh made himself feared, not only in Pavia, but over all Italy.

Quells a conspiracy of his subjects.

* LUITPR. l. iii. c. 4. in fin.

* SIGON. l. vi. p. 156.

- <sup>a</sup> WHILE these things were doing in Pavia, Marozia continued to excite her husband Vido John X. is imprisoned by order of Vido marquis of Tuscany.
A. D. 943. against the pope; accordingly, the following year Vido took an opportunity of rushing with armed men into the Lateran, and having slain Peter the pope's brother, they seized the pope but a very short time, and left his possessions to his brother Lambert. In the mean time Marozia being resolved upon having a husband, sent an embassy to Hugh, who was brother to her late husband, offering him the government of Rome, on condition of his marrying her. Hugh embracing this opportunity of increasing his dominion, marched immediately to Rome, Hugh marries Marozia, his brother's widow, and obtains the government of
Rome; and leaving his army without the city, was received into the castle, and having celebrated the marriage, got possession of the city without opposition: but a trifling accident gave occasion to his being quickly expelled; for Marozia having prevailed with her son Alberic to furnish water for washing her husband's hands, Hugh, offended with his awkward manner, struck him a blow on the face. The young man, enraged at this affront, went to the Ro- gundian, who had acquired the government not by any merit, but by incestuous marriage, he but is expelled by the Romans;
also declare Alberic consul and patrician. incited them to take arms against the intruder. The words of Alberic had such an effect upon the Romans, that they immediately declared him consul, and under his command at- tacked the castle. Hugh, not having time to strengthen the garrison by a reinforcement from his army, was obliged to consult his safety, by letting himself down from that part of the castle next the city wall, and flying to his camp<sup>2</sup>. The Romans, having expelled Hugh, seem to have had an intention of asserting their antient liberty; for despising the authority both of the king and the pope, they not only appointed Alberic consul and patrician, but likewise named a prefect of the city, and tribunes of the people, whom they called de- carchons<sup>3</sup>. Leo, who had succeeded John X. dying in the end of October, Stephen VII. was chosen in his room, who enjoyed the papal dignity little more than two years. Upon his death, Alberic appointed John XI. his successor, who was likewise a son of Marozia, whom she bore in adultery to pope Sergius<sup>b</sup>.
- In the mean time, Hugh, who after his repulse at Rome had returned with ignominy to Pavia, began to be afraid lest the Italians should renounce their allegiance to him, and offer the kingdom to his half-brother the marquis of Tuscany; therefore he resolved to ruin Hugh seizes upon Lambert
marquis of Tuscany, and confers his marquise upon Boson his brother.
931. him; and having consulted with his brother Boson, he denied that Lambert was his brother, and sent a message to him, forbidding him to call himself by that name. Lambert, instead of complying with the king's message, declared to him, that he would assert by single combat, that he was born of the same mother with himself. The king, thinking he had got an opportu- nity of destroying him, accepted of the condition, and procured one Teduin, a strong young man, for his adversary. Lambert defeated his antagonist; nevertheless Hugh commanded him to be seized, and giving his marquise to his brother Boson, soon after ordered his eyes to be put out. The king, by this cruelty towards his brother, alienated the minds of the Italians, who again offered their crown to Rodolphus; but Hugh being informed of this, immediately entered into a treaty with Rodolphus, and by ceding to him a part of his kingdom of Arles, The Italians invite Rodol-phus to come into Italy, but he enters into a treaty with Hugh. obtained from him a promise, which he confirmed by an oath, that he would not set a foot in Italy, or disturb him in the possession of that kingdom. In the mean time the Saracens, who were still in possession of some strong-holds near the Alps, made an incursion as far as Acqui; but having lost their general, they retired without doing any considerable damage. Soon after, another body of Saracens from Africa landing at Genoa, surprised the city, and killing the greatest part of the inhabitants, loaded their ships with the wealth of the city, and returned to Africa. The Italians, finding that Rodolphus refused to accept of their crown, the following year made an offer of it to Arnold, or Arnolphus, duke of Bavaria, The Saracens surprise and plunder Genoa.
The Italians offer the crown to Arnold duke of Bavaria, who is defeated by Hugh near Verona.
932. who soon after entered Italy by the valley of Trento, and advanced to Verona, where he was received by the count Milo, and the bishop Ratherius. Hugh being informed of this inva- sion, immediately marched against Arnold, whom he entirely defeated, and obliged to return into Germany<sup>c</sup>; and having recovered Verona, he brought Ratherius prisoner with him to Pavia, where that bishop wrote a treatise upon his disgrace. Hugh having quelled this sedi- tion, for the greater security of his government, associated his son Lotharius with him in the kingdom, and caused him to be crowned by the archbishop of Milan, soon after concluding a marriage for him with Adelaide, the daughter of Rodolphus king of Burgundy.
- HAVING thus secured himself from foreign pretenders, Hugh raised a formidable army, with which he marched against Rome, to revenge the affront he had suffered from that city some years before. After continuing some time before the city, finding his efforts baffled by the vigour of the besieged, he turned his arms against the other cities of the Roman terri- tory, many of which he reduced. While he was engaged in this war, Lombardy was ravaged by a kind of epidemical distemper or plague, which yielded to no remedies. The following year, Manasses bishop of Arles, and a relation of Hugh, hearing of his great prosperity and power, abandoned his bishoprick, and coming into Italy, obtained from him the bishopricks of Verona, Trento, and Mantua<sup>d</sup>; but not content with these, Luitprand tells us, that he afterwards seized the archbishoprick of Milan; and obtaining likewise the marquise of Trento, served in the king's army.

<sup>y</sup> LUTPRAND, l. iii. c. 12. LEO Ost. l. i. c. 57.<sup>a</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.<sup>b</sup> LUTPR. ubi supra.<sup>c</sup> SIGEBERT hoc anno. LUTPRAND, l. iii. c. 14. in fin.

A. D. 936. At this time Berengarius and Anscarius, the two sons of Adelbert marquis of Ivrea, were eminent for their wealth and power. Berengarius was the grandson of the king of that name, by his daughter Gisla, the first wife of Adelbert; Anscarius was born of his second wife Ermen-garde<sup>e</sup>. Hugh, being afraid of their power, studied to secure their interest, by conferring favours upon them; accordingly he gave Villa, the daughter of his brother Boson, marquis of Tuscany, in marriage to Berengarius; and the following year Theobald marquis of Spoleto dying, he conferred his marquise upon Anscarius. His resentment against the Romans abating, Hugh concluded a peace with Alberic, and gave him his daughter in marriage<sup>f</sup>. In returning with his army, he was informed, that his brother Boson, instigated by his wife Villa, began to cabal against him, upon which information he ordered them both to be seized, and gave the marquise of Tuscany to one Hubert.

Hugh concludes a peace with the Romans, and gives his daughter in marriage to Alberic.

The Hungarians invade Campania. 937.

Berengarius and Anscarius enter into a conspiracy against Hugh. 940.

Hugh attacks the Saracens in the Alps, but concludes a peace with them.

941.

They murder the pilgrims in their journey to Rome.

Romanus emperor of Constantinople, contracts an alliance with Hugh.

944. Berengarius sends Amadeus in disguise into Italy, to sound the affections of the nobles;

RODOLPHUS king of Burgundy dying soon after, he married his widow Berta, and by his politick administration, confirmed his authority in Italy every day more and more. But notwithstanding his power, the Hungarians invaded Italy, and marched with a formidable army into Campania; and having plundered Capua, and the dukedom of Benevento, they penetrated as far as Nola and Liburia; but after ravaging these countries, they were almost entirely cut off by the Marfi and Peligni<sup>g</sup>. Three years afterwards Leo VIII. dying, was succeeded by Stephen IX. a German, who enjoyed the papal dignity little more than three years; for Alberic being offended at his promotion, as being a foreigner, attacked and maimed him in a miserable manner; after which assault, he never appeared in public, and is supposed to have died of grief<sup>h</sup>. Soon after the promotion of Stephen, the two brothers Berengarius and Anscarius, notwithstanding the favours conferred upon them by Hugh, entered into a conspiracy against him, which being discovered, Hugh, by means of one Sarlio, apprehended Anscarius, and causing him to be put to death, conferred the dukedom of Spoleto upon Sarlio. Berengarius, alarmed at the fate of his brother, immediately fled to Herman duke of Suabia, who conducted him to Otho king of Germany, afterwards surnamed the Great. Hugh being informed of his retreat, sent an embassy to Otho, desiring him to deliver him up; but his request was denied by the king of Germany. The conspiracy being quelled by the death of Anscarius, and the flight of Berengarius, Hugh resolved to attack the Saracens, who were fortified near the Alps; and sending an embassy to the emperor at Constantinople, procured from him the assistance of some ships, and artificial or Greek fire, which had the property of burning under water. Having made these preparations, the following year he attacked Fraxinetum by sea and land, and burning the ships of the Saracens by means of the artificial fire, he forced them to abandon Fraxinetum, and retire to the mountain Maurus. Hugh besieged them there for a considerable time; but hearing that Berengarius had raised some forces in Suabia and France, and designed to invade Italy, he imprudently dismissed his Greek auxiliaries, and concluded a peace with the Saracens, allowing them to reside in the Alps between Suabia and Italy, on condition that they opposed Berengarius, in case he attempted to pass into Lombardy. The Saracens, being thus left in possession of several places in the Alps, robbed and murdered the pilgrims, who were passing that way in their journey to Rome; which barbarity they had exercised some years before, against a numerous troop of English pilgrims, murdering them by stones thrown upon them in their passage through the vallies<sup>i</sup>.

THREE years after the conclusion of this peace with the Saracens, Romanus, the emperor of Constantinople, hearing of the great reputation of Hugh, sent an embassy to him, demanding his daughter in marriage. Hugh declaring, that he had no legitimate daughter, but had one Bertha, by a concubine, Bezola, she was accepted, and was sent the following year into Greece, attended by Sigefrid, bishop of Parma; and being married to Romanus, changed her name to Eudoxia<sup>k</sup>. In the mean time Berengarius, who was an exile in Subia, hearing that the Italians were greatly disaffected to Hugh, upon account of his conferring so many favours upon the Burgundians, sent one Amadeus, his faithful attendant, into Italy, to sound the affections of the Italian nobles towards him. Amadeus, accordingly putting on the habit of a pilgrim, joined those who were travelling to Rome on account of devotion; and, having entered Italy, had secret conferences with many of the nobles, who were disaffected to Hugh, forming together with them a plan for procuring the kingdom to Berengarius. Hugh

<sup>d</sup> SIGON. l. vi. p. 159.

<sup>e</sup> LEO Ost. l. i. c. 58.

<sup>f</sup> PRAND, l. v. c. 5 & 9.

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>h</sup> BARON. in vita Stephani.

<sup>i</sup> FLODOARD hoc anno. LUITPRAND, l. iv. c. 1, 2, 3.

<sup>j</sup> FLODOARDUS anno 941.

<sup>k</sup> LUIT-

a having information, that Berengarius had sent an emissary in disguise into Italy, ordered strict search to be made after him; but, Amadeus, by frequently changing his habit, and sometimes appearing in one colour, and sometimes in another, eluded the enquiries of the king's officers, and even had the confidence to appear at his palace. Having satisfied himself in his enquiries, he returned, by bye paths, over the Alps, the passes of which were guarded, by order of the king; and informing Berengarius, that the nobles of Italy were ready to take arms in his favour, as soon as he appeared in that kingdom, he accordingly left Suabia, and goes himself into that kingdom, entered Italy by the valley of Venusia or Winsgau. Marching to the castle of Fornicarium, then under the command of Adelard, suffragan or clerk to Manasses bishop of Trento, Verona, and Mantua, Berengarius brought them both over to his interests, and obtained the possession of the castle, by promising the archbishoprick of Milan to Manasses, and the bishopric of Como to Adelard. The arrival of Berengarius was no sooner known, than many of the nobles repaired to his camp, the chief of whom was Millo, count of the palace, provoked by some injuries he had received from Hugh; and Vido, bishop of Modena, enticed by the promise of the rich abbey of Nonantula, not only left Hugh, but brought a great body of men with him to the camp of Berengarius. Hugh, hearing of the revolt of these two nobles, immediately assembled an army, and marched to Vincola, to attack the camp of his rival; but, the Italians continually flocking in to Berengarius, he found himself too weak to attempt any thing by force. While these things were doing in Lombardy, the two brothers, Landulphus and Athenulphus, princes of Capua, had seized upon the monastery of Cassino, and expelled the monks; but, complaint being made to the pope, he ordered the princes to resign what they had usurped, and the monks again to take possession<sup>1</sup>.

In the mean time, Berengarius, being sent for by the archbishop, left Verona, and, arriving at Milan, there acted as king. Hugh, being informed of this, returned in despair to Pavia; and finding himself daily deserted, so that there was no hope of keeping possession of the crown, he sent his son, Lotharius, to Berengarius, and the Italian nobles, at Milan, to endeavour to excite their compassion, chusing a day, appointed by Berengarius, for giving away a great many preferments. Lotharius accordingly went and threw himself at their feet before the altar, in the church of St. Ambrose, intreating that they would not reject him as they had done his father. The Italians were so moved with his distress, that they took him into their protection; and Hugh, preparing to quit Italy, they sent messengers to him, desiring him still to continue in the kingdom<sup>2</sup>. But Luitprand affirms<sup>3</sup>, that this was all done deceitfully, by the advice of Berengarius, who wanted to retain Hugh, that he might get possession of his treasures, which he heard he intended to carry into Burgundy, to raise forces in order to recover Italy. Thus, a kind of accommodation being concluded, the title of king continued with Hugh and Lotharius, but all power of government was in the hands of Berengarius, who acted in the beginning of his reign with an absolute authority, taking the bishoprick of Brescia from Joseph, a man of great sanctity, and substituting one Anthony, without any consent of the bishops. He likewise conferred the bishoprick of Como, not on Adelard, as he had promised, but on one Valdo, and gave that of Reggio to Adelard, and threatened to deprive the bishops of Placenza and Pavia, unless they gave him a large sum of money. Upon the death of the archbishop of Milan, he also appointed Manasses his successor, though the clergy had chosen Aldemar, the cardinal of their church, which proceeding occasioned a great sedition at Milan, so that neither of the two competitors were consecrated.

HUGH, dissatisfied with the administration of Berengarius, and finding himself without any authority, took an opportunity of retiring with his treasures into Burgundy, where he built a very magnificent monastery<sup>4</sup>, at his own expence, and appropriating to it all his wealth, he became monk himself, and died soon after. The emperor Constantine being informed of the death of Hugh, sent an embassy to Berengarius, recommending to him the protection of Lotharius<sup>5</sup>. In return, Berengarius sent the historian Luitprand ambassador to Constantinople, who gives a long and particular description of his own embassy<sup>6</sup>; but, Berengarius, instead of acting as a faithful administrator for Lotharius, is said, by the historian Flodoard, to have poisoned him at an entertainment<sup>7</sup>, of which he died soon after in a phrenzy<sup>8</sup>.

THE year after the departure of Hugh, Henry, duke of Bavaria, having defeated the Hungarians, led his army into Italy, took and plundered Aquileia, and having ravaged the country on the Tezino, returned loaded with booty unmolested into Germany<sup>9</sup>. Taxis or Toxis, king of Hungary, hearing of Henry's successful expedition into Italy, the following

<sup>1</sup> LEO Ost. l. i. c. 64.

fin. l. iv. c. 64. in fine.

<sup>2</sup> LEO Ost. l. i. c. 64.<sup>3</sup> SIGON. l. vi. p. 161.<sup>4</sup> LUITPRAND, l. i. c. 6.<sup>5</sup> SIGON. l. vi. p. 162.<sup>6</sup> LUITPRAND, l. v. c. 13.<sup>7</sup> Idem, l. vi. c. 1, 2, 3.<sup>8</sup> LEO Ost. Chron. Caf.<sup>9</sup> FLODOARD, anno 950.

Henry duke of Bavaria inwades Italy.

The Hungarians follow his example.

A. D. 949.

year raised an army, and made an irruption into Lombardy. Berengarius, not being able to oppose him, consented to pay him a large sum of money, on condition that he restrained his army from ravaging, and evacuated Italy; but in raising the money, Berengarius is said to have been more grievous than the barbarians, for he obliged every individual, without distinction of age or sex, to pay so much for their head, not excepting even the poor; he likewise robbed the churches, and by that means raised an immense sum, ten modii or bushels of which he gave to the Hungarians, but kept the much greater part to himself<sup>a</sup>. Lotharius being dead, Berengarius caused himself to be crowned at Verona, and associated his eldest son Adelbert with him in the government; the year after, at Olonna, he renewed the alliance between the Venetians and Italians, and settled the limits of their territories. Not contented with the title of king, Berengarius desired likewise to be in possession of Pavia, which was kept by Adelaide, the widow of Lotharius. In order to obtain his purpose, he proposed a marriage betwixt her and his son Adelbert; but, the alliance being rejected by Adelaide, he was highly offended, and marched with an army against Pavia, which he reduced; then taking the queen prisoner, he shut her up in the castle of Garda, near the lake of that name, being afraid lest she should have recourse to some foreign assistance. Berengarius had not long fixed his residence at Pavia, when Adelaide, by the assistance of Martin, her confessor, made her escape from her prison. In the night-time she went into a little boat with him and one female attendant, and, crossing the lake, concealed herself in a wood, where she continued for some days; but, being obliged to remove for want of food, she went and asked the protection of Adelard, bishop of Reggio, who recommended her, for greater safety, to his uncle Atho, who was possessed of a strong castle near Canoza.

A. D. 950.
Berengarius takes possession of Pavia, and imprisons Adelaide, for rejecting a marriage with his son.

She escapes to Canoza, where she is besieged by Berengarius.

She solicits the assistance of Otho king of Germany.

Otho marches into Italy, and raising the siege of Canoza, marries Adelaide.

A. D. 951.

Berengarius goes to Germany, and submitting to Otho, is restored to his kingdom.

Italy greatly harassed by the cruelty and tyranny of Berengarius.

A. D. 956.

BERENGARIUS was no sooner informed of the place of her retreat, than he sent a message to Atho, desiring him to deliver her up; but, his request being refused, he marched directly with an army and besieged Canoza. Atho, finding himself unable by his own strength to sustain the siege, sent a private messenger, with the consent of Adelaide, to Otho, king of Germany, intreating him to come to his assistance; which, if he did speedily, he might easily expel the usurper Berengarius, and by marrying Adelaide, obtain the kingdom of Italy. The pope likewise, who had been offended at Berengarius for plundering the churches, sent a letter to Otho, inviting him into Italy<sup>u</sup>. Otho willingly accepted of the terms offered him by Adelaide, and promised speedy assistance; and sending his son Ludolphus with some forces before him, marched soon after himself with a great army into Italy. When he arrived at Verona, he sent an officer with a letter to Canoza, to inform Adelaide that he had passed the Alps, and was marching to her relief. All access to the castle being cut off by the enemies guards, the officer tied the letter, with a ring which he had received from Otho, to an arrow, and shot it into the place. The besieged, upon reading the letter, gave public demonstrations of joy, which being observed by Berengarius, he concluded that the army of Otho was not at a great distance, and not thinking proper to venture an engagement, he immediately raised the siege, and retired with his sons Adelbert and Vido, to provide for the security of the places of strength in his kingdom, being resolved to oppose the invader to the utmost of his power<sup>x</sup>. Otho, upon his arrival at Canoza, immediately celebrated his marriage with Adelaide, and soon after marched against Pavia, which he reduced by October, and entered the palace in triumph with his queen. There he celebrated his Christmas, and returning, in the beginning of the spring, to Germany, with Adelaide, he left his son Conrad, duke of Lorrain, to carry on the war against Berengarius. Conrad began the campaign with great vigour, and soon obliged Berengarius to lay down his arms; he advised him to go with his son Adelbert into Germany and submit to Otho, and trust to his generosity for the terms of reconciliation. Berengarius was received in Germany with great respect by the nobles of that kingdom; and, after three days, had an audience of Otho, who deprived him only of the marquisate of Verona, and that of Friuli, which he gave to his brother Henry, duke of Bavaria; the rest of his kingdom he restored to him, on condition of his paying homage for it to the kings of Germany.

BERENGARIUS having thus made his peace with Otho, returned to Italy; but soon after hearing that Otho was engaged in opposing a rebellion, headed by his son Ludolphus, and his son-in-law Conrad, he likewise revolted, and again began hostilities in Italy. In revenge for the assistance Atho had given to Adelaide, he marched with an army against Canoza, and from thence to Ravenna and the exarchate, harassing the pope, the bishops, and nobles of Italy in a most grievous manner, and leaving every-where marks of his tyranny and avarice. In the mean time, Aldemar, the rival of Manasses in the archbishopric of Milan, dying, the clergy and people immediately chose Valpertus, who, the following year, together with the pope, wrote to Otho, complaining of the tyranny of Berengarius, and shewing, that, if he

<sup>u</sup> LUITPRAND, l. v. c. 5. in fine.
LEO Ost. l. i. c. ult.

<sup>x</sup> Script. Anonym. apud. BARON. hoc anno.

* SICON. l. vi. p. 163.

- a was not opposed, he would soon make himself master of all Italy. Otho, being then greatly engaged with the affairs of Germany, ordered his son Ludolphus to march with an army against Berengarius. In the mean time, pope Agapetus dying, Ostavianus, the son of Alberic, who, though a clergyman, two years before had succeeded his father in the government of Rome, now procured himself to be elected pope, and took the name of John XII. being then only eighteen years of age. Ludolphus, being arrived in Italy, defeated Berengarius in several engagements, and at last forced him into an island in the lake Novara; but the following year, while he was earnest in prosecuting the war, he was cut off by a sudden death, not without the suspicion of poison, administered to him by one of his domestics that had been gained by Berengarius<sup>y</sup>. His body was carried into Germany, and buried at Metz. Berengarius, being now freed from his adversary, and hearing that Otho was engaged in a war with the Sclavi, again took the field with an army, and renewed his former violences, ravaging with great barbarity the territories of those who had abandoned him. He was likewise engaged in a war with the new pope, on account of the dukedom of Spoletto, each of them, according to Sigonius, claiming that dukedom, which had been lately in possession of Sarlio. John having got a great many bishops and others in the dukedom to favour his pretensions, Berengarius marched thither with an army, and harassed those of the opposite party; but, the following year, he left his army and returned to Pavia, where he renewed their antient privileges to the Genoese, that republic asserting the charter to be still extant in their possession.
- b The Italians, at last, driven to despair by the tyranny of Berengarius, sent repeated embassies to Otho, intreating him to come to their relief. Valpertus, archbishop of Milan, went in person to Otho<sup>z</sup>, as did several other nobles; and the pope sent a cardinal, and one of his principal officers of his court to Germany, supplicating Otho to come and deliver the church from its oppressor, and promising to give him the imperial crown, provided he would swear to consult the Roman church, and restore all that had been usurped by Berengarius. Otho very readily consented to the oath, but, before he set out for Italy, in the beginning of the year, he assembled a diet at Worms, in which his son Otho, then only six years of age, was declared king of Germany, and trusted to the guardianship of William, archbishop of Metz, his half brother<sup>a</sup>. The diet being dismissed, the young Otho was crowned at Aix la Chapelle, on Whitsunday following; and his father having settled the affairs of Germany, marched with a formidable army through the valley of Trent into Italy, accompanied by his wife Adelaide, and attended by several bishops. Adelbert prepared to oppose the Germans, with an army, according to several authors, amounting to 60,000 men; but the counts and nobles making it a condition of their service, that Berengarius should forever resign the kingdom in favour of Adelbert, their proposal was rejected; upon which the whole army immediately separated<sup>b</sup>, and many of the bishops and nobles going to meet Otho, he marched without opposition to Pavia, which Berengarius had abandoned, after setting fire to the palace<sup>c</sup>. From thence he went to Milan, where the bishops and nobles of Lombardy being assembled, the archbishop, with the unanimous consent of all present, deposed Berengarius and Adelbert, and, conferring the kingdom on Otho, crowned him with the iron crown, in the church of St. Ambrose. In the mean time, Berengarius, his wife, and his two sons, abandoned the country to Otho, and retired separately into the strongest fortresses in the kingdom, which they fortified with strong garrisons, in expectation of a revolution in their favour. Otho, immediately after his coronation, returned to Pavia, where he kept his Christmas, and, in the month of February, marched with his army to Rome, to receive the imperial crown from the pope, according to his promise. The Romans went out to meet him, and received him into their city with the utmost demonstrations of joy. Otho having kissed the pope's feet, who waited for him on the steps of the Vatican, he was conducted into the church, and solemnly crowned emperor by John, amidst the loud acclamations of the people; after which both of them went to the altar of St. Peter, and bound themselves by a solemn oath, John promising always to be faithful to the emperor, and to give no assistance to Berengarius or Adelbert his enemies; and Otho engaging to consult the welfare of the church, and to restore to it all its patrimony granted by former emperors<sup>d</sup>. Otho besides bestowed very rich presents upon the church of St. Peter<sup>e</sup>. He ordained, that the election of popes should be regulated according to the canons; and that the elected pope should not be consecrated till he had publicly promised, in presence of the emperor's commissaries, to observe every thing formerly specified by pope Leo; that these commissaries should constantly reside at Rome, and every year make an exact report how justice was administered by

<sup>y</sup> SIGON. l. v. p. 163.<sup>z</sup> LUITPRAND, l. v. c. 6.<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>b</sup> Ex hist. Longobard. Duc. ap.

BARON.

<sup>c</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.<sup>d</sup> REGINO & FLODOARD, hoc anno.

SIGON. l. vi. p. 167. ann. BARON.

hoc anno.

<sup>e</sup> LUITPRAND, l. vi. c. 6.

the judges; and in case of any complaints, the commissaries should lay them before the pope; but, if he neglected to imitate them, the imperial commissaries might then determine what they thought proper<sup>f</sup>; which regulation shews, that the emperor still reserved to himself the sovereignty and jurisdiction in the last instance over all the territories granted to the holy see. Otho having thus got possession of Italy, that kingdom continued for upwards of 300 years to be reckoned a part of the German empire; but, in the reign of the emperor Rodolphus, it became independent, and detached from the empire, the cities of Lombardy refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the emperor, and claiming a liberty which time has since confirmed to many of them.

He returns to Pavia, and afterwards marches against Berengarius.

The pope makes a second treaty with Adelbert to expel the Germans; A. D. 963.

and solicits the Hungarians to invade Germany.

Otho marches with part of his army to Rome, and assembles a council of bishops.

John XII. is deposed and Leo VIII. chosen in his stead.

THE emperor having confirmed the grant of his predecessors to the holy see, and regulated what regards the election of the popes, returned to Pavia, and after Easter marched against Berengarius and those of his party, who were still in possession of some places of strength. He began with the siege of the island in the Lago Maggiore, whither Villa, the wife of Berengarius, had retired; after two months he made himself master of the place, and gave liberty to Villa to go to her husband, and restored the island to the church of Novara<sup>e</sup>. In the mean time, John XII. finding that Otho was not contented with the mere title of emperor, but claimed likewise the sovereign authority in Rome, began to repent of his calling him into Italy, and disregarding his oath, made a secret treaty with Adelbert, and promised to assist him in expelling the Germans. Otho, who was then at Pavia, being informed of this alliance, sent some of his faithful attendants to Rome, to enquire into the truth of the report, and the behaviour of John. Upon their return they confirmed the news, and likewise described the scandalous life of the pope. John, in order to throw the blame upon the emperor, immediately sent two legates to his camp, accusing him of having caused the people of Umbria to take the oath of allegiance to himself, and not to the holy see; but Otho declared, that he desired nothing more than to fulfil his promise, and sent two ambassadors to the pope to clear him by their oath, which, if John refused, he ordered the soldiers that attended the ambassadors to justify him by single combat; at the same time he told the legates, that he had certain information that John had solicited the Hungarians to invade Germany<sup>h</sup>. The ambassadors of the emperor were received with very little respect by the pope, who refused to accept of the justification which they offered, and after eight days dismissed them, sending along with them two other legates, with the design of amusing the emperor. In the mean time, Adelbert, having arrived at Civita Vecchia, repaired to Rome, where he was honourably received by the pope, who was earnest with the Romans to revolt. During these transactions, Otho had embarked his army on the Po, and sailed to Ravenna, which he quickly reduced; from thence he marched into the dukedom of Spoletto and besieged St. Leo or Montfeltre, then held by Berengarius and Villa with a strong garrison.

THE siege proceeding very slowly, he left part of his army to block up the place, and in the middle of September marched with the rest to Rome, being invited by the nobles to come to their assistance, they having opposed the proceedings of the pope and Adelbert, and seized upon the castle of S. Paul. John, alarmed at the emperor's march to Rome, immediately left the city, and taking with him the treasure of St. Peter, retired to some distance. In the mean time, Otho being received by the clergy and people of Rome with great respect, appointed a council of bishops to be held in the beginning of November, to regulate the affairs of the church. On the day appointed for the council the bishops assembled, and he himself presided, with the archbishops of Aquileia, Milan, and Ravenna. Otho began with complaining that the pope, who ought to have been the chief in their deliberations, was not present, and enquired of the bishops the cause of his absence. The council unanimously replied, that the consciousness of his crimes had made him afraid to appear: Otho required them to be more particular; upon which they accused him of filling the palace with lewd women, and having an intrigue with one Stephania his father's concubine; of ordaining a bishop in a stable; of making a child of ten years of age bishop of Tudor; of castrating a cardinal, and afterwards putting him to death; of saying mass and not communicating himself; of drinking the devil's health, and neglecting to use the sign of the cross<sup>i</sup>. John refusing to appear to defend himself, the council proceeded to depose him, and elected Leo, the chief secretary, in his place, who, though a layman<sup>k</sup>, was approved of by the emperor, and forthwith consecrated, taking the name of Leo VIII. Leo, in compliment to the emperor, by whose means he had obtained the papal dignity, granted a bull, by which it was ordained, that Otho and his successors should have a right of appointing the popes, and investing archbishops and bishops; and that none should dare to consecrate a bishop without the leave of the emperor<sup>l</sup>. The council being dismissed, Otho sent back the greatest part of his troops to assist at the siege, and continuing at Rome, celebrated his Christmas with Leo.

<sup>f</sup> Exemplar Diplom. Othon. apud BARON.

<sup>i</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>e</sup> BARONIUS hoc anno.

<sup>h</sup> SIGEBERT apud Grat. Dif. lxxix. c. 3 & 4.

<sup>l</sup> LUITPRAND, l. vi. c. 6.

<sup>l</sup> SIGON. l. vii. p. 170.

- a JOHN XII. was no sooner informed that Otho had dismissed the greatest part of his troops, but he sent his emissaries to Rome, exciting the Romans to revolt, and promising to divide amongst them all the treasures he was possessed of, if they would surprise and cut off Otho. The Romans being easily excited by the promises of John, took arms on the 2d of January, and marched to surprise Otho, who was encamped on the other side the Tyber; but the Germans taking the alarm before the Romans had passed the river, attacked them at the bridge, repulsed them with considerable loss, and with great difficulty were restrained by Otho from committing great slaughter<sup>m</sup>. Otho pardoned the Romans, on condition of their renewing their allegiance, and giving a hundred of their nobles as hostages. A few days after this pacification, the emperor received the news that Montfeltre was taken, and that Berengarius had surrendered at discretion: Otho sent him prisoner to Bamberg in Franconia, where he died two years afterwards; his wife Villa, who had accompanied him, retiring, after his decease, into a monastery. Garda and Comacina likewise surrendering to the Germans, there remained only Spoleto and Camerino, which Adelbert had strengthened with good garisons.

- Otho* resolving to go in person against these two places, at the intreaty of Leo, restored the Roman hostages, and in a few days left Rome, and marched against Camerino. Soon after the departure of the emperor, John, by the intrigues of his mistresses, found means of entering Rome, where his party immediately becoming prevalent, he called an assembly of the bishops, in which he deposed Leo, and annulled all his decrees, and likewise ordered a cardinal, named John, to be punished with the loss of his right hand, and his secretary Azo to lose his nose, his tongue, and two of his fingers. John was soon prevented by death from continuing these cruelties; for about the middle of May, being surprised in bed with a lady, he received a blow upon the head, of which he died eight days after<sup>n</sup>. The authors of those times say, that it was the devil that struck him, but they do not mention, whether he appeared in the shape of the husband or not. The Romans, upon the death of John, did not recall Leo, who had fled to the emperor's camp, but elected Benedict, a cardinal deacon, whom they immediately consecrated without acquainting Otho. Upon the news of John's getting possession of Rome, Otho had determined to march against that city, after he had reduced Camerino; but hearing that the Romans had elected Benedict, he quickly raised the siege, and led his army against them. The Romans, excited by Benedict, shut their gates against the emperor; but their city being surrounded by Germans, they were very soon obliged to surrender at discretion, for want of provisions. Otho, upon entering the city, strictly prohibited his soldiers from committing any violence; and having restored Leo to his dignity, he advised him to call a council, in order to depose Benedict. The council of German, Italian, and Sicilian bishops being assembled, Benedict was introduced, and voluntarily stripped himself of his pontifical ornaments, asked pardon of the emperor and Leo, who deprived him of the title of presbyter, but leaving him that of deacon, he ordered him into banishment at Hamburg. Tranquillity being established at Rome, Otho was preparing to return to the siege of Camerino, when he was informed that Adelbert had abandoned Italy, and fled to Corfica. Upon this information he settled the affairs of Italy, and set out on his return to Germany: passing the rest of the summer in Tuscany, in autumn he marched to Pavia, where he kept his Christmas, and soon after marched with his army into Germany.

- Otho* had no sooner returned to Germany, but the Italians, according to their usual fickleness, revolted from their allegiance, recalled Adelbert from Corfica, and upon his return to Lombardy, assisted him to the utmost of their power in recovering his former dignity. Otho, being informed of this rebellion, immediately sent duke Burchard with an army into Italy, giving him orders to engage Adelbert with the first opportunity. Burchard, according to his orders, soon after his arrival in Italy, attacked Adelbert near the Po, and, after an obstinate engagement, obliged him to retire with considerable loss, his brother Vido having fallen in the action. In the mean time pope Leo dying, the Romans sent ambassadors to Otho, to consult him about a successor. Being satisfied with their submission, he gave them liberty of choosing whom they thought proper; and sent the bishops of Spire and Cremona as his commissaries to Rome, to be present at the election and consecration of the new pope<sup>o</sup>. Soon after the arrival of the new bishops, the Romans elected the bishop of Nani, who took the name of John XIII. But he had not long enjoyed his new dignity, when Rome was thrown into the utmost confusion; for the prefect of the city, the consuls, and the tribunes of the people, whom they called decarchons, being greatly dissatisfied with the diminution of their power, resolved to renounce their allegiance to the emperor, and resume their former authority; but John declaring firmly for the emperor, and opposing their proceedings, they seized him, and threw him into prison, and finding they could not prevail with him to ap-prison the new pope. A. D. 966. prove their measures, they banished him the city, and sent for one Rofred, a rich nobleman of Capua, to their assistance. John, upon his expulsion from Rome, retired to Capua, where he was received with great respect by the duke Pandulphus, who excited his brother to assassinate Rofred, then prefect of the city.

<sup>m</sup> LUITPRAND, l. vi. c. 11.<sup>n</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>o</sup> Appendix ad Reginon.

Otho returns with an army to Italy, and punishes the rebels of Lombardy. THE Romans still continuing in their rebellion, notwithstanding the death of Rofred, Otho resolved to pass into Italy; and having concluded the diet at Worms, he then marched over the Alps with a formidable army, and began with punishing the rebels of Lombardy, who had invited Adelbert from Corfica. He banished Sigulfus, bishop of Placenza, and several counts, who were found guilty, into Franconia and Saxony; and giving the investiture of Montferrat to Aleran, a nobleman who had continued faithful to him, he marched with his army towards Rome. The Romans, upon the news of Otho's passing the Alps, being

He marches to Rome and punishes the authors of the revolt with great severity. A. D. 967. afraid of his resentment, had immediately recalled the pope from Capua, and restored him to his dignity, hoping that he would prevail with the emperor to pardon their rebellion<sup>p</sup>. But Otho thinking it proper to punish their seditious temper, by an example of severity, upon his arrival at Rome, banished the consuls into Germany, ordered the tribunes to be hanged, and the body of Rofred to be dug out of the grave, divided into pieces, and these to be dispersed. The prefect likewise, who had succeeded Rofred, was dressed in an ignominious habit, put upon an ass with his face towards the tail, and in that manner being led through the streets of Rome, was scourged by the hangman, and afterwards imprisoned<sup>q</sup>. Otho having punished the rebels, made several new laws for the government of the city. The Venetians having sent an embassy to him, he renewed the former privileges granted to that re-

He goes with the pope to Ravenna, and sends for his son Otho, who is crowned emperor.

He sends an ambassador to the emperor of Constantinople demanding Theophania for his son. A. D. 968.

The emperor rejects the alliance, and acts perfidiously towards Otho; who sends an army into Calabria, against the Greeks. 969.

The Greeks are defeated in Apulia and Calabria. Nicephorus is slain by John Zimis-

public, and, at the desire of the ambassadors, appointed the church of Grada to be the metropolitan of Venice. Having settled the affairs that regarded the city, he left Rome, and took the pope along with him to Ravenna, where, after Easter, he called an assembly of the states, and renewed the grant of Pepin and Charlemagne, in favour of the holy see<sup>r</sup>. He likewise created Sigebert or Albert, the son of Otho, count of Canoza, marquis of Este, whose descendents continued in the possession of that dignity for 600 years afterwards<sup>s</sup>. While he was at Ravenna, Otho sent an ambassador to Nicephorus, emperor of Constantinople, demanding his step-daughter Theophania in marriage for his son Otho, resolving, if he met with a denial, to make himself master of Calabria and Apulia; several nobles in these provinces having already renounced their allegiance to the Greek emperor, and done homage to him. Having settled the affairs of Romaniola, he dismissed the pope, and sending for his son Otho from Germany, he went as far as Verona to meet him, and returned with him to Rome, where, on Christmas-day, he was crowned emperor by the pope, being then only thirteen years of age.

AFTER this ceremony, Otho sent Luitprand, bishop of Cremona, to Nicephorus, again to demand Theophania in marriage; but that emperor, being highly offended that Otho and his son had obtained the title of emperor, and received the homage of the Beneventans, treated the ambassador with great disrespect, threw him into prison, and, after detaining him several months, dismissed him without any satisfaction as to his embassy (D). Nicephorus was not contented with treating Otho's ambassador with indignity, but likewise added perfidy to his insults; for he pretended to be reconciled to Otho, and sent an embassy to him at Rome, declaring, that he had agreed to the marriage, and desired him to receive Theophania, in Calabria. Otho, trusting to the assurances of the emperor, made preparations for the wedding at Rome, and sent a considerable body of nobility to receive the princess; but, instead of meeting with Theophania, they were attacked by the Greek soldiers, and almost all killed or carried prisoners to Constantinople<sup>t</sup>. Enraged at this perfidy, Otho immediately made preparations for war, and soon after sent an army into Calabria and Apulia, under the command of Gunther and Sigefrid, with whom likewise he sent his young son. Historians make very little mention of this expedition; Sigonius relates, that these two generals marched first to Capua, from thence they went to Taranto and Metapontum, now Torre di Mare, and being assisted by Pandulph, duke of Capua, attacked the Saracens, whom they expelled from Italy, enriching themselves with their spoil. The Greeks at first defeated the Germans in several small engagements; but their success rendering them unwary, they were at last drawn into an ambush, and almost all cut to pieces. Those who were taken prisoners had their noses cut off, and in that manner were sent to Constantinople. The Constantinopolitans, in the mean time, exasperated against Nicephorus, slew him, by means of one John Zimisces, whom they afterwards declared emperor. Mean while Otho was engaged in settling the af-

<sup>p</sup> Append. ad Reginon.

<sup>q</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>r</sup> Append. ad Anastas.

<sup>s</sup> WITTICHIND apud Meibom.

SIGON. l. viii. p. 172.

SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>t</sup> Append. ad Reginon.

(D) There is a long and curious account of this embassy, written by Luitprand himself, and published in the annals of Baronius, for this year, and in the collections of Matthari, volume 11.

a fairs of Italy, and conferring honours on those who had served him faithfully. He gave the city of Ferrara to Tedald, brother of the marquis of Este; and created one Scrofa, who is declared emperor. a man of a low extraction, and a butcher, duke of Milan<sup>n</sup>. He likewise appointed Ainolphus archbishop of Milan, in the room of Valpert deceased, and sent him ambassador to John, emperor of Constantinople, demanding Theophania in marriage for his son.

JOHN, not thinking himself secure in the possession of his throne, willingly embraced the friendship of Otho, and restoring the prisoners that had been surprized by the treachery of Nicephorus, he soon after sent the princess Theophania into Italy, with a numerous retinue, He concludes an alliance with Otho, and sends Theophania into Italy. who was received by Otho with great magnificence. The marriage was celebrated at Rome, on the 8th of April, with great pomp, and Theophania afterwards was crowned empress. Otho is married to Otho, and crowned empress. Some authors pretend, that the Greeks at this time renounced their rights to Calabria and Apulia; but Giannone, an Italian author of great reputation, seems to have proved, that no such renunciation was made. After the celebration of this marriage, Otho dismissed his auxiliary troops, and marched with his army to Pavia, with design of extirpating the Saracens from the Alps; but, being informed of the death of several nobles in Germany, he laid aside that expedition, and marched with his army into Saxony, where he arrived soon after. Otho survived his return to Germany only two years, and died of an apoplexy at Meinleben, The emperor returns to Germany, where he dies. on the 7th of May (E). A. D. 973.

THE death of Otho was no sooner related in Italy, than that kingdom fell into the greatest confusion, by reason of civil broils among the nobles and states, many of the citizens rejecting the authority of the emperor, and chusing consuls to themselves, while the dominion of others was usurped by the nobles, who confirmed their power by building citadels. Rome especially was harrassed with tumults, occasioned chiefly by the ambition of a citizen named Cincius, under pretence of restoring the antient republic. As the pope continued firm in the interests of the emperor, and could not be prevailed with to approve his proceedings, he seized him, by means of one Franco, a cardinal deacon, and throwing him into prison, ordered him to be strangled. Upon his death, one Donus was chosen by a faction of the Romans; but he dying soon after, Cincius and his faction chose Franco the deacon, who took the name of Boniface VII. The faction of the counts of Tuscany, alarmed at the power of Cincius, unanimously conspired against him; and after several struggles, obliged him and Boniface to quit the city. They chose likewise a grandson of the former consul Alberic who took the name of Benedict VII. and being approved of by the emperor, and supported by his friends, he threw many of the opposite faction in chains, and, in some measure, appeased the tumults<sup>w</sup>. Boniface, before he left Rome, had stripped the Vatican of all its wealth, which he carried with him to Constantinople, and incited the emperors Basil and Constantine to declare war against Otho, affirming, that the cities of Italy sought only an opportunity of shaking off the German yoke. These disturbances were hardly quieted at Rome, when the inhabitants of Bologna began to reject the authority of Otho, and to fortify Italy falls into great confusion upon his death;

<sup>n</sup> SIGON. l. vii. p. 174.

<sup>w</sup> BARONIUS ad an. 985. SIGON. ubi supra

(E) Italy was divided at this time into the following provinces, Apulia, Calabria, the dukedom of Benevento, Campania, Terra Romana, the dukedom of Spoleto, Tuscany, Romagna, Lombardy, and the marquisates of Ancona, Verona, Trevifo, Friuli, and Genoa. Of which, Apulia and Calabria were were still claimed by the Greek emperor; all the rest were either immediately subject to, or held of the kings of Italy. Of these last, Otho conferred Benevento, which included the antient Samnium, on the duke of that name; he gave Campania with Lucania, to the dukes of Capua, Naples, and Salerno. Rome with its territory, Ravenna with the exarchate, the dukedom of Spoleto with Tuscany, and the marquisate of Ancona, he granted to the pope; and retained the rest of Italy under the form of a kingdom. He left some of the cities free, but all tributary; and appointed several hereditary marquisates and counts, reserving to himself the sovereign jurisdiction in their territories. The liberty of the cities consisted in a freedom to chuse their own magistrates, to be judged by their own laws, and dispose of their own revenues, on condition that they took the oath of allegiance to the king, and paid the customary tribute. The cities that were not free, were governed by the commissaries or lieutenants of the emperor; but the free cities were governed by two or more consuls, afterwards called poteslates, chosen annually, who took the oath of allegiance to the emperor, before the bishop of the city, or the emperor's commissary. The tribute exacted was called foderum, parata, & mansfonaticum. By the foderum was meant a certain quantity of corn, which the cities were obliged to furnish to the king, when marching with an army, or making a progress through the country; the value of this was frequently paid in money. By the parata was understood the expence laid out in keeping the public roads and bridges in repair; and the mansfonaticum included those expences which were required for lodging the troops, or accommodating them in their camp. Under the pretence of this article, the inhabitants were sometimes stripped of all that they possessed, except their oxen and seed for the land. Besides regulating what regarded the cities, Otho distributed honours and possessions to those who had served him faithfully. The honours consisted in the titles of duke, marquis, count, captain, valvasor, and valvasin; the possessions were, besides land, the duties arising from harbours, ferries, roads, fishponds, mills, salt-pits, the uses of rivers, and all pertaining to them, and such like. The dukes, marquisates, and counts, were those who had received dukedoms, marquisates, or counties for the king in fiefs. The captains had a command of a certain number of men by a grant from the king, duke, marquis, or count. The valvasors were subordinate to the captains, and the valvasins to them (1).

(1). Sigon. de regno Italiæ, p. 175.

their city by building some castles; the Orvietans likewise refused to obey the emperor's officers, and chose to themselves consuls. At the same time the inhabitants of Milan were remarkable for their loyalty; for their archbishop being dead, to gratify the emperor Otho, they accepted of Godfrey the subdeacon, for whom they had an aversion.

The Greeks and Saracens invade Italy and make themselves masters of Apulia and Calabria. A. D. 979. Otho II concludes a peace with the French and enters Italy with an army. 980.

ITALY continuing still harrassed by civil dissensions, the emperors Basil and Constantine at last resolved upon an expedition against that kingdom, which they the more readily undertook, as they knew Otho was engaged in a war with the French, on account of Lorrain. Having concluded an alliance with the Saracens, whom they had expelled from Crete, they took a great body of troops into their pay, and in conjunction with them, landed in Italy. There, upon their first arrival, taking and plundering Bari and Maceræ, they soon made themselves masters of all Apulia and Calabria. Otho, who had hitherto been hindered from coming into Italy, at first, by the rebellion raised by his cousin Henry, duke of Bavaria, who pretended to the empire, and lately, by the war with the French; now hearing of the invasion of the Greeks, concluded a peace with the French, and, the following year, passed the Alps with a formidable army, being accompanied by the empress Theophania, and many nobles, bishops, and abbots*. He arrived at Placenza about the middle of August, and in the field called Roncalia held an assembly of the nobles and deputies of the cities of Italy (F); where after punishing the authors of the late tumults, and determining some controversies, he conferred some new honours upon Tedald, marquis of Mantua, and gave the castle of Vico Justino to one Lanfranc of Placenza, as a reward for their faithful services. Having settled the affairs of Lombardy, he proceeded to Rome, where he was received by all parties with great appearance of joy.

A. D. 981. Otho renders himself odious to the Italians by his cruelty.

Otho, after having celebrated his Christmas, resolved to punish the authors of the late disturbances in that city; but the method he took was much more cruel than serviceable to himself. He invited the nobles of Rome, and the deputies of the other cities then present, to a grand entertainment in the Vatican palace, and when the guests had placed themselves at the table, he forbade them, under pain of death, to speak or move, at what they should hear or see; immediately after which, the whole company was surrounded by armed men. While the guests sat trembling in suspense, the king, with great serenity, ordered the names of those concerned in the late disturbances to be read over, and the guilty persons to be punished with death in the midst of the hall; after which massacre, the king behaved with great complaisance and cheerfulness to the other guests during the whole entertainment. This cruelty made a deep impression upon the minds of the Italians, who, at that time, dissembled their resentment, and joined their auxiliary troops to his army. Otho began the campaign against the Greeks and Saracens early in the spring, and marching to Naples and Benevento increased his army by auxiliaries from those cities. After receiving this reinforcement, he defeated the enemy in several engagements, and conquered the country as far as Tarento. But, the following year, the Greeks and Saracens having collected their forces, made more opposition, and the two armies being encamped in the neighbourhood of Baven-tello, a small town on the sea coast of Calabria, a battle was fought, which proved very fatal to Otho. For during the engagement, the greatest part of the Italian auxiliaries, re-

He defeats the Greeks and Saracens and recovers Apulia. The Greeks afterwards gain a complete victory over him, * LAMBERT & SIGEBERT, in Chron. hoc anno.

† SIGON I. vii. p. 180.

(F) Sigonius gives the following account of the manner in which the emperors marched to Rome (2). When they proposed such a journey, messengers went before, who acquainted the cities of Italy, that the king was coming, and therefore renewed their oaths of allegiance, and made a demand of the fodrum, and other services necessary upon that occasion. The emperor, upon his entering Italy, went directly to Milan; and if he had not already received the crown of Italy, he went into the church of St. Ambrose, and laying aside his regal ornaments, he assisted the archbishop as his sub-deacon during the time of divine service. After which, the archbishop anointed him with the sacred oil, and put on his head the sacred crown, upon his swearing the usual oath to defend the rights of Italy. At this time, all magistracies and dignities in the cities were vacant, and the king judged all controversies by the archbishop of Cologne, who was chancellor of Italy. From Milan, the king marched to a plain called Roncalia, near Placenza, where he encamped. The merchants and sutlers that attended the army pitched their tents and booths near the camp in the manner of suburbs, if the camp was square, but in the form of a rampart, if the camp was round. The camp itself was divided into distinct streets, with the emperor's tent in the middle, in the form of a church, and round it were the tents of the nobles. The army being encamped, the king hung his shield upon the trunk of a tree, where all those who held any possessions of the king as fiefs, were summoned by a herald to watch the shield. In like manner, all the nobles summoned by the valvassors subject to them, and those who did not appear on the day following, were deprived of their fiefs. A diet being then appointed, the king received the deputies of the cities, who came to congratulate him, and heard those who had any controversies, which he decided by the advice of persons skilled in the laws; and likewise made new laws if there was occasion. Upon dismissing the diet, the king went attended by the archbishop to Rome, to receive the imperial crown, the principal inhabitants of each city, thro' which he was to pass, meeting him on his journey, which if they neglected to do, they were punished by a fine, or the loss of their privileges, or were reduced to their duty by arms.

(2) Sigon. p. 176.

a membering the emperor's former cruelty, left the field of battle; by whose desertion, those who remained were not only defeated, but almost entirely cut to pieces. Otho with great difficulty escaped from the field of battle; and, being destitute of a retreat, he stripped himself of his imperial habit, and intreated to be received on board a Greek vessel which was then on the coast. After he was on board, thinking himself discovered, he endeavoured to regain the land by swimming; but being retaken, he prevailed with the captain to set him at liberty, by promising him a large sum for his ransom. While Theophania was preparing to pay the ransom, Otho having been landed, and not strictly guarded, took an opportunity of escaping to Rossani, where the empress then was, with those who had saved themselves from the late defeat<sup>2</sup>.

b THE Greeks, instead of pursuing their conquest and marching directly to Rome, spent the rest of the campaign in retaking the places which Otho had made himself master of in Apulia and Calabria, whereby the emperor had leisure to assemble a second army, which he composed of the remains of his former, and the garrisons of several towns. As soon as he found himself able for action, he marched against Benevento, which he took and plundered, as a punishment for the perfidy of their soldiers in the late engagement, they having been the first that deserted. The spring approaching, he afterwards went into Lombardy, to meet the reinforcements that were on their march from Germany. While he was at Verona he held an assembly of the states of Italy and Germany, in which his son Otho, then a boy of ten years of age, was declared emperor. From Verona, Otho returned to Rome, where he fell into a languishing state of health, which was followed by a dysentery, of which he died, on the 7th of December. Among the regulations that he made in Italy, one is remarkable. Finding that the Italians were very guilty of perjury, he ordered, that no Italian should be believed upon his oath; and that in any dispute which could not be proved by other means than witnesses, the parties should have recourse to a duel.

c AFTER the death of Otho, the tranquility of Italy was in some measure disturbed by the return of Boniface from Constantinople, with the design of seizing upon the papal dignity. Boniface, by distributing the treasures which he had formerly taken from the Vatican, soon gained a great party among the Romans, who seized upon the pope, and imprisoned him in the castle of St. Angelo, where he died of hunger; but Boniface survived this second murder but a short time, for he died suddenly four months afterwards. Upon the death of Boniface, John XV. succeeded to the papal dignity; but he was soon after obliged to leave Rome by the tyranny of Crescentius Numentanus, who aspired at the sovereignty of the city, and had assumed the title of consul, and taken possession of the castle of St. Angelo. The Romans being informed that John was very earnestly soliciting the emperor to come into Italy, immediately altered their conduct, and sent an honourable embassy to him, intreating him to return to the city<sup>3</sup>. Otho at this time being greatly engaged with the affairs of Germany, sent his mother Theophania into Italy, with some troops, commanded by Hugh, marquis of Brandenburgh. The presence of the Germans quieted the disturbances at Rome; but not long after their arrival, the city of Milan was greatly harrassed by a sedition of the people, which introduced a new form of government. The sedition was occasioned by the following transaction: Bonicius, the duke, upon the death of Godfrey, the archbishop, obtained that dignity for his son Landulphus; but the people opposing his entering the palace, his father procured the entrance by force, in which skirmish many people were killed, and among the rest one Tatius, a man of great wealth and power. In resentment for the blood spilt in this commotion, Bonicius was privately stabbed in his bed; and while Landulphus was proposing to confer the government of the city upon his elder brother, the people arose and drove them both from the city, and renouncing the government of a duke, chose to themselves consuls, after the example of several other cities in Italy; in consequence of which proceeding, Milan was long afterwards harrassed with the two opposite factions of nobles and people<sup>4</sup>. Soon after this commotion at Milan, Theophania left Hugh, marquis of Brandenburgh, governor of Florence, and returned to Germany, where she died.

d but a short time, for he died suddenly four months afterwards. Upon the death of Boniface, John XV. succeeded to the papal dignity; but he was soon after obliged to leave Rome by the tyranny of Crescentius Numentanus, who aspired at the sovereignty of the city, and had assumed the title of consul, and taken possession of the castle of St. Angelo. The Romans being informed that John was very earnestly soliciting the emperor to come into Italy, immediately altered their conduct, and sent an honourable embassy to him, intreating him to return to the city<sup>3</sup>. Otho at this time being greatly engaged with the affairs of Germany, sent his mother Theophania into Italy, with some troops, commanded by Hugh, marquis of Brandenburgh. The presence of the Germans quieted the disturbances at Rome; but not long after their arrival, the city of Milan was greatly harrassed by a sedition of the people, which introduced a new form of government. The sedition was occasioned by the following transaction: Bonicius, the duke, upon the death of Godfrey, the archbishop, obtained that dignity for his son Landulphus; but the people opposing his entering the palace, his father procured the entrance by force, in which skirmish many people were killed, and among the rest one Tatius, a man of great wealth and power. In resentment for the blood spilt in this commotion, Bonicius was privately stabbed in his bed; and while Landulphus was proposing to confer the government of the city upon his elder brother, the people arose and drove them both from the city, and renouncing the government of a duke, chose to themselves consuls, after the example of several other cities in Italy; in consequence of which proceeding, Milan was long afterwards harrassed with the two opposite factions of nobles and people<sup>4</sup>. Soon after this commotion at Milan, Theophania left Hugh, marquis of Brandenburgh, governor of Florence, and returned to Germany, where she died.

e AFTER her departure from Italy, Crescentius began again to disturb the tranquillity of Rome, by representing to the Romans, that it was disgraceful for them to submit to a foreign yoke, and that they ought now to recover their former liberty. By his great wealth and pretences of regard for their honour, his party soon became very powerful in Rome; upon which he proposed to restore the ancient form of government, and expel the Germans<sup>5</sup>. Otho being informed of these proceedings, by the nuncios of the pope, and his assistance being likewise implored by Landulphus archbishop of Milan, who had fled to his court for protection, upon being entirely defeated by the other faction, he resolved upon an expedition into Italy, to put a stop to the ambition of Crescentius, and quell the commotions in that kingdom.

f AFTER her departure from Italy, Crescentius began again to disturb the tranquillity of Rome, by representing to the Romans, that it was disgraceful for them to submit to a foreign yoke, and that they ought now to recover their former liberty. By his great wealth and pretences of regard for their honour, his party soon became very powerful in Rome; upon which he proposed to restore the ancient form of government, and expel the Germans<sup>5</sup>. Otho being informed of these proceedings, by the nuncios of the pope, and his assistance being likewise implored by Landulphus archbishop of Milan, who had fled to his court for protection, upon being entirely defeated by the other faction, he resolved upon an expedition into Italy, to put a stop to the ambition of Crescentius, and quell the commotions in that kingdom.

<sup>2</sup> SIGEBERT hoc anno. DITMAR, Chron. l. iii. LEO Ostien. l. ii. c. 9.

<sup>3</sup> SIGON. l. vii. p. 182.

<sup>4</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>5</sup> ANN. BARON. anno 985.

Otho marches into Italy, and reduces Milan, where he is crowned.

Having entered that kingdom by the Trentine Alps, he marched directly for Milan, which he besieged with great vigour. The inhabitants at first made a stout resistance; but soon finding themselves too weak to oppose the Germans, they consented to surrender, and accept of Landulphus for their archbishop. Otho entering the city in a triumphant manner, was crowned by Landulphus king of Lombardy; after which ceremony he marched with his army to Ravenna, where he kept the feast of Easter; and the archbishop being lately dead, he conferred that archbishopric upon Gerbert, who the year before had been forced by the pope to quit the bishopric of Rheims, on account of his severe writings against the holy see<sup>d</sup>.

Bruno, a Saxon, is elected pope, and takes the name of Gregory V.

While Otho continued at Ravenna, the deputies of the senate and nobles of Rome came and informed him of the death of the pope, and at the same time desired his orders about the election of a successor. Upon their demand, Otho appointed one Bruno, a Saxon, his own relation, and then only twenty-four years of age, who, after his election, took the name of Gregory V<sup>e</sup>.

Otho marches to Rome, and is crowned with the empress.

A. D. 996.

OTHO then marched to Rome, where the new pope performed the ceremony of coronation of the emperor and the empress Mary, who was daughter of Garcias Sancho, king of Arragon, Navarre, and Gascony. Upon his arrival at Rome, Otho caused Crescentius to be seized, and after consulting with some of the Roman nobles, had resolved to banish him Italy; but Gregory V. interceding in his behalf, he pardoned him, and continued him in his magistracy. Otho having re-established the tranquillity of Italy, left Rome, and marched for

He returns to Germany, and in his march orders the count of Modena to be put to death.

Germany. In his return through Lombardy, he visited some of the principalities, and stopped a few days at Modena, where, according to several historians, the empress Mary endeavoured to draw the count of Modena into a criminal amour with her; but he refusing to hearken to her solicitations, she in a rage accused him to the emperor, as one who attempted to violate her honour. Otho readily believing the accusation of his empress, immediately ordered the count to be put to death, but allowed him, before his execution, to speak to his wife. The count declared to her in the most solemn manner, that he was innocent of the crime of which he was accused, and intreated her to justify his innocence to the world; being then separated from her, he was conducted to the place of execution, and had his head struck off. The army encamping afterwards on the plain of Roncalia, the widow of the deceased count accused the emperor of having put her husband unjustly to death, and proved his innocence by carrying a red hot iron in her hand without being burnt. Otho, surprised at the miracle, acknowledged himself guilty; and the widow demanding the empress to be punished, he ordered her to be burnt alive at Modena, and gave the injured widow four castles as a compensation for the wrongs she had received<sup>f</sup>. Some historians say, that the empress was only disgraced; and others, among whom is the learned Muratori, affirm, that the whole story is false.

The Romans
revolt and expel the pope.

THE Germans had scarce repassed the Alps, when Crescentius began again to disturb Rome, and assume a sovereign authority, by representing to the Romans that it was unworthy of them to submit to a foreign yoke, or to accept of a pope that had been thrust upon them against their inclination: he prevailed with them to revolt against Gregory, and renounce their allegiance to the Germans. The pope, unable to oppose the proceedings of Crescentius, left Rome and retired to Tuscany, and from thence to Lombardy<sup>e</sup>. Crescentius caused one Philagathus to be elected in his room, a Calabrian of obscure birth, who in his youth had been a monk; but leaving that profession, had acquired great wealth at the court of Theophania, and intruded himself by force into the bishopric of Placenza. Gregory being informed of this, went into Germany, to intreat the assistance of the emperor<sup>b</sup>; but before he left Pavia, he excommunicated Crescentius and the pretended pope. In the mean time the Romans, resolving to justify their proceedings, were very diligent in fortifying their city with new works. The following year Otho, prevailed upon by the intreaty of Gregory, returned to

Otho returns to Italy and reduces Rome.
998.

Italy with an army, and besieged Rome, which being soon distressed for want of provisions, was obliged to surrender; Crescentius and the garrison retiring into the strong castle of St. Angelo, formerly called the Mole of Hadrian. Otho being master of the city, seized the anti-pope Philagathus, and ordered his hands and ears to be cut off, and his eyes to be put out, as a sacrilegious intruder<sup>i</sup>. After Easter he ordered the castle of St. Angelo to be attacked, which he quickly reduced; Crescentius, according to Glaber, despairing of being able to make resistance, came out and submitted to the emperor, who refused to accept of his submission, and sent him back into the castle, which he soon after took by assault. But other authors assure us, that Crescentius could not be forced, and was drawn into the emperor's camp under a promise of security, where Otho, contrary to his oath, ordered him to be put to death<sup>k</sup>. Otho having re-established Gregory V. marched against Tibur or Tivoli, which had likewise revolted, and slain their duke Mazolin. At the solicitation of St. Romuald, he Crescentius is put to death, and Gregory restored.

<sup>d</sup> BARON. Ann. 995 & 996.

<sup>e</sup> CHRON. Hildesh.

<sup>f</sup> DITMAR l. iv.

<sup>g</sup> GLABER, l. i. c. 4.

<sup>h</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>i</sup> LEO. Ost. l. ii. c. 18.

<sup>k</sup> ANNAL Sax.

- a pardoned the city, on condition that they delivered up the murderers of the duke, broke down part of their walls, and gave hostages for their future fidelity. After this expedition, Otho returned to Ravenna, from whence he went in the beginning of the year to Venice, in consequence of a vow, and returning to Rome, he made a decree, that the emperor for the future should be elected only by the Germans, and crowned by the pope, which decree was very readily confirmed by Gregory<sup>1</sup>, who died in the beginning of the following year. Upon his death, Otho caused Gerbert, archbishop of Ravenna, to be elected his successor, he having been his preceptor, and the most eminent in that age for his learning and skill in astronomy and philosophy. Gerbert, upon his election to the papal dignity, took the name of Sylvester II. and obtained from the emperor a renewal of the grants of Pepin and Charlemagne, b in favour of the holy see<sup>m</sup>.

Otho having settled the affairs of Italy, prepared to return to Germany; but before his departure, he is said to have done penance for his perfidy, in putting Crescentius to death, contrary to his oath; yet other authors say, that it was on account of his unjustly condemning the count of Modena. He went in penitence to the monastery of St. Benedict on Monte Cassino, where he presented two crowns of silver, and from thence went bare-footed to Saint Michael, on Mount Garganus, now Monte di St. Angelo. He likewise shut himself up with Franco bishop of Worms, in a cell of the church of St. Clement, at Rome, where they continued fasting and praying fourteen days, bare-footed, and clad in sackcloth<sup>n</sup>. Otho having given satisfaction to the church for his crimes, departed with his army to Germany; but he c had no sooner left Italy, than the Saracens made an irruption into Campania, and making themselves masters of Capua, ravaged the country, and threatened to invade the Roman territories. Otho being informed of these new hostilities of the infidels, returned to Italy with such dispatch, that he arrived with his army at Ravenna before the end of March. From thence marching directly against the enemy, he reduced Capua, and drove the infidels from all the towns which they had seized in that province<sup>o</sup>. After this expedition he returned to Ravenna, where he proposed to spend the winter; but hearing of some commotions at Rome, he marched thither with his army, where he kept his Christmas. After this festival, he made enquiry after the authors of the late disturbances, and put to death two of the most guilty, which punishment in some measure quelled the seditious.

Otho does penance at Rome; A. D. 999.

and returns with his army to Germany.

1001.
He again enters Italy, defeats the Saracens, and marches to Rome.

- d DURING this tranquillity, the emperor published several decrees for the better regulation of the church and the empire. He established every-where governors and counts for the administration of justice, and ordered them to enquire into the usurpations made since the time of Otho the Great, and to cause all usurped possessions to be restored to their antient proprietors. These regulations, far from procuring the esteem of the Romans, served only to excite a new conspiracy against the emperor, which was encouraged by the counts of Tuscany. The conspirators, finding that Otho continued in the city with a very few guards, resolved to make use of the opportunity, and suddenly besieged him in his palace. Those that continued faithful ran to his defence, but not being able to resist the conspirators, an accommodation was proposed, during the settling the articles of which, Henry duke of Bavaria, and Hugh
 e governor of Florence, found means of amusing the seditious, and giving the emperor and pope an opportunity of escaping.

The emperor publishes several decrees which irritate the Romans to a revolt.

They attack his palace, and he escapes with great difficulty.

Otho having recovered his liberty, immediately assembled his army, that had been distributed into different quarters, and gave orders to the cities of Italy to send their quota of auxiliaries; at the same time a new reinforcement from Germany was on their march to join him. The Romans, being afraid of his resentment, sent the widow of Crescentius to him, to endeavour to appease him. This woman, who lived with him as his concubine, and was in hopes of being declared empress, finding him inflexible to all her intreaties, and that she herself had even lost his favour, departed full of revenge, and sent him afterwards as a present a pair of poisoned gloves, which affected him with such a languor, that he died soon after at Paterno.

He assembles his army to punish the Romans;

but is poisoned by the widow of Crescentius.

1002.

- f This is the opinion of several authors<sup>p</sup>; but Ditmar assures us, that he died of the small-pox<sup>q</sup>. The Germans endeavoured to conceal his death from the Italians, and marched through Lombardy with the corpse dressed in the regal ornaments; however, the Italians having some suspicion of his death, attacked the Germans at several places; but they defending themselves with vigour, arrived with the corpse at Augsburg, without any considerable loss<sup>r</sup>.

THE emperor's death being known in Italy, Lombardy was again thrown into confusion, upon account of his successor. One Ardoin, marquis of Ivrea, persuaded a great part of the nobles to declare against the Germans, alleging, that as Otho died without children, the Italians ought to assert their independency from a foreign yoke, and chuse a king of their own nation. Having, by his promises and money, prevailed with many of the nobles, an assembly was held at Pavia, where he was declared king. Arnolphus, archbishop of Milan, re-

Ardoin, marquis of Ivrea, is declared king of Italy, by a party of the nobles.

<sup>1</sup> BLOND, Dec. ii. l. iii. Chron. SIGEBERT.

<sup>m</sup> BARONIUS, an. 996.

<sup>n</sup> DITMAR. l. iv.

<sup>o</sup> SIGEBERT, ad ann. 1001. SIGON. l. vii. p. 185.

<sup>p</sup> ANN. PADERB. ad ann. 1002. ADLZREITER.

Histoire de l'Eglise, & du Monde, par BENEDICT. PICTAV. p. 186.

<sup>q</sup> DITMAR. l. iv.

<sup>r</sup> SIGON. l. vii.

The archbishop of Milan, with the bishops, acknowledge the emperor Henry, and press him to come into Italy against Ardoin. turning soon afterwards from Constantinople, protested against the election of Ardoin, affirming, that by a decree of pope Gregory, a king of Italy could not be elected without his consent. He likewise called an assembly of the bishops at Lodi, where the election of Ardoin was declared void, and Henry duke of Bavaria, who had been chosen emperor of Germany, was likewise acknowledged king of Italy. Ardoin, alarmed at the proceedings of the archbishop, immediately assembled some troops, with the resolution to compel the inhabitants of Milan, and the other favourers of the archbishop, to acknowledge his right. Henry being informed of the designs of Ardoin by Arnolphus, sent a small army into Italy, under the command of Otho duke of Carinthia, and governor of the county of Verona; but Ardoin having his troops ready for action, immediately marched against him, and attacking him in the passes of the Alps, before he could be joined by the well-affected Italians, he entirely defeated him, and obliged him to return to Germany. Though Ardoin by this victory was left without a rival in Italy, yet he was not able to reduce several cities in Lombardy, that still continued firm to the interests of the emperor; while others, particularly Pisa, Genoa, and Florence, took the opportunity of those disturbances to lay the foundations of their future grandeur. In the mean time the archbishop of Milan dying, one Adelbert usurped the archbishopric without any election; and pope Sylvester dying at Rome, was succeeded by John Sico, a Roman, who enjoyed the papal dignity only five months, and had for his successor one John Fasan, a Roman, who took the name of John XIX. The year following, the greatest part of Pavia was destroyed by fire, while all Italy was grievously afflicted with a famine, which introduced an epidemical distemper, that carried off great numbers of people.

Henry passes the Alps, defeats Ardoin, and is crowned at Pavia.
A. D. 1005.

The inhabitants of Pavia conspire against the emperor.

Henry pardons the conspirators, and returns to Germany.

Benedict VIII. is chosen pope, but is obliged to leave Rome.

Henry enters Italy with an army;
1013.

and is crowned emperor by the pope;
1014.

HENRY having by this time quieted the troubles in Germany, resolved upon an expedition into Italy, being earnestly solicited by many of the bishops and nobles who were oppressed by Ardoin. Having assembled a formidable army, he arrived at Trento upon Palm Sunday, and after some sharp disputes with the troops of Ardoin, who attacked him in passing the Alps, he encamped near Brenta. Ardoin finding himself disappointed in opposing the Germans in their passage over the Alps, retired with his army to Ivrea, while Henry took possession of Verona without opposition, and marched from thence to Pavia, where he was crowned king of Italy by the archbishop, in the presence of the nobility, and amidst the acclamations of the people. But not many hours after he was in great danger of his life, by an insurrection of the people, who having got drunk upon occasion of the solemnity, were excited by the partizans of Ardoin to quarrel with the Germans, and attack the palace of the king. The army, which was encamped in the neighbourhood of the city, hearing of the danger of the emperor, ran to his assistance, and having got possession of the town by scaling the walls, repulsed the rioters, and with great difficulty were prevented from pillaging and burning the city. Henry pardoned the inhabitants of Pavia, and after giving audience to the deputies of the other cities of Lombardy, who came to assure him of their fidelity, he marched with his army to Milan, and from thence returned to Germany, by the country of the Grisons. Henry not having had time to establish his authority in Italy, immediately upon his departure, Ardoin took the field with an army, and ravaged the Milanese, and other provinces that held for the emperor.

THREE years afterwards, John XIX. dying, Peter, bishop of Alva, was chosen to succeed him, and took the name of Sergius IV. He governed the church of Rome not quite three years, and upon his death, the Romans were divided into factions, upon account of chusing a successor. Some elected one Gregory, but the other faction chose John, bishop of Porto, son of Gregory, count of Tusculum, who was consecrated, and took the name of Benedict VIII. But the party that favoured Gregory soon after prevailing, Benedict was expelled the city, and went to the emperor in Germany, to implore his protection. At the same time Arnolphus, archbishop of Milan, sending ambassadors to Henry, intreating his assistance against Ardoin, he resolved to march into Italy; and having settled the affairs of Germany in the best manner that he could, he left Saxony in the month of September, and entered Italy without any opposition. Ardoin not venturing to appear in arms against him, retired to his castle in Piedmont, and sent deputies to him, offering to deliver up the crown, on condition of being left in possession of the marquisate of Ivrea. Henry rejecting the proposal of Ardoin, marched with his army to the plain of Roncalia, where the nobles of the cities and provinces came and did homage for their fiefs; after which ceremony he held an assembly, in which he published several laws against murder and unlawful marriages. Upon dismissing the assembly, Henry went to Pavia, where he kept his Christmas, and marching afterwards to Ravenna, he conferred the archbishopric of that city, which had been seized by Adelbert, on his brother Arnolphus, and went, accompanied by his queen Cunigond, and many nobles and bishops, to Rome, where he received the imperial crown, which was also conferred on Cunigond, by pope Benedict, who had again got possession of his see. Before he entered the church, the pope

* SIGEBERT, ad hunc an.

† DITMAR, l. vi.

‡ Idem ibid.

§ DITMAR, l. vi. p. 80.

* DITM. ibid.

† Annal. BROUV. p. 385.

‡ DITMAR, l. vii. MURATOR, t. ii. p. 204.

<sup>a</sup> proposed to him the following question: Will you observe your fidelity to me and my successors in every thing? which demand, though a kind of homage, was submitted to by the emperor, who answered in the affirmative. After his coronation, Henry confirmed the privileges and donations granted by his predecessors to the Roman see, and added others, reserving still the sovereign authority, and the right of sending commissaries, to hear and redress the grievances of the people<sup>a</sup>. During his residence at Rome, Ditmar relates, that the Romans made an insurrection against the Germans, which, with great difficulty, and after much bloodshed, was at last quelled by the emperor, who soon after marched for Lombardy, and returned after Easter into Germany<sup>b</sup>. and returns to Germany.

Soon after the departure of Henry, Ardoïn, still pretending to the kingdom of Lombardy, again appeared with a considerable army, and surprising Vercelli, marched against Novara; but not being able to reduce that city, he attacked Como, which he took by assault, and ravaged the country with his troops, even to the gates of Milan. The archbishop of Milan, alarmed at the progress of Ardoïn, sent to Arnolphus archbishop of Ravenna for assistance, who immediately raised an army, and joined that of Milan; after which junction, the two prelates recovered Vercelli and Como, and likewise reduced Cremona, which at first made some resistance. The people favouring the party of the archbishops, their army soon became very formidable; so that Ardoïn, finding himself unable to defend his usurpations, and being sensible that he had lost the affection of the people, retired from the world, and went into the monastery of Frutari, where he died three years afterwards<sup>c</sup>. The following year the Saracens of Sicily, in conjunction with those of Calabria, made a descent on the coasts of Tuscany, took and plundered l'Erici, and made themselves masters of the neighbouring country. Benedit, afraid lest they should advance towards Rome, raised some forces, and wrote to the bishops to join him with their troops, in order to attack the infidels: at the same time he assembled a great many ships, and sent them to that part of the coast where the infidels landed; notwithstanding this precaution, the chief of the Saracens found means of escaping, with a few attendants; but the rest were all killed or taken prisoners; among these last was the general's wife, whom the pope ordered to be beheaded<sup>d</sup>. The archbishops of Milan and Ravenna recover the cities, and Ardoïn retires from the world into a monastery. The Saracens invade Tuscany, but are defeated. A. D. 1016.

ABOUT the same period great disturbances arose in Apulia in Calabria, occasioned by the severity of the Greek governor, named Catapan. The inhabitants of Bari revolted from the Greek emperor, and endeavoured to assert their freedom under the conduct of Melo and Dattus. They were however soon obliged to submit, and Melo and Dattus flying, the one to Capua and the other to Garigliano, a few years after hired some Norman adventurers, by whose assistance they renewed the war. The Normans distinguished themselves greatly by their valour; they were not, however, a match for the power of the Greeks, and Melo was at last obliged to have recourse to the emperor, who was likewise intreated by the pope to march into Italy. Lombardy was at this time greatly disturbed by a civil dissension among the nobles, many of whom envying the great wealth of Boniface, son of Tedald, late marquis of the king's lieutenant in Lombardy, they assembled in a body, and attacked the bride with her retinue. She escaped falling into their hands, but her brother Conrad and several others were slain. The Normans assist the Apulians against the Greeks. 1017.

HENRY, alarmed at the disorders that were increasing in Italy, at last resolved upon an expedition into that kingdom; and having made very considerable levies, passed the Alps with a formidable army in the beginning of the spring. After he had advanced a considerable way in Italy, he divided his army into three bodies, marching himself with the principal division along the Adriatic sea to Traja, a city in Apulia, lately rebuilt and fortified by Basanus<sup>e</sup>; and ordering Poppo, archbishop of Triers, to march through the country of Marsi, now l'Abruzzo, with 11,000 men. He gave the command of the third division, consisting of 20,000 men, to Pelegrine, archbishop of Cologne, and ordered him to march by Rome to Capua, to serve Pandulphus, and the abbot of Cassino<sup>f</sup>. The abbot being informed that the emperor wanted to seize him, embarked at Otranto, in order to sail to Constantinople, but was shipwrecked and perished in the voyage. Pelegrine, being afraid lest Pandulphus should likewise escape, marched directly for Capua, and invested the place; but Pandulphus came out of his own accord and surrendered to Pelegrine, alleging, that he had committed no crime, and was ready to justify himself before the emperor. After the reduction of Capua, Pelegrine joined the emperor, who was then besieging Traja, and having delivered his prisoner, Henry immediately assembled the nobles to judge him. He was found guilty and condemned to death, but at the intercession of Pelegrine his life was spared, and kept in irons. 1021. Henry marches with a formidable army into Italy. 1022.

<sup>a</sup> ADLZREITER.<sup>b</sup> DITM. ubi supra.<sup>c</sup> SIGON. l. viii. p. 190. MABIL. Annal. Bened. sec. vii.

p. 350.

<sup>d</sup> DITM. l. vii. Annal. Boicæ gent. p. 392.<sup>e</sup> BLOND. Dec. ii. l. 3.<sup>f</sup> LEO OST.

l. ii. c. 40.

and he was banished to Germany. The emperor having recovered several cities from the Greeks, had been employed in the siege of Traja for some time, the garrison being very strong, and expecting to be relieved by the emperor Basil, whose feet they boasted Henry would be obliged to kiss. But he having invested the city on every side, raised very strong machines against their walls, and to prevent them from being burnt by the besieged, he covered them with raw hides. At last, after three months siege, the city being greatly distressed, the inhabitants surrendered at discretion, and were pardoned by the emperor, on condition of delivering hostages for their future fidelity <sup>g</sup>.

Henry reduces the greatest part of the cities of Apulia and Calabria. AFTER the reduction of Traja, and receiving hostages from the other cities of Apulia and Calabria, Henry immediately marched to Capua, as his army had suffered greatly by the heats, and a dysentery was very frequent in his camp <sup>h</sup>. Upon his arrival at Capua, he conferred that principality upon Pandulphus count of Tiano, and giving the title of counts to Stephen, Mello, and Peter, nephews of the late duke Mello, he left them, besides the assistance of the Normans, several of his officers, to assist them in recovering Bari. Having settled these affairs, he went with the pope to the monastery of Cassino, where Theobald was elected abbot in the room of Atenulphus, and consecrated by Benedict. Henry, while he was there, being relieved of a fit of the gravel, attributed his cure to St. Benedict, and from gratitude bestowed many valuable presents upon the abbey, and added to its other possessions some fiefs in the neighbourhood of Termini. The distemper still increasing in his army, he left Cassino, and marched to Rome, from whence he soon after set out for Germany, where he died the year following, and was buried at Bamberg. A few months before the death of the emperor, died pope Benedict, who was succeeded by his brother John, then only a laic; but by the force of money, and the strength of the Tusculan faction, he obtained the papal dignity without a competitor, and took the name of John XX <sup>i</sup>.

Conrad duke of Franconia is chosen emperor of Germany. As Henry had no children, some time before his death he recommended to the nobles of Germany, Conrad, duke of Franconia, for his successor. Notwithstanding the recommendation of the emperor, there appeared a great many competitors at the election, which was held in a plain near Worms; but after canvassing the pretensions of the different candidates for six weeks, Conrad was at last elected, and soon after crowned at Mentz, by Aribo the archbishop. As soon as the news of the death of the emperor Henry arrived in Italy, Heribert, archbishop of Milan, held an assembly of the bishops and nobles of Lombardy, in the plain of Roncalia, and proposed to them the election of Conrad; but the greatest part of the nobles being averse to the Germans, refused to agree to the proposal of the archbishop, and inclined to favour some other competitor. The assembly dispersing without coming to any determination, Heribert went into Germany, and from his own authority alone declared Conrad king of Italy, and took the oath of allegiance to him as such <sup>k</sup>. Conrad, in return for the services of Heribert, increased the privileges of his archbishopric, allowing him not only to consecrate, but likewise to appoint the bishop of Lodi. The year after the return of Heribert, the bishop of Lodi dying, the archbishop immediately exercised his right, and appointed Ambrose to fill the vacant see. But the inhabitants of Lodi refusing to accept of him, Heribert immediately raised an army, and besieging their city, compelled them to receive him, and to take an oath of submission. The favour of the emperor, and the success of his arms against Lodi, excited Heribert to oppress the nobles of Milan, many of whom he deprived of their dignities, by which oppression, finding that he had alienated their affections, he accused them of a conspiracy, and expelled them the city. The exiled nobles continuing in a body, took up their habitation in a place called Mons, or Motta (G), between Milan and Lodi, which they fortified; and having made an alliance with some cities disaffected to the archbishop, they assembled their forces and defeated Heribert, who thereupon fled to Germany, and invited Conrad to come into Italy <sup>l</sup>.

The nobles of Italy offer their crown to the king of France. IN the mean time the Italian nobles, who were disaffected to Conrad, sent an embassy to Robert king of France, offering the crown of Italy and the dignity of emperor to him, or his son Hugh, provided he would come into their kingdom with an army to oppose the entrance of the Germans. Robert refused to accept of their offer, both for himself and his son, as he knew he could not form any pretensions to the kingdom of Italy without exposing himself to a war with the Germans. The deputies having received a denial from the king of France, repeated their offer to William duke of Guienne, who, after consulting the king of France, accepted of their offer in favour of his son; and that he might not be disturbed by the Germans,

<sup>g</sup> GLABER, l. iii. c. 1. & lviii. in fine.

<sup>h</sup> LEO Ost. l. ii. c. 42 & 43.

<sup>k</sup> SIGON. l. viii. p. 193.

<sup>i</sup> GLABER, l. iv. c. 1. LEO Ost. l. xxvii.

<sup>l</sup> Idem ibid.

(G) Glaber accuses the inhabitants of this city of having renounced christianity, and offering sacrifices to idols (3).

(3) Glaber, l. iv. c. 2.

a prevailed with many of the nobles of Lorraine to revolt from Conrad, they having at first opposed his election, and favoured one Cono or Conrad the younger<sup>m</sup>. William, thinking that he had disposed every thing to favour his enterprize, set out with an army for Italy; but before he had passed the Alps, he was informed that Conrad had reconciled the malecontents of Lorraine, and by means of the pope, and the archbishop of Milan, had prevailed with the greatest part of the nobles and bishops of Italy to declare for him. Upon this news, William immediately resigned his pretensions to Italy, and returned with his army to Guienne, not thinking it safe to venture among a people so fickle as the Italians, against so powerful a competitor as Conrad.

The duke accepts of their offer, and sets out with an army for Italy.

In the mean time the emperor having quieted the commotions in Germany and Lorraine, b caused his son Henry, then a boy of about eight years of age, to be crowned king of Germany; and publishing throughout all the provinces, that every lord that disturbed the public peace, during his absence, should be put to the ban of the empire, he marched with his army towards Italy, and arrived at Vercelli about Easter. According to Glaber and Sigonius<sup>n</sup>, he met at first some opposition; but having taken Ivrea, and obliged the inhabitants of Motta to surrender, he marched to Milan, and from thence to Modoelia or Monza, where he desired to receive the crown of Italy according to the ancient usage; which being now revived by Conrad, was observed by most of the following emperors. After the ceremony of the coronation, he marched with his army, and encamped in the plain of Roncalia, where he held a diet of the nobles and people, and published several new laws. Upon dismissing the diet, he visited several of the cities of Italy, and sent part of his army to block up Pavia, which city, upon hearing of the death of Henry, had burnt the imperial palace, and being fortified with a strong garrison, had refused to acknowledge Conrad. The imperialists investing the place very strictly, the inhabitants were soon reduced to great distress, and consented to take the oaths of allegiance to Conrad, and rebuild the palace at their own charge. After the reduction of Pavia, the emperor marched with his army to some mountains near the Toza, in the Milanese, where he continued two months, on account of the excessive heats, and in the beginning of autumn he marched to Ravenna, where he spent the winter (H).

Conrad enters Italy, and is crowned at Monza. A. D. 1026.

He obliges Pavia to surrender.

In the spring, Conrad set out for Rome, and upon his approach to the city, the nobility, clergy, and people, came out to meet him, with palms and branches of trees in their hands, d and conducted him to the church of St. Peter; when he came to the steps, he was there received by Rodolphus king of Burgundy, and Canute king of England and Denmark, who walked up the steps, supporting the emperor. The archbishop of Milan being absent, the archbishop of Ravenna took Conrad by the hand, and led him to the pope, who was seated on the steps of the altar; but the deputies of Milan calling out that he usurped the office of their bishop, and a tumult arising, Conrad stopt, and desired the archbishop of Milan might be called. The deputies answering that he was absent, for a just reason, the pope ordered that the bishop of Vercelli, his suffragan, should perform his office; and the tumult being appeased, Conrad received the imperial crown, which was likewise conferred on his wife Giselle<sup>o</sup>. A few days after this ceremony, which was performed on Easter Sunday, Conrad was alarmed with an insurrection of the Romans, which arose from a quarrel betwixt a German and an Italian, e about purchasing the skin of an ox. The Romans running to the assistance of their countryman, immediately grew so outrageous, that they attempted to expel the emperor and his retinue; but the Germans taking arms, repulsed them, and, after much bloodshed, obliged them to submit. After this insurrection, Conrad, not thinking himself safe in Rome, left the city, and marched with his army to Lombardy, and at Verona granted some privileges to that bishopric, the charter being dated in that city on the 20th of May. Soon after he returned to Germany, and called a general diet at Ulm, to judge some nobles that had rebelled during his absence.

He goes to Rome, and is crowned by the pope. 1027.

A FEW years after, a faction in Rome having risen against the pope, expelled him from the city, and committed very great disturbances, which the emperor being informed of, he f marched with an army to Rome, and, after punishing the authors of the commotion, returned to Germany, to defend the kingdom of Burgundy, which had been left to him by Rodolphus.

<sup>m</sup> SIGEBERT, ad an. 1026. WIPPO. <sup>n</sup> GLABER, l. iv. in principio. SIGON. l. viii. p. 193. <sup>o</sup> OTHO Frising. l. vi. c. 29. ARETIN. Ann. Boii, l. v. p. 460. BLOND. Dec. ii. l. 3. SIGON. ubi supra.

(H) About this time flourished Guido Aretin, a monk of the order of St. Benedict, who was invited by the pope, upon account of his eminent skill in musick, he having rendered himself famous by inventing the fix notes, which are still used, and which he named from the first syllables of the following lines of the hymn of St. John.

UT queant laxis
RESonare fibris,

MIra gestarum
FAMuli tuarum,
SOLve polluti
LABii reatum.

He afterwards published a treatise, which he called, Micrologus, and dedicated it to Theobald, bishop of Arce.

The Italians form a resolution of a general revolt. before his death *. Conrad was not long returned to Germany, when the Italians entered into a resolution of a general revolt, and swore that they would not allow any one to reign over them, who imposed any thing upon them without their own consent. The inhabitants of Cremona, finding that their bishop opposed their designs, expelled him and his friends from their city; and not thinking the place strong enough, they entirely destroyed the fortifications, and rebuilt others larger and stronger, with a full resolution to defend their undertaking against the emperor.

Conrad returns to Italy; 1037. CONRAD, though informed of these tumults, was hindered by the affairs of Germany from going into Italy till the end of the following year, when he passed the Alps with a formidable army, and arrived at Verona about the end of December. After Christmas he went to Milan, where he was received with great pomp by Heribert, in the church of St. Ambrose; but the inhabitants of Milan behaving in an insolent manner, he went to Pavia, where he called an assembly of the nobles, to try those who had been accused of raising the late disturbances. Heribert being suspected of encouraging the commotions, was summoned to justify himself before the assembly; but he refusing to submit to their jurisdiction, Conrad ordered him to be seized, and put under a guard. The bishops of Vercelli, Cremona, Placenza, and many others, convicted of the conspiracy, were sent prisoners into Germany; and all those of Cremona, who had been concerned in expelling their bishop, were deprived of their lands for five miles round, which were all conferred upon the bishopric. Upon dismissing the assembly at Pavia, Conrad went to Ravenna; but being informed that Heribert had escaped, by making the German guards drunk with wine, and had returned to Milan, which he was fortifying, he immediately left Ravenna, in order to put a stop to the designs of the archbishop. In his march he took possession of many of the castles of the malecontents, which he razed; and, upon his arriving at Cremona, he was met by the pope, who came there to intreat his favour towards many Italians, who had suffered greatly, though they had not been concerned in the revolt.

He besieges Milan, but without success. FROM Cremona the emperor marched to Milan, and the gates being shut against him, he invested the place, and ravaged all the country in the neighbourhood; but being baffled in his attacks upon the town, and losing a great many men, he set fire to the suburbs, and retired with his army, at the same time depriving Heribert of his archbishopric, which he conferred on Ambrose, one of his cardinals, having prevailed with the pope, who was then only a boy of seventeen years of age, to excommunicate Heribert †. During the summer months Conrad distributed his troops into quarters of refreshment, but in the autumn he again assembled his army, and marched to Parma, where he proposed to continue during the winter. While the emperor was celebrating his Christmas in that city, a sedition arose betwixt the inhabitants and the soldiers, in which some chief officers were killed, at whose death the Germans were so enraged, that they set fire to the city, by which the greatest part of it was destroyed. Conrad, not satisfied with this punishment, ordered their walls to be pulled down, in order to deter other cities from any seditious attempts. After this example of severity he marched to Rome, and having received many embassies from the monks of Cassino, both when he was in Germany and since his coming to Italy, intreating his protection against the violences of Pandulphus prince of Capua, he sent some of his chief officers to him, ordering him to restore all that he had taken from the monastery without delay.

Conrad marches against Pandulphus. PANDULPHUS refusing to obey, Conrad marched to Cassino, where he was received with the greatest respect; and he and the empress having made some rich presents to the monastery, he marched afterwards to Capua, where he arrived on the eve of Whitsuntide, and next day was solemnly crowned (I), after which ceremony he quitted the city, and encamped at Old Capua ‡. Pandulphus having abandoned the place upon the news of the approach of the emperor, had fled to the strong castle of St. Agatha; but finding Conrad absolute master of the country, he resolved to make his peace with him, and offered for his pardon 300 pounds of gold, one half to be paid immediately, and his son and nephew to be given as hostages for the security of the payment of the rest. The emperor agreed to his proposal; but Pandulphus soon after repenting, and refusing to fulfil it, Conrad gave the principality of Capua to Guaimar prince of Salerno, and at his intreaty confirmed Rainulphus the Norman in the county of Aversa. He likewise restored Atenulphus to his archbishopric of Capua, and then marched

He confers Capua on Guaimar, and confirms Aversa to Rainulphus.

* GLABER, l. iv. c. 8 & 9. † SIGON. l. viii. p. 196. HERIBERT hoc an. & seq. l. ii. c. 66 & 67. Chron. Cavense, ad an. 1038. Chron. Cassin. ap. MURATOR, tom. v. p. 56.

‡ LEO Ost.

(I) The coronation spoken of here was only a solemn repetition of what had formerly been done at Rome, Monza, and Germany; it being a custom in those times to perform this ceremony on any of the great feasts of the church: and Conrad is even said by Sigebert to have been crowned the year before, on Whitsuntide, at Missa near Milan.

a with his army to Benevento, from whence he set out for Germany, by the coast of the Adriatic, or upper sea. During his march his army was attacked by a contagious distemper, by which a great many died. among whom was Herman, duke of Suabia, the son of the empress by her first marriage, Canon, duke of Franconia, and Gonild, or Matilda, the daughter of Canute, king of England, who had married Henry, the emperor's eldest son, two years before.

b THE Germans had no sooner left Italy, but Heribert made great preparations for war against Conrad re- Ambrose and all those who favoured him; but Conrad dying the year following, Henry, his turns to Ger- successor, was reconciled to him, and sent ambassadors to him, desiring the crown of Italy, many, where and promising future friendship. The wars in which Henry was engaged with the Bohemians he dies.
c and Hungarians, prevented him for several years from entering Italy. In the mean time, A. D. 1309:
the abbot of Cassino, resolving to expel the son of Pandulphus from the castle of St. Agatha, prevailed with Guiamar, duke of Capua, to march against the place with an army. The garrison being informed that Pandulphus, instead of receiving assistance from the emperor at Constantinople, had been thrown into prison, and hearing likewise that Guiamar intended to give the place to the inhabitants of Tiano, they voluntarily submitted to the abbot.

Soon after the city of Milan was greatly afflicted by domestic dissensions betwixt the nobles and the people, who having divided amongst themselves the power of their former dukes, 1042.
could not agree about one prerogative, namely, the right of possessing the estates of Milan is dying without heirs. Each faction obstinately claiming this right, they had recourse to arms greatly di- to justify their pretensions, and the people, fixing upon Lanzo Curtius, one of the nobles, turbed by two and constituting him their chief, became immediately too strong for the other faction, factions.
c and expelled them the city. The exiles still continuing in a body, and hiring other troops, returned against the city, which they reduced to great distress, by a very close siege. Lanzo, not able to repel the besiegers, fled to the emperor in Germany, imploring his assistance, which Henry immediately promised, on condition that he would admit 14,000 Germans into the city. Lanzo agreed to that condition; but, upon his return to Italy, reflecting that the German auxiliaries might be more dangerous to the city than their domestic enemies, he went privately to the camp of the nobles, and by shewing them their danger, prevailed with them to be reconciled to the people. The year after this reconciliation, Heribert dying, the nobles again began to oppress the people, and in an assembly made two decrees to strengthen d their own power, one for the perpetual banishment of Lanzo and all his relations; the other, that if a nobleman killed a plebeian, he should only be punished by a small fine. The people, enraged at these injuries, chose another of the nobles, named Landulphus, for their patron; and, the year following, at the election of the archbishop, opposed the faction of the nobles with great violence, proposing four candidates against Vido Valvasor, the person named by the nobles. The emperor approving of Vido, who was attached to his interest by a personal friendship, the tumults greatly increased, and the people, in revenge, treated the new archbishop with all possible indignity<sup>d</sup>.

At this time Rome was likewise divided by two powerful factions; the chiefs of the one were the counts of Tuscany, or Tuscanella, who, for almost two centuries, had governed The Romans
e with an absolute authority in the city, and destroyed the freedom of election of the popes. oppose the
The other faction was supported by Ptolemy the consul, a man of great power, and who boasted counts of Tus- to be descended from the emperor Augustus<sup>e</sup>. The Romans under his command took arms, cany, and ex- and expelled pope Benedict, whose scandalous life was universally offensive; at the same time pel pope Bene- substituting one of their own faction, John bishop of Sabinum, who having procured the pa- dict.
pal dignity by the force of his money, took the name of Sylvester III. Benedict was restored A. D. 1044.
three months afterwards by the Tuscan faction, and excommunicated Sylvester; but, finding himself despised and hated by the Romans, he soon after resigned the pontificate to John, archpresbyter of Rome, in consideration of a sum of money, and retired to his father's house, f to continue his debauches with the greater freedom. Being soon tired of a private life, he resumed his dignity, which was at the same time claimed by the other two, who, being each supported by their partisans, maintained themselves upon the revenues of the holy see: thus, while Benedict possessed the palace of the Lateran, Sylvester remained at St. Peter's, and the 1045.
other at St. Mary Major, all three being remarkable for their scandalous lives<sup>f</sup>. Three popes at Roman priest of piety and learning, observing that what they chiefly regarded was the revenues the same time of the church, prevailed with them all to renounce the pontificate, in consideration of a yearly have their revenue, to be paid out of the patrimony of St. Peter, for which service the Romans were so residence at grateful, that they elected him pope, under the name of Gregory VI. Rome.

<sup>d</sup> SIGON. l. viii. p. 101.<sup>e</sup> PETR. DIACON. Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 68.<sup>f</sup> LEO Ostiens. l. ii. c. 80.

OTHON Frisingens. l. ii. c. 32.

Henry marches into Italy
with an army.
A. D. 1046.

Is crowned with the iron crown at Milan.

Gregory VI. is deposed.

Clement II. is consecrated pope, and the same day crowns the emperor and empress.

1047.
The emperor confirms the Norman conquests in Apu-lia.

Clement dies,
and the papal see is again invaded by Benedict.

A. D. 1048.
Damascus II. is sent from Germany, but dies soon after.
Bruno bishop of Toul is elected pope, and takes the name of Leo IX.

1049.

The Normans
invade the territories of the church.
1052.

HENRY being informed of these disturbances at Rome, at last resolved upon an expedi- a tion into Italy, and ordered the nobles of Lombardy to assemble against a certain day at Ron- calia. As he was delayed on his march he did not arrive at the time appointed; and the nobles having waited for him three days, separated on the fourth, after protesting that they had performed their duty as feudatories. Having at last passed the Alps, he marched to Mi- lan without opposition, and establishing Vido, was crowned by him with the iron crown in the church of St. Ambrose; after which ceremony he went to Pavia, where he called an assembly of the states, about the end of October, and restored those that had been exiled by Conrad. The exiles, according to Sigonius<sup>b</sup>, upon their return to Italy, retired from the world, and took the habit of monks of the order of St. Benedict, having chosen for their residence a place called Rondinetum, near Como. The emperor having dismissed the assembly b at Pavia, went from thence to Placenza, where he was met by the pope, who accompanied him to Sutri, in the neighbourhood of Rome; at Sutri he called an assembly of the bishops, where Gregory being accused of simony, was deposed, and the papal see being declared vacant, the Romans referred the nomination of a new pope to the emperor, who proposing Sui- deger, or Hedeger, bishop of Bamberg, he was unanimously approved of, and took the name of Clement II. He was consecrated on Christmas-day, and the same day performed the ceremony of the coronation of the emperor and empress, after which they all three walked to the palace of the Lateran, with their crowns and robes. Having continued about a month in Rome, the emperor sent the late pope Gregory into Germany, and went, accompanied by the pope, to the monastery of Cassino, from whence he marched to Capua, where he confirmed to c the Normans the conquests they had made in Apulia<sup>h</sup>.

He marched afterwards to Lombardy, and celebrated his Easter at Mantua, from whence he proceeded to Roncalia, where he held an assembly of the states, and appointing a bishop for Pavia, and recommending him to the archbishop of Milan, he marched with his army over the Alps, accompanied by pope Clement. The Pavians, refusing to accept of the bishop named by the emperor, the archbishop of Milan raised some forces, in order to oblige them to receive him; but the Pavians meeting him in the field, an engagement ensued, which continued for some time with great obstinacy, till the Pavians being at last defeated, were obliged to submit and acknowledge their new bishop. Soon after the emperor's return to Germany, pope Clement died, which Benedict II. being informed of, he again seized d upon the papal dignity, which he held for eight months, till the arrival of Poppo, bishop of Brescia, who took the name of Damascus II. he being sent from Germany by the emperor, in consequence of a decree made when Henry was at Rome, whereby the nomination of the popes was to depend solely upon the emperor<sup>k</sup>. Damascus enjoyed his new dignity only twenty-three days, and died at Preneſte, whither he had retired during the heats of summer. Benedict, upon his death, again endeavoured to take possession of the papal see.
But being extremely odious to the Romans, they sent an embassy to the emperor, desiring him to name a pope, who accordingly sent Bruno, bishop of Toul, who, with great unwillingness, accepted of his new dignity; but, having given his consent, he put on the pontifical habit, and set out for Rome. On his journey he was met by Hildebrand, abbot of e Cluny, afterwards Gregory VII. who persuading him to lay aside his purple, and not to accept of the government of the church by the appointment of a layman, accompanied him to Rome, where he was unanimously elected by the clergy and people, and took the name of Leo IX.<sup>l</sup> The following year Leo went into Campania, and made the cities renew their oaths of allegiance to the emperor and the church, at the same time dissuading them from any alliance with the Normans, whose power began to be dreaded in Italy. Having likewise freed the Beneventans from the sentence of excommunication, he set out for his bishopric of Toul, in Lorraine, and afterwards had a conference with the emperor at Augsburgh. Upon his return to Rome, he called a council bishops, in which Gregory, bishop of Vercelli, was deposed, f having been accused of adultery and perjury. Soon after, Drago, count of Apulia, having been assassinated by the Apulians, was succeeded by his brother Humphrey, who being desirous of extending his dominions, invaded the territories of the church, plundering many churches and monasteries. At the same time, his brother Richard, count of Aversa, being informed of the death of Pandulphus, raised an army, and took possession of Capua, while the pope, unable to oppose their arms, complained to the emperor, and excommunicated the states of Capua and Benevento. A few months after this incursion of the Normans, Boniface, marquis of Mantua, was assassinated at Spineta, and buried in the church of St. Andrew, at Mantua, built by his wife Beatrice, who had by her husband two children, Boniface and Matilda, afterwards famous for her piety and liberality to the church<sup>m</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> SIGON. l. viii. p. 202.

<sup>h</sup> LEO Ostiens. l. ii. c. 81. Chron. Cavenf. ad hunc an. ROMUALD. Chron. ad hunc an.

<sup>k</sup> LEO Ostiens. l. ii. c. 82.

<sup>l</sup> Ibid. l. ii. c. 82. ROMUALD. Chron. ad hunc an. Pantheon

GODFREDI Viterbiens.

<sup>m</sup> Chron. Cavenf. ad hunc an. SICARDI Chron. Vit. Mathildis à DONIZONE

- a THE Normans still continuing to infest Campania with their hostilities, Leo went into Ger-<sup>Leo IX. goes</sup> <sup>many</sup> to solicit the assistance of the emperor; and after celebrating his Christmas with him <sup>into Germany</sup> at Worms, they had several conferences together about the affairs of Italy. Leo, demanding <sup>to solicit the</sup> the immediate jurisdiction of several abbeys and churches in Germany, that had been granted <sup>assistance of</sup> to the holy see by former emperors, Henry proposed him to give in exchange the city of Benevento, which was accepted by the pope, on condition that the emperor would allow him a strong body of Germans to repel the Normans, who, regardless of the censures of the church, were still committing great outrages in the Roman territories. Henry agreeing to his demand, granted him some troops, which were joined by great numbers of volunteers of profligate characters, who expected to enrich themselves by the expedition <sup>n</sup>.
- b LEO, fully resolved to punish the Normans, marched for Italy with his army, accom-<sup>He returns to</sup> panied by Godfrey, duke of Lorraine, Frederick his brother, and several other nobles of Ger-<sup>Italy with an</sup> <sup>many</sup>. Arriving at Rome about the beginning of Lent, he immediately held a council to de-<sup>army.</sup> liberate upon the expedition, and resolving to go in person against the enemy, the expecta-<sup>A. D. 1053.</sup> tion of all Italy was raised for the event of the campaign. The Normans, alarmed at the great preparations against them, sent a submissive embassy to the pope, desiring peace, and offering to become his vassals, and to hold all their conquests of the holy see. Their request was denied by Leo, who insisted, that their conquests belonged to the church of St.
Peter, and therefore must be restored. The Normans answered, that what they had conquered by their arms they would likewise defend by their arms; and, though very few in number, prepared to defend themselves to the utmost. Leo, having a considerable army, and the Norman force consisting only of a very few infantry, with 3000 horse, he marched on, confident of victory, and gave orders to attack the enemy. His superiority of numbers soon gained him a great advantage, which the Normans being sensible of, they retreated <sup>Engages the</sup> from the field of battle, and pretended to fly. The enemy pursuing them in disorder, they <sup>Normans, but</sup> returned to the charge with great fury, and the Italians immediately flying, they attacked <sup>is entirely de-</sup> the Germans, and, after a very great slaughter, intirely routed them. Leo, during the <sup>feated and</sup> battle, retired to a strong town in the neighbourhood; but, being besieged by the Normans, <sup>taken prisoner.</sup> he was obliged to surrender in a few days, having first taken off the sentence of excommunication which he had laid them under the year before <sup>o</sup>. The Normans received the
- d pope with great respect, and conducted him to Benevento, as though he had been a conqueror. The pope, finding his enemies so courteous, entered into a treaty with them, and confirmed to them all their conquests in Calabria and Sicily, and, after continuing six months at Benevento, he returned to Rome, on the 12th of April, and died a few days after. While <sup>He is set at li-</sup>
Leo continued at Benevento, the emperor caused his son Henry, then a boy of three years of <sup>berty and re-</sup> age, to be declared king of the Romans, in an assembly at Tribur upon the Rhine, soon <sup>turns to Rome</sup> after which he was informed that his enemy Gozelo had married Beatrice, the widow of the <sup>where he dies.</sup> marquis of Mantua, and that Godfrey, Gozelo's son, and duke of Spoletto and Tuscany, had <sup>A. D. 1054.</sup> married Mathilda.

- AFTER the death of Leo, the Roman see continued vacant eleven months and twenty-four <sup>Victor II.</sup> days, occasioned by the violent intrusion of Benedict IX. who was supported by the counts <sup>elect.</sup> of Tuscanella. The clergy, not finding any one to oppose to him at Rome, sent Hilde- <sup>1055.</sup> brand, ambassador to the emperor, desiring him to appoint a person in Germany fit for that dignity. Henry immediately called an assembly of bishops at Mentz, where Gebehard, bishop of Eichstet, was chosen, much against his own inclination, and that of the emperor, who needed him greatly both for the education of his son, and his advice in affairs of state.
 However, he was conducted to Rome by Hildebrand, and being consecrated on holy Friday, took the name of Victor II. <sup>p</sup>. Soon after his promotion he called an assembly at Florence, to which he invited the emperor, who had entered Italy with an army, at the solicitation of <sup>The emperor</sup>
 the Italians, against Gozelo, the husband of Beatrice, whom they accused of aspiring to the <sup>enters Italy</sup> sovereignty of Italy. Upon his arrival the emperor found Gozelo very submissive; and as <sup>with an army.</sup> he publicly declared, that he was contented with the possessions he had acquired by his <sup>Receives the</sup> wife, he received him into his friendship, being afraid that, if he became disaffected, he would <sup>submission of</sup> join in an alliance with the Normans <sup>q</sup>. <sup>Godfrey duke</sup>
<sup>of Lorraine.</sup>

HENRY having celebrated the feast of Easter at Mantua, arrived at Florence about Whit- suntide, and was present at the council, where several new canons were made for the regulation of the church. In the mean time, Gozelo, or Godfrey, duke of Lorraine, notwithstanding his apparent reconciliation with the emperor, left Italy, and went to his brother Baldwin, count of Flanders. Beatrice, his wife, coming afterwards to the emperor, to justify herself and her husband, Henry, who was offended at his departure, detained her, and carried her prisoner with him

<sup>n</sup> HERMAN. Chron. hoc an.

<sup>o</sup> GULIELM. Apul. l. ii. LEO Ostiens. l. ii. c. 85—88. HERMAN. Chron.

hoc anno. Chion. Cavenie. ROMUALD. Chron.

<sup>p</sup> HERM. Chron. LEO Ostiens. l. ii. c. 90.

<sup>q</sup> SIGON.

l. viii. p. 207.

into Germany. Her son Boniface, dying before she left Italy, Matilda remained sole heiress a of all her possessions. Henry, having settled the affairs of Italy, returned, in the beginning of winter, to Germany, and died the year following at Butfeld, near Paderborn, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, having, a little before his death, called a diet of the empire at Goslar, at which the pope was present, and, together with the nobles of Germany, confirmed the election of his son Henry.

He returns to Germany, and dies. A. D. 1056. His son Henry is acknowledged emperor. 1057. IMMEDIATELY after the death of Henry, the empress Agnes, under pretence of being guardian to the young emperor, assumed the whole authority, having gained the bishops and many of the nobles, and likewise secured the fidelity of the troops of Bavaria and Franconia. A diet being soon after called at Cologne, Henry was acknowledged without opposition, and a reconciliation was made betwixt the empress and Baldwin, count of Flanders, and his brother b Godfrey, marquis of Tuscany or Etruria, by means of the pope. The Italians likewise, being now accustomed to the German princes, made no opposition to Henry, and received Gilbert Corrighia of Parma as the emperor's legate, or vicar, in Italy. Victor II. having continued with the young emperor for some weeks after Christmas, returned to Italy, and stopped at Florence. While he continued in that city, Frederic, another brother of Godfrey, marquis of Tuscany, who, two years before, had turned monk at Cassino, and was now elected abbot of that monastery, came to him, attended by eight brothers of the order, to receive consecration, and to complain of some violences of the count of Tiano. The pope having excommunicated the count, created Frederic a cardinal, and soon after consecrated c him abbot of Monte Cassino. The new abbot continued for some time with the pope; but, having obtained his leave, he went to Rome, where, a few weeks after his arrival, news was brought of the death of the pope at Florence. The cardinals immediately assembled for the election of a successor, and, after deliberating some time, united their votes for the cardinal Frederic, whom they brought by force from his lodgings to the church of St. Peter, where he was unanimously declared pope, and named Stephen IX. Immediately after his consecration, Stephen sent Hildebrand, as his legate, to the empress Agnes, to inform her of what had been done, and to consult with her concerning the reformation of the clergy, who were universally accused of simony.

Disputes betwixt the clergy and inhabitants of Milan. THE church of Milan, which, for almost 200 years, had separated from the church of Rome, was, at this time, likewise remarkable for simony, and other irregularities, benefices d being intirely procured by money, without any regard to merit. Landulphus Cotta, the prefect of the people, endeavouring to reform this abuse, was opposed by Vido, the archbishop, who was supported by the nobles. At last, the people having compelled the married priests to perform divine service apart by themselves, and the boys giving them the name of Patarini, in contempt, from the name of the place where they performed their functions, Vido called an assembly of his bishops, and, by a public decree, gave allowance to the clergy to marry.

Stephen forms a design of conferring the imperial crown on his brother. A. D. 1058. STEPHEN having continued four months at Rome, employed in reforming the abuses of the church, went, in the beginning of December, to the monastery of Monte Cassino, where he consecrated a new abbot, and sent him as his legate to the emperor of Constantinople. e Returning afterwards to Rome, he is said, by Leo Ostiensis, to have formed a design of conferring the imperial crown on his brother Godfrey, who, by his marriage with the countess Beatrice, was in possession of Lucca, Parma, Reggio, Mantua, and all that country which is at present called the Patrimony of St. Peter. Stephen, in order to assist his brother to raise troops, sent to the abbot of Cassino, desiring him to bring all the gold and silver of his monastery, as privately as possible, to Rome, promising to repay it in a short time, with a large addition. The abbot obeyed; but, upon his arrival at Rome, testifying a great reluctance at parting with the immense wealth, the pope was so moved, that he ordered it to be immediately carried back, reserving only a small Greek image, which he himself had brought from Constantinople. f Going afterwards to Florence, to have a conference with his brother, and, according to some authors, to declare him emperor, he died in that city, on the 28th of March, in the eighth month of his pontificate.

The Tusculan faction declare the bishop of Velitri pope, by the name of Benedict X. UPON the news of the death of Stephen, great disturbances arose at Rome; the Tusculan faction, presuming upon the minority of the emperor, rushed at night, with a body of armed men, into the Vatican church, where they declared their relation, John bishop of Velitri, pope, by the name of Benedict X. and the cardinals and bishops flying from Rome, they caused him to be consecrated by a presbyter of the church of Ostia, both pope and priest being equally ignorant, as Peter Damian, a man of great piety and learning, and then bishop of Ostia, declares, in one of his letters, that if either of them could read a page, he would

<sup>r</sup> Ibid. l. ix. p. 209.

<sup>s</sup> Leo Ostiensis. l. ii. c. 96—98,

<sup>t</sup> BLOND. Dec. ii. l. iii. SICON. ubi supra.

<sup>u</sup> Leo Ostiensis. l. ii. c. 99 & 100

<sup>w</sup> BLOND. ubi supra.

- a not reckon Benedict a pope, but an apostle *. Hildebrand, at this time returning from his embassy in Germany, and hearing of the intrusion of Benedict, stopped at Florence, and assembling the bishops and cardinals at Siena, elected Gerard, bishop of Florence, who took the name of Nicholas II. Having sent to demand the confirmation of the emperor, Henry not only granted their request, but ordered Godfrey, marquis of Tuscany, to put Gerard in possession of the apostolic see. Before he entered Rome, Nicholas held a council at Sutri, at which were present, Godfrey, Matilda, Guibert, the chancellor, and a great many bishops of Tuscany and Lombardy. The council having deposed and excommunicated Benedict, Nicholas advanced to Rome, where he was received by the clergy and people with great respect. Soon after his arrival he held another council, consisting of 113 bishops, besides abbots, priests, and deacons, in which, among other matters, it was decreed, that, for the future, the pope should be elected only by the cardinals; but, that the emperor might take no offence, a clause was added, reserving to him all due honour and respect †.

The cardinals and bishops elect the bishop of Florence. A. D. 1059.

Benedict is excommunicated.

- As Nicholas wanted to settle all disputes with the Normans, he transferred the assembly to Melfi, whither Robert Guiscard, and his brother Richard, came with a numerous retinue, and proposing to hold their possessions of the pope, it was agreed, that the Normans should restore to the holy see the city of Benevento, and all other lands which they had conquered from it; and that the pope should give them a solemn absolution of all their former sentences of excommunication. Nicholas then gave the investiture of the principality of Capua to Richard, and of the dukedoms of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily, to Robert, both princes swearing to be true and faithful feudatories to the holy see, and to pay every year twelve deniers of the money of Pavia, for every yoke of oxen in their dominions ‡. The treaty with the Normans being concluded, some of that nation, at the persuasion of Nicholas, marched through Campania, and invaded the territories of the counts of Tuscanella, under pretence of their rebelling against their lord the pope. Having entered their country, they committed great outrages, so that the counts were obliged to submit to the pope, and to intreat his intercession with the invaders §.

Pope Nicholas makes a treaty with the Normans; and gives the investiture of Capua to Richard, and of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily, to Robert.

- WHILE these things were doing in Apulia and at Rome, Peter Damian had arrived at Milan, as pope's legate, to terminate the disputes in that city, having been sent for by the prefect Landulphus. The day after he arrived, the people being informed of the design of his coming, assembled in great crowds at the palace, and by ringing the bells, and blowing trumpets, they raised a great insurrection in the city, threatening to put the legate to death, and crying out, that the pope had no right to regulate their church, which was independent of the Roman see. Peter going into the church, made a discourse to the people, which had such an effect upon them, that they immediately submitted. Proceeding then to examine into the grievances complained of, he found that there was scarce one priest, but who had purchased his preferment, and lived with a concubine. The archbishop being brought at last to acknowledge that he had transgressed the canons, and swearing with his clergy never again to commit the like offences, he was pardoned by the legate, who quickly left the place. Upon his departure, the clergy reviling him for betraying the rights of their church, he again allowed them to keep concubines, which being opposed by the people, the city was again thrown into great confusion ¶.

Peter Damian goes to Milan as pope's legate.

The archbishop and clergy swear to reform the abuses in that church. A. D. 1060.

- POPE Nicholas dying about two years after, the city of Rome was greatly divided, on account of chusing a successor, Hildebrand having persuaded the cardinals and bishops to have no regard to the emperor, but immediately to proceed to the election: on the other hand, the counts of Tuscany supported the rights of the emperor, in hopes that he would assist them in recovering what the Normans had lately taken from them. This faction being joined by cardinal Hugh, a German by nation, and by the bishops of Lombardy, they sent an embassy to the emperor, in the name of the senate, the clergy, and people, to present him with a crown of gold, and the title of patrician of Rome, at the same time intreating him to nominate a pope *. Hildebrand and his party, hearing that the other faction were accusing them to the emperor, sent the cardinal Stephen, as their ambassador, to the imperial court; who, after waiting five days, without being admitted to an audience, returned to Rome. Upon his return, the cardinals, pretending necessity, and the danger of a civil war, immediately elected Anselm, bishop of Lucca, who being soon after conducted to Rome by the marquis Godfrey, was consecrated without the authority of the emperor, and took the name of Alexander II.

Rome in great confusion on the death of pope Nicholas. 1061.

The counts of Tuscany support the rights of the emperor, in opposition to the cardinals; who elect Anselm, bishop of Lucca, who takes the name of Alexander II.

- THE news of this election arriving at Basil, where the emperor then was, and had called an assembly of bishops, it was judged a high contempt of the imperial authority; and the chancellor Guibert affirming, that the emperor ought to exercise his power in * PET. DAM. Epist.

† BARON. ad hunc an.

‡ Chron. Cassin. l. iii. c. 16.

GUL. Apul. l. ii.

Vita Nicolai. LEO Ostiens. l. iii. c. 13.

§ Vit. Pont. Rom. a Nicol. Card.

¶ SIGON. l. ix. p. 112.

Vit. Pont. Rom. a Nicol. Card.

* HERM. ad hunc an.

Cadalous bishop of Parma is appointed by the emperor, who takes the name of Honorius II. He goes to Rome with an army, but is defeated by Godfrey marquis of Tuscany.

A. D. 1062.

He again enters Rome, but is besieged in the castle of St. Angelo.

The emperor is taken from his mother, and the administration committed to the archbishops of Cologne and Bremen.

Anno archbishop of Cologne comes into Italy to put an end to the schism of the church of Rome.

A. D. 1064.

The people of Milan expel the married clergy.

Erlembaldus the prefect receives letters of excommunication from the pope against the archbishop.

A. D. 1065.

nominating a pope, proposed Cadalous, bishop of Parma, who was immediately chosen by the bishops of Placenza and Vercelli from Italy, and all the other bishops present in the assembly. Immediately after, being confirmed by the emperor, he assumed the pontifical habit, with the name of Honorius II. and engaging the Lombards to take arms to support his cause, he marched towards Rome, where he had a powerful party that favoured him. Alexander hearing of his approach, retired to Tuscany, while Cadalous, attended by the chancellor Guibert, and many bishops of Lombardy, arrived with his army, and encamped before the city<sup>d</sup>, on the 12th of April. The people of Rome, who had hitherto favoured Alexander, immediately took arms, and having got possession of the gates, made a sally upon the enemy; but, attacking them without order, were repulsed with considerable loss. In the mean time, Godfrey, marquis of Tuscany, having assembled an army, marched to the relief of the city, and attacking Cadalous, entirely defeated him, and obliged him to return to Parma, where he still continued to assume the title of pope, and to endeavour to increase his party by the influence of his money. Having by this means procured the favour of a great many nobles of Rome, in the beginning of the spring he was again invited to the city, which he reached without being observed, by travelling during the night; and, having privately entered the Leonine city, so called from pope Leo, he endeavoured, by the help of his partisans, to get possession of the Vatican. The attack being made during the night, the Romans, at first, were in great confusion; but, by day-break, discovering the fraud, they repulsed Cadalous and his party, and obliged them to fly to the castle, where they were immediately besieged.

In the mean time the young emperor, having been taken by a stratagem from the hands of his mother, who, by several acts of her administration, had given offence to the nobles of Germany; his education, and the management of the affairs of the empire, were committed to Anno, or Hanno, archbishop of Cologne, and Adelbert, archbishop of Bremen, who immediately deprived Guibert of the office of chancellor, and conferred it upon Gregory, bishop of Vercelli. Anno, likewise desirous to put an end to the schism of the church, called an assembly of bishops at Osborne, or Osber, in Saxony, in which Alexander was declared duly elected; but hearing that Cadalous still disturbed Italy by keeping up his pretensions, he went himself into that kingdom; and, arriving at Rome, he represented to the pope, that, by his election, he had infringed the rights of the emperor, and therefore he ought to resign, or call a general council, to shew the justice of his cause. The pope received Anno with great civility, and consented to a general council, which was called at Mantua: and Alexander, in the presence of the Italian, German, and Spanish bishops, clearing himself, by an oath, of the crime of simony, of which he was accused, Cadalous was unanimously deposed, and the right of Alexander acknowledged. In the mean time Cadalous, finding his cause declining, bribed Cincius, a Roman citizen of great power, by whose means he escaped from the castle of St. Angelo, and returned to his church, where, though despised by every man, he still retained the pontifical habit till his death, which happened the year following.

DURING these disputes betwixt Cadalous and Alexander, the faction still continued at Milan, to the great disturbance of the peace of that city; for Erlembaldus, the prefect of the city, having received from Alexander, soon after his promotion, a decree, condemning the clergy who kept concubines, immediately expelled all the clergy who had families from the city, and threatened the archbishop, the captains and their vassals, with death, if they offered to make any opposition. He was assisted by one Arialdus, a deacon of noble birth, who, several years before, had gone to reside at Milan, to oppose what he reckoned a heresy among the clergy<sup>e</sup>. Erlembaldus, after dismissing of the council at Mantua, waited upon Alexander at Lucca, where he obtained a new edict against the married clergy, and likewise letters of excommunication against the archbishop Vido, which he published upon his return to Milan. The archbishop being highly offended at this proceeding, on the Sunday of pen-tecost exclaimed against Erlembaldus from the pulpit; and a tumult arising, the different parties attacked one another in the church, and continuing the attack afterwards in the streets, a great many persons were slain. The citizens blaming Ariald, as the cause of this disturbance, he thought fit to leave the city: but, being seized near the Lago Maggiore, by the niece of the archbishop, he was cruelly put to death by her servant-maids<sup>f</sup>. Erlembaldus, after the death of Ariald, continued quiet for some time; but, going the following year to Rome, he obtained a decree, that no person ought to be accounted a lawful bishop, though chosen by the clergy and people, unless approved of by the pope; and returning to Milan, obliged the clergy and people to give their assent to it by an oath.

<sup>d</sup> Otho Frisingens. l. vi. c. 44. Vit. Pont. Rom. a Nicol. Card. Mediol. Histor. l. iii. c. 29. SYRUS in Vit. Ariald.

<sup>e</sup> BARON. Annal.

<sup>f</sup> LANDULPH.

- a VIDO, finding no end of the disturbances, at last resolved to abdicate his bishopric, and sent the pastoral rod and the ring to the emperor. Godfrey, a deacon of that church, having before made a private agreement with Vido, immediately went into Germany, and, by giving a large sum of money to the emperor, obtained from him the investiture of the archbishopric. Godfrey was equally unacceptable to both factions; and the pope having sent letters to Milan, condemning his election, Erlembaldus opposed his entrance into the city, and obliged him to retire, first to Varisum, and from thence to Castellio, where he was besieged for several months. While the inhabitants of Milan were employed in this siege, their city, by some unknown means, was set on fire, and the greatest part of it consumed, which calamity obliged the citizens to raise the siege of Castellio. But, upon their return to Milan, taking an oath never to admit Godfrey, Erlembaldus informed the pope of their resolution; and, having received the title of standard-bearer of the holy Roman church, he procured the election of one Atto, who was consecrated in the presence of the pope's legate, without the authority of the emperor. The other faction, highly displeased at this infringement of the emperor's right, assembled in a tumultuous manner, and broke into the palace, as the new archbishop and his friends were going to sit down to a grand entertainment. The guests immediately dispersed; but the rioters having found Atto, beat him in a cruel manner, and dragging him out from the palace, obliged him to abdicate his new dignity in the church of St. Ambrose. The pope being informed of this disturbance, excommunicated Godfrey, and confirmed the election of Atto by a new decree; while the emperor, thinking his prerogative infringed by the proceedings of the pope, assisted Godfrey to recover a part of the possessions of his bishopric, who, in the mean time, resided at Brescia, a small city on the frontiers of Montferrat. The pope being highly displeased that the emperor had opposed his decrees, made complaints to Anno, archbishop of Cologne, and Herman, bishop of Bamberg, who were then in Italy collecting the revenues of the empire; and the following year sent by them letters to the emperor, citing him to appear before his tribunal, to justify himself of the crime of simony, and giving the investiture of churches without the approbation of the see of Rome.

A. D. 1067.

Erlembaldus
procures the election of At-
to a priest, who is confirmed without the authority of
the emperor.
A. D. 1072.

1073.

<sup>8</sup> ARNULPH. Histor. Mediol. l. iii. c. 23. SICON. l. ix. p. 217.

The history of the Popes.

- d ALEXANDER dying soon after, on the 20th of April, this citation had no effect; and his successor Hildebrand, who took the name of Gregory VII. having been elected in a precipitate and irregular manner, the day after the death of Alexander (K), thought proper, at first, not to irritate the emperor, but sent an embassy to him at Augsburg, declaring, that he had been elected against his will, and intreating him not to consent to his election, promised that he would not allow himself to be consecrated till he had received his determination. Henry was almost prevailed upon, by the persuasions of the nobles and bishops of Germany, to take Gregory at his word, and to refuse his consent; but, as it was his own opinion that Gregory's submission and humility were sincere, he sent count Eberhard to Rome, to enquire into his election. Gregory received the count with great respect, and soon satisfied him with regard to his election; which the emperor being informed of, he sent the bishop of Vercelli, his chancellor in Italy, to confirm his election, and to be present at his consecration. Gregory, having now got full possession of the apostolic see, soon discovered by his letters, that he was resolved, at any rate, to oblige the emperor to desist from conferring benefices: and likewise published a decree, forbidding the bishops to take the title of pope, which name he appropriated to himself alone. Before he was elected, he sent the cardinal Hugh, as his legate, into Spain, to reform the abuses in that kingdom; but principally to claim, for the apostolic see, all the conquests that had been lately made from the Moors, under pretence that the kingdom of Spain, before the invasion of those Infidels, was tributary to the Roman see. Henry, finding that Gregory began his pontificate with vigour, sent him a submissive

Death of
Alexander, and election of
Gregory VII.

The emperor confirms his election;

and sends a submissive

<sup>h</sup> BARON. Annal. Lambertus, hoc anno.

(K) Gregory was born at Soan in Tuscany, of a low extraction, his father being a carpenter. He made early progress in literature, and being of an active and ambitious spirit, soon distinguished himself in life. He was sent by Victor II. as legate into France, and employed afterwards in several embassies. During the pontificate of Alexander, being created chancellor, he ruled the church with an absolute authority; and discovering an extraordinary zeal for extending the power of the apostolic see, he was chosen by the cardinals to succeed him. He was of a low stature and ungraceful appearance, but an impetuous and domineering spirit. Not content with being the spiritual head of Europe, he arrogated to himself temporal authority, deposing princes, and conferring kingdoms; his extravagant ambition, which, in a more enlightened age, would have appeared chimerical, then meeting with success.

letter,

letter to him, acknowledging his errors.

Gregory receives the allegiance of the dukes of Benevento and Capua.

He threatens to excommuni-cate the king of France.

A. D. 1074.

Gregory sends his legates into Germany to hold a council;

but, being prevented by the emperor, they return to Italy.

A general council at
Rome.

Gregory proposes a crusade against the Saracens.

The Normans obliged to quit their conquests in Campania.

A. D. 1075.

letter, acknowledging his former errors, which he attributed to his youth, and to bad coun- a sellors, and desiring him to correct what was amiss in the church of Milan, promising to assist him in every thing with his imperial authority <sup>1</sup>.

In the mean time the pope left Rome, and having visited Paterno, went to Monte Cassino :
from thence taking the abbot Desiderius along with him, he went to Benevento, where he entered into an agreement with Laudolphus, by which the duke bound himself never to be unfaithful to the holy Roman church, under the penalty of forfeiting his title. From Bene- vento, Gregory went to Capua, where he received the oath of fidelity from duke Richard, who, among other things, promised to assist the pope in defending the rights of St.
Peter, to resign all the churches of his dominions to the authority of the Roman see, and to take the oath of allegiance to the emperor, when he should be desired by the pope or his b successors. While he continued at Capua, he ordained James, archbishop of Cagliari, and sent a letter to the governor of the island of Sardinia, informing him, that the dominion of Sardinia belonged to the Roman see, and that the Normans and Lombards had formerly desired leave to invade it, promising to resign one half of the island entirely to the see of Rome, and to pay homage for the other half: but, if he continued in his obedience, he would not allow any one to molest him. Before he returned to Rome, he wrote a letter to the bishop of Chalons, threatening to excommunicate the king of France, and to absolve his subjects from their allegiance, if he did not desist from conferring of benefices for money, of which heresy he was then greatly accused.

THE good understanding betwixt the emperor and the pope was of very short continu- c ance; for, the following year, he sent the empress Agnes, and four Italian bishops, as his legates, to the emperor, to hold a council in Germany, in order to judge and condemn all the bishops and abbots who should be found guilty of simony. The emperor received the legates with great civility, but, by the general advice of his clergy, would not allow them to call a council in Germany; and ordered the bishop of Bremen to tell them, that the archbishop of Mentz was declared the only vicar of the apostolic see in Germany by the late pope Alexander II. The legates insisted that this grant ceased with the death of the pope; but, not being able to obtain any thing of the emperor, they excommunicated the bishop of Bremen, who pretended, that the privilege of vicar belonged to him as well as to the arch- d bishop of Mentz <sup>k</sup>; after which they returned to Rome <sup>l</sup>.

In the mean time Gregory held a general council, at the Lateran, of the bishops and abbots of Italy, in which were present the marchioness Matilda, and Gisulphus duke of Sal- erno, besides Guibert, or Gilbert, the late chancellor, who had been created archbishop of Ravenna by Alexander. In this council it was ordained, that if any one should take the investiture of a church from a layman, both he who gave, and he who received, the investiture should be excommunicated <sup>m</sup>. The archbishops of Ratisbon, Constans, and Lusanne, with the counts Edward and Uldaric, were likewise excommunicated, being accused of advising the emperor to claim the privilege of conferring benefices. The council likewise decreed, that all married priests should either dismiss their wives or be deposed; which decree, when it was published in Germany, was opposed by all the clergy in that kingdom, who accused the pope of contradicting a precept of St. Paul. Nevertheless, Gregory persisted in his purpose, and renewed a decree of his predecessors, forbidding any one to hear mass performed by a married priest. Gregory, having dismissed the council, wrote to the count of Burgundy for a body of troops, designing an expedition against Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, who, tho' excommunicated by the late council for invading Campania, still continued his hostilities, and had made an alliance with the emperor Henry <sup>n</sup>. Besides this expedition against the Normans,

Gregory proposed a crusade against the Saracens, who were then threatening Constantinople; for which purpose he wrote several letters to all Christians, exhorting them to lay down their lives for their brethren; and having by this means levied 30,000 men, he wrote to the em- f peror, desiring his council and assistance, informing him, that he designed likewise to recover the Armenians to the true faith <sup>o</sup>. But Henry paying no regard to his letter, and the emperor of Constantinople having gained some advantages over the Saracens, this expedition of the pope was laid aside; however, the Normans, alarmed at these warlike preparations, ceased their hostilities, and evacuated Campania; and Robert wrote to the pope, offering any security for his future fidelity, on condition of being absolved from the sentence of excommunication. Gregory did not grant his request, but referred it to the consideration of a general council, which was to be held at Rome the following year, during the time of Lent. The

<sup>1</sup> Epist. Henri. ap. BARON.

ARRAGON. ap. MURATOR. BLOND. Dec. ii. l. iii. LAMBERT, hoc an.

<sup>k</sup> PETRUS Bibliothec. in Vit. Pontif. Rom.

<sup>l</sup> Vit. Pontif. Rom. a Card.

NULPH. Hist. Mediol. l. iv. c. 7.

<sup>m</sup> SIGON. l. ix. p. 217.

<sup>n</sup> AR-

<sup>o</sup> GREG. l. i. epist. xlix. l. ii. epist. xxx, & xxxvii.

a council being assembled, threatened Philip, king of France, with excommunication, if he did not satisfy the nuncios of the pope; and they suspended the archbishop of Bremen, and the bishops of Strasburgh, Spire, and Bamberg, if they did not appear to give satisfaction before Easter. In Lombardy the bishop of Pavia was suspended, and the bishop of Piacenza deposed.

ABOUT this time Gregory wrote to Sueno, king of Denmark, desiring him to send deputies to Rome, to inform him of the state of affairs in his kingdom, and offering him a province of Italy, then possessed by the heretics, if he would assist the holy see against its enemies. These arbitrary proceedings of the pope gave new spirits to the faction of Erlembaldus at Milan. At the feast of Easter, Erlembaldus presenting a new chrism for the use of baptism, and the cardinals of the church refusing to consecrate it, one Luitprandus, a priest, usurped their office, and baptized all that presented themselves. The people, highly offended at this usurpation, left the city, and made an agreement, which they confirmed with an oath, to accept of no archbishop who was not confirmed by the emperor. Soon after, returning to the city, they slew Erlembaldus in a tumult, and seizing Luitprandus, cut off his nose and ears. Henry having been engaged in a war with the Saxons ever since the accession of Gregory to the pontificate, had hitherto behaved with respect and submission, not willing to increase the number of his enemies, and hoping that the pope would observe some measure in his conduct; but finding his usurpation exorbitant, he resolved to assert his own authority; and as the inhabitants of Milan refused to accept of Godfrey, and had sent an embassy to him, acquainting him with the death of Erlembald, and desiring an archbishop, he allowed them to choose whom they pleased promising to confirm him. The ambassadors fixing upon Tedald or Theobald, one of the king's chaplains, he received the investiture of the archbishopric, and at Milan was consecrated by the same persons who had formerly consecrated Godfrey. Thus at the same time there were three archbishops to the same see; Theobald residing at Milan, Godfrey at Plebia or Brebia, and Atto at Rome.
 HENRY likewise countenanced the bishop of Bamberg, and the other bishops suspended by the council of Rome; and the archbishop of Mentz went to Italy to intercede with the pope in their behalf; but he could obtain nothing from Gregory, but leave to assemble a council in Germany, in order to determine the dispute concerning the celibacy of the clergy.
 The assembly was accordingly held at Mentz, in the month of October; but the pope's legate, who had attended the archbishop into Germany, had no sooner proposed the question concerning celibacy, than the whole clergy who were present rose up in a tumultuous manner, and threatened the life of the archbishop and the legate. The assembly immediately dismissing, the archbishop wrote to the pope, referring all future determinations of that question to the see of Rome.

IN the mean time, Gregory having received an embassy from Geyza, king of Hungary, who, the year before, had expelled Solomon, he wrote a letter to him, informing him, that the kingdom of Hungary had been granted to the see of Rome, by Stephen, their first Christian king; therefore, if he would hold it as a fief of the holy see, he might expect his assistance against his competitor Solomon. He wrote likewise to Demetrius, king of Russia, who, being engaged in a war with his brother, had sent his son to Rome, offering to hold his kingdom as a fief of the apostolic see, on condition of having the investiture from the pope; wanting thereby to strengthen his authority against the party of his brother. Gregory, willingly embracing this opportunity of gratifying his ambition, together with the letter sent his nuncios into Russia, to strengthen the party of the king, and to receive his submission.

NOT long after he was attacked in Rome, by means of Guibert, or Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, who, being desirous of the pontificate for himself, had continued in the city after the dismissal of the council, and had entered into a conspiracy against the pope, with one Cincius, prefect of the city, a man of great wealth, but excommunicated on account of his profligate life. Cincius, having a great many troops always at his command, one Christmas eve seized the pope, while he was celebrating mass in the church of St. Mary Major, and stripping him of his pontifical robes, dragged him from thence, and shut him up in a strong tower. He met with no opposition in committing this violence, as the people had been expressly forbid to assemble in the churches that evening, on account of the heavy rains which had almost rendered the streets impassable; but the news of the pope's being seized spreading through the city, they assembled from all quarters, and being informed where he was detained, they attacked the tower with great violence. Cincius, finding that he should soon be forced to surrender, went and threw himself at Gregory's feet, and having obtained his promise of

<sup>P</sup> ARNULPH. Histor. Mediol. l. iv. c. 9 & 10. <sup>SIGON.</sup> l. ix. p. 219.
<sup>senior.</sup> Histor. Mediol. l. iv. c. 2. <sup>BARON.</sup> Annal. ad ann. 1075.

xvii. p. 148. <sup>LAMBERT.</sup> Schafn. ann. 1076.

<sup>9</sup> SIGON. ubi supra. <sup>LANDULPH.</sup>
<sup>1</sup> Acta Greg. apud BOLL. tom.

but is forced to deliver him up next day. pardon, set him at liberty; upon which he returned to the church, and finished the service, though greatly wounded in the forehead by a sword which was aimed at his neck. The protection of the pope saved Cincius from the fury of the populace; but, at the following Easter, he and all his accomplices were banished for ever from the city<sup>a</sup>. Gilbert, seeing the bad success of the conspiracy, left Rome, and retired to Ravenna, where he entered into new designs against the pope, with Theobald, archbishop in Milan, and the other bishops of Lombardy.

A. D. 1076. Gregory accuses the emperor of several crimes, and cites him to appear before the council of Rome. In the mean time, Gregory having written several sharp letters to the emperor, accusing him of communicating with the excommunicated bishops (L), and of conferring the churches of Fermo and Spoletto on persons unknown to him, at last sent his legates into Germany, citing him to appear at the council of Rome, to answer to the crimes of which he was accused, and threatening him with immediate excommunication, if he neglected to appear<sup>b</sup>. The emperor, highly offended at this summons, dismissed the legates with great contempt; and, finding that while Gregory held the pontificate he could not enjoy the empire in peace, he called an assembly of bishops and abbots at Worms, against the 23d of January, in order to depose the pope<sup>c</sup>. The emperor came to Worms, on the day appointed, with a great many bishops and abbots; and the cardinal Hugh, surnamed Candidus, or White, having lately entered into the designs of the archbishop of Ravenna, came to the assembly, and, accusing the pope of simony, murder, atheism, and many other crimes, the greatest number of the bishops immediately declared, that Hildebrand could be no longer pope, nor have any power to bind or loose. The bishops of Worms and Mentz objected to the justness of this sentence, affirming, that it was not right to condemn a person absent, even without witnesses; but being at last brought to give their consent, one Roland was sent to Rome with a copy of the sentence against the pope. Roland made such dispatch, that he arrived at the city the day before the opening of the council, and, appearing next day at the assembly, delivered the letter from the council of Worms.

Gregory excommunicates the emperor. The Lombard bishops depose the pope. The pope appeared unconcerned at the sentence of deposition, and, at the next meeting of the assembly, proceeded to excommunicate the emperor, absolving likewise all his subjects in Germany and Italy from their oaths of allegiance (M). The assembly afterwards excommunicated the archbishop of Mentz, and many bishops of Germany, Lombardy and France, upon various accusations, and drew up several resolutions, under the title of Dictatus papæ<sup>d</sup> (N), all tending to ascertain the despotic authority then usurped by the pope. The bishops of Lombardy, alarmed at the proceedings of the council of Rome, by the advice of Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, assembled at Pavia, after Easter, and, in imitation of the council of Worms, deposed Gregory, accusing him of the most horrid crimes. In the mean time, the bishops of Germany, repenting of what they had done at Worms, sent to the pope, acknowledging their error, and begging absolution of the censures they had incurred. Gregory, after some difficulties, was reconciled to them, and wrote general letters to all the bishops, nobles, and people in the empire, exhorting them to defend the Roman church, and justify his sentence against the emperor<sup>e</sup>.

The bishops and nobles of THE German bishops having thus gone over to the party of the pope, Henry soon found himself deserted by the greatest part of his subjects, many of the nobles finding their personal

<sup>a</sup> ARNULPH. Hist. Mediol. l. v. c. 6. Card. ARAÇON. in vita Greg. a PANDULPH. PISAN. & aliis apud MURATOR. tom. iii. <sup>b</sup> LAMBERT. Schafn. ubi supra. SIGON. ubi supra. <sup>c</sup> See the History of the empire.

<sup>d</sup> GREG. l. ii. epist. lv. <sup>e</sup> GREG. l. iv. epist. i.

(L) Excommunications in the first ages of the church were used with great reserve, and only for sacred matters; but in the 10th and 11th centuries they began to be thundered out for the slightest reasons, and to support temporal interests. An excommunicated person was deprived of the society of other Christians, even of his wife, children, and servants. He lost the protection of the laws, and all right to his property; likewise those that conversed with him were thereby excommunicated. Their great frequency, at last, obliged the popes to abate their rigour; and Gregory permitted the wife, children, domestics, and vassals of the excommunicated person to converse with him. He likewise allowed others to enter his territories, to buy and sell things necessary for life, and to receive presents from him (1).

(M) The popes had long presumed to arbitrate the differences of princes in an arbitrary manner, threatening them with excommunication if they did not submit to their sentence; which was, indeed, making themselves their superiors and judges in temporal matters; but, before Gregory, no one had ever dared to depose sovereigns. This was the first step made by the popes entirely to shake off the yoke of the emperors, which independence they have ever since maintained, and from being subjects, first of the Roman and Greek emperors, and afterwards of Charlemagne and the German empire, they now claimed to be superiors of all the sovereigns on earth (2).

(N) The following are some of the most remarkable of these resolutions, viz. That the Roman pontiff alone can be called universal. That he alone can depose bishops. That his legates have a right to preside over all bishops at a council. That the pope can depose the absent. That he alone has a right to use imperial ornaments. That princes are bound to kiss his feet alone. That he has a right to depose emperors. That no synod or council, without his commission, can be called general. That no book can be reckoned canonical without his authority. That his sentence can be annulled by none; but that he may annul the decrees of all. That the Roman church has never erred, nor ever will err. That he is not a catholic that dissents from the Roman church. That subjects may be absolved from their allegiance to wicked princes (3).

(1) Acta Concilii Romæ anno 1078, apud Baronium. l. ii. epist. lv.

(2) Otho Frising. de gest. Fred. l. ii. c. 1.

(3) Greg.

- <sup>a</sup> interest in depriving him of his crown, and others being piqued at disappointments in their Germany de-ambitious views. Having received a second letter from the pope, exhorting them to pre-<sup>sent the empe-</sup> vail with the emperor to obey the apostolic see, and, in case of his refusal, to elect another, they assembled at Tribur, on the 16th of October, in order to restore the peace of the empire, Gregory having sent two legates to be present at the assembly, which was almost wholly composed of malecontents, the errors of the emperor's former life were recapitulated, and it was proposed, as the only means of saving the empire, to elect another prince, capable and willing to reform all abuses. In the mean time, Henry, with those of his party, came to Oppenheim, on the opposite side of the Rhine, and, being informed of the disposition of the diet, solicited the nobles, by frequent embassies, not to deprive him of his crown, promising any security for his future conduct. The nobles, at <sup>b</sup> first, instead of favouring him, proposed to pass the Rhine, and attack his army; but, on the last day of the diet, the Suabians and Saxons sent ambassadors to him, informing him, that they had determined to leave the whole affair to the determination of the pope, in the <sup>and submit his</sup> presence of a general diet, to be held at Augsburg, on the 2d of February: that, in the mean <sup>cause to the</sup> time, he should dismiss all excommunicated persons from his presence, disband his army, and <sup>determination</sup> retire to Spire, as a private person; but, if he was not absolved from the sentence of excommunication before the twelve months were expired, they would, without any more regard to him, chuse another emperor. Henry, who was on the point of losing his kingdom, made no difficulty of accepting the condition; but soon after reflecting, that if he trusted the cause to <sup>c</sup> the diet of Augsburg, the year might expire before he was absolved from the excommunication; he therefore left Spire, with the empress and his young son, attended with very few servants, designing to go for Italy, and, if possible, to obtain absolution from the pope.
Gregory had, at this time, set out for Rome, on his journey to Augsburg, attended by the countess Mathilda, who, by the death of her mother Beatrice, had this year succeeded to vast possessions in Italy<sup>a</sup>, and, from her aversion to the emperor, and opinion of the sanctity of the pope, had put herself wholly under his direction, so that they were accused by their enemies of a criminal intercourse.
- By his success in deposing the emperor, Gregory had greatly raised the reputation and authority of the holy see; and at the desire of the duke of Croatia and Dalmatia, who offered <sup>Gregory con-</sup> <sup>d</sup> to hold his dominions of St. Peter, he sent two legates into that country, who, having re-<sup>fers the title</sup> ceived the submission of the duke, gave him the investiture of his dominions, and conferred <sup>of king on the</sup> upon him the title of king<sup>b</sup>. Gregory likewise received an embassy from Roger, count of <sup>duke of Dal-</sup> Sicily, who, having conquered almost all that kingdom, sent to the pope, desiring his blessing, the pardon of his sins, and the title of a son of the church; all which he obtained, on condition of performing a certain penance, and abstaining from any communication with his brother Robert, duke of Apulia<sup>c</sup>, who was then excommunicated. This year there likewise arrived at Rome, an embassy from Anzir, king of Mauritania, or Morocco, who sent all the Christian captives in his dominions to the pope, desiring him to consecrate one Servandus, who had been chosen bishop of Hippo or Bona.
- <sup>e</sup> In the mean time the emperor, having celebrated his Christmas at Besanson, pursued his <sup>The emperor</sup> journey, though in the middle of a very severe winter, and having, by the help of guides, passed <sup>arrives in</sup> <sup>d</sup> Mount Cenis, arrived in Italy with a very few attendants. Upon the news of his arrival in <sup>Italy, and is</sup> that kingdom, he was immediately joined by Theobald and Gilbert, and the other bishops <sup>joined by the</sup> of Lombardy; and it being reported that he was come with a design to depose the pope, the <sup>bishops and</sup> counts joined him with their forces, so that in a few days he found himself at the head of <sup>nobles of Lom-</sup> a considerable army. Gregory, who had proceeded on his journey to Augsburgh as far as <sup>A. D. 1077.</sup>
Trento, hearing that the king was come into Italy, and was marching towards him with an <sup>The pope, igno-</sup> army, immediately suspecting some hostile intention, he returned with Mathilda to the castle <sup>rant of his de-</sup> of Canosa. But he was soon undeceived by the excommunicated bishops from Germany, who <sup>sign, retires to</sup> <sup>f</sup> having likewise passed the Alps, came barefooted to Canosa, begging absolution, which, after some rigorous penance, was granted to them, on condition of not communicating with Henry, till he had satisfied the holy see. In the mean time, Henry having obtained a conference with the countess Mathilda, prevailed with her to intercede for him with the pope, and upon her return sent along with her several of the chief nobles of Italy, who he believed had influence with his holiness. Gregory resisted the importunities of Mathilda and the nobles a long time;
 at last, he said, If Henry is truly penitent, let him deliver up his crown, and the other ensigns of his royalty, and declare himself unworthy to possess them. This sentence appearing too hard, he was at last prevailed with to allow him to come to Canosa.
- HENRY* accordingly leaving his army at Vercelli, appeared before the castle with a few attendants<sup>d</sup>, and being admitted alone within the outermost of the three walls that surrounded the fort, he stood there barefooted, in a very vigorous season, for three whole days, waiting

<sup>a</sup> LAMBERT. Schafn. ubi supra. SIGON. l. ix. p. 220. Card. ARAGON in vita Greg.

<sup>b</sup> BARON. Ann. ad ann. 1076.

<sup>c</sup> GREG. l. iii. epist. xi.

<sup>d</sup> DONIZO in Vita

<sup>e</sup> BLOND dec. ii. l. 3.

Henry is absolved by the pope.

Mathilda gives all her possessions to the holy see.

The Italians are offended with the emperor.

Henry is reconciled to the Italians.

He is deposed by the Germans, who give the empire to Rodolphus.

The pope is greatly embarrassed,

Henry opposes Rodolphus.

Gregory sends legates into Britain and other kingdoms.

He calls a synod at Rome,
A. D. 1708

the sentence of the pope. On the fourth day, being the 25th of January, Gregory admitted him to his presence, and, after much discourse, promised to absolve him, on condition that he answered to the accusation of the nobles of Germany in a general diet, and till then should use no imperial ornaments, or assume any part in the administration of government; that he should for ever renounce the society of those who had been his advisers in his former mal-administration; that he should continue always obedient to the Roman see; and that if ever he failed in these engagements, his absolution should be of no effect. Henry willingly agreed to these propositions, upon which he received absolution from the pope, who afterwards communicated with him, and, having entertained him at dinner, dismissed him to his friends, who waited for him without the walls<sup>a</sup>. Gregory immediately wrote to the bishops and nobles in Germany, acquainting them with what he had done; and continuing some months longer in Canosa, received a grant of all the possessions of Mathilda for the use of the church<sup>b</sup>, to the prejudice of the empire, to which they ought to have fallen upon her decease.

THE emperor, by this submission to the pope, quite alienated the minds of the Italian bishops and nobles, who exclaimed against him for submitting to a person who had been justly excommunicated by all the bishops of Italy for simony, murder, adultery, and other crimes; and as the emperor had deserted them, they resolved to depose him, and, after choosing another pope, to crown his son Conrad. Henry with great difficulty appeased the sedition, by pleading the necessity of his affairs, which compelled him to that submission; and being determined at any rate to regain the affection of the Lombards, publicly broke the treaty that he had made with the pope, and continued for some time near Canosa, with the design of seizing him and Mathilda<sup>c</sup>; but they being informed of his purpose, and continuing within the fortress, he went to Pavia, where he was joined by the excommunicated bishops of Germany, and by many Italian nobles, who had forsaken him upon the news of his submission. In the mean time, the nobles of Germany, assembling at Forcheim, cited Henry to plead his cause, and, upon his not appearing, deposed him from the empire, and chose Rodolphus, duke of Suabia, whom they crowned at Mentz on the 20th of March. This proceeding of the Germans not only alarmed the emperor, but greatly disturbed the pope; who, having received a letter from Rodolphus, informing him of his election, and promising obedience to the holy see, was greatly embarrassed what course to take. He durst not absolutely declare against Henry, who was very powerful in Italy; and to abandon Rodolphus would have been ruining his own party in Germany. In the midst of this uncertainty, he published a letter, addressed to all the faithful, wherein he declared, that Rodolphus had been elected without his orders; and that if the bishops did not give a sufficient reason for their conduct, they should be deprived of their dignities, and Rodolphus deposed. At the same time he refused the request of the ambassadors of Henry, who solicited his assistance against Rodolphus; and he ordered his legates in Germany to confirm in the royal dignity that king who should be most obedient to the holy see<sup>d</sup>. This wavering behaviour of the pope was greatly blamed by the nobles of Germany, who wrote to him, declaring their surprize that he still continued to name two kings of Germany, and did not openly oppose the enemy of the church.

IN the mean time, Henry, being disappointed in his expectations of assistance from the pope against Rodolphus, had returned to Germany, to oppose his competitor by arms<sup>e</sup>; whereby he again lost the affections of the Italians, who finding themselves in a manner without a king, began to acknowledge the pope, and claim an independency, which was afterwards maintained by many of their cities<sup>f</sup>. After the departure of Henry, Gregory returned to Rome; but before he arrived at the city, he sent three legates into Britain, to regulate the church affairs in that kingdom; and ordered them to call a synod at Langres in France, in which assembly he ordered a decree to be made against lay investitures<sup>1</sup>. Soon after, he sent a legate to the Venetians, to absolve them from the excommunication which they had incurred, by communicating with excommunicated persons<sup>2</sup>. He likewise sent two legates into Spain, with letters addressed to all the kings, princes, and counts in that kingdom, reminding them of the rights of St. Peter in those provinces before the conquests of the Saracens. Upon his return to the city, he sent Landulphus, bishop of Pisa, as his legate, into Corfica, with a letter addressed to all the inhabitants of that island, informing them, that their island belonged to no sovereign on earth, but was the property of the Roman church; and having thanked them for their ready submission to the holy see, offered them the assistance of some troops in Tuscany, if they had occasion for them<sup>3</sup>.

THE following year Gregory appointed a synod to be held at Rome, to which he cited Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, with all his suffragans, and the bishops and abbots of Lom-

<sup>a</sup> LAMBERT. ubi supra.
NIZO in Vita Mathild.
<sup>b</sup> GREG. l. iv. epist. xxiii.
epist. xvi.—xv.

DONIZO in Vita Mathild. SIGON. l. ix. p. 223.
Chron. Cass. l. iii. c. 49.
<sup>c</sup> See the History of the Empire.
Id. l. iv. c. i. et. xxvi, xxvii.

<sup>d</sup> DONIZO in Vita Mathild. BLOND. dec. ii. l. iii.
<sup>e</sup> SIGON. l. ix. p. 225.
<sup>f</sup> Id. l. v. epist. ii. & iv.

<sup>1</sup> LEO Ost. l. iii. c. 48. Do-
NIZO in Vita Mathild. BLOND. dec. ii. l. iii.
<sup>2</sup> GREG. l. iv.

- a brady, and of the march of Ancona and Camerino. They neglecting to appear, the synod proceeded to excommunicate and depose Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, and Theobald, archbishop of Milan. Arnulphus, bishop of Cremona, and Roland, bishop of Treviso, were likewise deposed and excommunicated; the one for simony, and the other for promoting the schism betwixt the emperor and the church; the same sentence was given against cardinal Hugh, who was for ever rendered incapable of any priestly office in the church. Cardinal Hugh and many bishops are deposed.
- The synod likewise excommunicated all the Normans who should invade the territory of St. Peter, and those who were besieging Benevento, and suspended all those bishops who, having received a citation, did not appear at the synod, or send a canonical excuse. The ordinations given by excommunicated persons were declared null and of no effect; and those b who were bound by allegiance, or engaged by an oath to any who were excommunicated, were absolved from all obligation; those likewise who plundered persons suffering by shipwreck, or who detained any of their effects, were also excommunicated. The council being dismissed, Gregory wrote to the bishops and nobles of Germany, exhorting them to hold a diet, to terminate the dispute betwixt Henry and Rodolphus, for which purpose he sent his legates into Germany. The two parties, after some hostilities, agreed to a suspension of arms, and sent their ambassadors to the council held at Rome in the month of November. Henry and Rodolphus agree to a suspension of arms.
- The council referred the determination of the dispute to the legates in Germany: and taking an oath from the ambassadors that neither party should interrupt the proceedings of the legates, they afterwards excommunicated Nicephorus, emperor of Constantinople, who the c year before had usurped the throne, and confined the emperor Michael with his wife and son in a monastery. The emperor is excommunicated.
- The Normans having lately made an attempt upon the monastery of Monte Cassino, were threatened with excommunication, if they should invade the territories of St. Benedict. The decree was likewise renewed against lay investitures: Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, still refusing to submit to the council, was at last deposed; and Gregory wrote to the people of Ravenna, informing them of the sentence against Gilbert, and forbidding them, under pain of excommunication, from yielding any obedience to him. He likewise wrote to the kings of Denmark and Norway, inviting them to send their young nobility to Rome, to be instructed in the truths of the Christian religion.
- d THE following year he called another council at Rome, in the month of February: at this assembly appeared Berengarius, priest of Tours, then eighty years of age, and publicly abjured the opinion which he had for many years maintained concerning the eucharist, namely, that the bread and wine after consecration continued the same, and were only a substantial figure of the body and blood of Christ. Berengarius abjures his heresy. A. D. 1079.
- Ambassadors from Henry and Rodolphus were likewise present at the council, and swore, in the name of their masters, to submit to the determination of the legates of the pope. In the same assembly the archbishop of Narbonne, and Theobald, archbishop of Milan, Sigefrid, bishop of Bologna, and Roland of Treviso, were excommunicated, without hope of absolution, with all their followers, whether clergy or laity. The council being dismissed, Gregory sent his legates into Germany, with the patriarch of Aquileia, to assist at the diet of Ratisbon, in order to re-establish the tranquillity of the empire. But the methods they proposed being contrary to the dignity and prerogatives of the emperor, Henry refused to agree to them, and again had recourse to arms. In the mean time, Gregory wrote to the bishop of Girona in Spain, desiring him to reconcile the two sons of the king with their father Berengarius, and threatening them with excommunication if they continued rebellious. He likewise sent a letter to Ladislau, king of Hungary, commending him for his attachment to the holy see, and desiring him to recall the nobles that had been banished on account of the late troubles in that kingdom.
- Soon after he wrote to Hubert, his legate in England, to remonstrate to the king against his order for prohibiting the bishops to go to Rome, and to threaten him with excommunication if he refused to grant liberty to two bishops, out of each archbishopric, to come to Rome to the council. It appears from Gregory's letters, the following year, to the king, that he had agreed to the demand of the pope, and had sent ambassadors to Rome. But that he did not entirely satisfy the ambitious desires of Gregory, is evident from a letter of his to the pope, and from one expression in a letter from the pope to Hubert. Gregory threatens the king of England with excommunication.
- William*, in the letter that he sent to Gregory, refused to pay homage to the see of Rome, affirming that it never had been done by any of his predecessors; but as to the arrears of the tax of St. Peter's pence, he promised that they should be faithfully transmitted by Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury. Gregory wrote to Hubert, that he set no value upon the money without the submission. This same year he likewise claimed to be arbiter betwixt the king of Dalmatia, and one duke Wezelin, and wrote to the duke, that if he did not either cease hostilities, or

<sup>a</sup> Aſta Concilii apud BARON. ad. ann. 1078.

<sup>r</sup> GREG. l. vi. epist. i.

<sup>s</sup> Id. l. vii. epist. xxv.

<sup>p</sup> GREG. l. v. epist. xv.

<sup>q</sup> See the History of the Empire.

<sup>t</sup> Epist. Guliel. apud BARON.

<sup>u</sup> GREG. l. ix.

He excommu-nicates the king of Poland.

He refuses to allow the Bohemians to worship in the vulgar tongue.
A. D. 1080.

The emperor is again excommunicated.

The pope sends a crown to Rodolphus.

Gregory is deposed.

He is reconciled to the Normans,

exhorts the Germans to assist Rodol-phus.

Rodolphus is defeated and slain.

refer the dispute to the decision of the holy see, he should be excommunicated. Soon after, a hearing that Stanislaus, bishop of Cracow, had been murdered in the church, while he was saying mass, by the connivance of the king, Gregory excommunicated Boleslaus, absolved his subjects from their allegiance, and declared the sons of those who had been concerned in the murder incapable of enjoying any ecclesiastical preferments to the fourth generation.

In the beginning of the following year, he wrote to Wratisslaus, duke of Bobemia, re- proving him for communicating with excommunicated persons, but refused to grant him his request of performing divine service in the Sclavonic tongue, although he owned that the pri- mitive church had allowed divine worship to be performed in the vulgar tongues<sup>w</sup>. The council soon after assembling at Rome, confirmed the former decrees concerning investitures, and the sentences of excommunication against the Normans and the archbishops of Milan and Ravenna, with the other excommunicated bishops. They likewise ordained, that a profession of penitence for any crime, without a real reformation, should not entitle the criminal to ab- solution; and with regard to the succession to churches, they decreed, that, upon the decease of any pastor, the clergy and people should assemble, and without any secular favour chuse a successor, who should be approved of by the apostolic see or metropolitan. Before the council broke up, Gregory caused Henry to be again excommunicated, having been informed of a victory that Rodolphus had obtained over him in the end of January. Before this defeat Gregory had acted with great caution towards both the competitors, exhorting them to refer their differences to the determination of a diet in the presence of his legates: he had even been suspected of privately favouring Henry; but now, believing his affairs quite ruined, he took upon himself to decide the right of the competitors; and having deposed Henry, and con- demned him never to be successful in war, he gave the kingdom of Germany to Rodolphus, and granted the absolution of their sins to all who should assist him<sup>x</sup>. Besides, to strengthen his right, he sent him a crown of gold, on which the following arrogant verse was engraved; Petra dedit Petro, Petrus diadema Rodolpho. Henry, exasperated with this proceeding of the pope, called a council of thirty bishops and many nobles of Germany and Italy, at Brixen in Tyrol, which assembly deposed Gregory, and chose Gilbert, or, according to some, Vuigbert, archbishop of Ravenna, pope, by the name of Clement III. Henry, after having assisted at this assembly, returned to Germany, while the new pope continued in Italy, to strengthen the emperor's interest in that kingdom<sup>y</sup>.

In the mean time, Gregory, considering that his difference with the emperor was now to be decided by force and not by negotiation, was reconciled to the Normans, whom he had excommunicated, and condescended to give the investiture of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily, to Robert, allowing him to retain Salerno, Amalphi, and part of the march of Fermo, though at the same time he declared that they were unjustly seized; his arbitrary disposition being obliged to submit to the necessity of his affairs<sup>z</sup>. He proposed immediately to make use of the assistance of the Normans; and having recommended to duke Robert to assist the emperor Michael, who had come into Italy to implore the aid of the pope against Nicephorus, he published a letter, threatening to invade Ravenna, the residence of the anti-pope, by the assistance of Jordanus prince of Capua. But, omitting this expedition, he wrote to all the faith- ful in Germany, exhorting them to assist Rodolphus, and declaring, in a prophetic stile, that a false king would soon be cut off, and the enemies of the Roman church would perish<sup>a</sup>. He likewise wrote to William king of England, desiring his assistance against the enemies of the church; but that king, though he was also solicited by the other party, refused to declare himself absolutely for either. Gregory, soon after, sent a legate into Spain, to justify his character to Alphonfus, and to threaten him with excommunication if he did not reject the Gothic office, and receive the Roman. It appears from a letter of Gregory, written the fol- lowing year to Alphonfus, that that prince was obedient to the holy see. In the mean time, Henry having assembled his troops, marched against Rodolphus, and a few days after the arrival of the pope's letter, the two armies engaging near Mersburg, Rodolphus was entirely defeated, and mortally wounded in the action<sup>b</sup>. Gregory at this time received an embassy from the patriarch of Armenia; and in the letter that he wrote to that bishop, he commends him for using unleavened bread in the eucharist, but condemns him for not mixing water with the wine, and for using butter instead of balsam in what is called the sacrament of unction<sup>c</sup>. Soon after he sent his legate into France, to preside at the council of Lyons, in which the archbishop of Rheims was deposed for his disobedience to the apostolic see; in consequence of which sentence the pope wrote to the king of France, desiring him to refuse his pro- tection to the archbishop, and commanding him not to interfere with the election of his successor<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>w</sup> GREG. l. vii. epist. xi.

<sup>z</sup> GREG. l. viii. post epist. i.
l. viii. epist. i.

<sup>x</sup> Acta Concilii apud BARON.

<sup>a</sup> Id. l. viii. epist. ix.

<sup>d</sup> Id. ibid. epist. xxi.

<sup>y</sup> GUIL. Biblioth. in Vita Greg.

<sup>b</sup> See the History of the Empire.

<sup>c</sup> GREG.

a In the beginning of the following year, the council, as usual, assembled at Rome, and A. D. 1081. confirmed the sentence of deposition against the archbishops of Arles and Narbonne, and the sentences of excommunication denounced by the legates. The emperor Henry, and the anti-pope Clement, were again excommunicated, with all their adherents; and some bishops were again excommunicated. The emperor is again excommunicated. During the sitting of the council, Gregory wrote to the bishop of Mentz, confuting what he called the new heresy, that had appeared in Germany; many of the nobles and bishops in that kingdom denying that the pope had a power to depose kings: Gregory's chief argument rested upon the commission given by Jesus Christ to Peter to bind and loose; after reasoning upon which, he subjoined some extracts from those fathers who were of the same opinion with himself<sup>a</sup>. He wrote likewise to the bishop of Padua, his legate in Germany, informing him, that he was urged by his friends to be reconciled to Henry, who threatened to invade Italy with an army. He pretended not to fear him on his own account, but, at the same time, pressed the legate to send German auxiliaries to join the army of Matilda, that was assembled in Lombardy, lest that princess should be obliged to submit to the emperor.

In the mean time, Henry, having left an army in Saxony, under the command of his son-in-law Frederic Stauffen, marched with another army into Italy, and, having obliged the troops of Matilda to retire, arrived at Verona about the beginning of April. Having granted the liberty of a standard, or carrocia, to the cities of Padua and Cremona<sup>b</sup>, for their fidelity, he continued his march through Tuscany, and reduced the city of Florence, which ventured to shut its gates against him. While the emperor continued in those parts, Gregory being informed by the countess Matilda that Henry had entered into a negotiation with Robert the Norman, whereby it was proposed that the emperor's son should marry the duke's daughter, and that Robert should receive from Henry the investiture of the march of Fermo, he wrote to Desiderius abbot of Cassino, desiring him to inform himself of the truth of that news, and to hasten to Rome<sup>c</sup>. He likewise wrote to France for the arrears of the tax of St Peter in that kingdom; and published a circular letter, addressed to all the faithful, exhorting them to rise up in defence of the persecuted church<sup>d</sup>. The emperor, soon after, He besieges Nero, expecting to be admitted into the city. But the place being strongly garrisoned by the soldiers of Matilda, he was obliged to abandon the siege, and marched with his army to Ravenna<sup>e</sup>. During these disturbances, Gregory wrote a very severe letter to Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury, threatening him with suspension, if he neglected any longer to visit Rome: he likewise excommunicated Jordanes prince of Capua, who, notwithstanding his oath of allegiance to the apostolic see, had openly espoused the cause of the emperor<sup>f</sup>. The prince of Capua is excommunicated. It appears from a letter of Gregory to the kings of the Visigoths, that this year they again allowed the Christian religion to be preached amongst them. The pope earnestly exhorts the kings to be obedient to the bishops, and appoint the tenths to be paid for sacred uses throughout all their kingdom<sup>g</sup>. Bertrand count of Provence likewise came this year to Gregory, and, having taken an oath of fidelity to him, afterwards surrendered all his possessions to the holy see, for the remission of his own sins and those of his forefathers<sup>h</sup>.

The following year Gregory was prevented from holding the synod at Rome by the emperor, who returned with his army, and besieged the city during the time of Lent. After Easter, Henry set fire to some houses near St. Peter's church, with design to assault the city, The emperor renews the siege of Rome. during the confusion occasioned by the flames; but being disappointed by the vigilance of the pope, he turned the siege into a kind of blockade, by putting garrisons into the castles round Rome; and leaving the command to the anti-pope, he went himself to Lombardy, hearing that Herman, whom the Saxons had chosen king, was marching towards Italy, to the relief of the pope. He marches into Lombardy, but in the spring returns against Rome. Herman having been defeated in passing through Suabia, Henry returned to Rome, and, in the beginning of the spring, renewed the siege; at the same time offering to enter into a negotiation with Gregory, and promising safe-conducts to the members of a general council to meet at Rome in the middle of November. Henry by this time had gained a great party among the Romans by his money; but the pope still continuing inflexible, and requiring an unreasonable submission, he ordered an assault to be given, and made himself master of the Leonine city and the capitol.

The pope immediately retired to the castle of St. Angelo, which Henry prepared to attack; but his army being seized with an epidemical sickness, on account of the heat, he retired with the greatest part of it to the mountains. In the mean time, having prevailed with the Romans to favour his cause, they insisted that Gregory should either crown the emperor, or they would elect another pope. Gregory consented, in some measure, to an accommodation,

<sup>a</sup> GREG. I. viii. epist. xxi.<sup>f</sup> SIGON. I. ix. p. 227.<sup>g</sup> GREG. I. ix. epist. xii.<sup>h</sup> GREG.

I. viii. epist. xxv. &amp; I. ix. epist. xxi.

<sup>i</sup> SIGON. I. ix. p. 228. BLOND. dec. ii. l. iii.<sup>e</sup> GREG. I. ix.

epist. xx—xxvi.

<sup>l</sup> Id. epist. liv.<sup>m</sup> BARONII Annal. ad hunc annum.

The Romans
greatly favour
the emperor,

and a council assembled in the month of November; but Henry by no means agreeing to a their resolutions, Gregory proposed to excommunicate him by name. The council interceded against the denouncing of this sentence; but as Henry had intercepted several bishops in their journey to Rome, Gregory excommunicated all those who had prevented any bishops from coming to the council. The Romans still insisting that they had promised by oath to procure the imperial crown to Henry, the pope offered to let it down to him by a rope from the castle of St. Angelo; but the emperor disdaining to accept of it in that manner, the Romans declared they were absolved from their oath, and continued, for some time, satisfied with the proceedings of the pope.

who at last makes himself master of Rome.

A. D. 1084.
He is crowned by the anti-pope, but quits
Rome upon the approach of the Normans.

THE emperor, the following year, having got possession of the Lateran palace, caused Guibert to be consecrated by the bishops of Modena and Rimini, and the Sunday after, being b Easter, he was crowned by him in the Lateran church<sup>a</sup>. During the festivities of that week he made himself master of St. Peter's church; but not being able to get possession of St. Angelo, he fortified himself in the Aventine mount. The pope being soon reduced to great difficulties, again solicited the assistance of the Normans. Henry being informed of their march, quitted Rome, and retired with his army towards Lombardy, leaving the greatest part of the Romans in his interest, who now blamed the pope for all the miseries that they had suffered for three years. Robert, upon his arrival, finding the gates of the city shut against him, set fire to some houses near the walls, and, during the confusion of the Romans, was c admitted into the city by the friends of Gregory<sup>o</sup>, and, after several skirmishes in the streets, got possession of the capitol, from whence he marched to the castle of St. Angelo, and having destroyed the works raised by Henry, brought the pope safe to the palace of the Lateran. Gregory soon after held a council, and excommunicated Henry and the anti-pope, with all their adherents, and ordered the sentence to be published by his legates in Germany and France; but as the greatest part of the citizens were discontented with his government, and the imperial army still continued in the neighbourhood of Rome, he left the city, and retired to Monte Cassino, from whence, in a few days, he went to Salerno, where he continued till his death. The Romans, upon his departure, immediately recalled the emperor, who, after d having received their oaths of fidelity, left Clement with a strong garrison in Rome, and returned with the rest of his army to Germany<sup>p</sup>. After his return, the Lombards assembled an army, and attacked the countess Mathilda; but the pope sending the bishop of Lucca, as his legate, with full power of absolving all those that should return to the church, and with indulgences to those who were zealous in its defence, Mathilda soon turned too powerful for her enemies; and, having defeated them in an engagement, and taken the bishop of Parma with several nobles prisoners, she obliged them to continue quiet<sup>q</sup>.

Gregory re-
tires to Salerno.

He writes to William king of England, to be reconciled to his brother.

WHILE Gregory continued at Salerno, he wrote to William king of England, interceding for his brother Odo bishop of Bayeux, whom that prince had thrown into prison, on account of his maladministration and tyranny in England, while he himself was absent in Normandy. The pope did not succeed with the king of England; however, this year, he prevailed with Robert count of Flanders to pardon several of his nobles, who had entered into a conspiracy against him. In the mean time the German garrison, which had been left in Rome, being e almost entirely cut off by a malignant distemper, the Romans had expelled Clement, rejecting both him and Gregory.

The German bishops excommunicate the anti-pope.
1085.

Soon after the emperor's return to Germany, an assembly met at Quedlemburgh, in the presence of Herman the competitor for the empire, and Otho the legate of the pope. The bishops and clergy who were present being wholly in the interest of Gregory, several decrees were made, tending to exalt the power of the holy see; and, having excommunicated the anti-pope, and several other bishops, with lighted candles, they made several regulations with regard to the church. They ordained, that no layman should touch sacred vessels; that presbyters, deacons, and sub-deacons, should continue in celibacy; that no layman should usurp the property of tythes; that during Lent no one should eat eggs or cheese, &c. In f opposition to this council, Henry called a diet and synod at Mentz, in which Gregory was deposed, the election of Gilbert confirmed, and the bishops of the other party excommunicated. A few weeks after the celebrating of those councils in Germany, Gregory died at Salerno, on the 24th of May, having, three days before his death, desired the cardinals and bishops who were present to elect, as his successor, Desiderius abbot of Cassino, or Hugh archbishop of Lyons, or either of the bishops of Lucca and Ostia.

Gregory dies
at Salerno.

IMMEDIATELY upon the death of Gregory, the cardinals and bishops proposed to elect Desiderius, but he refused to accept it, and returned to his monastery; at the same time writing to the Normans and Lombards, exhorting them to submit to the church, and to reject all communication with the anti-pope, who was then endeavouring to strengthen his party.

<sup>a</sup> BERTHOLD. Hist. SIGON. l. ix. p. 228.
<sup>q</sup> Afta Anselm. apud BARON.

<sup>o</sup> LEO Ost. l. iii. c. 52.

<sup>p</sup> SIGON. l. ix. p. 229.

a Upon the departure of Desiderius, the bishops consulted with Jordanes prince of Capua, in order to entice the abbot to Rome, and to compel him to accept of the dignity. A few months after, the excessive heats being abated, Jordanes set out for Rome with an army, attended by Desiderius, with the other cardinals and bishops. When they arrived at Campania, Desiderius suspecting their design, refused to go any further, unless they promised not to use compulsion with him, with regard to the election; and, upon their denying his request, he returned to his monastery, so that the election was deferred until the year following.

ABOUT Easter, many cardinals and bishops assembling at Rome, they wrote to Desiderius to come to them, with the bishops that were in those parts, to consult about settling the church. Upon the arrival of Desiderius, they renewed their intreaties with him to accept of the pontificate; but he obstinately denying for two days, they at last took him by force, and carried him to the church of St. Lucia, where he was unanimously elected, and got the name of Victor III. though he struggled, during the whole ceremony, that he might not be clothed in the pontifical dress; and, soon after, laying aside his ornaments, he returned to Cassino. Desiderius is chosen pope, by the name of Victor III.

THE following year, being present at the council held at Capua during Lent, at the intreaty of the bishops, he re-assumed the pontifical habit; and, after Easter, he went to Rome with the princes of Capua and Apulia. The Capuans having expelled the other faction from the church of St. Peter, the next day Victor was consecrated by the bishops of Ostia, Albano, and Porta, according to the canons, in the presence of a great many cardinals, bishops, and abbots. Eight days after, he returned to the monastery of Cassino; but the countess Mathilda coming to Rome to have a conference with him, he returned by sea, and soon after, by the assistance of her troops, made himself master of all that part of the city beyond the Tyber. On the eve of the feast of St. Peter, the Romans, in the interest of the antipope, recovered a great part of the city, and made an attempt to get possession of the church of St. Peter, but were repulsed by the soldiers of Mathilda. That countess soon after returning to Lombardy, Clement, only countenanced and supported by the imperialists, expelled the bishops from several churches, who were suspected to incline to Victor, and substituted others in their room, who procured that dignity from him by their money. He assumes the pontifical habit, and goes to Rome. A. D. 1087.

d In the mean time Victor, desiring to repress the insolence of the Saracens, who made frequent descents upon the coasts of Italy, and carried off a great many captives, he held a council with the bishops and cardinals, and by their advice assembled an army from all parts of Italy, which he sent over into Africa against the Infidels, giving them the standard of St. Peter, and remission of all their sins. The Italians were very successful in their expedition; for, after defeating 100,000 of the enemy, they made themselves masters of their principal city, and, what is remarkable, the victory was told in Italy the same day that it was obtained in Africa. He sends an army into Africa against the Saracens.

e In the month of August Victor went to Benevento, to hold a council with the bishops of Apulia and Calabria: after mentioning the intrusion of Clement, he pronounced a sentence of deposition and excommunication against him; but nothing particular was determined with regard to the emperor. The assembly likewise ordained, that whoever should receive a bishopric or abbacy from the hand of a layman, should not be accounted a bishop or abbot, and should be rejected by the church; and whoever prayed with them, or heard them performing mass, should also be excommunicated; and that if any king, duke, count, or other secular person, should presume to give the investiture of ecclesiastical dignities, he should be comprehended in the same sentence. During the holding of the council, Victor being attacked with sickness, he dismissed the assembly, and returned to Monte Cassino, where, after several regulations with regard to the monastery, he appointed Oderisius, a sub-deacon of the Roman church, for their abbot. His sickness becoming dangerous, he called the bishops and cardinals who had attended him, and taking Otho bishop of Ostia by the hand, he presented him to the other bishops, and recommended him to them for his successor. He lived three days after this, and died on the 14th of September, not without the suspicion of poison having been given him in the chalice while he was celebrating mass. He holds a council at Benevento.

f UPON his death, messengers were immediately sent to the Roman clergy and laity, and likewise to other bishops, desiring them either to come themselves, or to send their nuncios to Tarracina, in the first week of Lent, to chuse a successor to the Roman see. Many bishops and abbots assembling at Tarracina, upon the appointed day, they unanimously chose Otho, bishop of Ostia, who being consecrated in the church of St. Peter, in that city, on the 12th of March, took the name of Urban II. Otho was formerly prior of Cluny, and being created bishop of Ostia by Gregory, became the most faithful confidant of that pope; and five years He returns to Monte Cassino, and dies.

* LEO Ost. l. iii. c. 65—67. Vita Victor III. apud MURATOR. tom. iii. * LEO Ost. l. iii. c. 69.
 † SIGON. l. ix. p. 230. LEO Ost. l. iii. c. 70. BERTHOLD. Hist. * Acta Concilii Benev. apud BARON.
 ‡ LEO Ost. l. iii. c. 71. * Vita Victor III. ex MSS. Bernard Guidon apud MURATOR, t. iii.

before, as his legate, had published in Germany the sentence of excommunication against the emperor and his adherents. The day after his consecration Urban published a letter, addressed to all the faithful, informing them of his election, and declaring, that he would follow in every thing the footsteps of Gregory VII.<sup>y</sup> Going afterwards to Cassino, he was visited by Boemond, and Roger duke of Apulia, sons of Robert Guiscard, whom he reconciled, by making partition of their father's territories. This year he likewise created the archbishop of Toledo primate of all Spain, at the request of the king Alphonfus or Ildephonsus<sup>z</sup>, who had distinguished himself against the Saracens. After he had continued some time in Apulia, he went to Rome; but being repulsed by the faction of Clement, he fled into the island of Tyber, called Lycaonia, where he was supported by some Roman matrons for several months<sup>a</sup>.

THE following year he wrote a letter to Gebehard, bishop of Conflans, appointing him his legate and vicar in Germany; and having prevailed with the Romans to expel Gilbert the antipope, he held a synod of 115 bishops at Rome, in which Henry and the antipope were excommunicated in the first decree; and in the second decree were included all those who assisted them with arms, money, or counsel, or who received ecclesiastical preferments from them or their adherents<sup>b</sup>. Towards autumn Urban went into Apulia, to recommit to the earth the body of St. Nicolas, which had been brought to Bari; and having consecrated the bishop of that place, he went to Traja, where he kept a council of seventy-five bishops and twelve abbots<sup>c</sup>, in which some decrees were made relating to the degrees of consanguinity that were prohibited in contracts of marriage. Soon afterwards, hearing that the emperor was proposing to enter Italy, he prevailed with Mathilda, then in the forty-third year of her age, to marry Guelph, son of the duke of Bavaria, who had distinguished himself in Germany against the party of Henry<sup>d</sup>, and from whom are descended the present dukes of Brunswick and Lunenburg<sup>e</sup>.

Mathilda marries Guelph, the son of the duke of Bavaria.

The emperor marches into Italy.

THE emperor, in order to recover his interest in Italy, marched in the beginning of the following year into that kingdom<sup>f</sup>, and upon entering the territories of Mathilda, allowed his army to pillage the country. But duke Guelph marching against him, and passing the Po, defeated him in an engagement in the plain of Sorbaria, which obliged him for some time to act on the defensive; but soon after his troops resuming their courage, he marched against Mantua, which was then one of the strongest cities of Italy. In the mean time Urban sent his legates into France, who held a general council at Thoulouse, in which several decrees were made with regard to ecclesiastical discipline. He himself went afterwards to Melpis in Apulia, where he held a general council, and gave Roger, the son of Robert Guiscard, the investiture of his father's duchy, upon his promising to become his liege subject<sup>g</sup>. The canons made by this council chiefly regarded the celibacy of the clergy, which was strictly enjoined; lay investitures were condemned, and a decree was made against pretended penitents, in the number of whom were reckoned those who exercised traffic, or followed the law, it being declared impossible to follow these employments with a safe conscience<sup>h</sup>.

His faction recall Clement to Rome.

A. D. 1091.

URBAN continuing for some time in Apulia and Campania, the party of the emperor at Rome took that opportunity of recalling Guibert, and making themselves masters of the castle of St. Angelo, which they endeavoured to destroy. In the mean time the emperor made himself master of Mantua, which, after maintaining a siege of eleven months, was at last obliged to surrender, on the 11th of April, being Good Friday<sup>i</sup>. The Imperialists, having left a garison in Mantua, afterwards marched to Ferrara, which immediately submitted. During these transactions in Lombardy, Urban went to Benevento, where he held a council, and renewed the excommunications against the emperor and the antipope; after which he returned to the neighbourhood of Rome, where he kept his Christmas, not daring to enter the city, which was held by the party of Clement.

Eric king of Denmark comes to Rome, and is absolved from the sentence of excommunication.

HAVING afterwards got possession of a part of the city, he was visited by Eric, king of Denmark, who, upon some false suspicions, had been excommunicated by the archbishop of Hamburg. The king, struck with the sentence, had appealed to the apostolic see; and having justified himself before Urban, not only was absolved from the sentence, but his kingdom was freed from subjection to a foreign archbishop; and the bishop of Lundy was created primate of Denmark, and also of Sweden and Norway<sup>k</sup>. About this time Urban sent for St. Bruno, who six years before had instituted the sect of the Carthusians, and kept him with him, though against his inclination, three years, using his advice in the affairs of the church<sup>l</sup>. In the mean time the hostilities still continued in Lombardy betwixt the emperor and Mathilda. The arms of Henry being every where victorious, Mathilda, by the advice of several bishops, proposed to negotiate a peace with him; but the conferences were soon broke off by means of one John, a hermit, who advised her to trust for success to the divine Pro-

<sup>y</sup> BERTHOLD. Hist. ad hunc an.

<sup>b</sup> BERTHOLD. hoc an.

<sup>c</sup> Chron. Cassin. l. i. c. 8.

<sup>d</sup> l. ix. p. 231.

<sup>e</sup> Vita Mathild.

<sup>f</sup> in Vita Mathild.

<sup>g</sup> ROMUALD Salern. Chron. ad hunc an.

<sup>h</sup> Sax. Gram. l. xii.

<sup>i</sup> Exemplar. Diplom. apud BARON.

<sup>j</sup> BARON. Annal. ad hunc an.

<sup>k</sup> SIGON. l. ix. p. 232.

<sup>l</sup> Acta Concilii apud BARON.

<sup>m</sup> BARON. Annal. ad an. 1092.

<sup>n</sup> SIGON. l. ix. p. 221.

<sup>o</sup> SIGON.

<sup>p</sup> DONIZO in

<sup>q</sup> DONIZO

a vidence. Henry, irritated at this affront, sent one of his sons to besiege Carpineto; but the young prince being killed in an attack, the siege was raised, and Henry returned to Verona, accompanied with Clement, having withdrawn all his forces beyond the Po; upon which Mathilda recovered all that she had lost on the other side of that river<sup>m</sup>. Urban finding the faction of the antipope prevailing at Rome, went the following Lent into Apulia, and held a general council at Troja.

MEAN while Conrad, the eldest son of the emperor, having received some unworthy treatment from his father, rebelled against him, and came over to the party of Mathilda. The countess and duke Guelph received him with great joy; and Urban, thinking the rebellion of a son no crime, immediately absolved him from excommunication; upon which he was crowned king of Italy by Anselmo, archbishop of Milan, and received the allegiance of a great many cities of Lombardy, strengthening his interest likewise by an alliance with the Normans, and marrying the daughter of Roger, count of Sicily. This revolt of Conrad obliged Henry to quit Italy, and to retire to the Alps, in expectation of new succours from Germany. The affairs of the Orthodox, as they called themselves, being now in a prosperous condition, Urban returned to Rome, and took possession of the city, the other party being obliged to retire into the castle of St. Angelo. The following year he ordered Gebehard his legate to call a general council at Constance, which accordingly assembled; where having made some canons relating to simony, and the celibacy of the clergy, they likewise heard the complaints of Praxide or Adelaide, against the emperor her husband. Soon after, Hugh, archbishop of Lyons, as pope's legate, called another synod in France, in which Philip the king was excommunicated, for having put away his queen, and married another woman during her life-time.

MEAN while Urban himself went to Tuscany, where he celebrated his Christmas; and the party of Conrad being now very strong in Lombardy, he proceeded to Piacenza, where, about the middle of Lent, he held a general council of the bishops of Italy, France, Germany, and other provinces; the number assembled being so large that no church in that city could contain them, so that they were obliged to hold the council in a field without the walls. It being proved before the council, that the empress, during her imprisonment, had been ravished by several persons, sent in by orders of Henry, she was absolved from all penance, upon her public confession. The council likewise received an embassy from the emperor of Constantinople, and from Philip king of France: the emperor intreated assistance against the Saracens, who had approached almost to the walls of Constantinople; and Philip excused himself from appearing at the council, having been delayed by necessary reasons, after he was on his journey. The council likewise ordained, that no money should be exacted for unctions, baptisms, or burials; and before they broke up, denounced anathemas against the antipope, and several different heresies<sup>n</sup>. Having dismissed the council at Placenza, Urban went to Cremona, and on his journey was met by Conrad, who, upon the pope's entering the city, acted as groom, and afterwards took the oath of fidelity to the papal see. The pope received him as a son of the Roman church, and promised to assist him in obtaining the empire, on condition that he renounced all right to give investitures.

Soon afterwards he left Italy, and went by sea into France, where, in the beginning of November, he held a general council at Clermont in Auvergne, famous for the first commencement of the crusade. Urban having some time before received letters from the patriarch of Jerusalem, by Peter the hermit, representing the miserable state of the Christians in those parts, and intreating assistance against the Saracens their oppressors, he made several long and pathetic speeches to the council, exhorting them to encourage the people committed to their charge to undertake the holy warfare, for recovering the sepulchre of Christ from the Infidels. The council being moved by the addresses of the pope, made a decree, that whoever, out of devotion, and not for honour and money, went to the relief of the church of Jerusalem, that journey should serve instead of all penance, and during his absence all his possessions should continue safe. They afterwards excommunicated Philip king of France, who still refused to put away his concubine, and confirmed the decrees made at the councils of Melfis, Benevento, Troja, and Placenza; they likewise made several new canons, that no clergyman should carry arms; that the sons of clergymen should be incapable of church preferments, unless they became monks; that it should not be lawful for clergymen to have women in their houses; that if any guilty person embraced a cross, either in the church or fields, he should be protected from harm<sup>o</sup>.

THIS year a general council was likewise held in England, by Anselm, bishop of Canterbury, who wanted pope Urban to be acknowledged in that kingdom; but most of the bishops submitting to the edict of the king, which ordained, that no pope should be acknowledged in

A. D. 1093.
Conrad rebels against his father Henry, and is crowned king of Italy.

Urban goes to Lombardy, and holds a council at Placenza.
A. D. 1095.

He holds another council at Clermont in France, and proposes a crusade for the recovery of the Holy Land.

The king of England favours the antipope.

<sup>m</sup> SIGON. ub. supra BERTH. Hist. ad hunc. ann.
• Concil. General. t. x. p. 506. DONIZO ubi supra.

* DONIZO in Vita Mathild. BERTHOLD. Hist.

England but whom the king allowed of, great disputes arose in the assembly; and as it was known that the king favoured Clement, many of the bishops declared, that they would not yield any obedience to Urban<sup>p</sup>. This year was likewise remarkable for the first institution of the knights hospitallers, by one Gaston, of the province of Vienne in France, who, with his son and eight others, began the order<sup>q</sup>.

The crusade is preached with great success.
A. D. 1096.

AFTER the dismissing of the council of Clermont, Urban continued still in France, in order to promote the sacred expedition to the Holy Land. The bishops likewise, upon their return, went round the cities of their dioceses, and shewing the pope's letters, exhorted their people to the holy warfare; but the most active promoter of this expedition was Peter the hermit, who went through France, preaching to the people with great enthusiasm and zeal. The number of people who gave in their names for this holy expedition was so immense, that the priests were obliged to dissuade a great many, who, upon account of their age, sex, or weakness, were unfit for warfare; but still there remained behind an army greatly superior in number to any that had ever appeared in Europe. Instead of pay, they received a plenary indulgence for all their sins, and in lieu of an uniform, wore a cross made of red cloth upon their right shoulders, from whence the expedition got the name of a crusade.

THE first who put themselves on their march were Guelter or Walter, surnamed Sans Avoir, or Lack-land, and Peter the hermit, who, at the head of about 50,000 men, directed their route for Germany, where they were joined by Godescald, a monk, with 15,000 Germans, armed with clubs. These forces were soon after followed by Godfrey de Bouillon, duke of Lorraine, with many other dukes and counts, with a great body of troops. In Italy likewise great levies were made for the sacred expedition; the archbishop of Milan assembled 50,000 Lombards, 7000 of whom were from the city of Milan; while Boemond, brother of Roger, duke of Sicily, put himself at the head of the Apulians and Calabrians. The Venetians, Pisans, and Genoese, were ready with their fleets, and each city sent out a body of men, with a commander and standard, on which was painted a cross; the general device of those engaged in the expedition being Dieu le vent, or It is the will of God<sup>r</sup>. Mean while Urban, having held a general council at Tours, and absolved the king of France, upon his humble submission, returned to Lombardy, and having had a conference with Matilda, proceeded to Rome, where he celebrated his Christmas; the castle of St. Angelo being still in the possession of the Imperialists.

Urban informs the emperor of Constantinople of the expedition to the Holy Land;
1097.

IN order to reconcile the Greeks to the crusade, he wrote a letter to Alexius, emperor of Constantinople, informing him of the design of the expedition, which, if it succeeded, would be of great advantage to his empire: he likewise appointed a council to be held at Bari, on the first of October, to which he invited the Greek bishops. In his way towards Bari, he went to Capua, which was then besieged by Roger count of Sicily, together with his nephew Roger duke of Apulia, in favour of Richard II. who had been expelled a few years before. The pope endeavoured to mediate a peace; but the Capuans rejecting the terms of accommodation, were, in a few days, obliged to surrender to the count, and to submit to Richard<sup>s</sup>. After the reduction of Capua, the two princes repaired to Salerno, and were soon after visited by the pope, who granted a very large privilege to the count, allowing him, and his son who should succeed him, to act as legates of the apostolic see in Sicily (O).

and holds a council at Bari, composed of Greek and Latin bishops.

The Croises
murder the Jews in Germany.

THE council assembling according to appointment at Bari, the pope repaired thither, with Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, who having had some difference with the king, had left England. The acts of this council are not extant; but there is mention of a great dispute betwixt the Greek and Latin bishops, concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit; the Greeks affirming, that the Spirit proceeded only from the Father. Their arguments were entirely confuted by Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, who, by his eloquence and strength of reasoning, gained great honour in the debate<sup>t</sup>. In the mean time the Croises, who had begun their march to the Holy Land, being without money and without discipline, attacked the rich Jews in Germany, under pretence of zeal for the Christian religion, of which they were the professed soldiers. The cities of Worms, Cologne, Mentz, Triers, and several others, suffered greatly by their outrages. Those Jews, who would not consent to be baptized, were massacred, and their possessions seized. In Bavaria alone there were 12,000 put to death, and many thousands in the other provinces of Germany. Coloman, king of Hungary,

<sup>p</sup> GULIEL. MALMS. l. i. EDINER in Vita S. Anselm. apud Surm. t. ii.

Fulconis.

<sup>q</sup> SIGON. l. ix. p. 235. Vita Pontif. Rom. apud MURATOR. t. iii. WILLEL. TYR. de bello

Sacro, l. i. c. 18. l. ii. c. 1.

<sup>r</sup> EDINER. in Vita Anselm.

<sup>s</sup> Histór. Antonian. HINCMAR.

<sup>t</sup> ROMUALD SALERN. Chron. ad hunc an. GOUFRED. l. iv. c. 27. p. 29.

(O) This charter has been the occasion of great disputes betwixt the kings of Sicily and the church of Rome, it being maintained on one side, that, from this time following, the princes of Sicily have had the title of king, and have been hereditary legates of the popes within their own dominions; whereas the advocates of the church affirm, that the charter limits the privilege of legate to Roger, and his immediate successor, and makes no mention of the title of king, which they say was afterwards conferred by an antipope.

a being informed of these ravages, denied the Croises a passage through his kingdom; but his army being defeated in several encounters, he was at last obliged to consent to their passage. From Hungary they went through Dacia, Mæcia, and Thrace, to Constantinople, in order to be transported into Asia <sup>u</sup>.

THE pope, after dismissing the council of Bari, returned to Rome, where he called another council a few weeks after Easter. In opposition to this assembly, the bishops and cardinals in the interest of Clement likewise held a council at Rome, in which they composed a letter, addressed to all the faithful, declaring, that they had laboured for sixteen years to destroy the heresies introduced by Hildebrand, and summoning the authors of the schism to appear before them in the synod which they proposed to hold in November <sup>w</sup>. Mean while, news arriving at Rome of the success of the Croises in Asia, Urban sent Theobert, archbishop of Pisa, as his legate to the Christian army, in order to restore the churches in those places that had been taken from the Infidels. But before his arrival, Alexius having deserted the party of the Europeans, the Croises were reduced to great difficulties, so that his embassy had no effect, till the army marched towards Syria, when they again met with success.

THE following year, which was the last of Urban's life, he held a council at Rome, in which Clement and his adherents were excommunicated, and the faithful again exhorted to go to the assistance of their brethren in Asia. Many Croises giving in their names for the holy expedition, Urban, by their assistance, recovered the castle of St. Angelo, and having quieted the factions in the city, died on the 27th of July. The same month that the pope died, the Croises in Asia, after a siege of six weeks, made themselves masters of Jerusalem by storm. And Robert, duke of Normandy, refusing the dignity of king of Jerusalem, Godfrey de Bouillon, duke of Lorraine, was elected, and took the investiture of his new kingdom from Theobert, the pope's legate, who had been chosen patriarch of Jerusalem <sup>x</sup>.

AFTER the death of Urban, the clergy and nobles of Rome assembled in the church of St. Clement, to chuse a successor, and immediately pitched upon cardinal Rainer or Ragnier, abbot of the monastery of the saints Lawrence and Stephen, without the walls, who observing the disposition of the assembly, fled and hid himself; but being discovered and brought back, was obliged to accept of the dignity, the clergy calling out, pope Paschal is elected by St. Peter. He had no sooner taken possession of the papal chair, than he wrote to all the Catholic princes, informing them of his election; and in return received letters from many of them. The princes in the Holy Land particularly wrote a long letter, addressed to him and all the faithful, giving an account of their sufferings and late successes, and inviting their brethren to come to their assistance <sup>y</sup>. This letter being published in Europe, was the occasion of a second general crusade, the Croises going by sea from Italy. Paschal in the mean time being encouraged by the Roman clergy to act vigorously against the schismatics, and having received one thousand ounces of gold from Roger count of Sicily, employed that money against the antipope, whom he drove from Albano, and obliged to retire to Citta-di-Castello, where he died the year following <sup>z</sup>.

HE likewise sent two legates into France, who held a general council at Poitiers, in which Philip was again excommunicated, for having relapsed into adultery. The bishop of Porta was also sent as his legate into the Holy Land; soon after whose arrival, Godfrey king of Jerusalem died, and was succeeded by his brother Baldwin, who was immediately engaged in disputes with the patriarch. The contest between them was concerning the temporalities of the see: Baldwin claimed all the rights of his predecessor; but the patriarch insisted that Godfrey had left Jerusalem and Joppa to the church, in case he died without a male heir. To protect himself against Baldwin, he wrote to Boemond, prince of Antioch, exciting him to declare war against the king of Jerusalem, as an oppressor of the church <sup>a</sup>.

DURING these disturbances in the Holy Land, occasioned by the patriarch of Jerusalem, Paschal appointed Gebehard, bishop of Constance, his legate in Germany; and soon after received an embassy from Henry king of England, who insisted upon giving investitures of benefices, as a right inherent to his crown. But the pope, rendered confident by the success of his predecessors against the emperor, and by the mean submission of the other princes of Europe, denied the request of the ambassadors, and appointed the decrees of Urban with regard to investitures to be observed in England <sup>b</sup>. Ambassadors likewise arrived at Rome from the king of France, petitioning for the absolution of the sentence of excommunication against him. Paschal did not absolutely refuse the request, but sent two legates into France, to receive the satisfaction of the king, which being given, he was again admitted into the church. In the mean time, the emperor's party in Italy did their utmost to support their sinking interest in that kingdom: upon the death of Guibert, they elected one Albert, a German, who dy-

<sup>u</sup> WILLEL. MALMS. l. i.

<sup>w</sup> BARONIUS, ad an. 1098.

<sup>x</sup> WILLEL. TYR. de bell. Sac. l. viii.

<sup>y</sup> WILLEL. TYR. l. iii. c. 13, 14.

<sup>z</sup> DONIZO in Vita Mathild. PETR. DIAC. in Chron.

Cassin. Vita Pontif. Rom. apud MURATOR, l. iii.

<sup>a</sup> WIL. TYR. l. ix. c. ult. l. x. c. i.

<sup>b</sup> WIL. MALMS. l. i.

ing four months afterwards, they chose Theodoric, a Lombard. He survived his election a little more than three months, and was succeeded by one Maginulph, who was expelled from Ravenna, and died in exile.

A general council held at Rome.

A. D. 1102.

An oath of obedience to the holy see appointed to be taken by all the clergy.

PASCHAL being now too powerful to be disturbed by the weak efforts of these antipopes, held a general council at Rome, to which the emperor was invited, and upon his non-appearance, was again excommunicated. The council likewise composed an oath, which, under the title of a profession of faith, the archbishops, bishops, and all whom the pope required, were obliged to swear. By the oath, they abjured all heresy, they promised obedience to the pope and his successors, and to affirm what the holy and universal church affirms, and to condemn what she condemns. This new usurpation of the papal see alarmed several nations in Europe, but chiefly the king of Poland, and the princes of Sicily; and the archbishops of Poland and Palermo refused for some time to take the oath, alleging, that it was not enjoined by any former council. The pope wrote to them both, and insisted, that no council could prescribe a law to the Roman church <sup>c</sup>.

1103.

WHILE the pope's authority was called in question in Poland and Sicily, it was confirmed by Anselm in the synod of London, where several decrees were made against lay investitures, and the concubinage of the clergy. His party was likewise strengthened by Otho, bishop of Wamberg, who having received his bishopric from the emperor, wrote to the pope for his confirmation <sup>d</sup>; and Matilda having had a difference with her husband this year, renewed the grant of her possessions in favour of the holy see <sup>e</sup>. The proceedings of Anselm having offended the king of England, he ordered him to depart the kingdom, and sent an ambassador to the pope to determine the controversy, declaring, that he would rather lose his kingdom than part with his right to give investitures. Paschal, far from complying with the desire of the king, declared to the ambassador, in as peremptory a manner, that he would rather lose his salvation than suffer him to enjoy that right without censure <sup>f</sup>.

The pope sends a legate to Poland.

1104.

ABOUT this time Gallo, bishop of Paris, having come to Rome upon account of some difference with the king of France, Paschal sent him as his legate into Poland, to correct the abuses in that kingdom. He likewise sent cardinal Richard, bishop of Albano, as his legate into France, who held a council at Troyes. In the mean time, the patriarch of Jerusalem, and Boemond prince of Antioch, arrived in Italy. Boemond proceeded to France, to marry the daughter of Philip; but the patriarch went to Rome, and complained to the pope of the injuries he had received from Baldwin, who had substituted one Ebremarius in his place. He likewise accused the king of having divorced his wife without any formal sentence of the church. Upon hearing these complaints, Paschal detained the patriarch with him, and wrote in his behalf to Jerusalem, desiring those who had any thing to accuse him of to appear at Rome. At length, no accusers having appeared, he was judged innocent by the apostolic see, and restored to his former dignity.

The emperor is dethroned by his son Henry.

1105.

MEAN while a great revolution happened in Germany, the emperor being imprisoned and dethroned by his youngest son Henry, whom a few years before he had associated with himself in the empire. In the beginning of the revolt, Henry wrote a letter to Paschal, proposing an accommodation with him, on terms that were consistent with his honour <sup>g</sup>. The pope paid no regard to this letter, persuaded that the emperor's submission proceeded more from the bad state of his affairs, than from the purity of his intentions; and the young Henry professing all obedience to the apostolic see, he ordered his legates to absolve him from the sentence of excommunication, and to assist him with their advice. Soon after, in a general diet held at Mentz, Henry, who was then imprisoned by the treachery of his son in the castle of Bingenheim, was excommunicated by the pope's legates; and the assembly having likewise deposed him, the young Henry was acknowledged as king, and his former election at Aix la Chapelle confirmed.

The pope's legate refuses to absolve him.

1106.

THE new emperor, that he might give some appearance of justice to his rebellion, assembled another diet at Ingelheim, where his father is said to have been prevailed upon to make a voluntary resignation of his crown to his son, and to have thrown himself at the feet of the legate, praying to be absolved from the sentence of excommunication; but his request was refused, the legate declaring, that he could only be absolved by the pope, or a general council. The party of the pope being now victorious in Germany, the schismatic bishops, namely, those that had received their investiture from the emperor, were expelled from their sees, and new bishops appointed by the catholic party. The bodies likewise of those bishops, who had been accused of schism, were ordered to be dug out of their graves; in consequence of which order, the body of Clement the antipope was exposed at Ravenna in an ignominious manner, and thrown into the river, his followers having alleged, that a great many miracles had been performed at his tomb <sup>h</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> BARON. ad an. 1102.
Annal. hoc anno. WILLEL. de reg. Angl. l. v.
Annal. Abbas URSPERG.

<sup>d</sup> Vita Othon, l. i. c. iii.

<sup>e</sup> MURATOR. de reb. Ital. t. v.
<sup>f</sup> Epist. Henrici apud Urstil. p. 392.

<sup>g</sup> ROGER
<sup>h</sup> BARON.

a In the mean time the emperor fled from Ingelheim, and retired to Cologne, and from thence He escapes from his confinement to Liege, and raises an army. Being received honourably in this city, he wrote a long letter to the king of France, which he published in form of a manifesto, declaring the injuries he had received, and asking assistance against his rebel son. Many of his friends upon this letter came to Liege; so that in a short time he formed a considerable army, which encouraged his party in Italy again to make some efforts in his favour: accordingly, having raised some troops, and got a part of the Romans to favour them, they took the opportunity of the absence of the pope, and chose an antipope at Rome, under the name of Sylvester, who was soon after expelled by the catholics. During these transactions in Italy, the young emperor besieged Cologne, which held for his father; but after continuing a month before the place, he was obliged to raise the siege with some loss. Henry at the same time writing to the bishops and lords of the empire, complaining of the injustice that had been done him, and offering to submit to the holy see, a negotiation was in some manner agreed to; but while they debated about a prior cessation of hostilities, the emperor died at Liege; and was interred with great pomp by the bishop of that see. For this kindness to the deceased, the bishop was excommunicated, and, as a condition of being absolved, he was ordered to dig up the corpse <sup>He dies soon after at Liege.</sup>

b POPE Paschal having been invited to come into Germany by the diet at Mentz, was on his journey when he heard of the death of the emperor. Upon receiving this news, he stopt at Florence to enquire into a prophecy of the immediate coming of Antichrist, published by some eminent men in that city. Being convinced of the absurdity of the prophecy, he proceeded c to Guastalla, where he held a general council, at which were present the ambassadors of the new emperor, who desired the pope to confirm to their master the privileges belonging to his dignity <sup>Pope Paschal holds a council at Guastalla.</sup>. Among other decrees, the council ordained, that all the cities in Æmilia, namely, Placenza, Parma, Reggio, Mantua, Bologna, should no longer be subject to the metropolitan of Ravenna. They likewise prohibited any layman from giving investitures, under pain of excommunication.

d THIS last decree highly offended the emperor Henry V. who finding himself established in the throne, refused to abate any thing of his right of investitures, or of the manner of giving them (P). The pope, upon his arrival at Verona, being informed of the emperor's resolution with regard to these points, altered his design of going into Germany, and went through Burgundy into France, where, about Whitsuntide, he held a council at Troyes. Before the assembling of the council, the emperor sent ambassadors to the pope, at Chalons upon the Marne, to shew his holiness that his claim of investitures was an antient right belonging to the emperors; but the pope refusing his consent, the ambassadors departed in an abrupt manner, declaring that they would determine the controversy at Rome with their swords <sup>He goes into France and holds a council at Troyes.</sup>. The pope proceeded afterwards to Troyes, and in the council ordained, that the investiture of benefices belonged only to the sovereign pontiff; but before the publication of the decree, ambassadors arrived from the emperor, who represented to the council, that the power of appointing bishops had been granted to Charlemagne by the apostolic see; and as Henry was his lawful successor, he expected to enjoy the same privilege. As the emperor had approached e with a considerable army to the confines of France, the council deferred the consideration of that question, under pretence that they were in a foreign kingdom, and indulged the emperor with the delay of a year, that he might come himself to Rome to plead his cause in a general council. <sup>A. D. 1107.</sup>

<sup>1</sup> URSBERG Abbas hoc anno. Vita Ludov. c. 9.

<sup>k</sup> Concil. Gener. t. x. p. 748. DONIZO in Vita Mathild.

<sup>m</sup> SUGER

(P) Ever since the time of Charlemagne, princes had been in possession of the right to give investitures of great benefices. The first pope that undertook to deprive them of that right was Gregory VII. though he himself, after his election to the papal see, refused to be consecrated till he had the approbation of the emperor. It must be acknowledged, that the princes, by their frequent abuses of that prerogative, gave too great occasion to the popes to call the lawfulness of it in question. For under pretence that the bishops and abbots could not enter into the possession of their benefices till they had received the investiture of them, the princes openly sold them to the highest bidder. Elections indeed were then in use; but it was the investiture that gave the right to the temporalities, which the princes might refuse to grant, if they were not satisfied with the person elected; so that the whole power of providing to benefices was in their hands, for none chose to be elected, unless they were sure of having the consent of the prince.

Besides the simoniacal use of this right, which the popes condemned, the manner of giving investitures was another subject of dispute. As they were given by a pastoral staff and a ring, the popes seemed to think that the princes pretended to confer a spiritual jurisdiction, which was an encroachment upon their authority, reckoned by them to be divine. It appears, that this form of giving the investiture was the chief occasion of the disputes betwixt the sovereign princes and the popes; for the kings of England and France having afterwards agreed to alter the form, were no more disturbed by the popes with regard to investitures. But during the disputes of the emperor Henry IV. with the papal see, the difference betwixt the temporal and spiritual jurisdiction of a bishop was not attended to, both parties carrying their pretensions beyond their just bounds, the popes especially advancing theirs to an extravagant degree, absolutely forbidding all ecclesiastics to receive any investiture from laymen, or even to take the oath of allegiance to them.

He returns to Italy, and accommodates the difference with the king of England. PASCHAL having dismissed the council of Troyes, returned in autumn to Italy, and made an accommodation with the ambassadors of the king of England, with regard to the dispute about investitures, it being agreed that the king should receive the homage of the new elected bishops and abbots; but that he should invest none by the ring and staff<sup>n</sup>. Having thus put an end to that controversy, he sent Gibelin, bishop of Arles, as his legate to Jerusalem, who held a council in that city, of the bishops of the country, in which Ebremerius, who had intruded into the patriarchate, was deposed, and Gibelin chosen to that dignity. The following year Paschal was engaged against Ptolemy count of Tusculum, and Peter de Columna, who had invaded some territories of the church: having reduced them by the assistance of Leo Frangipani, he went to Benevento, where he held a council, in which an anathema was denounced against lay investitures, and the clergy were prohibited from wearing secular or splendid apparel<sup>o</sup>. Before he went to Benevento, he wrote to Baldwin king of Jerusalem, allowing him to add all the cities he should conquer from the Infidels to the see of Jerusalem, which grant greatly offended the patriarch of Antioch. Paschal being soon after informed that Alphonfus, king of Arragon, had married Uraca, the daughter of the late king of Castile, related to him in the third degree, he wrote to the bishop of Compostella, ordering him to cause the incestuous marriage to be dissolved, threatening the king with excommunication and deposition if he did not comply. Alphonfus paid no regard to the threats of the pope, but was killed soon after in his wars with the Moors.

A. D. 1108.

He threatens the king of Arragon with excommunication, for marrying his cousin.

1109.

The emperor marches with a formidable army into Italy.

1110.

He is crowned king of Italy at Milan.

1111.

In the mean time the emperor having concluded a peace with the Poles, and made an alliance with the king of England, whose daughter he had married, assembled a formidable army, and marched for Italy, in order to determine the dispute concerning investitures, and receive the imperial crown from the pope<sup>p</sup>. Paschal being informed of his march, and judging by his great preparations that he intended rather to give the law to him, than to receive it from the council, sent to France to solicit the assistance of Lewis, and went himself to Apulia, and assembling the Norman princes and counts of that country, obtained the promise of assistance from them against the emperor, if there should be occasion. Upon his return to the city, he took an oath from the nobles of Rome to the same purpose<sup>q</sup>. Henry had by this time passed the Alps, and arrived at Ivrea, where he was received with great respect, and his army supplied with refreshments. Having afterwards taken and burnt Novara, for offering to resist him, he marched to Milan, where he was crowned king of Italy by the archbishop Chrysolaus; and having crossed the Appenine mountains during the month of December, he stopped at Florence, where he kept his Christmas<sup>r</sup>.

WHILST he continued at Florence, he sent one David, a Scotchman, president of the schools of Wirtzburg, and other learned persons, as his deputies to the pope, who having admitted them to several audiences, agreed to the following convention. "That the emperor should publicly and by writing renounce his right of investitures on the day of his coronation; that he should put the holy see in possession of all the territories formerly granted to it by Charlemagne, and other emperors; and that he should not, by himself or another, deprive pope Paschal of the pontificate, or take from him his life, liberty, or any of his members: That the pope, on the other side, should order the bishops to deliver up to the emperor their fiefs, and the lands of their bishopricks which held of the empire, that is, all the temporalities of their benefices, and should deliver a bull in good form, forbidding, under pain of excommunication, all bishops ever to pretend to those temporalities<sup>s</sup>."

A treaty concluded betwixt the emperor and the pope at Sutri.

Henry enters Rome, and is conducted to the church of St. Peter.

DURING the negotiations of his deputies with the pope, the emperor advanced by slow marches towards Rome. Upon his arrival at Arezzo, being denied access to the town, he took it by force, and treated it in the same manner as he had done Novara. Advancing afterwards to Sutri, he was there met by his deputies, with others from the pope, who came from Rome with a copy of the convention, which the emperor agreed to, and gave hostages for the security of the performance of it on his part; but to the copy which he signed, he added the following clause: "On condition that the exchange of right of investitures, for the possessions which the bishops held of the empire, was approved of and solemnly ratified by the bishops and nobles of Germany<sup>t</sup>". The pope, either not attending to this clause, or believing that he had authority enough with the German bishops to make them consent to it, made no complaint of that article, but published that an honourable peace was concluded with the emperor. The people rejoiced at this news, and received Henry into the city with extraordinary honours, going before him to the church of St. Peter with palms and branches of trees. Being received by the pope on the top of the steps, he was conducted into the church, and seated in a magnificent desk, while his holiness began the mass. After having performed

<sup>n</sup> EDINER. Vita Anselm.<sup>o</sup> Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 24, & 35.<sup>p</sup> SIGON. l. x. p. 244.<sup>q</sup> Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 25, 37. SIGON. ubi supra.<sup>r</sup> DONIZO in Vita Mathild.<sup>s</sup> Chron.

Cassin. l. iv. c. 37, 38, 39. Exemp. Ser. Cod. Vatican. apud BARON, Annal. an. 1111.

<sup>t</sup> URSPERG.

Abbas. BARON. Annal. ad an. 1110.

a what is called the offertory, the pope, about to proceed to the coronation, demanded of the emperor aloud, if he was willing to renounce his right of investitures in exchange for the fiefs of the bishops. The emperor replied in the affirmative<sup>u</sup>; but the bishops absolutely refused to part with their fiefs, declaring that they had the same right to them that the pope had to the possessions of his see.

THE pope, finding that he could not prevail with the bishops, declared that he would not crown the emperor, since he did not execute the treaty; and rising from his seat, went to the altar to finish the mass; which behaviour of the pope offending the emperor, he ordered his guards to surround the altar, and made his holiness, and all the cardinals and other ecclesiastics that were assisting him, prisoners. Upon the news of this violence, the Romans immediately assembled, and attacking the Germans, killed a great many of them; but the emperor having the second day after received a reinforcement from his camp, repulsed the Romans with great slaughter, and taking the pope and the other prisoners with him, he marched with his army towards Soraſſe, ravaging the country round Rome, in hopes of prevailing with the pope to agree to his coronation upon his own terms. Paschal continued a long time inflexible; but being disappointed in his succours from the Normans, by the death of duke Roger, who died during his confinement<sup>w</sup>, and fearing likewise a schism in the church, he was at last prevailed with to renew the treaty, by the intreaties of his fellow prisoners, who were threatened with immediate death in his presence, if he did not consent<sup>x</sup>.

He accordingly granted to the emperor, by a bull in due form, the right of investitures by the ring and crozier, without any limitations; upon which Henry promised to restore to the church all the possessions granted by former emperors. Matters being thus settled, the pope was conducted back to the city, and conferred the imperial crown on the emperor, on the Sunday after Easter, besides the usual ceremonies, being obliged to present him with a new bull, confirming the privilege of investitures<sup>y</sup>. Having then celebrated mass, he divided the host, and presenting one half to the emperor, and reserving the other to himself, he pronounced a curse against the party who should break the present treaty. The ceremony being finished, the emperor left Rome about an hour after, and being accompanied with the pope and several cardinals, set out on his return for Germany.

d PASCHAL having taken leave of the emperor in Lombardy, returned to Rome, where he was again involved in new troubles, which seemed to him even of more dangerous consequence than the former; for the cardinals and prelates, who continued at Rome during his confinement, being greatly offended at his concession to the emperor, publicly condemned his proceeding, and affirmed, that he could not conclude that treaty without the consent of the sacred college; some even talked of deposing him as a heretic, who had contradicted the decrees of his predecessors<sup>z</sup>. Paschal pleaded in his excuse the necessity to which he was reduced, and that what he had done was not from any consideration of his own danger, but merely to free the city and the whole church from the threatening calamity. The prelates did not acquiesce in this apology; but upon the absence of the pope at Tarracina, assembled of themselves at Rome, and annulling what Paschal had done in the late treaty with the emperor, they confirmed the decrees of Gregory VII. Victor III. and Urban II. against lay investitures. The pope wrote them a very moderate letter, blaming their conduct, and declaring, that he would endeavour, as soon as possible, to reform what was amiss in the late treaty. Notwithstanding this letter, many cardinals still continued to censure the conduct of the pope; and Bruno, bishop of Segui and abbot of Cassino, a man of a warm temper, wrote a letter to the bishop of Porta, in which he accused Paschal of heresy<sup>a</sup>.

THE pope, offended with the liberty of Bruno, deprived him of his abbacy, and returning immediately to Rome, appointed a general council to be held in the Lateran church, to determine concerning the treaty. In the mean time he wrote to his legates in the other kingdoms of Europe, informing them how he had been forced to grant the treaty to Henry, and declared, that he annulled what was therein contained, and confirmed the decrees of his predecessors<sup>b</sup>. The council having assembled on the 28th of March, Paschal informed them how the bull of privileges had been extorted from him: he acknowledged that he had done amiss, and begged to be corrected; but as he had sworn never to disturb the emperor with regard to investitures, he desired them to elect another pope, to provide for the good of the church<sup>c</sup>. The assembly refused to receive his demission; and the following day having appointed the bishop of Angouleme as their president, they made a decree, annulling and condemning the false privilege extorted from pope Paschal by the violence of Henry V.

<sup>u</sup> SIGON. l. x. p. 246.

<sup>w</sup> ROMUALD. Chron. hoc anno.

<sup>x</sup> Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 41 & 42.

<sup>y</sup> Acta ipsa ex PETR. DIAC. l. iv. c. 42.

<sup>z</sup> Epist. Pasch. apud BARON.

<sup>a</sup> Epist. Brun. apud eund.

<sup>b</sup> Epist. Pasch. apud eund.

<sup>c</sup> Vita Pasch. a Nicol. Aragon. apud MURATOR.

The emperor is excommunicated in the councils of Vienne and Jerusalem.

THE behaviour of the pope in this council was far from satisfying all the ecclesiastics; <sup>a</sup> he was blamed particularly by Guido, archbishop of Vienne, his legate in France, who held a council at Vienne, in which, to maintain the lawfulness of lay investitures was judged a heresy, the above-mentioned bull of privileges was likewise condemned and annulled, and the emperor himself excommunicated. Guido, in the name of the council, wrote to the pope, informing him, that they had condemned the bull extorted from his simplicity, and desiring him to confirm their decrees with his apostolic sanction, especially the sentence of excommunication against the emperor <sup>d</sup>. Henry had been excommunicated the year before by Cono, bishop of Pilastrina, in a council held by him in Jerusalem, and likewise in five other councils, which he held in Greece, Hungary, Saxony, Lorrain, and France<sup>e</sup>; however, the pope, for what reason is uncertain, refused to give his consent. <sup>b</sup>

The emperor Alexius offers to receive his crown from the hands of the pope.

IN the mean time, an embassy arrived at Rome from Alexius, emperor of Constantinople, who expressed his sorrow for the bad treatment the pope had received from Henry, and offering to come himself, or to send his son John, to receive the imperial crown from the hands of Paschal. This embassy was very acceptable to the Romans, who, according to Petrus Diaconus, sent 600 men of note to the coasts of Italy, to conduct the emperor to Rome<sup>f</sup>. Some of the chief of them went with the abbot of Cassino to Constantinople; but Alexius being engaged with other affairs, thought no more of his journey to Italy, so that the ambassadors returned disappointed. While Paschal was in expectation of a visit from Alexius, he received a complaint against Heriman, who had intruded into the see of Augsburgh, and debauched the wives of several citizens; having formerly received an accusation against him, in the council of Guaftalla, he now wrote to the archbishop of Mentz to proceed against him in a canonical manner. <sup>c</sup>

The pope holds a council at Benevento.

THE following year Paschal went to Benevento, where he held a council, in which were decided some provincial questions, and appointed Landulphus to govern the city under the title of comestable<sup>g</sup>. Soon after he held another synod at Ceperano, on the Garigliano, where he restored the archbishop of Casanza to his see, who had been expelled by Roger count of Sicily, and forced to take the habit of a monk at Cassino<sup>h</sup>. In the mean time Landulphus, governor of Benevento, having by his incursions drawn the power of the Normans against him, had thereby exposed his city to their ravages. The citizens, not being able to repel the invaders, sent their archbishop to the pope; who, having received a power to treat with the Normans, returned to Benevento; but, instead of executing his commission, he assembled some troops, and attacked the comestable, whom he compelled to abdicate his dignity. Complaints of the archbishop's conduct being laid before the council at Ceperano, he was unanimously deposed; and William, the son of duke Roger, having come to do homage to the pope, he received from his holiness the investiture of his possessions, with the title of duke of Calabria and Apulia. After dismissing the council, the pope, at the intreaty of Iva, bishop of Chartres, granted the pallium to Rodolphus, archbishop of Canterbury, without requiring him to come for it to Rome according to the established custom<sup>i</sup>. <sup>d</sup>

The countess Mathilda dies.

1115.

The pope confirms the excommunication of the emperor in the Lateran.

1116.

THE following year the countess Mathilda died, in the 69th year of her age; but whether the church of Rome immediately obtained possession of her estates is uncertain; for an author of those times mentions, that, immediately upon the death of Mathilda, messengers came to the emperor from Italy, inviting him to come and take possession of the estates of his cousin<sup>k</sup> (Q). Paschal, in the mean while, went into Apulia, and held a council at Troja, in which the truce of God (R) was established for three years<sup>l</sup>. Upon his return to Rome, he held a general council in the Lateran church during the time of Lent, in which assembly he again acknowledged his fault in granting the bull of privileges to the emperor, which he condemned and declared of no effect, denouncing an anathema against the giver and receiver of a lay investiture. And the bishop of Pilastrina, notwithstanding the opposition of several of the emperor's friends who were present, urging the pope to ratify what he had done as his legate, Paschal at last declared, that he approved and confirmed all his proceedings: the bishop thereupon informed the assembly, that he had excommunicated the emperor in six councils. The pope likewise confirmed the decrees of Guido, made in the council of Vienne; so that although he did not excommunicate the emperor himself, he confirmed the excommunications of others<sup>m</sup>. <sup>e</sup>

<sup>d</sup> BARON. Annal. ad an. 1112. l. iv. c. 48.

<sup>e</sup> URSPERG. Abbas ad an. 1116.

<sup>f</sup> PETR. DIAC. Chron. Cassin.

<sup>g</sup> FALC. Benevent. Chron. apud MURATOR. t. v. p. 83.

<sup>h</sup> PETR. DIAC. Chron. Cassin.

<sup>i</sup> IVON. Epist. 252.

<sup>k</sup> URSPERG. Abbas. BARON. Annal. ad an. 1115.

<sup>l</sup> FAL-

<sup>m</sup> CON. Benevent. Chron. apud MURATOR. t. v. p. 89. 90. SIGON. l. x. p. 250.

<sup>n</sup> URSPERG. Abbas hoc anno. Card. Arragon. in vita Pasch.

(Q) Beatrice the wife of Boniface, marquis of Tuscany, and mother of Mathilda, was the sister of Henry III. the grandfather of the emperor.

(R) By the truce of God is meant, a decree prohibiting the taking private revenge on Sundays and holidays, or attacking any person when they were going to church.

a HENRY by this time had advanced with his army as far as Mantua, and, hearing of the determinations of the council, sent ambassadors to the pope, complaining of the injustice of his proceeding. Paschal replied, that he had kept his oath, and had not excommunicated him himself; but as he was excommunicated by a council, he could only be absolved by the same. The emperor finding himself deceived by the pope, resolved, as soon as he had settled the affairs of Lombardy, to march to Rome. Paschal, remembering his former expedition, proposed to the Romans to prepare for making a vigorous defence against the Imperialists; but finding that Ptolemy, count of Tusculum, the prefect of the city, and many of the nobles, were in the interest of the emperor, he left the city, and went the following A. D. 1117. b held a council, and restored Landulphus the archbishop to his see.

WHILE he continued in this city, he received messengers from Rodolphus, archbishop of Canterbury, and Heribert, bishop of Norwich, who had come as far as Rome, as ambassadors from the king of England, and the clergy of that kingdom, complaining of the rapaciousness of his legate, and insisted upon the privilege granted by St. Gregory to the archbishop of Canterbury, of being perpetual legate of the holy see in England. The pope wrote to the bishops and king of England, professing, that he had no intention to violate the privileges of the archbishop of Canterbury; but as the apostolic see had for a long time sent legates into England, he desired to see the bull of the privileges granted by St. Gregory. The ambassadors having received this letter from the pope, returned to England, without any redress of the grievances complained of.

IN the mean time the emperor having received the homage of several cities that had belonged to Mathilda, and taken some places in the territory of St. Peter, that had held for the pope, entered Rome in a magnificent manner; and having given his daughter to the son of Ptolemy, and confirmed to him whatever his grandfather Gregory, and his other ancestors possessed, he secured the affection of the other nobles by his great liberalities. But not being able to prevail with any of the clergy of Rome to consent to his coronation, which ceremony he desired again to be performed, Macericius Burdinus, archbishop of Braga in Portugal (S), who had attended him in his expedition, crowned him in the church of St. Peter, with great solemnity; immediately after which, he returned with his army towards Tuscany, upon account of the heats. Paschal, during his residence in (T) Apulia, had assembled an army of Normans, and thinking himself strong enough to oppose the Imperialists, in the beginning of autumn set out for Rome; but not being able to bear the violent heats, he fell dangerously sick at Anagni. However, he recovered in some degree, and went to Pilastrina, where he dedicated the church of St. Agapetus, and from thence returned about the middle of January with the Norman army to Rome; but died the second day after his arrival. c

THE cardinals and bishops who were then in Rome, thinking it of the utmost consequence to elect a successor as soon as possible, immediately sent to Cassino for cardinal Cajetan, and, upon his arrival, unanimously elected him pope, by the name of Gelasius II. (U). The election was quickly disturbed by Lincius Frangipani, one of the wealthiest nobles of Rome, entirely attached to the emperor, who, enraged that the cardinals had not elected a person recommended by himself, broke in with an armed force into the monastery where they were assembled, and taking Gelasius by the throat, pulled him from his seat; and, after kicking him, carried him prisoner to his castle in the neighbourhood. Many of the cardinals, who

<sup>a</sup> FALC. Benevent. Chron. p. 90. ROMUALD Salern. Chron. p. 180.

RON. Annal. ad an. 1117.

MURATOR. tom. iii.

<sup>b</sup> Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 63.

<sup>c</sup> Vita Pasch. ubi supra.

<sup>d</sup> WILLEL. MALMS. l. i. BA.

<sup>e</sup> SIGON. l. x. p. 252. Vita Pasch. apud

<sup>f</sup> Vita Gelas. apud FLATINAM. SIGON. l. x. p. 252.

(S) Burdinus was born in the province of Limofin in France. He was of an ambitious, fawning, and interested temper; and having gained the friendship of the archbishop of Toledo, he obtained to be archdeacon of that church, and was afterwards declared metropolitan of Conimbria. He made a voyage to the Holy Land in 1108, and upon his return, procured the archbishopric of Braga, with the privilege of the pallium; which occasioning some disputes between him and the archbishop of Toledo, he was obliged to come to Rome in 1115, to implore the assistance of the pope, who, observing his capacity for negotiation, made him his legate to treat with the emperor. Having neglected to follow the instructions of the court of Rome, his commission was soon after revoked; upon which disgrace, he addicted himself wholly to the service of the emperor.

(T) By Apulia, the authors of those times frequently meant all that part of Italy that lay south from the Tyber.

(U) Gelasius was born at Gaeta, of a noble and illustrious family, many of his ancestors having been dukes of Gaeta, and also of Naples and Sorrento. He early took the habit of a monk at Cassino, and distinguished himself for his attachment to Urban II. and Paschal II. by the first of whom he was created chancellor and cardinal deacon, and by the last cardinal archdeacon and librarian (1).

(1) Comment. Constantin. Cajetan. apud Murator. t. iii.

He is obliged to leave
Rome.

He is consecrated at Gaeta.

The emperor declares his election void, and appoints
Gregory
VIII.

Gelasius goes to France.

The emperor is excommunicated.

A. D. 1119.
Death of Gelasius.

were endeavouring to mount their mules to make their escape, were likewise seized and shut up with the pope<sup>a</sup>. The news of this outrage spreading through the city, the Normans, together with the Romans, immediately took arms, and besieged the house of Frangipani, who seeing himself likely to be overpowered, asked pardon of the pope, and delivered him up to his friends. Gelasius was then set upon a white horse, and conducted amidst the acclamations of the people to the Lateran palace; but before his consecration, he was alarmed with the news that the emperor had arrived with his army at the portico of St. Peter; upon which information, he immediately went with his attendants on board two small vessels in the river Tyber, with a design to escape by sea; but when he came to Ostia, the weather was so tempestuous, that it was impossible to proceed farther. The German soldiers, who had followed the vessels on the bank of the river, making preparations to seize the pope, he landed during the night, and was carried on the shoulders of cardinal Hugh to Ardea; and a few days after, the weather turning more favourable, he returned to Ostia, and sailed from thence to his native city Gaeta, where, being attended by a great many cardinals and bishops, he was ordained priest, and afterwards consecrated in the presence of William duke of Apulia, Robert prince of Capua, and several other Norman nobles, who took the oath of fidelity to him, and received from him the investiture of their estates (W). After this he restored Leetus to the archbishopric of St. Albans, and went to Capua, where he celebrated the feast of Easter. b

He had no sooner arrived at Capua, than he was informed that the emperor had declared his election void, and having assembled in the Vatican all the clergy attached to his interests, had caused Burdinus to be elected by them under the name of Gregory VIII. The messenger added likewise, that he had advanced with his army into the territory of Anagni, and was besieging Turricolo. Upon this news, the pope immediately asked the assistance of the Norman princes, and, holding a council in Capua, excommunicated the emperor and the antipope<sup>c</sup>. The Norman princes having soon after assembled with their forces at St. Germain, advanced with the pope towards Rome; which Henry being informed of, he raised the siege of Turricolo, and leaving the antipope with some forces at Rome, he marched with the rest of his army to Germany. Upon the departure of the emperor, Gelasius dismissed the Normans, and returned in a private manner to Rome; but the party of the antipope being more powerful than he expected, he lived secretly in the house of Wartbman and Pandulphus, two Corfican nobles. d

Soon after, upon the feast of St. Praxidis, going to church to celebrate mass, he was assaulted by the Frangipani, with a body of armed men; but his friends making a resolute defence for several hours, he found means of escaping, and fled to the fields, in the neighbourhood of St. Paul's. Gelasius, finding that the party of the antipope was too powerful in Rome, resolved to go into France, and appointed the bishop of Porta as his vicar in the city. He likewise gave the command of the city to Peter Leo, as prefect, and appointed Stephen the Norman as standard-bearer and protector of the church. Before he embarked for France, he sent the pallium to Walter, lately elected archbishop of Ravenna; and, as that church had deserted the party of the emperor, he restored to its jurisdiction the churches which Paschal had taken from it in the council of Guastalla<sup>e</sup>. The ships being now ready, he sailed for Pisa on the second of September, and continuing some days in that city, he again put to sea, and arrived at Provence, where he was received with great respect<sup>f</sup>.

WHILE he continued in France, he sent a diploma to the archbishop of Toledo, confirming to him the primacy of all Spain; and being informed that the emperor every-where represented his retreat from Rome as an abdication of the pontificate, he sent the famous Cono, bishop of Pilastrina, as his legate into Germany, who held a council at Cologne, and another at Fritzlar, in both which the emperor and the antipope were excommunicated<sup>g</sup>. During these disturbances in Rome and Italy, the order of the knights Templars was founded at Jerusalem, their profession being to protect the pilgrims from robbers on their journey to that city. For the first nine years they were only nine in number; and as they had no house appropriated for themselves, the king, for a time, granted them a part of his palace, next to the church, or temple, of our Saviour, from whence they got the name of Templars<sup>h</sup>. The following year Gelasius held a council at Vienne, and a few days after falling sick of a pleurisy,

<sup>a</sup> Vita Gelas. ex. MSS. PANDULPH Pisan. <sup>u</sup> Concil. Gener. p. 823. Abbas URSPERG. SIGON. l. x. p. 253.
<sup>v</sup> Epist. Gelas. apud BARON. Comment. in Vit. Gelas. apud MURAT. t. iii. <sup>x</sup> FALCO Benevent.
Chron. ad hunc ann. <sup>y</sup> URSPERG Abbas hoc anno. <sup>z</sup> WILLEL. TYR. bello sacro. l. xii. c. 7.

(W) Romualdus archbishop of Salerno, in his Chronicon, mentions the form which the pope used in giving the investiture to William, "As pope Gregory gave the duchy of Apulia and Calabria to Robert Guiscard your grand-father, and as pope Urban gave the same duchy

"to your father Roger, and as pope Paschal gave the same first to your father Roger, and afterwards to yourself, so I give to you the same lands, with the honour of dukedom, by the same gift, and under the same agreement."

a he died in the monastery of Cluny, on the 28th of January. Before his death he recommended his legate Cono as his successor, who had returned from Germany; but he refusing to accept of the dignity, the cardinals present unanimously agreed to elect Guido, or Guy, archbishop of Vienne, who arrived at Cluny a few days after the death of Gelasius. The fixing upon a successor before the death of the pope was contrary to custom; but then authorized by the schism occasioned by Burminus<sup>a</sup>.

GELASIUS being buried in the monastery of Cluny, the cardinals immediately elected Guido Election of Calixtus II. (X), by the name of Calixtus II. but he absolutely refused to assume the pontifical ornaments; till the election was ratified by the cardinals and clergy at Rome. Having at last received the approbation of the cardinals, bishops, and nobles in that city, he was consecrated on the 14th of October, by Lambert bishop of Ostia<sup>b</sup>. A few days after he held a general council at Rheims, at which were present 426 bishops and abbots, from the different nations of Europe, besides a great number of other ecclesiastics and nobles<sup>c</sup>. The emperor, in the mean time, giving some hopes of an accommodation, and desiring a conference with the pope, Calixtus left the council, and went to Mousson, in order to settle the dispute about investitures with the emperor. Henry had advanced to Troyes with an army of 30,000 men: and, though he had agreed, a few weeks before, with the deputies of the pope, to renounce the giving of investitures with the ring and pastoral staff, on condition of being absolved from excommunication, and allowed the privilege of investing with the sceptre, yet he now refused to determine any thing without the advice of a general dyet; upon which the pope returned to the council, and, having renewed the decree against lay investitures, pronounced a sentence of excommunication against the emperor and the antipope<sup>d</sup>. The emperor is excommunicated by the council of Rheims.

AFTER dismissing the council, Calixtus went to Gisors in Normandy, where he had a conference with Henry king of England, who, being offended with Turstan, archbishop of York, for allowing himself to be consecrated at Rheims without his knowledge, had sworn never to suffer him to enter his dominions. The pope confirmed to Henry all the prerogatives which his ancestors had enjoyed in Normandy and England, and chiefly that no person should be allowed to act as legate in England, unless desired by the king. He then offered to absolve Henry from the oath he had sworn with regard to Turstan, which the king consented to, on condition that the archbishop should pay the same subjection to the see of Canterbury as his predecessors had done; which Turstan refused to agree to. However, the pope afterwards writing a letter to the king and archbishop of Canterbury, interdicting all divine service in the dioceses of Canterbury and York, unless Turstan was admitted to his benefice without any limitation, Henry at last allowed him to enter the kingdom, and enjoy his archbishopric<sup>e</sup>. A conference between the pope and the king of England.

CALIXTUS, having settled the affairs of the Gallican church, proposed to set out for Italy; but, before he left France, he enlarged the privileges of the archbishopric of Vienne, by a new bull, dated at Valentia upon the Rhosne, on the 24th of February<sup>f</sup>. Setting out for Rome, Valentia, he passed the Alps, and was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy by all the cities of Italy through which he passed. At Pisa he dedicated the great church to the Virgin Mary, and arrived at last at Rome, on the ninth of June, where he was received with the greatest respect; upon which the antipope quitted the city, and retired to Sutri, which was garrisoned by imperialists<sup>g</sup>. The pope, finding that he would need an army to reduce the place, went in the beginning of autumn to Benevento, where he received the allegiance of the Norman princes, and gave the investiture of Apulia to duke William<sup>h</sup>. While he continued in this city, he decreed several usurped territories to be again restored to the monastery of Monte Cassino; but the abbess of the nunnery of St. Mary at Capua, thinking herself injured by the sentence, refused to give obedience, although she was excommunicated, and her nunnery laid under an interdict. The dispute was terminated by the intercession of count Rainulphus, who satisfied the demands of the monastery of Cassino. Calixtus afterwards received an embassy from Lewis king of France, by Suger, abbot of St. Dennis, who wrote the life of that king, and, having dismissed the embassy, he went to Troja, to solicit the assistance of the Normans against the antipope. Calixtus arrives at Rome. A. D. 1120. He receives an embassy from the king of France.

HAVING raised a considerable army, he returned to Rome, and the following spring marched against Sutri; but he had no sooner brought his machines to play against the walls, than the inhabitants capitulated, and delivered up Gregory, who was cloathed with raw goats Burminus taken prisoner.

<sup>a</sup> Comment. in. Vit. Gelas. apud MURATOR. t. iii. Abbas.

<sup>c</sup> ROGER. in Annal Anglic. Aët. Concil. p. 478. Diplom. ap BARON.

<sup>70.</sup> ROMUALD. Chron. ad hunc an.

<sup>b</sup> FALC. Benevent Chron. hoc Anno.

<sup>e</sup> ROGER, ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> URSPERG

<sup>f</sup> Exemplar

<sup>h</sup> Chron. Cassin. lib. iv. c.

(X) Guido was the son of William, surnamed Tete Hardie, or Strong-head, duke of Burgundy, and consequently related to the blood-royal of France. Adelaide, the wife of Lewis le Gros, was his niece; and the emperor Henry his cousin german (1).

(1) Suger in Ludov. vit. Pontif. Platin.

skins, and set upon a camel, with his face towards the tail, and in that manner led to the city, <sup>a</sup> and, being conducted through the principal streets, was afterwards shut up in the monastery of Cava for life <sup>1</sup>. Having reduced Sutri, and taken Burdinus, Calixtus destroyed some of the castles of the opposite party in Rome, and quelled those counts who had invaded the territories of the church. The peace of the city being thus established, he appointed Adelbert, archbishop of Mentz, as his legate in Germany, who was the emperor's professed enemy, and had raised a powerful league against him in Saxony. But both the emperor and the states of Germany being weary of the long and destructive wars, which, for more than forty years, had desolated their country, Adelbert was prevented from embroiling the kingdom by their moderation; for a dyet being held at Wurtzburg, preliminaries of a peace were settled, and Bruno, bishop of Spire, and Arnold, abbot of Fulde, were sent as deputies to the pope, <sup>b</sup> praying him to call a general council, to terminate all differences betwixt the empire and the church <sup>k</sup>.

Calixtus receives an embassy from Germany.
A. D. 1122.

CALIXTUS received this embassy with great joy, and accordingly held a general council in the Lateran church, during Lent, before which the German ambassadors declared, that the emperor was willing to renounce the right of investiture of benefices, and desired the council to send an embassy to Germany, to receive the renunciation from the emperor, and, in the name of the apostolic see, to absolve him from the sentence of excommunication. The council, with great readiness, complied with their desire, and appointed Lambert bishop of Ostia, and two other cardinals, as legates of the holy see in Germany. They likewise made some canons, annulling all the proceedings of Burdinus, and threatening excommunication <sup>c</sup> against those who should break the truce of God, coin false money, or attack the city of Benvenuto. It was ordained also, that persons excommunicated by their own bishop could not be absolved by any other bishop or abbot <sup>1</sup>.

The affair of investitures determined.

1123.

UPON the arrival of the legates in Germany, a dyet was appointed to be held at Wurtzburg; but they having consecrated Roger bishop of that city, although the emperor had appointed one Gebehard, the accommodation was interrupted; for the emperor did not appear at the assembly, which broke up without transacting any business. The legates still continuing in Germany, Henry sent an excuse to them for not appearing at Wurtzburg, and appointed another dyet, to be held in the month of September, at Worms, where he and all his party received a general absolution: he promised, by the bishop of Ostia, to renounce <sup>d</sup> investiture by the ring and crozier, to restore all possessions that had been usurped from the church, and to allow the vacancies of benefices to be supplied by a free election and consecration. Upon receiving the above concession, attested by the golden seal of the emperor, and the subscriptions of the nobles, who were present, the pope reciprocally promised to allow the elections of German bishops and abbots to be made in the presence of the emperor, or his commissaries; and if any disputes should happen, they should be determined by the metropolitan, with the consent of the emperor; that the person elected should receive the investiture of the regalia (Y) by the sceptre, and should pay homage for them only; and, lastly, that the subjects of the empire, out of Germany, should be allowed six months for receiving the investiture of the regalia. <sup>m</sup>

THE peace being ratified on both sides, the emperor sent ambassadors along with the legates to Rome, with rich presents for the pope, who wrote to the emperor, confirming what had been done by his legates, and testifying his joy upon the happy event. Calixtus having thus obtained, in a peaceable manner, from the emperor, what his predecessors had in vain struggled for by violent means, he went to the monastery of Cassino, in order to put a stop to the irruptions of the Norman princes, who had invaded some part of his territories <sup>n</sup>. Upon his return to Rome, he created the bishop of Compostella a metropolitan, from his devotion to the apostle James, whose body is said to be buried in that city (Z).

The pope gives a commission to the bishop of Bamberg to convert the Pomeranians.

Death of Calixtus II.

THE following year he gave a commission to Otho bishop of Bamberg, who had formerly been chancellor to the emperor Henry IV. to preach the gospel, in quality of an apostle, to <sup>f</sup> the Pomeranians, who had been lately conquered by the king of Poland. In consideration likewise of his piety, he granted large privileges to the church of Bamberg, and to fifteen monasteries, which Otho had founded at his own charge <sup>o</sup>. Towards the end of the year he made a large ordination of bishops, priests, and deacons; after which, being seized with a fever, he died on the 15th of December, and was buried in the Lateran church. His

<sup>1</sup> ROMUALD. Chron. URSPERG. Abbas. SUGER in Vit. Ludov. Concil. ap. BARON.

<sup>m</sup> Abbas URSPERG.

<sup>n</sup> Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 42 & 44.

<sup>k</sup> URSPERG. Abbas.

<sup>o</sup> URSPERG. Abbas.

<sup>1</sup> Acta

(Y) By the regalia is understood the fiefs, and the royal rights pertaining to them; such as the privileges of judging upon life and death; of coining money; of laying duties upon merchandizes; and other rights granted by the emperors to several churches in the empire.

(Z) Calixtus, besides his letters and decrees, wrote a book of the miracles of St. James the apostle (2).

a memory was very dear to the Romans, on account of his putting an end to the dispute with the emperor about investitures, on terms so advantageous to the papal see, and for several public works which he executed, especially the conducting of water into the city from the antient Formill<sup>p</sup>.

CALIXTUS being dead, the cardinals, the next day, assembled to chuse a successor, and the greatest part of them fixing upon one Theobald, a cardinal priest, he was called Celestine, <sup>Election of</sup> and Te Deum immediately sung. But Theobald absolutely refusing to accept of the dignity, <sup>Honorius II.</sup> Robert Frangipani, with his followers, called out, "Lambert bishop of Ostia is pope;" upon which there arose a great confusion in the assembly; but Theobald still refusing to consent to his own election, and Lambert being clothed in the pontifical dress, he was at last acknowledged as pope, by the name of Honorius II. Seven days after Honorius, reflecting that his election was not canonical, resigned his mitre, and other papal ornaments; but, the other cardinals being satisfied with his election, obliged him to resume the ornaments, and again declared him pope. During these transactions at Rome, the church of Ireland was again restored to the communion of the Roman see, by St. Malachi, a monk, who obtained the bishopric of Connor, after it had been possessed by one family for fifteen generations<sup>q</sup>.

HONORIUS, soon after his promotion, went to the monastery of Cassino, and reproved the abbot Oderisius for his profusion, accusing him of being more like a soldier than an abbot. From thence he went to Benevento, where he continued several months; but that city being shaken by a terrible earthquake, he returned again to Rome, and receiving a complaint against the abbot Oderisius, he summoned him to appear at Rome. The abbot neglecting the summons, Honorius deposed him; but Oderisius paying no regard to that sentence, he was at length excommunicated. The monks immediately assembled, and chose one Nicholas for their abbot; but Honorius sent a legate to Cassino, desiring them to elect Senioritus, chief of the monastery at Capua, which they complied with, but not without murmuring that their privileges were infringed<sup>r</sup> (A).

ABOUT the same time he condemned one Pontius, who, some years before, had been abbot of Cluny; but, disagreeing with his monks, had, with the leave of Calixtus, resigned that charge, and gone into the Holy Land, where he continued three years; and returning to France, had insisted upon resuming his former dignity, to the prejudice of Peter the present abbot<sup>s</sup>. This same year St. Norbert (B) received from Honorius the confirmation of his new order of Premonstratensians, which he had instituted a few years before.

IN the mean time William duke of Apulia dying without issue, Roger count of Sicily took possession of his estates as his heir, according to an agreement made with him at Messina, and assuming the title of duke, returned to Sicily. Honorius, offended that Roger had assumed the title of duke, and taken possession of Apulia, without first asking the investiture from him, went to Capua, and formed an association with many Norman nobles, to deprive the duke of the estates which he possessed in that part of Italy. Roger, the year before, hearing that the pope was offended at his taking possession without his leave, had desired to become his vassal, and had offered a large sum of money to receive the investiture from him; which Honorius rejecting, Roger committed some hostilities in the neighbourhood of Benevento. The pope, in his speech at Capua, magnifying these injuries he had received from Roger, by that means prevailed with the Normans to raise a powerful army to protect the rights of the church<sup>t</sup>.

WHILE Honorius was employed with the affairs of Apulia, he sent Matthew, bishop of Albano, as his legate into France, who held a council at Troyes, which confirmed the order of knights Templars that had been instituted at Jerusalem nine years before. He likewise appointed William archbishop of Canterbury as his legate in England, who held a national council at Winchester. At the same time cardinal Gerard was sent as legate into Germany, who consecrated St. Norbert, then elected to the see of Magdeburgh. Mean while Lotharius, who, three years before, had been elected emperor upon the death of Henry V. being engaged in

<sup>p</sup> PANDULPH. Pisan. in Vit. Calixt.
<sup>s</sup> BARON. Annal. ad. an. 1126.

<sup>q</sup> BERNARD in Vit. S. Malach. c. 5.
<sup>r</sup> ROMUALD. Chron. FALCON. Benevent. Chron. <sup>t</sup> Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 91, 95.
<sup>u</sup> Idem ibid.

(A) Honorius, in this affair of Oderisius, seems to have been actuated by private resentment. For when he succeeded to Leo as bishop of Ostia, having asked leave of the abbot to lodge in the monastery of Pallaria, as his predecessor had done, he received a denial from Oderisius, who was afraid lest the bishops of Ostia should claim that monastery by prescription; whereas Leo had been indulged with the privilege of residing there, on account of his great services to the monastery of Cassino, of which he was a brother (3).

(3) Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 81.

(B) Norbert was the son of the count of Genepe, in the duchy of Cleves, and had spent the greatest part of his life at the court of the emperor Henry V. in elegance and splendor, without engaging in the vices of the court. Influenced by the conversation of Cuno, abbot of Siburgh, he embraced an ecclesiastical life, sold his patrimony, and instituted a new order of monks at Premontre, in the diocese of Laon (4).

(4) Vit. S. Norberti.

opposing Conrad, the nephew of the late emperor, who, pretending to the crown, had entered Italy, prevailed with the pope to excommunicate him, and the archbishop of Milan, who had crowned him at Monza. Honorius then went into Apulia, and having excommunicated Roger for having assumed the title of duke without leave of the holy see, and had hindered the bishops of Sicily from coming to Rome, he went against him with a powerful army of Normans. Roger, judging that the princes would not long continue unanimous, declined coming to an action, and, by continuing on the defensive for several months, so fatigued his enemy, that many of the princes refused to continue any longer in the field, and retired with their troops to their own territories.

who is excommunicated.
A. D. 1128.

Honorius is reconciled to Roger.
1129.

Death of Honorius.

Two popes elected.

Innocent, who was first elected, quits Rome.

Anaclete informs the emperor of his election.

He writes to the king of France.

He is acknowledged by Roger, whom he creates king of Sicily.

THE pope, finding himself thus deserted, returned to Benevento, and sent his chancellor Americus and Cencius Frangipani to Roger, offering him the investiture of Apulia, on the condition of his allegiance, and promising not to invade Capua or Benevento. Roger, upon receiving this embassy, immediately advanced with his army to Benevento, and at the bridge upon the river Sabbato, without the city, swore allegiance to Honorius, and received from him the investiture of Apulia, with the title of duke<sup>w</sup>, after which ceremony Honorius returned to Rome; but upon his departure, the Beneventans having murdered William their governor, he went the following year to that city, and having consecrated Franco abbot of the monastery of St. Sophia, he desired the citizens to recall the friends of William, who had been banished, and to punish his murderers. The Beneventans refusing to comply with his desire, he left the city, and inviting duke Roger to ravage their territories, he returned to Rome, where he died on the 14th of February, in the sixth year of his pontificate<sup>x</sup>.

HONORIUS was succeeded the same day by Gregory cardinal of St. Angelo, who was elected by the other cardinals before the death of his predecessor was published among the people<sup>y</sup>, and took the name of Innocent II. Another party of the clergy and people of Rome assembled likewise the same day, and chose the son of Peter Leo, a cardinal priest, as successor to Honorius, by the name of Anaclete, who, according to the abbot Suger, an author of great reputation in those times, had the unanimous consent of many Roman nobles, bishops, and cardinals<sup>z</sup>. He was likewise, on account of the wealth of his family, universally favoured by the people, who went in a body to seize Innocent, at the house of the Frangipani; but being repulsed, Anaclete led them to the church of St. Peter, and having by this means made himself master of it, he plundered it of its wealth.

INNOCENT, finding his adversary wholly supported by the people, went with his friends on board two galleys in the river Tyber, and sailed to Pisa<sup>a</sup>, from thence to Genoa, and afterwards to St. Gille in Provence. In the mean time the bishop of Porta, who had consecrated Anaclete, wrote to the bishops who favoured Innocent, accusing them of causing a schism in the church, and affirming, that their clandestine meeting could not be called an election; at the same time denying the charge of pillaging the churches, which the other party accused them of. This letter having no effect upon the bishops, the following Easter Anaclete excommunicated pope Innocent, with all his adherents, and created new cardinals in the room of those of the opposite party<sup>b</sup>. He likewise wrote to the emperor Lotharius, informing him of his election, and that he was supported by all the clergy and nobility, had ordained cardinals, and consecrated bishops; whereas those of the opposite party had been obliged to fly, in the night, from the house of Leo Frangipani, their principal protector<sup>c</sup>. Besides this letter, there was another sent to the emperor in favour of Anaclete, signed by twenty-one cardinals, and many abbots and suffragans of Rome. Anaclete at the same time wrote to other Christian princes, and particularly to the king of France, desiring him to give no assistance to Innocent or his adherents. But Innocent having sent Matthew, bishop of Albano, as his legate into France, he, with the assistance of St. Bernard, prevailed upon the king and the bishops of that kingdom to acknowledge Innocent; which the emperor being informed of, he paid no regard to the letters of Anaclete, and his party, but called a dyet at Wurtzburg, in which Innocent was acknowledged as pope, and invited into Germany in the name of the Germanic nation.

MEAN while Anaclete, finding that his cause was not espoused by the emperor or king of France, went to Benevento, and from thence to Abellino, where he had a conference with Roger duke of Apulia, and agreed to give him the title of king, on condition of assisting him against Innocent and his party<sup>d</sup>. Accordingly Roger returned to Sicily, and was crowned on Christmas-day, in the city of Palermo, by cardinal Comes; and Anaclete, being acknowledged by the abbots and monks of Cassino, returned to Rome<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>w</sup> Ibidem ibid. in Vit. Ludov. Annal.
<sup>e</sup> Ibidem ibid.

<sup>x</sup> Ibidem ibid. PANDULPHUS in Vit. Hon.
<sup>a</sup> Ex Cod. Vat. apud BARON.
<sup>c</sup> Epist. Anac. ap. BARON.

<sup>y</sup> FALCON. Chron.
BERNARD. Abbas in Vit. S. Bernard.
<sup>d</sup> Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 112, & seq.

<sup>z</sup> SUGER
<sup>b</sup> BARON.
Chron. FALCON.

- a THE following year Innocent celebrated his Easter at Paris, and afterwards held a council at Rheims, in which Anaclete and his adherents were excommunicated. After dismissing the council, he proceeded to Liege, where he was received with great respect by the emperor, who, nevertheless, considering the necessity of the pope's affairs, demanded a restitution of the right of investitures. This proposition greatly embarrassed Innocent; but St. Bernard, strenuously asserting the rights of the church, the emperor gave up the point of investitures, on condition of enjoying the possession of the estates of Mathilda for his life, and the life of his son-in-law the duke of Bavaria, upon paying yearly to the pope 100 pounds of silver<sup>f</sup>. After this accommodation, Innocent crowned the emperor and the empress, and returning to France, visited the monastery of St. Bernard at Bonevalle, and then set out for Italy; Innocent is received at Paris; A. D. 1131. and acknowledged by the emperor.
- b having received a large sum of money from the Gallican church, for the expences of his journey<sup>g</sup>. He returns to Italy. 1132.

- ARRIVING at Placentia after Easter, he held a council in that city, of the bishops of Lombardy and Ravenna; and the emperor Lotharius, soon after, entering Italy with an army, he had a conference with him at Roncalia, from whence he set out for Pisa, and continuing there several months, enlarged the privileges of that church, subjecting to its diocese the island of Sardinia, and three bishops of Corfica. Lotharius having settled the affairs of Lombardy, in the best manner he could, marched the following spring to Rome, with a small army of only 2000 men, and having entered part of the city, was crowned emperor by the pope in the Lateran church, Anaclete and his party being still in possession of the church of St. Peter, and many other places of strength in the city. Lotharius not being able to prevail with Anaclete to renounce his pretensions to the pontificate, and not having troops sufficient to oppose Roger, left Rome and returned to Germany. Innocent, upon the departure of the emperor, was soon after forced, by the party of Anaclete, to quit Rome, and reflecting upon the kindness of the Pisans, he again returned to that city, where he held a general council, about Easter, and excommunicated Anaclete and his adherents<sup>h</sup>. After the dismissing of the council he sent St. Bernard as his legate to Milan, who prevailed with the inhabitants of that city to forsake the party of Conrad, the competitor for the empire, and to acknowledge the emperor Lotharius, who at last prevailing on Conrad to drop his pretensions, raised a formidable army, and, the following year, entered Italy about the beginning of autumn, accompanied with the empress, Henry the Proud duke of Bavaria, Conrad duke of Suabia, and many other nobles. Having reduced several cities in Lombardy that ventured to oppose him, he gave them to his son-in-law, and, after holding a council in the plain of Roncalia, marched with his army to Ravenna, where he deliberated on the operations of the following campaign. In the mean time Guarin, the chancellor of the king of Sicily, being left by Roger in Apulia, employed himself in strengthening the cities in that duchy; and hearing that the abbot of Cassino was inclining to favour Innocent, he made an attempt to take possession of that monastery, but was disappointed by the vigilance of the abbot, who died soon after. Upon his decease the monks disagreed in their choice of a successor, and two abbots being elected, the one embraced the party of Anaclete and Roger, while the other solicited the protection of the emperor. The emperor crowned at Rome. 1133.
- d emperor. The emperor enters Italy with an army. 1136.

- e LOTHARIUS had at this time arrived with his army at Viterbo, and having had a conference with the pope, sent Henry his son-in-law, with 3000 horse, into Campania, who quickly reduced Cassino; and, having restored Robert to his principality of Capua, made himself master of Benevento. The emperor, in the mean while, had reduced Romagna, the march of Ancona, and Umbria, without opposition, and, advancing into Apulia, besieged Bari, which he took after a siege of forty days. Proceeding from thence to Salerno, he quickly made himself master of that city, by the assistance of the Venetian and Pisan fleets; and, having completed the conquest of Apulia, he marched to Benevento, where he had a great dispute with the pope about the property of the conquered provinces. As they both pretended to the superiority of Apulia, after thirty days disputation, it was at length agreed, that they should both give the investiture at the same time. Accordingly one count Renaud, or Rainulph, received the investiture of Apulia from the emperor and Innocent in the presence of the whole army<sup>i</sup>. Benevento and all the other possessions taken from the church of Rome were restored by the emperor, who then proceeded to Cassino with the pope; and Innocent, having deposed the abbot who had been ordained by Anaclete, and ordered a new election, afterwards advanced to Rome with Lotharius. The emperor having settled the affairs of that city, set out on his return for Germany; but dying in a village of the Alps, he sent the imperial ensigns to Henry duke of Bavaria, who had married his only daughter<sup>k</sup>. He expels Roger from Apulia. 1137.
- f Death of the emperor Lotharius.

<sup>f</sup> Not. in Chron. Cassin. l. iv. c. 97. apud MURATOR.

BENEVAL, in Vit. S. Bernard.

Cassin. OTHO Frisingenf.

<sup>g</sup> PETR. Cluniacens. l. iii.<sup>h</sup> FALCO. Benevent. Chron. ROMUALD. Salern. Chron.<sup>i</sup> BERNARD<sup>k</sup> Chron.

Roger enters Italy with an army.

Is defeated by Rainulph.

A. D. 1138.
Death of Anaclete.

Another anti-pope elected,
but is reconcil-ed to the pope.

A general council at Rome.
1139.

Rainulphus
duke of Apulia dies.

Innocent confers on Roger the title of king. 1140.

THE emperor had no sooner entered Lombardy, than Roger returned to Italy with an army; and many of the cities of Apulia again revolting to him, he marched to Capua, which he took and plundered, allowing the soldiers even to pillage the churches. The Beneventans, afraid of the same fate, immediately sent ambassadors to Roger, with offers of submission, and, abjuring Innocent, again acknowledged Anaclete. In the mean time Rainulph, having assembled a small army to defend his new acquired duchy, ventured an engagement with Roger, who being entirely defeated, had recourse to negotiation, and proposed a conference at Salerno of three cardinals of either party, in order to examine into the merits of the election of Innocent and Anaclete<sup>m</sup>. The disputation being finished, Roger, to gain time to establish his affairs, proposed that it should be put in writing, and that one cardinal of each party should go with him to Sicily, to lay it before the bishops of that kingdom, which was accordingly agreed to, but soon rendered needless by the death of Anaclete, who died in the beginning of January<sup>n</sup>. During these transactions, St. Malachi, archbishop of Armagh, arrived at Rome, to have the sanction of the apostolic see for his ministry in Ireland, and to obtain a pallium for himself and the other metropolitan. Innocent received him with great humanity, and appointed him his legate in that kingdom; but denied his request of the pallium, telling him, that, as it was a solemn matter, he must first call a national council of the clergy and nobles, and have his request seconded by them<sup>o</sup>.

ROGER being informed of the death of Anaclete, by his brothers and the cardinals of his party, gave his consent to their electing another pope. One Gregory, a cardinal priest, was accordingly elected by them, and took the name of Victor; but, a few days after, the brothers of Anaclete having made their peace with Innocent, Victor renounced his mitre and ornaments, and was likewise reconciled to the pope, upon which his whole party acknowledged their error, and were reunited to the Roman church. In the mean time Innocent sent Theodwin, a cardinal bishop, as his legate into Germany, who was present at an assembly of the nobles of that kingdom, held about the middle of Lent, at Coblentz, where Conrad, the late competitor for the empire, was declared emperor (C).

DURING the disturbances in Germany, occasioned by this election, Innocent assembled a general council at Rome, at which were present 1000 bishops. This council excommunicated Roger king of Sicily, and made thirty canons, chiefly relating to matters determined in former councils. It was decreed that all ordinations by Anaclete, and other schismatics, should be void; that the nuns and monks should not sing in the same choir; that none, under the pain of excommunication, should claim a benefice as hereditary; that no clergyman or monk should follow the profession of the law or physic for gain; that no benefice should continue vacant above three months; and an anathema was denounced against usurers, wilful incendiaries, and those soldiers who assembled on holidays to try feats of strength<sup>p</sup>. The council likewise condemning Arnold, or Arnulph, a reader of the church of Brescia, who was accused of publishing a new heresy, he having publicly affirmed, since his return from his studies, under Peter Abelard in France, that the gospel did not allow clergymen to be possessed of any settled revenues, but appropriated for them only the tithes, and the free gifts of their hearers<sup>q</sup>.

WHILE the council was held at Rome, Rainulph duke of Apulia died; which Roger being informed of, immediately landed an army at Salerno, and reduced all Apulia, except Troja and Bari: Innocent, alarmed at his quick progress, and desiring to assist the rebels, assembled some forces, and marched to St. Germano; but a few days after he had arrived in those parts, he was surprised by Roger's son, with 1000 horse, and carried a prisoner to the king<sup>r</sup>. Roger treated the pope with great respect, but refused to grant him his liberty till he had absolved him from the sentence of excommunication, and concluded a peace. Accordingly Innocent having granted him and his party absolution, conferred upon him the title of king of Sicily, duke of Apulia, and prince of Capua, on condition of paying homage for these territories to

<sup>m</sup> FALCO. Benevent. Chron.

lach. <sup>p</sup> Acta Concil. apud BARON.
de gest. Fred. I. l. iii.

<sup>n</sup> Idem ibid. BERNARD Abbas.

<sup>q</sup> OTHO Frising. l. ii. c. 20. <sup>r</sup> FALCON. Benevent. Chron.

<sup>o</sup> St. BERNARD, in Vit. S. Malachi. <sup>p</sup> GUNTHER. Ligur. Poema.

(C) What determined the pope to countenance this irregular meeting is uncertain. That the assembly was not a diet of the empire, is declared by Otho bishop of Frisingen, who narrates, that Conrad, fearing that Henry duke of Bavaria, who was left in possession of the imperial ornaments, would have too great an influence at the diet to be held at Mentz in Whitsuntide, privately assembled the nobles of his party on the 22d of February, and being countenanced by the pope's legate, was declared emperor, and crowned by him at Aix la Chapelle.

It is probable Innocent was afraid of the haughty disposition of Henry, and of his great power, as he possessed all Saxony, except Misnia and Thuringia, likewise the duchy of Bavaria, the principalities of Spoletto and Verona, with all the estates of Matilda; so that, as he boasted himself, he was lord from the Baltic to the Mediterranean. If the imperial dignity had been added, he would have been so independent and powerful as to have vindicated the rights of the empire from the usurpations of the papal see.

a the fee of Rome, and a yearly tribute of 600 (D) scyates*. A reconciliation being thus effected, Innocent returned to Rome, where he was in vain solicited to break the peace he had but lately concluded†.

Soon after his arrival at the city, he received a complaint against Peter Abelard, the master of Arnold of Brescia, who was accused of heresy by the synod of France, and the abbot St. Bernard. Abelard had long taught philosophy with great reputation, and had published several books, in which he maintained some doctrines that were contrary to the faith professed by the Roman church. The pope's legate in France had ordered those books to be burnt; nevertheless a second edition of them appeared, and Abelard undertook to defend publicly the doctrines contained in them. Upon which the archbishop of Sens, the metropolitan, invited St. Bernard to impugn his errors, and appointed a day for the disputation. Abelard, struck with the appearance of the assembly, at which the king and a great many bishops, abbots, and other persons of learning, were present, was not able to dispute, but appealed to the apostolic see. Innocent being informed of these proceedings by the bishops and the abbot St. Bernard, condemned Abelard to perpetual silence, as a heretic, and excommunicated all those who followed his doctrines. The prosecution went no farther; for, at the intercession of Peter abbot of Cluny, the pope absolved him from all censure, and allowed him to reside in that monastery, where he spent the rest of his days in great piety and humility. Abelard professor of philosophy in France is silenced as a heretic.

WHILE Innocent was engaged in putting a stop to the doctrines of Abelard, he was alarmed at the revolt of the Tiburtins, who, imitating many other cities in Italy, wanted to assert their own independency; and, having defeated the Romans in several engagements, struck a terror into the city. Innocent, having excommunicated them, marched against the place with a considerable army, and after a long siege obliged them to surrender; but restraining the Romans from plundering the city, a sedition arose in his own army, who proposed to restore the ancient republic; and taking possession of the Capitol, nominated a senatorian order, and renewed the war with the Tiburtins. These commotions were in some measure quelled by Innocent, who laid the Romans under an interdict, and deprived them of the privilege of having any part in the election of future popes*. The following year he sent Ivo, a cardinal priest, as his legate into France, to inquire into the conduct of Radulphus, count of Vermandois, who had unjustly obtained a divorce from his wife, and married Petronilla the queen's sister. Ivo, finding the reasons alleged for the divorce unlawful, suspended the bishops who had given the sentence, excommunicated Radulphus, and laid the kingdom under an interdict. This severe proceeding created a great disturbance in France, the bishops and people in that kingdom murmuring against the pope, and threatening to renounce his authority. Innocent being greatly affected with their disobedience, and with the seditions that still continued in Rome, fell into a languishing illness, and died the year following, on the 24th of September†. The Tiburtins revolt, but are subdued. A. D. 1141. The Romans endeavour to revive the ancient republic, and appoint a senate. 1142. Death of Innocent. 1143.

THE day after the death of Innocent the cardinals assembled to chuse a successor, and being in great terror from the republican party, who turned daily more powerful, they unanimously elected Guido of Castello, a cardinal priest, who took the name of Celestine II. Soon after his election he was reconciled to the king of France, and took off the interdict from that kingdom, but upon what conditions is unknown. Having ordained several bishops, priests, and deacons, he died about the beginning of March, and was buried in the Lateran church. He is succeeded by Celestine II. 1144.

He was succeeded two days after by Gerard, a cardinal priest, with the title of the holy cross in Jerusalem, who took the name of Lucius II. In the mean time the seditious Romans, having settled a form of government, conferred the dignity of patrician upon Jordanes, one of the sons of Peter Leo; and having embraced the doctrines of Arnold of Brescia, from whence they were called Arnoldists, they made themselves masters of all the strong places in the city, and sent to the pope, demanding him to resign to their senate the administration of all temporal concerns, and to content himself with the care of spiritual matters, and the tythes and offerings of the faithful, in imitation of the primitive followers of St. Peter. They did not even wait for the pope's compliance with this demand, but assumed the civil jurisdiction, turned out the officers commissioned by him, and appropriated the revenues of the city and church patrimony to their own use. Lucius, having concluded a truce with the king of Sicily, who at this time invaded the church territories in Campania, wrote a submissive letter to the emperor, desiring his assistance against the seditious Romans. Conrad likewise received a letter from the republican party, informing him, that what they had done was for his honour, and from their fidelity to him. They invited him also to come to the city; telling him that they The Romans assume the civil jurisdiction. 1144. Death of Celestine, who is succeeded by Lucius II.

* Exemplar. Diplom. apud BARON.
† FALCON. Chron.
NARD, Epist. 187, 189, 190. PLE. Clun. l. v. Epist. ad Eloisam.
Vita S. Bernard, l. iii. c. 5. BER-
fi. genf. l. vii. c. 27.
* Vita Innocent ex Card. Arrag.
† SIGON. l. ii. p. 276.
† OTHO Frising. ubi sup.

(D) A gold coin, having the figure of a cup stamped upon it.

A.D. 1145.
Lucius is killed.
He is succeeded by Eugenius
III.

who quits
Rome, and retires to Viterbo.

The Romans
sue for peace.

The pope obliged to quit the city.
1146.

The emperor and king of France undertake an expedition into the Holy Land.

1147.
The pope goes into France.

He opposes the heresies in that kingdom.

had rebuilt the Milvian bridge, to facilitate his access: and concluded with wishing that he might enjoy the empire in the same manner that Justinian and Constantine had done. Mean while Lucius, resolving, if possible, to put a stop to the revolt, assembled a considerable body of troops, and besieged the senators in the Capitol; but being wounded by a stone from the be- sieged, he died a few days after<sup>y</sup>.

Upon the death of Lucius, the cardinals, not agreeing upon any one of their own number, chose Bernard, abbot of the monastery of St. Anastasius, who took the name of Eugenius III. As he was informed the republicans were determined to oppose his consecration in the church of St. Peter, unless he would confirm their new established senate, he fled out of the city, and was consecrated at the monastery of Farfara, in the Sabine territory. In the mean time, Arnold of Brescia, arriving at Rome, encouraged the Romans in their revolt, who, by his advice, repaired the Capitol, and revived the antient equestrian order. They likewise fortified the church of St. Peter, and pillaged and destroyed the houses of the cardinals and those nobles who favoured the pope. Eugenius, not being able to oppose their outrages, went to Viterbo, where he received an embassy from the king of England. Another embassy likewise arrived from the bishops and metropolitan of Armenia, who, having had some disputes with the Greek church, about the manner of celebrating the eucharist, desired to be informed of the manner observed by the church of Rome. At the same time a bishop arrived from Syria, desiring the confirmation of the apostolic see, for the tythes of those countries conquered from the Infidels, and intreating the assistance of the European princes, as the Christians in Asia had lately suffered a great defeat, and lost the city of Edeffa. Eugenius, moved by his account, gave liberty to St. Bernard to preach up a croisade, and wrote a long letter, addressed to the king of France and his subjects, exhorting them to the sacred expedition, by offering them a full remission of all their sins<sup>z</sup>. Having likewise sent Peter, abbot of Cluny, to mediate a peace between the cities of Pisa and Lucca, he solicited the assistance of the Tiburtins, and other people of Latium, against the rebellious Romans, whom he quickly obliged to sue for peace, which was accordingly concluded, on condition that they abolished the patrician dignity, restored the prefect of the city, expelled Arnold, and obliged the senators to take the oath of allegiance to the pope<sup>a</sup>.

THE sedition being thus, in appearance, quelled, Eugenius returned to Rome; but, soon after Christmas, the Arnoldists again began to mutiny, and insisted upon the intire destruction of Tibur or Tivoli. Their request being denied, they turned so outrageous, that the pope quitted the city, and retired beyond the Tibur, to the castle of St. Angelo, where he was informed by the letters of St. Bernard, that, in consequence of his preaching the crusade, a national council of the bishops and nobles of France had assembled at Chartres, and unanimously conferred the chief command of the whole expedition upon himself. The pope did not allow Bernard to undertake that commission; however, soon after, at another council held in France, the abbot put the cross upon Lewis the king, who, with great chearfulness, undertook the expedition, and was followed by the greatest part of the nobility of his kingdom<sup>b</sup>. St. Bernard having met with such great success in preaching the crusade in France, went into Germany many for the same purpose; but one Rodolphus a monk, having, without the pope's authority, assembled a body of croises, and attacked the Jews in Germany, he wrote to the archbishop of Mentz, condemning his proceedings, and having procured him to be silenced, and shut up in a monastery, he went to the general diet held at Spire, where he prevailed upon the emperor Conrad, and many of the nobles of Germany, to assume the cross<sup>c</sup>, not only against the infidels in Asia, but likewise against the Pagans in the north of Saxony.

THE levies being completed in Germany, the emperor, at the head of a numerous army, set out for the Holy Land after Easter, accompanied by the pope's legate, and Adam abbot of York. The king of France was detained some time by the arrival of Eugenius in his kingdom, who having been still harrassed by the seditious Romans, was obliged to quit Italy. Lewis, after having received the pope at Paris, and appointed the historian Suger abbot of St. Denis, administrator of the kingdom during his absence, began his march on the second week after Whitsuntide, and, towards the end of the year, joined Conrad in Asia<sup>d</sup>. In the mean time Eugenius held a council at Paris, to examine the doctrines of Gilbert bishop of Poitiers, who had been accused of heresy, in asserting that the Divine Essence was not God; that the properties of the Persons were not the Persons themselves; that the Divine Nature was not incarnate; and some other propositions that were said to be less important. The assembly decided nothing in the affair; but, by the advice of Eugenius, referred it to the consideration of a general council. Other heresies at this time being said to be prevailing in

<sup>y</sup> Idem, l. vii. c. 31. BARONII Annal. ad ann. 1144, 1145.

Frising. l. i. c. 37. SIGON. l. xi. p. 278.

Frising. ubi sup.

<sup>z</sup> Epist. Eugen. apud BARON.

<sup>b</sup> BERNARD. Epist. 322. BARON. Annales.

<sup>d</sup> SUGER Abbas in Vit. Lud. OTHO Frising. ubi sup.

<sup>a</sup> OTHO

<sup>c</sup> OTHO

France,

a France, Eugenius sent the bishop of Ostia as his legate to the province of Tbdulouse, against one Henry, who asserted, that it was needless to build churches; that baptism was of no service; that it was in vain to pray for the dead; that the cross ought not to be honoured or worshipped; that singing the service was mocking of God; and that the body of Christ was not present in the sacrament of the eucharist. St. Bernard having accompanied the legate, wrote to the count of St. Gill, in whose territory Henry resided, and exerted himself so vigorously, that the people renounced the doctrines of Henry, and delivered him up bound to the abbot<sup>e</sup>. During these transactions in France, the croises had arrived in Syria; but, having suffered greatly by the fatigues of their march, and the treachery of the Greek emperor, very few of them remained alive, and not being able to undertake any enterprize, they resolved to b return to Europe.

EUGENIUS still continuing in France, held a general council at Rheims, about the middle of Lent, to determine the affair of the bishop of Poitiers; and having drawn up a confession of faith, in opposition to the heretical articles, the bishop renounced his opinion, and declared his assent to them. Having dismissed the council, Eugenius went to Triers, where being convinced of the truth of the prophecies of St. Hildegardis a nun, he wrote to her, and gave her liberty to publish whatever should be revealed to her by divine inspiration<sup>f</sup>. From Triers he proceeded to the monastery of Clairvaux (E), where he determined the dispute betwixt the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of St. David's, who pretended to be metropolitan of Wales. Having decided in favour of the archbishop of Canterbury, and sent cardinal Nicolas as his legate into Denmark, he returned to the neighbourhood of Rome, not being able to enter the city, which was still possessed by the faction of the Arnoldists. The emperor Conrad, being returned from his expedition, Eugenius wrote to him, and, to comfort him for his bad success, gave him the titles of Catholic prince, and defender of the Roman church.

He likewise wrote to France, to encourage another crusade to Jerusalem; but the Cistercian monks opposed this second expedition, as the bad success of the former had drawn upon St. Bernard the indignation and censure of the people of Germany and France, who accused him of being a false prophet, and the murderer of their friends, by sending them into a distant country, to perish in the midst of deserts (F). The following year, the Arnoldists being still in possession of Rome, Eugenius went to Ferentino; but, towards the end of the year, returning to the city, he had a visit from the abbot of Cluny, who came to complain of a certain nobleman that had built a castle overlooking his monastery. Soon after the archbishops of Cologne and Mentz arrived at Rome to plead their cause, the archbishop of Cologne having been accused of defaming his brother of Mentz. The pope absolved the archbishop of Cologne as innocent, and referred the trial of the archbishop of Mentz to his legates in Germany. He then sent two legates into Germany, who dissolved the marriage of Frederic duke of Suabia with his wife, upon account of consanguinity. Another legate was likewise at this time sent into Ireland, who divided that kingdom into four metropolitan provinces, and carried the pallium with him for the archbishops of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Con-naught<sup>g</sup>.

In the mean time Frederic duke of Suabia, having succeeded to the empire upon the decease of his uncle Conrad, sent an embassy to the pope, and concluded a treaty with him, the substance of which is as follows; That the emperor should not conclude a peace or truce with the Romans, or Roger king of Sicily, without the consent of the pope or his successors; that he should endeavour to reduce the Romans to the obedience of the pope, and should not grant any lands to the Greek emperor on that side of the sea. On the other side, the pope promised to give the imperial crown to Frederic; to study the honour and enlargement of the empire, and not to grant any lands to the Greek emperor on his side the sea.

THIS good correspondence between the emperor and the pope was of very short continuance; for, a few months afterwards, Frederic having conferred the metropolitan church of Magdeburgh upon Guicman bishop of Zeitz, Eugenius wrote to the bishops of Germany, charging them to desire the emperor to desist from that unnecessary translation, and insisting that the emperor had no authority to translate from one bishopric to another, without leave

<sup>e</sup> GOFRID. in Vit. S. Bernard, l. iii. c. 5. BERNARD Epist. 242. RONII Annales ad an. 1151.

<sup>f</sup> Apud SURIUM, tom. v.

<sup>g</sup> BA-

(E) Bernard abbot of Bonevalle relates, that when Eugenius continued in the monastery of Clairvaux, he lived in the same austerity as the monks; that he wore no shirt, and though he had purple curtains to his bed, yet the bed itself was nothing but straw (5).

(F) St. Bernard, to recover his character, which was greatly lessened in the opinion of the people of France and Germany, two years afterwards wrote an apology for his conduct, which he dedicated to the pope.

(5) Vita St. Bern. l. ii. c. 8.

which offends
the pope.

A.D. 1153.

Death of Eu-genius.

He is succeeded by Anastasius
IV.

1154.

who confirms the bishop of Magdeburgh.

He dies at Rome, and is succeeded by Hadrian IV.

The emperor enters Italy
with an army.

The Romans
murder a cardinal.

1155.

The emperor
goes to Rome;

from the apostolic see<sup>i</sup>. This letter had not the effect Eugenius desired; however, he did not push the affair any farther at that time, but the following year sent two legates into Germany, to judge the archbishop of Mentz, who, being of a peaceable and mild disposition, had been accused of a slothful negligence of his charge. The legates having been corrupted by Arnold, the archbishop's greatest confidant, and who had been lately preferred by him, would not hear any defence, but deposed him from his archbishopric, and substituted Arnold in his place. The archbishop, scorning to appeal to the papal see, appealed to the judgment of Christ, and retired to the monastery of the Cisterians, where he died, greatly lamented, two years after<sup>k</sup>. During these transactions in Germany, Eugenius died at Tivoli, and was buried with great pomp in the church of St. Peter (G).

THE next day after the death of Eugenius, the cardinals unanimously elected Conrad, a cardinal, and bishop of Sabino, as his successor, who took upon him the name of Anastasius IV. and sent cardinal Gerard as his legate into Germany, to judge the cause of the bishop of Magdeburgh, who had been lately translated by the emperor. Gerard arriving at Magdeburgh, began to exert his apostolic authority in deciding of the cause; but the emperor, who was then celebrating his Christmas in that city, checked him so severely, that, finding he could not proceed in the affair, he set out on his return to Rome, but died of grief on his journey. However, the emperor, willing to conclude the affair without coming to a rupture with the pope, sent an embassy to Rome, together with the archbishop elect, which had such an influence with Anastasius, that Guicman was not only confirmed, but received the pallium, not without great scandal to many people, who had heard the court of Rome declare that Guicman should never be confirmed<sup>l</sup>. Soon after Anastasius, having been accused of too great condescension, and a neglect of the rights of the see of Rome, died, and was buried in the Lateran church.

Two days after the death of Anastasius, Nicolas bishop of Albano was chosen pope by the name of Hadrian IV. (H), who, immediately after his election, sent a legate to William king of Sicily. The pope having only stiled him Lord of Sicily, William would not admit the legate to an audience, but ordered him to return to Rome<sup>m</sup>. Mean while the emperor Frederic having settled the affairs of Germany, and being invited by several cities in Lombardy to protect them from the usurpations of their neighbours; had entered Italy with a powerful army, and having received the crown of Italy from the archbishop of Milan, held a general assembly of the states in the plain of Roncalia. After dismissing the assembly, he marched with his army against Milan, and having defeated some troops that had marched out against him, he put his army into winter quarters in Lombardy<sup>n</sup>.

DURING these transactions great disturbances happened at Rome; for Hadrian refusing to comply with the request of the people, who desired the civil power to be committed to the senators, they attacked one cardinal Vido, by some called Gerard, as he was going to the pope, and wounded him in such a manner that he died. As a punishment for this murder, the pope laid the city under an interdict, which continuing several weeks, the senators were at last compelled by the clergy to submit to the pope; and, having sworn to him upon the gospels to expel Arnold and his adherents from the city, the interdict was taken off in the following Easter week. This accommodation was of very short continuance, for the republican party soon becoming again seditious, the pope was obliged to quit the city, and retire to Viterbo, where he excommunicated William, surnamed the Bad, king of Sicily, who attacked Benevento, and invaded the territories of Campania, where they burnt several towns.

In the mean time the emperor Frederic, having drawn his troops from their winter quarters, had reduced several towns in Lombardy, and was marching directly for Rome. The pope, who was then at Viterbo, alarmed with the quickness of his march, retired to Citta di Castello, a place of great strength, and sent three cardinals to the emperor, to negotiate a treaty (I) with him before he proceeded farther. Frederic at the same time had sent an embassy to the

<sup>i</sup> OTHO Frising. l. ii. c. 9.

<sup>m</sup> ROMUALD. Chron.

<sup>k</sup> CONRAD Episcop. Chron. Mogun.

<sup>n</sup> SIGON. l. xii. p. 287.

<sup>l</sup> OTHO Frising. l. ii. c. 10.

(G) A few months after the death of Eugenius, died St. Bernard, after having founded 160 monasteries, and spent his whole life as a zealous champion for the advancement of the power of the Roman church.

(H) Nicholas was born in England, at St. Alban's in Hertfordshire. His parents are said to have been beggars. He himself, when a boy, left his native country, and travelling into France, was admitted as a poor clerk, in the church of St. James in Melgor, and making a progress in learning, took the habit of a monk, in the monastery of St. Rufus in Dauphiny; where, in process of time, he became prior, and afterwards abbot. After obtaining this promotion, he went to Rome about the affairs of his monastery, and was so acceptable to pope

Eugenius, that he detained him with him, and created him bishop of Albano. That pope soon after sent him as his legate into Denmark, some say Norway, where he distinguished himself for several years in that capacity, and returned to Rome a little before the death of Anastasius.

(I) Arnold of Brescia, having lately fallen into the emperor's hands, by the means of the counts of Campania, who had taken him from cardinal Gerard, the pope's deputies demanded him to be delivered up. The emperor acquiescing in their demand, Arnold was carried to Rome, where he was condemned, and burnt as a heretic, and his ashes thrown into the Tyber, lest his followers should honour his relics as those of a martyr.

pope,

- a pope, and, after some difficulties, it was agreed that the pope should give him the imperial crown, Frederic having sworn not to hurt the pope in his life or members. The treaty being concluded, the emperor advanced with his army to Sutri, where he received the pope and cardinals with great respect, and conducted his holiness to his tent; but having neglected to hold the stirrup when the pope alighted, the cardinals, imagining that the emperor had some hostile intention, immediately fled back to Citta di Castello; and Hadrian, offended at his oversight, refused to admit him to the kiss of peace. The emperor alleged that it was not his duty; but, after two days disputing, being at last convinced that former emperors had performed that ceremony, he likewise condescended to do the same. All differences being thus accommodated with the pope, he received an embassy from the senate and people of Rome; but they addressing him in the stile of a master, he dismissed them abruptly, and that same evening he sent cardinal Octavianus, with 1000 horse, who took possession of the Leonine part of the city, and fortified the Ælian bridge, to prevent any surprize from the Romans.

HAVING taken this precaution, the emperor advanced with his army to the neighbourhood of the city, and received the imperial crown from the pope in the church of St. Peter, <sup>where he is crowned by this pope.</sup> without any disturbance. But he had no sooner returned to his camp, than the Romans, enraged that their embassy had been rejected; and the coronation performed without consulting them, passed the Tyber, and attacking the church of St. Peter, killed several bishops of the party of the emperor. Frederic immediately returned to the assistance of the pope, and, after a desperate engagement of four hours, repulsed the Romans, killing 1000 of them, and taking 200 prisoners, with the loss of only one German killed and another a prisoner<sup>o</sup>. At the intreaty of the pope he restored the Roman prisoners, but the Romans refusing him provisions for his army, he marched up the Tiber, to Ponte Lucano, where he received the submission of the Tiburtins; but the pope claiming that city as part of the Roman territory, the emperor ceded it to Hadrian, and, his army being attacked with sickness, he set out on his return to Germany. <sup>He returns to Germany.</sup>

AFTER his departure the pope went to St. Germans, where he received the homage of Robert prince of Capua, and of other counts and barons of Apulia, whom he had excited to rebel against the king of Sicily. While he continued in that city, the Greek emperor wrote to him; offering to drive William from Apulia and Sicily, on condition of being allowed three sea coast towns in Italy. This news alarming the king of Sicily, he sent some of his nobles to the pope, desiring to be absolved from the sentence of excommunication, offering to restore all the possessions of the church, and to assist the pope with arms and money to reduce the rebellious Romans. Hadrian was prevented by the cardinals in the emperor's interest from hearkening to these proposals of William; and retiring to Ferentino, heard the complaints of the patriarch of Jerusalem, who, though near one hundred years of age, had come to Italy, to complain of the knights Hospitallers, who refused to pay the tythes, as they were exempted from the jurisdiction of the patriarch by a privilege of the pope. Hadrian heard both parties, but dropped the affair at that time, without any decision; and passing through Campania, went to Benevento, where, a few months after, being besieged by William, he consented to a peace, the articles of which were dictated by the king, who absolutely refused to allow any legates to enter Sicily, or any appeals from the churches in that kingdom to the apostolic see. These terms, however disagreeable, were confirmed by the pope, who likewise gave the investiture of Sicily, Apulia, and Capua, with all their dependencies, to William, upon his swearing allegiance to the holy see<sup>p</sup>. This accommodation with the king of Sicily occasioned great factions among the cardinals, which continued several years; but those of the emperor's party dissembling their resentment at that time, they went with Hadrian to Orvieto, which never having been honoured with the presence of a pope, had revolted from its subjection to the see of Rome. Upon Hadrian's approaching to the city, he was received with great honours by the inhabitants; and having continued there some time, towards the beginning of winter he returned to Rome<sup>q</sup>. <sup>The pope goes to St. Germans.</sup> <sup>The king of Sicily besieges the pope in Benevento, and obliges him to conclude a peace.</sup> <sup>A. D. 1156.</sup>

BEING soon after informed that the archbishop of Lunden, in his return to Denmark (K), had been robbed in Germany, and was detained a prisoner till he should pay a large sum for his ransom, he sent two legates into that kingdom, with a letter to the emperor, who was at Besançon, attended by a great many nobles. The pope in his letter expressed his astonishment that the emperor had suffered such an outrage to be committed in his kingdom, without punishing the authors, especially as, two years before, he had been so kindly received by the Roman see, from whom he had obtained the favour of the crown. At these last words the nobles who were present were greatly enraged; but while they were exclaiming against the

<sup>o</sup> OTHO Frising.
apud BARON.

<sup>p</sup> WILLEL. Tyr. l. xviii. c. 8. Exemp. Diplom. apud BARON.

<sup>q</sup> Acta Vatic.

(K) Baranius calls him an English bishop, being probably led into a mistake by a similarity of names.

arrogance of the pope, one of the legates called out, "Of whom then doth the emperor hold a the crown, if not from the holy see?" At this question the count Palatine immediately drew his sword to attack the legate, but was prevented by the emperor, who ordered the legates immediately to quit Germany, and soon after published a letter addressed to all his subjects, justifying his proceeding. The pope, offended at the little respect that had been paid to his legates, wrote to the bishops of Germany, exhorting them to admonish the emperor to turn away his evil counsellors, and to be submissive to the church.

The pope advised to a reconciliation.

A. D. 1158.

THE bishops, in their answer, acknowledged their submission to the holy see; but at the same time declared to his holiness, that all Germany was offended with an expression in his letter to the emperor (L), which was ambiguous, and without precedent; that they reckoned their emperor held his crown only by the divine favour; that the first offence had been given b by a picture (M), but that the empire was greatly alarmed to find the unprecedented claim authorized by writing; therefore they advised his holiness to appease the emperor by a second letter in more moderate terms. Hadrian, finding that even the bishops of Germany were tenacious of the honour of their crown, and that the emperor had assembled an army upon the Lech, near Augsburgh, with an intention of entering Italy, sent two legates to him, who being admitted into his camp, presented the pope's letter in a submissive manner. In this letter the pope addressed the emperor in terms of affection and respect, and told him, that at Rome, Beneficium was never taken in the sense of a fief, but in the proper meaning of the word as a good deed, and hoped that if he had taken any umbrage at the see of Rome, he would have acquainted him by letters or messengers, and he would have taken care, that his honour c should have received no injury. The emperor being appeased by this letter, settled with the legates other points that might give occasion for future disputes, and, when they took their leave, loaded them with rich presents. Hadrian sent the cardinals Arditi and Otho as his legates into Lombardy, to endeavour to reconcile the inhabitants of Milan to those of Lodi, and other cities in their neighbourhood, which they oppressed.

Hadrian writes a submissive letter to the emperor;

who enters Italy with an army.

MEAN while the emperor, having held a diet at Augsburgh, marched with a formidable army into Italy, and being joined by the Italian barons, with their troops, after a long siege, obliged the city of Milan to surrender at discretion, and deprived it of a great many of its privileges. The other cities being struck at the fate of Milan, quickly surrendered, and the emperor having reduced all Lombardy, marched to the plain of Roncalia, and, with the advice d of the doctors of the law in the school of Bologna, and the deputies of the other cities, he determined the regalia, or prerogatives of the emperor in Italy, which being reduced to writing, the bishops, nobles, and deputies of the cities, swore to observe them in every article. Frederic having then redressed the grievances of the cities, and enacted several new laws, dismissed the assembly, and putting his troops into winter quarters, repaired Albezola, in Liguria, where he kept his Christmas, having sent commissaries into Tuscany and the territory of Rome, to provide magazines for his march in the spring.

New disputes between him and the pope. 1159.

HADRIAN, offended at the behaviour of the commissaries, and dissatisfied with the emperor, because at Roncalia he had obliged the bishops to pay homage for their fiefs, wrote him a disrespectful letter, complaining of the infringement of the ecclesiastical rights. The e emperor answered this letter, and justified what he had done; but the pope still continuing his complaints, and refusing to consecrate Guido, archbishop of Ravenna, although a cardinal had assisted at his election, several other letters passed between him and the emperor, which would soon have occasioned a rupture, if cardinal Henry, on the one part, and the bishop of Bamberg on the other, had not acted as mediators. At last Hadrian consented to send two cardinals, with two other cardinal deacons, to negotiate an accommodation with the emperor; but their terms were so high, that nothing was concluded upon. It was then proposed that six cardinals should be chosen on the part of the pope, and six bishops on the part of the emperor, to terminate all differences; but Hadrian rejected this proposition, and insisted on renewing the peace formerly made by Eugenius III. The dis- f † RODERICUS Canonicus in Fred. l. i. c. 8, 10, 15, 16, 17. GUNTHER Ligur. Poem. l. i. c. 21, 22, 23.

* RADEVIC.

(L) The expression here referred to in the pope's letter, was the two words Beneficium Coronæ, which, as Beneficium in those days signified a fief, implied that Frederic held the empire as a fief of the see of Rome.

(M) This was a picture hung up in the Lateran church, representing the emperor Lotharius upon his knees, with his hands between the hands of the pope, after the manner of vassals when receiving the investiture of fiefs. Underneath the picture were written the two following lines:

*Rex venit ante fores, jurans prius urbis honores,
Post homo fit Papæ, sumit quo dante coronam.*

That is, "The king swears at the gate to maintain the honour of Rome, and becomes the vassal of the pope, from whom he receives the crown." Frederic, when he was at Rome, complained of this picture, upon which complaint Hadrian had promised to cause it to be taken down.

a pute was at last in some measure terminated by the death of Hadrian, who died at Anagni, Hadrian dies.
on the first of September (N).

A FEW days after the death of Hadrian, the cardinals assembled to chuse a successor, and after deliberating three days, fixed upon cardinal Roland, born at Sienna in Tuscany, who took the name of Alexander III. but two cardinals named John and Guido, immediately after declared one cardinal Octavian pope, by the name of Victor IV. who observing the other competitor with the papal robe, run to him and snatched it from his shoulders; but a senator taking it from him, he called to his chaplain, who had brought a robe on purpose, and taking that robe, he hastily put it over himself with the fore part of it behind. The doors of the church being then opened, a body of armed men rushed in to his assistance.

b The other party being afraid lest they should be obliged by force to acknowledge Victor retired to the castle of St. Angelo, where they were besieged for nine days by the Romans, whom Victor had corrupted. But the citizens being at last undeceived, Alexander and his party were released from their confinement, and retired to Nymphæ, in the neighbourhood of Rome, where he was consecrated by the bishop of Ostia, and immediately after excommunicated Victor and his adherents. Victor being likewise consecrated by some bishops that had joined him, excommunicated Alexander, and wrote to the emperor, informing him of his election. Frederic had likewise received a letter to the same purpose from Alexander; but he having distinguished himself in the late disputes by his attachment to the rights of the church, and being a known friend to the king of Sicily, the emperor inclined rather to favour c Victor. However, that he might seem to act impartially, he appointed a council of bishops to assemble at Pavia, about the middle of January, and told the two competitors, that, as he could not determine which of them had the best right, he had referred their cause to the decision of a general council, and that he would acknowledge and protect him whom the council should declare to have the best right. Alexander, conscious of the validity of his election, refused to acknowledge a council not convoked by himself, and in the mean time sent legates into the different kingdoms of Europe and the east, informing them of his promotion to the Roman see, and of the intrusion of Victor.

A schism in the church.

Alexander III. is elected.

The emperor favours the antipope Victor;

who is declared pope by the council of Pavia.

A. D. 1160.

THE council assembling at Pavia, on the 2d of February, Victor appeared, and referring his cause to their determination, after consulting seven days, declared him pope, and conducted him from St. Salvator's church, without the city, where he lodged, to the diocesan church, where the emperor received him; and, having held the stirrup of his horse while he alighted, led him to the altar, and kissed his feet. The next day the council again assembled; and, with lighted candles, excommunicated Alexander and his adherents. In the mean time Alexander held a council of the bishops and cardinals of his party, at Anagni, in which he denounced a sentence of excommunication against the emperor, if he continued to acknowledge the antipope. He likewise wrote to Arnulph, bishop of Lisieux in Normandy, acquainting him with his election, and the proceedings of the council of Pavia; upon which Arnulph wrote a letter, addressed to all the archbishops and bishops in France, exhorting them to adhere to Alexander, who being acknowledged by his master the king of England, the following year received an embassy from him concerning the canonization of king Edward, who had been dead almost 100 years. The pope, in consideration of the many miracles wrought by him during his life and since his death, granted a bull, allowing him to be numbered among the holy confessors, and exhorting the English to be very fervent in worshipping his body.

Alexander III. canonizes Edward formerly king of England.

A. D. 1161.

Soon after Peter, archbishop of Tarantaise, who had distinguished himself in France by his attachment to Alexander, arrived in Italy, and after having defended the cause of Alexander in the cities of Lombardy and Tuscany, he was sent as his legate into France, the pope designing himself to sail for that kingdom, as he could not live in safety in Rome, upon account of the party of the emperor, who had now possessed all the territory of St. Peter, except Orvieto and Anagni. Upon Peter's arrival in France, the kings of France and England, having lately concluded a peace, held a council, each in his own dominions, and examining the pretensions of the two competitors, acknowledged Alexander as pope. In the mean time Victor held a council at Lodi, which confirmed what had been ordained the former year at Pavia, and received letters from the kings of Denmark, Norway, Hungary, and Bohemia, and from many archbishops and bishops in those kingdoms, who acknowledged Victor as pope. This council likewise excommunicated the archbishop and consuls of Milan,

And is acknowledged by the kings of France and England.

* Idem ibid. WILLEL. Tyr. l. xviii. c. 19. RONII Annal.

† Exemplar. Diplom. apud SUR. tom. iii.

‡ BA-

(N) Hadrian granted a bull to Henry II. of England, but in what year of his pontificate is uncertain; allowing that king to make a conquest of Ireland, provided he paid a penny to St. Peter for every house in that kingdom, and suffered the church to enjoy all its privileges.

with the bishops and consuls of Placenza and Brescia, and also all those who had been concerned in the murder of Arnold archbishop of Mentz.

He is forced to quit Italy. THE party of the emperor growing every day more powerful in Italy, Alexander left that kingdom, and on the first of January sailed for France, where he was received with great

A. D. 1162. respect. The emperor finding that Alexander's cause was espoused by the kings of France and England, and being afraid that he should not be able to establish Victor, he proposed to the king of France to have a conference at Avignon, and that a council should be assembled in that city, of the German, French, and Italian bishops, to determine the cause of the popes, and that the two competitors should appear personally to justify their pretensions.

And refuses to submit to a council called by the emperor. The king of France agreed to this proposal, which was mentioned by the emperor only with a design to lay both the competitors aside; but Alexander absolutely refusing to appear, and the emperor wanting provisions for his army, he was obliged to retire, and the council broke up without coming to any conclusion<sup>x</sup>. In the mean time Alexander pro-

A. D. 1163. ceeded to Tours, where he continued several months, and celebrated his Christmas. About the beginning of Lent he went to Paris, where he had a conference with the king of France; and having celebrated his Easter in that city, he again set out for Tours, where he had appointed a council to be held about the beginning of May.

A council held at Tours. THE council, being assembled, consisted of seventeen cardinals, one hundred and twenty-four bishops, and a great number of inferior clergy. Among the dignified clergy was Thomas Becket, who the year before had succeeded to the see of Canterbury. The pope received him with singular respect, having ordered all the cardinals, except two, to meet him without the gates, and conduct him into the city. After a long discourse made by Arnulphus, bishop of Lisieux, the council excommunicated Victor and his adherents; and made several canons, condemning usury in the clergy, and prohibiting them to practise law or physic. They likewise annulled all the ordinations made by Octavianus and the schismatics, and prohibited the hiring of annual curates, as contrary to the decrees of the fathers. The council being dismissed, Alexander retired to the city of Sens, which he made the place of his abode while he continued in France; and hearing that Thomas Becket had incurred the displeasure of the king of England for refusing to deliver up a priest that had killed a man, and for not consenting to swear to observe the king's prerogatives, he wrote to encourage him to be steadfast in the defence of the rights of the church<sup>y</sup>. Mean while Octavianus, with those of his party, arriving at Lodi, assisted in transporting the body of St. Bassianus from the old to the new city, in the presence of the emperor and empress, with the patriarch of Aquileia, and many bishops and abbots<sup>z</sup>.

A difference between him and the king of England. THE following year Alexander, being informed that the archbishop of Canterbury had been compelled, by the threats of the king and nobles of England, to swear faithfully to observe the royal customs, he wrote to him, absolving him of his oath: which the king being informed of, he sent an embassy to the pope, desiring him to confirm the decree of the states, obliging ecclesiastics to swear to observe the royal customs; and likewise intreating him to appoint the archbishop of York as his legate in England. The pope, by the necessity of his affairs, not daring wholly to disoblige the king, appointed the archbishop of York as his legate, but would not confirm the decree of the states, and even restrained the jurisdiction of the legate to his own see. The king, not satisfied with the pope, ordered the bull, appointing the archbishop of York as legate, to be returned; and cited the archbishop of Canterbury, upon an accusation of misdemeanours during his chancellorship; but Thomas refusing to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the court, appealed to the see of Rome; and soon after quitting the kingdom, wrote to Alexander, informing him of the persecution he had suffered, and imploring his protection; in consequence of which letter he received another from the pope, annulling all that had been done against him in England.

The emperor acknowledges the antipope's successor. DURING these transactions the antipope Victor dying at Lucca, his party, despairing of a reconciliation with Alexander, elected cardinal Guido of Crema as his successor; who took the name of Paschal III. and was acknowledged by the emperor. In the mean time the archbishop of York, and the bishops of London and Chester, arrived at Sens; and having accused the archbishop of Canterbury to the pope, desired his holiness to send a legate a latere into England, to determine the dispute betwixt the king and the archbishop. The pope refused to grant their request, but sent for Thomas to his court, to judge him himself, and desired the English ambassadors to be present at his trial; but they refused, and immediately departed without the apostolical benediction. Thomas, upon his arrival at Sens, was received with great affection by the pope; and having informed him of his opposition to the king of England, which, he alleged, proceeded from his zeal for the honour of the church, he presented to his holiness a copy of the customs of the kingdom, consisting of sixteen articles, which he had sworn to observe. The pope having read the paper, condemned ten of the

<sup>x</sup> NEWBRIGENS. tom. ii. c. 14.
in Laudensi Chron.

<sup>y</sup> Exemp Epist. Alex. apud BARONIUM.

<sup>z</sup> OTHO MORENA;

<sup>a</sup> articles; and having confirmed Thomas in his archbishopric, he sent him to the monastery of Pontiniac, where he took the habit of a monk, and lived according to their rules<sup>a</sup>.

WHILE these things were doing in England and France, some cities of Lombardy, driven to despair by the exactions of the emperor's officers, entered into an association against him, with the republic of Venice; and Frederic being unsuccessful in his attempt to reduce them, cardinal John, who had lately succeeded Julius as pope's vicar in Rome, prevailed with the Romans to join the confederacy, and to invite pope Alexander to return to his own see. In the mean time Alexander was endeavouring to effect a reconciliation betwixt the king of England and the archbishop of Canterbury. A conference was proposed between the pope and Henry<sup>b</sup>; but the king refusing to allow the archbishop to be present, Thomas dissuaded his holiness from meeting the king; so that the hopes of a reconciliation at that time vanished. Alexander having canonized Helena, a widow of great sanctity among the Visigoths, and Canute the father of Waldemar, king of Denmark, set out on his return for Rome, after celebrating his Easter at Sens. The archbishop of Canterbury accompanied his holiness as far as Berry, where Alexander dismissed him with his apostolic benediction, and then proceeded to Montpellier, from whence he sailed to Messina in Sicily. Upon the news of his arrival, William king of Sicily sent him magnificent presents, and ordered five galleys to conduct him to Rome, for which city he sailed in the month of November; and entering Ostia, was received next day by the senators and nobles, with a great body of the clergy and people, who conducted him with branches of olive trees to the Lateran palace<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> THE emperor hearing of the pope's departure for Italy, endeavoured to seize him at sea, by the assistance of the Pisan fleet; but being disappointed in his design, he held a diet at Wurtzburgh, at which were present the deputies of the king of England, who, together with the emperor; and many of the nobles and bishops of Germany, swore never to acknowledge pope Alexander or his successor, and to protect and defend Paschal III. and his successors. The king of England refused his approbation to this proceeding of his deputies; but the emperor published an edict, ordering all his subjects to take the same oath within six weeks, and that pope Paschal should be prayed for through all the empire. He likewise sent the archbishops of Cologne and Mentz, with a considerable army, into Italy; and soon after following himself with another army, he was joined in Lombardy by the Italian auxiliaries, and directed his march to Lodi, where he held an assembly of the Italian and German nobles, and heard the complaints of many of the cities of Lombardy against the grievous exactions of his commissaries. From Lodi he marched against Ancona, which the Greeks had taken possession of; and while he was engaged in the siege of that place, he ordered the two archbishops to march towards Tusculum, to assist the antipope to take possession of Rome<sup>d</sup>.

HAVING in three weeks obliged the city of Ancona to surrender, he marched with his army towards Rome, and joined the antipope Paschal at Viterbo, the two archbishops with the other army having lately returned to that city, after a signal victory which they had obtained over the Romans. From Viterbo Frederic marched to Rome, and after a vigorous attack, made himself master of the Leonine city and St. Peter's church, where the emperor and empress Beatrice were crowned by the antipope Paschal<sup>e</sup>. William king of Sicily, who the year before had succeeded his father, hearing of the danger to which the pope was exposed, sent two galleys, with a large sum of money, to his assistance. The pope sent back the galleys, but accepted of the money, which he distributed among the Romans, to encourage them in his defence. But they pressing him to agree to the proposal of the emperor, who offered to prevail with Paschal to resign, on condition that Alexander should abdicate the pontificate, the pope, to avoid the solicitations of the people on that point, fled from the city in the habit of a pilgrim, and retired to Benevento<sup>f</sup>. A few days after the departure of the pope, after some heavy rains, the sun appeared with so violent a heat, as occasioned a sudden mortality amongst the emperor's troops. Several of the chief officers dying, and likewise great numbers of the common men, he immediately quitted the city, and leaving the antipope at Viterbo, marched with all speed for Pavia, having on his road lost 2000 men by the distemper, the whole army also continuing sickly and infirm during the whole winter<sup>g</sup>.

DURING these transactions the king of England wrote to the college of cardinals, disclaiming the proceedings of his deputies at the diet of Wurtzburgh; but at the same time he refused to recall the archbishop of Canterbury, as he had not expelled him the kingdom: however, if he pleased to return, and satisfy legally the charges that were laid against him, he promised that he should enjoy his archbishopric in peace. The pope wrote to the bishop

<sup>a</sup> Vita S. Thom. ALANUS in quadripartit.

MURATOR. tom. iii.

MUALD. Chron. Salern.

MURATOR. tom. vi. p. 1153. 1155.

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>c</sup> SIGON. l. xiv. p. 321.

Otho Morena de gestis Fred.

<sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. Otho Morena de gestis Fred. apud

<sup>e</sup> Vita Alex. ex Card. Aragon. apud

<sup>f</sup> Ro-

of

of London, desiring him and his brethren to advise the king to recall the archbishop; and not to oppress the church: in answer to which letter the bishops wrote to Alexander, that the king offered to give all reasonable indulgence to the clergy, but obstinately refused to recall the archbishop. The bishops likewise in their letter, far from alleging with the archbishop, that the church was aggrieved, declared that the king seemed to justify his cause, and advised his holiness not to proceed to an interdict or excommunication, but rather to soften the king by mildness, as a breach with the holy see was desired by a great many in the kingdom.

who is created pope's legate in England; and
excommuni-
cates those who observed the royal customs.

This letter had not the desired effect with the pope; who, to shew his approbation of the behaviour of the archbishop, soon after created him his legate a latere in England.

THE new legate immediately annulled the articles composed under the title of Royal Customs, and excommunicated the authors and observers of them. He also excommunicated several persons by name, and wrote to the pope, informing him, that he proposed likewise to excommunicate the king, if he did not give satisfaction. This proceeding greatly irritated the people of England; and Thomas still continuing in France, his suffragan bishops wrote to him, that they had appealed from his sentence to the apostolic see; and that by denouncing a sentence of excommunication before he had judged any one, he had discovered more heat of passion than respect for justice. Thomas, in his justification of himself, wrote a long letter to the bishops, in a haughty and overbearing stile, and from a warm confidence of being himself in the right, insisted strongly on those topics that seemed to condemn his adversaries. Soon after, the bishops neglecting to appear at Benevento, on a day mentioned in their appeal, the pope confirmed the decrees of Thomas, and wrote to the bishops of England, enjoining them obedience at their peril. The king, who was then in Normandy, finding that the protection of the pope rendered the archbishop more confident, sent an embassy to Benevento, desiring his holiness to appoint cardinal William of Pavia as his legate in England, who was the king's intimate friend. The pope being deceived by the promises of the king's ambassador, who was likewise liberal in dispensing his gold, appointed cardinal William as his legate in England; but, as a check upon him, named Otho, a cardinal deacon, as his colleague. This news greatly afflicted the archbishop of Canterbury, who declared, that he would not submit his cause to the decision of cardinal William, who sought his life.

Two legates are appointed to decide the difference betwixt him and the king of England.

A. D. 1168.

THE two legates arriving in France, in their way to England, wrote to Thomas, informing him of their commission; but they received very different answers from the archbishop. To cardinal William he had wrote a letter, which John of Salisbury advised him to suppress, as being full of bitterness and rancour; he therefore wrote another in a more moderate stile. To the other legate he wrote in very affectionate terms, declaring his confidence in his virtue and integrity. In the mean time Alexander, finding that he had been imposed upon by the king of England's ambassadors, wrote to his legates, prohibiting them from entering England till they had composed the difference betwixt the king and the archbishop, and not allowing them to act in a judiciary manner, but by way of mediation. He also wrote to the archbishop, not to be difficult to be reconciled to the king, but to humble himself, and to agree to such terms as could then be obtained, in hopes of better afterwards. Nothing was effected at the first conference, which was held on the borders of Normandy on the 18th of November; but the king of England having obtained from the holy see a suspension of the archbishop's authority, Thomas wrote in very bitter terms both to the pope and college of cardinals, and also sent a letter to his nuncio at Rome, desiring him to use his utmost endeavours to have the legates recalled. The pope, not satisfied with their proceedings, immediately ordered them to return to Italy, and revoked their commission; so that nothing further was transacted in the dispute at that time<sup>a</sup>.

The pope re-vokes their commission.

The emperor
flies into Germany.

MEAN while the emperor, upon his disgraceful retreat from Rome, having been excommunicated by the pope, and finding himself unable with the remains of his army to oppose the confederate cities of Lombardy, pretended to incline to a reconciliation with Alexander. But the count of Moriene allowing him a passage through his territories, he escaped with the wreck of his army into Burgundy, not without considerable loss, the Italians pursuing him and harrassing his march<sup>i</sup>. While the emperor was reduced to these extremities, the anti-pope Paschal was besieged in Rome, having been received by the senators into the Leonine city on the north of the Tyber, on condition of restoring the hostages whom they had been obliged to deliver to the emperor. The senators were either not able or not willing to procure him the favour of the Romans; for soon after his entering the city, he was besieged by them in the tower of Stephen Theobald.

Alexander protects the city of Tusculum from the fury of the Romans.

THOUGH they refused to acknowledge Paschal, yet they would not admit Alexander, who had advanced to Tusculum, to protect that city from their violence, they having resolved to burn it, as they had done Alba, in revenge for the assistance those cities had given to the imperial army under the command of the archbishops of Mentz and Colagn. The Romans at-a tacked the city for some time without success; upon which they pretended to be reconciled to the pope, and promised to admit him into their city, on condition that he would order the fortifications of Tusculum to be destroyed. Alexander, trusting to their promises, caused the walls to be razed; but the Romans still refusing to admit him into their city, he repaired the fortifications of Tusculum, and leaving a strong garrison in that city, retired with his court to Anagni, where he continued a considerable time<sup>k</sup>. He there received an embassy from the king of England, who, having had an unsuccessful conference with the archbishop of Canterbury in the presence of the king of France, had sent to desire his holiness to transport him to some other benefice; but, though he had bribed the inhabitants of Parma, Cremona, and Milan, and the king of Sicily, to solicit in his behalf, and had offered 10,000 marks to the see of Rome, the pope would only consent to send two nuncios to mediate a peace, and limited the time of their commission to the term of Michaelmas.

<sup>a</sup> Epist. Joan. Sarisburiens. et aliorum, apud BARON.

<sup>i</sup> See the History of the German Empire.

b AFTER several conferences with the nuncios, the king, at last, declared, that, for the sake of his lord the pope, he would allow the archbishop, and all those who were banished on his account, to return to England, saving, nevertheless, the dignity of the kingdom. This last clause, which the nuncios would by no means agree to, prevented the peace from being concluded within the limited time, so that their journey proved ineffectual. The pope, to hasten a reconciliation, before the return of the nuncios, had sent others, with letters to the king, threatening to lay his kingdom under an interdict, unless he was reconciled to the archbishop before Lent. This embassy likewise had no effect; for the king still insisted on the former clause, which was as stiffly objected to by the archbishop, who, on his part, proposed the clause of Saving the honour of God, and the privileges of his sacred order. The king rejecting this, Alexander again allowed the archbishop to exercise the functions of his office, without a liberty of appeal, in case the peace was not concluded before the beginning of Lent. In the mean time, he received from the king of Hungary a full resignation of his right to the venue of vacant benefices, and a promise not to depose or translate bishops without the consent of the holy see. He likewise received an embassy from the sultan of Iconium, who, having turned Christian, had sent to the pope, desiring to be instructed in a fuller manner in the truths of religion. The pope wrote to him in an affectionate manner, and sent him a catechism of the Christian faith, which is still extant<sup>l</sup>.

And sends two nuncios to mediate a peace between the king of England and the archbishop of Canterbury.

The king makes an offer of peace, but without effect.

c IN the beginning of the following year, he sent other two legates to the king of England, threatening to lay his dominions on the continent under an interdict, if the peace was not concluded within the limited time. Being informed likewise that the king of England proposed to crown his son by the hands of the archbishop of York, he wrote to that prelate, and all the other bishops of England, discharging them at their peril from being concerned in that ceremony; which letter so enraged the king, that he commanded the bishops to promise by an oath, not to obey the constitutions of the pope or the archbishop of Canterbury, which the greatest part of them agreeing to, the coronation was accordingly performed on the 24th of June. The pope, offended with this proceeding, wrote to the king, declaring absolutely, that if he was not reconciled to the archbishop by a certain day, that his kingdom would be laid under an interdict.

Alexander sends other two legates to the king of England; A. D. 1170.

who agrees to a reconciliation.

d THE king, to avoid the sentence, immediately offered to the legates, to accept of a peace under any form prescribed by them; and, a few days after, they bringing the archbishop with them to the conference, he was reconciled to him in a most generous manner, and immediately admitted him to his former familiarity, as though there never had been any dispute betwixt them. The pope being informed of the concession of the king, immediately laid aside his former reserve, occasioned by his apprehension lest the king should join the party of the antipope; and, to shew his displeasure at the clergy of England, for favouring the king, he suspended the archbishop of York, and excommunicated several bishops, particularly the bishops of London and Salisbury. He likewise wrote to his legates in Normandy, ordering them to lay the king's dominions on the continent under an interdict, if he did not annul the royal customs, and intirely fulfil the terms of the peace. Thomas also insisted, that, before he should return to England, all that had been seized from the archbishopric of Canterbury should be restored; but the king absolutely refusing to agree to a restitution till after his return, he proceeded directly for England. Having, by his long opposition to the king and the constitutions of the kingdom, become odious to the people, a few weeks after his return he was murdered in the church of Canterbury, by four gentlemen, who came from Normandy for that purpose, upon hearing the king exclaim against him as a turbulent person<sup>m</sup>.

The archbishop of Canterbury is murdered.

e WHILE these things were doing in England, Emanuel, emperor of Constantinople, sent an embassy to the pope with immense presents, offering to unite the Greek church with the Roman, and to acknowledge the superiority of the pope, provided he would confer upon him the imperial crown, which the Germans had so long usurped. The pope declared, that the

The emperor of Constantinople asks the imperial crown from the pope.

<sup>k</sup> SIGON. l. xiv. p. 324.
ROGER in Annal Anglic.

<sup>l</sup> Inter tract. PETR. Blesensis.

<sup>m</sup> HERBERTUS in quadripartita.

decrees of the ancient fathers would not allow him to consent to his demand; and, upon the return of the ambassador, sent with him two cardinals to the Greek emperor<sup>a</sup>.

The antipope dying, his party elect a successor.

The emperor sends an embassy to the pope.

A. D. 1171.

ABOUT the same time, the antipope Paschal died at Rome, and his party, then very despicable, chose for his successor one John, abbot of Surmio, who had been created bishop of Albano by the antipope. Frederic, after some deliberation, condescended to acknowledge him, but, finding that the cities of Lombardy were strictly united to pope Alexander, he despaired of reducing them to obedience till he had made his peace with him. He therefore sent the bishop of Bamberg, as his deputy, to the pope, with express orders that he should confer only with his holiness. Alexander, that he might give no umbrage to the associated cities of Lombardy, sent for a representative from each city to be present in the consistory; and after condescending to hear the deputy apart, according to his instructions, he explained his negotiation in a full consistory, and told him, that, as the terms proposed by the emperor were ambiguous, he could not agree to a peace.

Alexander sends two legates to examine into the murder of the archbishop of Canterbury.

A. D. 1172.

Who absolve the king of England.

Soon after the pope was informed by various messengers of the murder of the archbishop of Canterbury, and likewise received an embassy from the king of England, to justify himself from having had any concern in the murder. Alexander, for some time, would not see the English ambassadors, and they were even received by the cardinals with great coldness. Being at last admitted to an audience, they endeavoured to justify the king; and, to prevent his kingdoms from being laid under an interdict, they swore in his name that he would submit to the sentence of the pope. Alexander, being appeased by this oath, excommunicated the murderers of the archbishop, and all who supported and protected them, and sent two legates to examine the king, and to receive his satisfaction. Upon their arrival in Normandy, the king cleared himself by an oath from having had any concern in the murder, and promised to submit to any penance prescribed by them. They then enjoined him to send 200 men, for one year, into the Holy Land, or as much money as would maintain 200 soldiers at 300 crowns each; to repeal the statutes of Clarendon, and restore all the possessions of the see of Canterbury; to grant free appeals to the see of Rome; that he should go himself three years to the Holy Land; and, if the pope desired it, should make an expedition into Spain against the Moors. The king swearing to fulfil these articles, he went with the legates to the door of the church, and kneeling down, (but without putting off his cloaths) he was absolved by them, and afterwards conducted into the church<sup>o</sup>. The next day the legates celebrated a council with the bishops and clergy of Normandy, in which it was decreed, that children should not be admitted to the government of churches; that the sons of priests should not inherit the churches of their fathers; that clergymen should not intermeddle in the administration of secular affairs; that churches should not be committed to annual curates; and having dismissed the council, they wrote to the ministers of the church of Canterbury, in consequence of a mandate from the pope, desiring them to sprinkle the church with holy water, as the sacrament of dedication ought not to be repeated<sup>p</sup>.

The pope in vain endeavours to enter Rome.

The archbishop of Canterbury is canonized.

A. D. 1173.

MEAN while Alexander, residing at Tusculum, endeavoured to prevail with the Romans to admit him into their city; but the senators, favouring the party of the emperor, would not hearken to his request; so that he retired from Tusculum, and went into Campania, where the murderers of Thomas Becket came to him in a penitent manner, desiring absolution of their crime. The pope, instead of committing them to the civil power, ordered them, as a penance, to go and spend the rest of their life in the Holy Land. One of them died before they left Italy, and the other three survived only two years.

THE following year, the legates returning from the king of England, and reporting the numerous miracles that were performed at the tomb of the archbishop of Canterbury, the pope canonized him, and enrolled him among the martyrs, ordering the 29th of December, the day of his death, to be every year celebrated in a solemn manner<sup>q</sup>. Soon after, he received a letter from the king of England, asking his assistance against his rebel son, whom he had associated with himself in the kingdom three years before. Henry acknowledging his kingdom as subject to the jurisdiction of Rome, Alexander published a mandate, ordering, that whoever should disturb the peace of the king, should be excommunicated without liberty of appeal. The archbishop of Canterbury, supported by this authority, immediately excommunicated the rebels, the young king not excepted; and Henry, that he might have the favour of the new saint, left Normandy, and entering the city of Canterbury barefooted, and covered only with a coarse cloak, went to the tomb of the martyr, where he continued all that day, and the following night, and then calling the monks to him, he received from each of them a stripe with a rod.

The emperor enters Italy.

IN the mean time, the emperor Frederic entered Italy, for the fifth time, with a formidable army, and laid siege to the new city of Alexandria, which was only fortified with a ram-

<sup>a</sup> Vita Alex. ex card. Arag. apud MURATOR. tom. iii.
<sup>p</sup> BARONII Annales.

<sup>q</sup> Vita Alex. apud MURATOR. tom. iii.

<sup>o</sup> Idem ibid. BARONII Annales ad ann. 1172.

a part of earth. The imperial army being greatly incommoded with heavy rains, and the winter approaching, Frederic changed the siege into a blockade, and employed his army, in the mean time, in carrying on a mine into the city, which being finished about the following Easter, he resolved to give a general attack. But the besieged killing those that had taken possession of the mine, and, at the same time, making a general sally against the imperialists, defeated them, and obliged them to retire to Chiasterà. Frederic, not thinking himself safe at that place, passed the Po, and retired to the neighbourhood of Pavia; and as his army was greatly weakened by the late defeat, and by the departure of Henry the Lion with his troops, he proposed to enter into a negotiation with the see of Rome and the confederate cities of Lombardy. A. D. 1175.

b THE pope, at the desire of the consuls of Cremona, who were the mediators, sent three legates to Pavia; but after a few conferences, each party being high in their demands, the legates returned to the pope, without concluding any thing. Alexander, in the mean time, to punish the city of Pavia for its adherence to the emperor, deprived the bishop of the dignity of the cross and pall; and, as a reward for the bravery of the Alexandrians, he erected their city into a bishopric, creating Arduin, a sub-deacon of the Roman church, their first bishop. Frederic, being afraid lest William king of Sicily should be persuaded by the pope to assist the confederate cities of Lombardy, proposed to conclude an alliance with him, and to give him his daughter in marriage; but William being prevented from agreeing to this match by the pope, the emperor, having received considerable succours from Germany, determined to try the fortune of another engagement. As he was marching towards the confederates, he was attacked by them at Lignano, and, after an obstinate dispute, entirely defeated; the Italians making themselves masters of his camp, and pursuing the Germans for eight miles. A peace is proposed, but without effect. 1176.

THIS considerable loss, and the murmuring of his general officers, who refused to serve any longer, unless he was reconciled to the pope, prevailed with the emperor seriously to think of an accommodation with Alexander. Accordingly, Christian archbishop of Mentz, with several others, were sent, as ambassadors, with proposals of peace to the pope, who received them with joy; and, after close conferences for fifteen days, the articles of the peace betwixt the emperor and the pope were agreed to; but as his holiness insisted, that the cities of Lombardy, and the king of Sicily, should be comprehended in the peace, a truce for six years was granted to these cities; and it was resolved that Alexander should have a congress with the emperor in Lombardy; and, in the mean time, safe-conducts were granted by the emperor to all persons of the Roman church. Frederic is entirely defeated; and proposes a peace.

THE pope, desiring the king of Sicily to send some of his ministers to accompany him, was joined by Romuald, archbishop of Salerno, and Roger count of Andria; and sailing, on the 9th of March, from Licianà, with twelve galleys and two other ships, arrived in a few days at Venice, where he continued 15 days, and was treated with the greatest respect by the doge and nobles. From Venice he went, by sea, to Loretto, and from thence, going up the Po, arrived on Easter-Sunday at Ferrara, the place appointed for the conferences. A few days after his arrival at that city, the archbishop of Mentz, with other six persons, came, as deputies on the part of the emperor. After some disputes, it was agreed, that Venice should be chosen for the congress: accordingly, the pope and the deputies removed thither about the end of May; but not being able to come to any conclusion, the pope, at length, consented to allow the emperor to enter the city, who, arriving about the middle of July, was absolved from the sentence of excommunication; and after prostrating himself at the pope's feet, received the kiss of peace. On the first of August, the articles of the peace being agreed upon, all the parties concerned swore to fulfil them, the emperor promising a six years truce to the cities of Lombardy, a peace for fifteen years with the king of Sicily, and a perpetual peace with the church. The pope a few days after held a council at Venice, where the above peace was confirmed, and a sentence of excommunication denounced against those who should infringe any of its articles. The council likewise excommunicated all those who still adhered to the antipope. 1177. The pope goes to Venice, where the peace is concluded.

ALEXANDER having dismissed the council, wrote to the emperor of Abyssinia, commonly called Prester John; and having given the letter to one Philip, his physician and ambassador, who had left Europe to reside in those parts, he, according to the emperor's desire, appointed the church of St. Stephen for the residence of his subjects who should come to Rome. Having then obtained four galleys from the doge of Venice, he left that city, and arrived by sea at Silponto on the 28th of October, from whence he proceeded to Troja and Benevento, and at length arrived at Anagni on the 20th of December. During these transactions in Italy, Alexander sent a legate into Denmark, who conferred the archbishopric of Lunden on Abfalon bishop He writes to the emperor of Abyssinia.

* ROMUALD. Salern. Chron. SIGON. l. xiv. p. 333. Vita Alex. apud MURATOR. tom. iii. ibid. BARONII Annales ad ann. 1177.

* Idem

of Roschild, which is the first example of one person possessing two churches; but, however unjustifiable, it was frequently imitated by following popes<sup>1</sup>.

And receives the submission of the Romans.
A. D. 1178.

THE Romans, finding that the emperor was reconciled to the pope, and reflecting on the great loss they suffered by his absence from the city, sent seven of their chief men, with letters from the clergy, senate, and people, inviting him to return. Alexander at first refused; but the Romans giving security to deliver up the church of St. Peter, and the regalia of the city, into his hands, he left Tusculum, and arrived, amidst the acclamations of the people, at the Lateran palace. The antipope finding himself forsaken by the emperor, who now put his followers to the ban of the empire, and seeing the Romans reconciled to Alexander, privately left Viterbo, and with a few of his clergy came and threw himself at the feet of the pope, acknowledging his error. Alexander, being of a humane disposition, received him without any reproaches, and not only detained him in his court, but honoured him with his table<sup>a</sup>. In the mean time he appointed a general council to be held the following year at Rome, to which he not only invited the bishops in Europe, but likewise those of Asia and the Greek church. He likewise, at the desire of the kings of England and France, sent a legate with several bishops to Toulouse, to convert the heretics of that province to the Roman faith. Some of the chief men of the province being condemned of arianism and manicheism, and their estates confiscated, many others were prevailed upon to renounce their tenets, and be reconciled to the church.

A general
council held at Rome.
1179.

MEAN while the day for holding the general council being arrived, 300 bishops assembled in the Lateran church on the 5th of March, and, in order to prevent any future schism, they decreed, that no pope should be deemed duly elected who had not the voices of two-thirds of the cardinals in his favour. They likewise condemned all ordinations made by the antipopes Octavian, Guido, and John, and denounced a sentence of excommunication against the heretics in Gascony, Arragon, Navarre, Toulouse, and Albigensis. The council also deprived many of the German bishops, who had been ordained by the antipopes or their adherents. Complaints were likewise laid before them of some doctrines maintained by Peter the Lombard, professor at Paris; upon which Alexander wrote to the archbishop of Sens, desiring to assemble his suffragans, and to condemn the doctrines.

Alexander
confers the title of king on the duke of Portugal.

HAVING dismissed the council, he conferred the title of king on Alphonso, duke of Portugal, in consideration of his exploits against the Moors; for which favour Alphonso put his kingdom under the protection of the holy see, to which he bound himself and his successors to pay yearly four merks of gold<sup>w</sup>. The pope likewise created Laurence, archbishop of Dublin, who had been present at the council, his legate in Ireland, where that prelate distinguished himself in reforming the vices of his clergy, to whom, if they were guilty of incontinency, he refused absolution; so that soon after 140 priests, convicted of that crime, came from Ireland to Rome, to be absolved by the pope.

1180.

The king of Scotland is excommunicated.

THE following year the bishop of Alexandria being dead, the pope translated thither the bishop of Acqui; and being informed of a schism in the election of the archbishop of St. Andrews, in Scotland, he sent a legate into that kingdom, who deposed Hugh, who had intruded into that see, and confirmed the election of John Scot, the other competitor. The king, who favoured Hugh, immediately banished John, on which account the pope wrote to him, threatening his kingdom with an interdict, if he did not recal the archbishop. The king neglecting the admonition of the pope, the archbishop of York, as legate of the pope in Scotland, excommunicated him, and laid his kingdom under an interdict. Mean while Alexander, hearing of the great preparations of Saladine against Jerusalem, published a letter, addressed to all the faithful, exhorting them to march to the assistance of their brethren in Asia. The danger of the Christians, represented by the letter, had such an effect on the kings of France and England, that they promised as soon as possible to undertake the holy expedition (O).

Alexander
dies, and is succeeded by
Lucius III.
1181.

ALEXANDER dying the August following, the cardinals unanimously elected cardinal Hubald, bishop of Ostia, who took the name of Lucius III. and having received a congratulatory embassy from his native city of Lucca, he granted them, with the consent of the emperor, the privilege of coining money, to be current in Tuscany, the march of Ancona, Romaniola, and Campania. A few months after his promotion, he received an embassy from William king of Scotland, intreating to be absolved from the sentence of excommunication. Lucius granted his demand, and took off the interdict from his kingdom; but at the same time sent two legates into Scotland to reconcile the king to the archbishop of St. Andrews. William proposed, that Hugh, who had been deposed by Alexander, should abjure the arch-

<sup>1</sup> SAXO. GRAM. l. xiv. in fin. Annales.

<sup>a</sup> ROMUARD. Salern. Chron. BARONII Annales.

<sup>w</sup> BARONII

(O) The order of Carmelite friars was first instituted during the pontificate of Alexander; but in what year is uncertain. The author of the order was Ilaimericus, patriarch of Antioch, and legate of the holy see, who collected the pilgrims that were in the Holy Land into a body, and led them to Mount Carmel.

a bishopric, and that John likewise should resign and accept of the bishopric of Dunkeld; but this accommodation was prevented by Hugh, who refused to abjure, and appealed to the Roman see *. Mean while the Maronites, a people inhabiting the neighbourhood of the mountain Libanus in Syria, renounced their distinguishing tenets, and embraced the faith of the church of Rome, in which they were remarkable for their perseverance, as appears by their letters afterwards written to Leo X. †.

THE following year Lucius, endeavouring to restrain the power of the Roman senate, and to protect the city of Tusculum from their resentment, was expelled from Rome, and retiring to Veletri, determined the cause betwixt the competitors for the archbishopric of St. Andrews, confirming Hugh in the archbishopric, and giving the bishopric of Dunkeld to John. From Veletri Lucius proceeded to Verona, where he received the ambassadors of the king of England, who desired his intercession with the emperor Frederic to recall Henry the Lion, who had been put to the ban of the empire. At Verona he likewise celebrated a council, in which it was ordained, that the bishops, once or twice a year, should visit those parts of their dioceses that were suspected of heresies. During the celebrating of the council, the emperor arrived at Verona, to have a conference with his holiness, and intreated him to confirm the ordinations of those who had been ordained by the schismatics, during the pontificate of Alexander. Lucius not agreeing to his demand, they proceeded to treat of the succession of the countess Matilda, the superiority of which the emperor pretended was left to the empire; but as each party claimed time to justify their pretensions, that affair was left undecided ‡.

c THE pope likewise differing with the emperor with regard to the schism at the late election to the archbishopric of Triers, and refusing to give the imperial crown to his eldest son Frederic, would not hearken to his solicitations in favour of Henry the Lion; and taking his leave of him, went to Milan, where, with great solemnity, his son was crowned king of Italy. Lucius still continued at Verona; and received an embassy from the princes in Palestine, intreating the assistance of the European princes, he sent the ambassadors with letters to the kings of England and France, exhorting them to that holy expedition. Henry king of England, upon reading the pope's letter, gave leave to all his subjects, both clergy and laity, to assume the cross, which example was followed by the king of France, at the solicitation of William, archbishop of Tyre, the historian of the crusades, who continued in France, while Heraclius, patriarch of Jerusalem, sailed into England. However, the forwardness of their preparations were greatly retarded by the death of Lucius, who died on the 24th of November at Verona.

IMMEDIATELY upon the death of Lucius, the cardinals who were present unanimously elected Lambert Crivelli, archbishop of Milan, who assumed the name of Urban III. and notwithstanding his promotion to the papal chair, still retained his archbishopric of Milan. Urban, a few weeks after his election, was engaged in disputes with the emperor about the succession of the countess Matilda, the revenues of vacant benefices (P) and nunneries, whose nuns he had dispersed under pretence of their irregularities. Frederic being in hopes to prevail with the pope to crown his son, pretended a willingness to accommodate these differences; but Urban persisting in the sentiments of his predecessor, and consecrating Volemar, the competitor for the archbishop of Triers, whom the emperor disapproved of, Frederic was greatly enraged. Urban nevertheless persisted in his demand of satisfaction upon these points; and, in case of refusal, threatened the emperor with excommunication. Another reason of the pope's displeasure was, the alliance concluded betwixt the emperor's son and Constantia, aunt of the king of Sicily, and heiress of his kingdoms. Frederic, finding that the pope was favoured by many of the chief prelates in Germany, went into that kingdom, and shut up all the passes of the Alps, to prevent any correspondence with Italy. Having given the investiture of the temporalities of the see of Triers to Rodolphus, and expelled Berthold, bishop of Metz, for favouring Volemar, he sent for the archbishop of Cologne, and explained to him his differences with the pope; but finding the archbishop in the pope's interest, he dismissed him, and called a diet at Geilenhausen, where the bishops agreed to write to his holiness to come to an accommodation with the emperor †. Urban, upon reading the letter, was confounded at the behaviour of the bishops, as it was chiefly upon their account that he had insisted upon the emperor's resigning the revenues of vacant benefices; however, persisting in his demand, he determined to excommunicate Frederic, but delayed denouncing the sentence for some time, at the intercession of the inhabitants of Verona.

* ROGERII Annal. Ang.

† WILLEL. TYR. l. xxii. c. 8. BARONII Annales.

‡ ARNOL. Lubec. l. iii. c. 16, 17, 18.

(P) As the regalia of the bishops were fiefs of the empire, Frederic, by the laws of the empire, had a right to the revenues of all benefices, from the death of the incumbent to the investiture of his successor, the benefice during that time being accounted a vacant fief, and consequently devolving to the empire.

The pope grants a bull for creating a king of Ireland.
 A.D. 1187. DURING these transactions in Germany, Urban wrote to the king of Scotland to protect the a bishop of Dunkeld in his privileges against the archbishop of St. Andrews. He likewise sent the pall to Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury; and at the earnest intreaty of the king of England, he granted a bull, allowing him to create one of his sons king of Ireland, and sent him a crown of peacocks feathers interwoven with gold <sup>b</sup> (Q). Soon after he sent two legates into England, who had a commission to pass over into Ireland, to crown the king's son John; but Henry deferred the coronation, and carried them with him into Normandy, to be present at a conference with Philip, king of France.

The Christians defeated in the Holy Land, and Jerusalem lost.
 IN the mean time news arrived at Rome, that the sultan Saladin, after having taken a great many towns in the Holy Land, had at last made himself master of Jerusalem, and conquered the whole country, except Tyre, Tripoli, and Antioch, and a few castles. It was b likewise reported, that he had made an alliance with the emperor of Constantinople, who was to be put in possession of the Holy Land, on condition that he allowed no more Europeans to pass through his dominions into that country; and that, in consequence of this treaty, all the Croises that were found in Constantinople were massacred <sup>c</sup>. This melancholy news astonished the princes of Europe, and had such an effect upon the pope, as to throw him into a languishing illness, of which he died on the 18th of October <sup>d</sup>, at Ferrara.

Urban dies at Ferrara, and is succeeded by Gregory VIII. who gives indulgences for a new crusade.
 URBAN being dead, the next day cardinal Albert, the chancellor, was elected, and took the name of Gregory VIII. who, during the short time of his pontificate, which continued only a month and 27 days, exerted himself with great vigour for the assistance of the Christians in the Holy Land. A few days after his promotion he published a letter, addressed to c all the faithful, exhorting them to assume the cross, and promising them a full remission of all their sins, with the security of all their possessions during their absence. He likewise ordered a fast to continue for five years, on certain days of the week. His zeal was greatly seconded by the college of cardinals, who unanimously entered into a resolution to renounce their luxury and wealth, and to assume the cross; and after having preached the sacred expedition, they should be the conductors of others into the Holy Land. They proposed also, that a truce should be established for seven years among all Christian princes, so that whoever should make war on a Christian during that time, should be excommunicated by the pope and all the bishops of the universal church. In the mean time Gregory went to Pisa, in order to reconcile that republic with the Genoese, that their fleets might act in concert against the Infidels; d but being seized with a fever, he died there on the 15th of December.

Clement III. succeeds Gregory; 1188.
 AFTER a vacancy of twenty days, cardinal Paulinus, bishop of Pilastrina, a Roman by birth, succeeded to the papal dignity, and assumed the name of Clement III. He immediately sent a nuncio to the Romans, to acquaint them with his promotion, and to offer terms of an accommodation. Following likewise the steps of his predecessor, he published a bull, offering plenary indulgences to all who would assume the cross; and also prescribed a form of prayer, to be used every day, for the success of the expedition. He likewise sent the bishop of Albano as his legate to the emperor, who with great alacrity seconded the designs of the pope; and being reconciled to the Rome see, called a diet at Mentz, where he received the cross from the hands of the bishop of Wirtzburg, and wrote a letter to the sultan, threatening e him with war, if he did not evacuate the Holy Land, and deliver up the true cross. As his letter was written in a haughty stile, and filled with the names of the princes and states of Europe, whom he pretended to be his vassals, and dignified with warlike epithets, Saladin replied in the same manner; and declaring that his followers were so numerous, that their names and titles could not be committed to paper, he insisted as the terms of peace, that the Christians should deliver up Tyre, Tripoli, and Antioch; upon which he promised to deliver up all their captives, and allow the pilgrims free access to Jerusalem <sup>f</sup>.

His example is followed by the kings of England and France.
 IN the mean time William, archbishop of Tyre, having procured a conference in Normandy between the kings of France and England, both these princes, with their nobles and barons, assumed the cross with great ardour; and each having assembled the states of his dominions, f it was decreed, that all those, who did not assume the cross, should pay the tenth part of their estates and effects for the support of the expedition. This tax, which was called the Saladin Tythe, was likewise raised in Germany, and occasioned every-where a great oppression of the poor; and as ecclesiastical revenues were not excepted, the clergy murmured very much, and insisted, that the expedition could not prosper that was supported by the sweat of the poor, and the spoils of the churches <sup>g</sup>. Clement having been successful in his negotiation with the Romans, had concluded a treaty with them, in which, among other things, it was agreed,

The Romans are reconciled to the pope.

<sup>b</sup> ROGER. Annal. Ang. PETR. BLES. Annales ad an. 1188.

<sup>c</sup> BARONII Annal.

<sup>d</sup> ROGERII Annales.

<sup>e</sup> BARONII

<sup>f</sup> Epist. PETR. BLESS. ad Episc. Aurelian.

(Q) This year, 1186. Christianity was propagated in Livonia, and a bishopric founded in Riga, by Meinard, canon of Sigeborg (1).

(1) Arnold. Chron. Sclavor. l. vii. c. 89.

a that the walls of Tusculum should be destroyed; that the senators should have the third part of the money that was coined in the city; and if the Romans had a mind to make war upon Tivoli, the pope should not take that city under his protection. In consequence of this treaty, Clement having returned to Rome, wrote to the king of Scotland, and the bishops of that kingdom, in favour of John, bishop of Dunkeld; and having procured a reconciliation betwixt him and the king, he granted a bull, exempting the church of Scotland from subjection to any one, except the pope, and his legate a latere.

b THE following year Clement sent cardinal John of Anagni as his legate into France, to mediate a peace betwixt the kings of France and England, and to press them to hasten their departure for the Holy Land. At the intreaty of the legate a conference was held, but without effect; so that both parties had again recourse to arms: but the king of France gaining some signal advantages, Henry was obliged to submit to the terms of peace that he had before rejected; and dying soon after, was succeeded by his son Richard, who renewed the war. He being in great want of money, sent ambassadors to the pope, who granted him letters patent, allowing him to discharge whom he pleased from the sacred expedition, by which means he raised immense sums. Mean while William, king of Sicily, dying without issue, Clement pretended to the whole succession, as the kingdoms of the deceased were reckoned fiefs of the holy see<sup>2</sup>; but considering that he had not forces to support his claim, and being informed that the nobles of the island had set up Tancred, a natural son of king Roger, he gave the investiture of the kingdom to him, to the prejudice of Henry, the emperor's son, who claimed the succession in right of his wife Constance, daughter of Roger, and aunt of the late king<sup>3</sup>.
He sends a legate to France. A. D. 1189. and gives the investiture of Sicily to Tancred.

c THE emperor in the mean time departing with an army of 150,000 men for the Holy Land, Richard king of England proposed soon to follow him; and having appointed William bishop of Ely to govern the kingdom in his absence, he sent ambassadors to the pope, desiring his holiness to confer the dignity of legate upon the viceroy, to prevent the princes Geoffrey and John from attempting to disturb the kingdom. The king obtained his request from the Roman see, but not without paying 1500 merks of silver, for which extortion the following year he reproached the cardinal bishop of Ostia, as he touched at that port in his passage to Sicily. Upon his arrival at Messina, he had some disputes with Philip, king of France, who had likewise sailed thither on the same expedition; and having concluded a treaty of marriage betwixt Arthur duke of Britany, and the daughter of Tancred king of Sicily, on which account he had received from Tancred 20,000 ounces of gold, he wrote to the pope, informing him of the transaction, and desiring him to become his surety for the payment of the money, in case the intended alliance should never take effect. Soon after Clement received an embassy from the emperor Henry, who upon the news of the death of his father in the Holy Land, had succeeded to the empire. The pope having deliberated with the cardinals, senators, and people of Rome, promised, at the desire of Henry, to confer upon him the imperial crown, and appointed the following Easter for the ceremony of the coronation; but, before the arrival of the emperor, he died at Rome on the 10th of April.
The emperor marches to the Holy Land, and is followed by the kings of England and France. 1190.

d A FEW days after the death of Clement, the cardinals elected Hyacinthus, a cardinal deacon, then 85 years of age, who was consecrated on Easter Sunday, and took the name of Celestine III. The next day he went from the Lateran to the church of St. Peter, to receive the emperor Henry, who had advanced with his army to Rome. Having received an oath from him on the top of the steps, that he would preserve the privileges of the church, restore its patrimony intire, and deliver up Tusculum, he conducted him into the church, and crowned him and his wife Constance. This coronation was very singular, for the pope had no sooner put the crown upon the emperor's head, than he kicked it off again to the ground, signifying, that he had a power of depriving him of the empire, as well as of conferring it upon him<sup>4</sup>. Henry soon after marched with his army towards Apulia, to take possession of the kingdom of Sicily, and the provinces of Italy depending on that crown. The Romans in the mean time having obtained permission of the pope, utterly destroyed Tusculum; and, as a memorial of their revenge, carried part of the ruins to Rome, which was piled up in the capitol<sup>5</sup>. The miserable inhabitants dispersed themselves in different cities; but a few of them built some huts in one of the suburbs, which, from being built of wood, were called Frascati, and thither the episcopal see was transferred<sup>6</sup>. Henry in the mean time had made himself master of the greatest part of the cities of Apulia and Calabria, and had sat down before Naples; but after three months siege, his army being seized with sickness, he was obliged to withdraw his troops and retire to Lombardy, from whence, in the end of autumn, he returned to Germany.
Pope Clement is succeeded by Celestine III. 1191. who crowns the emperor Henry VI.

e DURING these transactions, Celestine excommunicated Alphonfus, king of Galicia, for refusing to divorce his wife, who was related to him within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity.
He excommunicates the king of Galicia.

<sup>2</sup> PLATINA in Vita Pontif. Rom. ibid. SIGON. l. xiv. p. 349.

<sup>3</sup> WILLEL. Neubrigens. <sup>4</sup> BARON. Anna l.

<sup>5</sup> ROGERII Annales.

<sup>6</sup> Idem

guinity. Being informed likewise, that Geoffrey and John, the king of England's brothers, <sup>a</sup> were raising commotions in that kingdom, he wrote to the bishops, ordering them to excommunicate all those who disturbed the administration of the bishop of Ely. Mean while Philip king of France, having had some disputes with the king of England, abandoned the expedition in the Holy Land, and returned to Europe. Upon his arrival at Rome, he heavily accused the king of England of forcing him from the Holy Land; tho' this accusation was believed to proceed from envy, yet he was treated with great respect by the pope, who granted many of his subjects that followed him the privilege of pilgrims, though they had not accomplished their vow; but he refused to absolve him from the oath he had given to Richard, not to invade his dominions during his absence<sup>m</sup>.

and the disorders of the public peace in England.
A. D. 1192.

The king of England is detained a prisoner by the emperor;
1193.

who is threatened with excommunication.

1194.

The pope orders the archbishop of York to be tried, and creates the archbishop of Canterbury his legate.

The emperor marches into Italy, and subdues Apulia and Sicily.

THE following year Celestine renewed the bull of his predecessor in favour of the church <sup>b</sup> of Scotland, and confirmed the sentence of excommunication against the archbishop of Rouen, who had disturbed the administration of the bishop of Ely in England, and, by the assistance of the faction of the princes, had expelled him the kingdom. He likewise wrote a letter, addressed to the bishops of England, but which seems, by its contents, to have been intended for the public perusal: it contained a command to all the princes in Europe to live in mutual peace, and offered full remission of sins to all those who should undertake the holy expedition. Mean while Richard, king of England, in his return from the Holy Land, being taken prisoner in Austria, and unjustly detained by the emperor, the bishops of Normandy wrote to his holiness, loudly complaining of the violence and breach of faith, and intreating him to draw the sword of St. Peter against the emperor, who had affronted the church, by doing violence to <sup>c</sup> one of its soldiers. Celestine was not prevailed upon by this letter to intercede for the king's liberty; but he obtained the liberty of the empress Constantia, who had been taken prisoner in the emperor's expedition to Naples, and sent her, at his own expence, in an honourable manner to Germany. Eleonora, the mother of the king of England, amazed at the pope's inactivity in the cause of her son, wrote to him with great freedom and sharpness, mixing reproaches with her intreaties, and complaining that no legate had yet been sent to the emperor, she declared, that it would have been no degradation of the apostolic see, if he had gone himself to Germany to intercede for the liberty of her son. This letter having no effect, she wrote a second and a third in the same stile<sup>n</sup>. The pope at last, after the king had been more than a year in captivity, wrote to the clergy of England, that he would excommunicate the emperor and the king of France, <sup>d</sup> with all their subjects, if Richard was not immediately set at liberty. But by the time the apostolic see had launched this threatening, the emperor had agreed to set the king at liberty for a ransom of 150,000 merks. Accordingly, upon the arrival of the queen dowager Eleanora, with part of the ransom, and hostages for the security of the rest, Richard was delivered to her at Cologne, on the 4th of February, and immediately set out with the greatest dispatch for England.

THE pope having received great complaints of the irregularities committed by Geoffrey, archbishop of York, during the absence of the king of England, created the archbishop of Canterbury as his legate in that kingdom, to second the endeavours of the king in reforming abuses; and gave a commission to Hugh bishop of Ely, Winemer archdeacon of Northampton, <sup>e</sup> and Hugh a prior, to judge the archbishop of York; and, if they found him guilty of the irregularities wherewith he was charged, to suspend him. The archbishop of Canterbury, in virtue of his commission as legate, soon after went to York, and in the cathedral church held a council of the clergy, in which twelve canons were ordained, relating chiefly to the form of celebrating mass, the administering of baptism, and the payment of tythes. Monks and nuns were likewise ordered not to wander abroad, and clergymen to be dressed decently, according to their order, and not to frequent taverns; and those guilty of wilful perjury, or exciting others to the same crime, were ordered to be excommunicated thrice a year, with lighted candles and bells tolling, and their names to be read over every Sunday<sup>o</sup>.

IN the mean time the emperor Henry, being informed of the death of Tancred, king of Sicily, <sup>f</sup> marched with a formidable army into Italy, and by the assistance of the Genoese and Pisan fleets, made himself master of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily; and seizing upon the immense treasures of the late king, he made the queen dowager, with her children, and a great many bishops and nobles, prisoners, and carried them over with him to Italy, from whence he returned with them to Germany<sup>p</sup>.

CELESTINE, though he had no desire to see the emperor possessed of Sicily, yet found him so powerful, by the unanimous submission of the Italians and Germans, that he thought proper to dissemble his resentment; but having received an embassy from the king of England, complaining of the violence of the duke of Austria, who seized upon him in contempt of the

<sup>m</sup> SIGON. l. xiv. p. 351.

<sup>n</sup> Apud PETR. BLESS. Epist. 144, 145, 146.

<sup>o</sup> ROGERII Annales

<sup>p</sup> Chron. Fossæ Novæ apud MURATOR. t. vii. ARNOLD. Chron. Slav. l. iv. c. 20.

a three years protection granted by the holy see to all pilgrims, he excommunicated that duke by name, and in general all those who had laid violent hands upon the king. He likewise laid his territories under an interdict, and ordered him not only to send back the hostages of the king of England, but to restore the money that had been unjustly extorted from him. At the solicitation of Richard, Celestine also admonished the emperor to restore the money that he had taken for the ransom, and upon his neglecting the admonition, he at length denounced a sentence of excommunication against him, under which Henry continued till his death. Celestine being likewise informed, that the king of France had prevailed with the bishops of his kingdom to grant a divorce from his queen, he annulled their sentence, and wrote to the archbishop of Sens, ordering him to prohibit the king from taking another wife.<sup>a</sup>

The pope excommunicates the duke of Austria.

ABOUT the same time he wrote to the bishops of England, exhorting them to preach up the crusade in that kingdom; and the archbishop of York being suspended, he wrote to Simon, the deacon of that see, to take the government of that diocese. Being informed likewise that the clerk and agent of the archbishop of Rome had sent many false letters to England, written in the name of the Roman church, he ordered diligent search to be made after those letters. Mean while, having sent cardinal Gregory to preach up the crusade in Germany, the people of that nation assumed the cross with great alacrity, and the emperor himself resolved upon the expedition, but was dissuaded from it by all his counsellors, who alleged, that it would conduce more to the success of the crusade if he continued in the empire, to provide for convoys and reinforcements.<sup>c</sup>

The crusade preached in England and Germany with great success.

THE following year Celestine received a letter from Philip, bishop of Beauvais, who having been taken prisoner in an engagement with the king of England, intreated his holiness to prevail with the king to set him at liberty. Celestine reproved the bishop for acting inconsistent with his profession; but at the same time wrote to the king, interceding in his behalf. Richard, upon receiving the letter, sent the armour of the bishop to the pope, and desired the messenger, upon presenting the armour, to ask the following question; "Is this thy son's coat or not?"

A. D. 1196.

IN the mean time the Croises having assembled in great numbers in Germany, Henry divided them into three armies, and sending one through Hungary, and another by sea from Hamburg and Friesland, he conducted the third himself into Italy, to be shipped from thence for the Holy Land. His real intention of leading them into Italy was to punish a revolt of his new subjects in Apulia and Sicily, who having had an aversion to the German government, and exasperated by the emperor's cruelty, took the opportunity of his absence to chuse a chief of their own nation, and to oppose his regents. Henry having reduced Apulia and Calabria, put a great many of the rebels to death by various tortures, and passing over into Sicily, about the middle of January, reduced the rebels in that kingdom; after which he sent off his troops for the Holy Land. His excessive cruelty had not only exasperated the minds of his new subjects, but also alienated the affections of the empress, who resenting his coldness towards herself, and his barbarity towards her countrymen, formed a conspiracy against him, which broke out with great violence upon the departure of his troops. The insurrection first began in Italy, which the Sicilians being informed of, they immediately assembled at Palermo, and besieged the emperor, who being in no condition to resist, was obliged to submit to a dishonourable peace, and died (R) a few days after.<sup>d</sup>

The emperor marches with an army of Croises into Italy.

1197.

Having committed great cruelties in Apulia and Sicily, he sends his troops to the Holy Land, and dies in Sicily.

As Henry died excommunicated, the pope ordered his body to remain unburied; but at the intercession of the archbishop of Messina, Celestine promised to allow his body to be buried, if the king of England should consent to it, and likewise to confer the crown of Sicily on the infant Frederic, king of the Romans; on which account Roger the annalist relates, that the pope received 1000 merks of silver for himself, and as much for his brothers the cardinals.<sup>e</sup> Besides, at this time the church of Rome recovered a great many territories that they had pretensions to in Tuscany, Campania, and Apulia, but which had been for a considerable time possessed by the emperors.<sup>f</sup>

<sup>a</sup> MAT. PARIS, in Hist. Ang. Innocent Epist. 186. c. 20.

<sup>c</sup> See the History of the empire.

<sup>d</sup> ARNOLD. l. v. c. 1. WILLEL. Neubrigens. l. v. ROGERII Annales.

(R) Roger, the English annalist, relates, that Henry, before his death, sent his chancellor of Burgundy to the king of England, offering the restitution of the ransom he had taken from him, either in gold, silver, or land; but that the emperor died while the chancellor was on his journey, which put a stop to the negotiation. Pope

Innocent likewise mentions, in one of his letters to Richard, that, by his last will, the emperor ordered his son to restore the money that he had extorted from the king of England, when he was a prisoner; and if he neglected to make restitution, he ordered him to be compelled by the apostolic see (2).

(2) Innocent, l. i. Epist. 130.

Celestine sends a legate into Bohemia and Poland;

A.D. 1198. and dies at Rome.

*Cardinal Lotharius is chosen pope; and takes the name of Innocent
III.*

He receives allegiance from the prefect of Rome;

and requires homage from all the ecclesiastical states.

He orders his legates to confirm the election of the emperor Otho.

Is left guardian of the king and kingdom of Sicily by Con-stantia.

DURING these transactions, Celestine being informed that the clergy of Bohemia and Poland neglected the precept of celibacy, and contracted marriages, he sent Peter, a cardinal deacon, as his legate into those kingdoms, who, upon his arrival at Prague, narrowly escaped being murdered, by the clergy who despised his authority; but in Poland, being treated with great honour and respect, he went through the dioceses in the kingdom, and prohibiting the marriages of the clergy, under severe penalties, he ordered those of the laymen to be celebrated in the presence of a full congregation. Mean while Celestine, falling sick at Rome, assembled the cardinals, and proposed to them cardinal John, of the title of St. Paul, as his successor, offering to resign the pontificate, if they would consent to his election; but as several of them were aiming at the pontificate for themselves, his proposal was rejected; and his illness increasing, he died on the 10th of January.

CELESTINE being buried the same day that he died, the cardinals immediately assembled to chuse a successor. At first they were divided in their opinions, some proposing cardinal John of Salerno, and others Lotharius, a cardinal deacon; but John resigning his pretensions, they unanimously elected Lotharius, then only thirty-seven years of age<sup>a</sup>, who upon his election took the name of Innocent III. (S); and next day wrote letters, addressed to all the faithful, informing them of his election. Being informed likewise that the cities of Tuscany, encouraged by the death of the emperor, had entered into an association to defend their liberties against Philip duke of Suabia, he condemned their proceeding, declaring that, as the duchy of Tuscany was part of the patrimony of the church, the cities ought not to have entered into an association to the prejudice of the rights and authority of the holy see<sup>w</sup>. As he was only a deacon, he received priest's orders on the 20th of February, and on the Sunday following was consecrated in the church of St. Peter. The next day he received the oath of fidelity from the prefect of the city, and gave him the investiture of that dignity, which authority no pope had ever hitherto assumed, the prefects having always done homage to the emperors from whom they held their dignity<sup>x</sup>.

TAKING the opportunity of the factions occasioned by the death of the emperor, he likewise sent nuncios through all the ecclesiastical state, requiring homage; and turning out the judges of the senate, appointed others of his own. At the intreaty of Constantia, he gave the investiture of Sicily, Apulia, and Capua, to her and her infant son Frederic, on condition that she paid homage to the holy see, as her ancestors had done, and renounced the right of elections, legations, appeals, and councils, which privileges, he alleged, had been surreptitiously obtained from his predecessors. Soon after his election, he likewise sent two legates into Germany, requiring the Sicilian captives, especially the archbishop of Salerno, to be delivered up, and threatening to lay the kingdom of Germany under an interdict, in case of refusal. The legates, upon their arrival in Germany, found the kingdom in great distraction, occasioned by the factions of the competitors to the empire; the friends of the house of Suabia having elected Philip, brother of the late emperor, while another party chose Otho duke of Brunswick, son of Henry the Lion, who was solemnly crowned by the archbishop of Cologne at Aix la Chapelle.

INNOCENT, who hated the race of Barbarossa, gave orders to his legates to confirm the election of Otho; and in the mean time being solicitous to recover the patrimony of the church from the usurpations of the late emperors, he excommunicated Marcoaldus, who possessed Romaniola and the march of Ancona, and Conrad, who held the duchy of Spoleto. These two German princes immediately offered to become vassals of the holy see, and to pay yearly a large sum of money to the pope; but Innocent rejecting all accommodation, Conrad, even against the inclination of his subjects, resigned his duchy to the Roman church, and was absolved from the sentence of excommunication. Marcoaldus, knowing that his subjects had an aversion to submit to the Romans, resolved to maintain the possession of his duchy by force; but Innocent sending an army against him, and prevailing with the inhabitants of Bologna to join his forces, Marcoaldus was defeated, and his cities obliged to surrender to the pope<sup>y</sup>.

ABOUT this time the empress Constantia dying, and leaving the pope guardian of her son and administrator of his kingdoms during his minority, Marcoaldus, not being able to maintain the possession of Ancona and Romaniola, marched with his army into Apulia; and pretending that the guardianship of the young king was committed to him, made himself master

<sup>a</sup> SPONDANI Annales. MURATOR. t. iii.

<sup>w</sup> SIGON. l. xv. p. 385.

<sup>y</sup> SIGON. ubi supra. Vita Innocent, ubi supra.

<sup>x</sup> Vita Innocent ex Stephano Baluzio apud

(S) Innocent was born at Anagni, and descended from the noble family of the counts of Segui. He studied first at Rome, then at Paris, and afterwards at Bologna, where he distinguished himself by his superior knowledge in philosophy and divinity; which last he publicly professed. He was ordained a sub-deacon by Gregory VIII.

and promoted to the dignity of cardinal by Clement III. While cardinal, he wrote several treatises full of piety and learning; and after his promotion to the pontificate, besides his numerous letters, he published several books of sermons.

a of several cities, and besieged the monastery of Cassino. Innocent having ordered an army to march against him, sent a legate into Sicily, to receive the allegiance of the nobles of that kingdom. He likewise sent Peter, a cardinal deacon, as his legate into France, to oblige the king to recall his lawful queen; but the king paying no regard to the intreaties of the legate, Peter called a council at Vienne, and laid the kingdom under an interdict, prohibiting all divine offices to be performed, except the baptism of infants, and the confession of dying persons; so that the churches were shut up, and the dead remained unburied. Innocent at the same time sent other legates into Portugal, Hungary, Denmark, and Sweden, to correct the abuses in those kingdoms; and having received an embassy from Alexius, emperor of Constantinople, he sent legates to his court, desiring him to assist the Christians in the Holy Land, and to bring the Greek church to an union and submission to that of Rome.

The kingdom of France put under an interdict;

BEING studious of reforming the discipline of the church, he wrote to the monks of Cassino, and the discipline of the church reformed by the pope. reprehending them for their neglect of the rules of their order; and suspended the patriarch of Antioch, and the archbishop of Tours, for translating of bishops without consulting the apostolic see. He likewise extirpated the usurers from France; ordained that fighting priests should be deposed; prohibited lay investitures, and a plurality of benefices; discharged ecclesiastic judges from accepting of money for deciding of causes; and offered indulgences to those who would marry prostitutes<sup>2</sup>.

THE following year he wrote to the kings of France and England, exhorting them to take A. D. 1199. the cross, and to send money to the assistance of the Christians in Syria. He also invited the emperor of Constantinople to undertake the holy expedition; and sent two legates into Dalmatia to reform the churches of that kingdom, who likewise visited the jupan of Servia, as appears by that prince's letter to the pope. Innocent also sent the standard of St. Peter to the king of Armenia; but ordered him not to intermeddle in the dispute about the succession to the principality of Antioch, till he had sent legates to determine the affair. He applied himself likewise with great earnestness to put a stop to the heresies that were spreading in France and Italy; and being informed by the bishop of Metz, that, in consequence of a translation of the bible into the French language, the people had taken an occasion to despise the priests, to assemble in private conventicles, and to assume to themselves the office of preaching, he reprov'd them severely, and wrote to the bishops in that neighbourhood to enquire who was the author of the translation, what were his intentions; and how he stood affected to the apostolic see<sup>2</sup>. The year before, his legate in France having deposed the abbot of St. Martin's, and suspended the deacon of the great church in Nivers, upon conviction of heresy, Innocent wrote to his legates, ordering them to proceed against the heretics called (T) Waldenses, Cathari, Albigenses, or of whatever denomination.

He invites the emperor of Constantinople to take the cross.

Exerts himself to suppress the Albigenses and Waldenses.

SOON

<sup>2</sup> Epist. Innocent, 191, 113, 50, 118, 506, &c.

<sup>2</sup> Epist. 130, 131, 223.

(T) Those who separated themselves from the Roman church, upon a conviction of its depravity from the institution of our Saviour and his apostles, were at this time very numerous, and distinguished by various appellations. They were called Waldenses, Cathari, Patarini, Albigenses, Poor of Lyons, Populicani; in Flanders they had the name of Pipbles; and in some parts of France, Tisserants, that is, weavers. Though they all united in condemning the tyranny, luxury, and superstition of the Roman church, yet they differed from one another in many practices and articles of belief, and were split into several small sects, under particular names. These separatists, or, as the church of Rome called them, heretics, were named Waldenses, from one Peter Waldo, of Lyons in France, who, though possessed of great wealth, about the year 1160 resigned all his possessions, and professed an evangelical poverty; and having gained a great many proselytes, they were called The Poor of Lyons, and sometimes Leonists. They were called Albigenses, from the city Helvii, or Albigeois, in Languedoc, which they inhabited; or because they were first condemned there, in a council held in 1176. Rainerius, who had been one of their teachers, and afterwards conformed to the Roman church, gives an account of the chief of their tenets, viz That the Roman church was the whore mentioned in the Apocalypse; that its statutes were grievous and burdensome; that the pope was the head of all errors; that none is greater than another in the church; that therefore we ought only to obey God; no tythes or secular revenues ought to be given to clergymen; churches ought not to be endowed; clergymen ought to work with their hands as the apostles did; the sacraments of the church were nothing; the Eucharist could not be consecrated by priests remaining in mortal sin; that transubstantiation was not made in the hand of the priest, but in the mouth of the receiver; that it may be consecrated at a common table; and ought to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue; that mass was nothing, as the apostles never used it; that a penitent cannot be absolved by a wicked priest; that a good layman had power to give absolution; that clergymen ought not to be denied marriage; the sacraments of unction and ordination were nothing; every good layman was a priest, and both men and women may preach; Latin was of no service to laymen; whatever is affirmed without the authority of scripture, is a fable; the decrees of the church, and the explanations of the saints, are not to be minded; excommunications ought to be disregarded; indulgences and dispensations have no real power; none ought to be invoked but God alone; relicks ought not to be honoured; the miracles and legends of the saints are lies; the sign of the cross ought to be detested, upon account of the suffering of Christ; the traditions of the church are the traditions of the Pharisees, and all its customs, rites, feasts, consecrations, benedictions, &c. ought to be rejected; that as God does not dwell in churches, they ought not to be dedicated or adorned; sacerdotal ornaments and vestments, incenses, images, candles, processions, holy water, and the singing of the church, ought to be condemned and rejected; ecclesiastical burial is of no service to the dead, but is only practised for gain; that there is no purgatory; that every sin is mortal; that an oath ought

He embraces the party of the emperor
Otho;
A. D. 1200.

Soon after, hearing that Philip duke of Suabia still supported his pretensions to the empire by arms, he sent two legates into Germany, ordering every one to submit to Otho, and to desert the cause of Philip, who, though he had privately obtained absolution, was still accounted an excommunicated person by the apostolic see. Being informed likewise, that John, king of England, who had succeeded his brother Richard, had concluded a peace with the king of France, and engaged to give no assistance to Otho, he wrote to king John, that he ought not to keep his engagements to the king of France, and ordered him to pay to his nephew Otho the sums that had been left him by Richard in his last will. In the mean time, Marcoaldus having taken St. Germano, and made himself master of several places in Apulia and Calabria, passed over with the greatest part of his army into Sicily, and made himself master of Mont Royal in the neighbourhood of Palermo. Innocent being informed of these transactions by the Sicilians, sent his cousin James, accompanied by a legate and the archbishops of Naples and Tarento, with an army into Calabria, who having defeated a party of Germans that were ravaging that province, passed over from thence with his army to Messina, and marching directly for Palermo, which had been strictly besieged for twenty days by Marcoaldus, he engaged him before the city, and entirely defeated him, taking all his baggage, among which was found the last will of the late emperor<sup>b</sup>.

and offers to absolve the nobles from their obligations to Philip.
1201.

THE following year Innocent wrote to Otho and the nobles of the empire, and, acknowledging him as emperor, he ordered them to render him respect and obedience as their prince, offering to absolve them from all obligations that they might be under to Philip. His legate having likewise held an assembly at Cologne, publicly declared Otho king of the Romans, and excommunicated all those who opposed him, particularly Philip of Suabia and his adherents. This proceeding of the legate highly incensed the nobles of the other party, who wrote to Innocent, complaining of the infringement made upon their right of election. The king of France having been likewise reconciled to the Roman see, by agreeing to take back his queen, wrote to Innocent to prevail with him to favour Philip; but no intreaties had any effect with the pope, who was the determined enemy of the house of Suabia.

He exerts himself for the relief of the Christians in the Holy Land;

MEAN while he laboured earnestly to excite the princes of Europe to a new crusade, which he had ordered to be preached soon after his promotion to the pontificate. As an example to others, he appointed two of the cardinals to take the cross, and assigning the tenth of his revenues and of those of the cardinals, he ordered all other ecclesiastics, of whatever denomination, to pay the fourth part of their revenues for the support of the Christians in Syria. He likewise fitted out a new ship, which he loaded with corn and provisions, and sent them to the relief of the Christians in those parts, ordering the ship to continue in the service of the Templars. His ardour was imitated by many French and Germans, some of whom sold all their possessions to defray the expences of the expedition. Many of the French sailed from Marseilles, but others, as the most commodious passage, marched to Venice, from thence to sail to Syria. As they had not money sufficient to pay for their passage, they agreed to assist the Venetians as soldiers, and to free the Adriatic Sea from the pirates of Istria and Dalmatia. They were also persuaded to reduce Zara, then in possession of the king of Hungary, to the power of the Venetians, which the pope being informed of, he immediately excommunicated them, for unjustly attacking the territories of a Christian prince. The Croises, upon their submission, were again absolved; but the Venetians, refusing to give satisfaction for the losses of the inhabitants, remained under the sentence of excommunication; however, as the Croises had no other way of arriving at the Holy Land but by their fleet, the pope allowed them to communicate with them during the voyage.

and excommunicates
the chancellor of Sicily; 1202.

IN the mean time Innocent being informed that Walter, bishop of Troja, and chancellor of Sicily, had caused himself to be elected archbishop of Palermo, and had surreptitiously obtained the confirmation of the legate, he wrote to his legate, severely blaming his proceeding; however, he allowed the chancellor to enjoy the spiritual and temporal jurisdiction of the archbishopric, but not to assume the title. Walter with disdain rejected this offer, and being offended with the pope, for granting the principality of Taranto and the county of Lecce to the count of Brenna, who had married the daughter of the late king Tancred, he entered into ought never to be used, and that he who forces one to swear in judgment, is worse than a murderer; all princes and judges are damned who condemn evil doers, as the avenging of crimes belong only to God. These tenets, Rainerius says, were professed by most of the Waldenses, who were dispersed almost over all Europe, and were divided into small sects, having some general opinions in which they all agreed, and some peculiar ones, in which they disagreed. However, he declares that they were sedate and modest, always working, and living upon the labour of their hands, content with necessities; the greatest part of them chaste, temperate in their eating and drinking, shunning dancing, jesting, lying, and slander-ing (1).

<sup>b</sup> Vita Innocent, & Chron. Richard. de S. Germano, apud MURATOR, t. iii. & vii.

(1) Spondani Annales.

- a an agreement with Marcoaldus, and divided with him the administration, one of them being to reside in Sicily, and the other in Apulia. This composition was no sooner made than broken; however, the pope, offended with the proceeding of the chancellor, excommunicated him, and deposed him from both his sees, ordering others to be ordained in his place<sup>c</sup>.

THE chancellor, after this sentence was pronounced against him, immediately joined Diapuldus, who had been left by Marcoaldus in Apulia; but the pope sending an army against them, under the command of the count of Brenna, they were, after a desperate engagement, entirely defeated. In the mean time, Marcoaldus had made himself master of almost all Sicily, except Messina; but fearing the power of the count of Brenna, who was supported by the pope, and upon the death of Frederic was next heir to the crown, he made large offers to him and the pope, on condition that he would return to France. These offers were rejected by Innocent and the count; and Marcoaldus being so grievously afflicted with the stone as to submit to be cut, died soon after of the effects of the operation. The chancellor being informed of his death, submitted to the holy see, and receiving absolution, went over into Sicily, to oppose the Germans, who were now commanded by one Capparo. In Apulia, the pope appointed the count of Brenna and his cousin James as justiciaries, and being obliged by the tumults of the Romans to quit the city, he retired to Anagni, where he was so dangerously ill, that his life was despaired of.

- WHILE he continued in this city, he received an embassy from the king of Armenia, and the primate of that church, declaring their assent to the faith of the Roman church, and desiring the assistance of the pope against the count of Tripoli, and the Templars his adherents. The king likewise desired, that none, except the pope, should have the power of excommunication, or interdict; against him or his kingdom; the primate, at the same time, requested the pall, ring, and mitre. Innocent granted their demands, and sent two legates to judge the difference betwixt the king and the count. Having likewise received an embassy from Calo John, emperor (as he styled himself) of Bulgaria and Walachia, desiring to receive a crown from the apostolic see, as his ancestors had done, Innocent immediately sent a legate into that country, with the pall for the archbishop, and promised to confer the crown as soon as he was informed of the state of the church in that kingdom.

- THIS year we find likewise that Innocent sent a legate into Scotland, with the present of a purple hat for the king, in token of his being a defender of the church, as that religious prince had ordered the sabbath to be observed with great strictness after mid-day. The legate also presented the king with a sword, the handle and scabbard adorned with gold and diamonds, and besides honoured him with many privileges and indulgences<sup>d</sup>. In the mean time John, king of England, not being able to oppose the arms of the king of France, implored the protection of the apostolic see, and accused his adversary of breaking the truce. Innocent sent legates to both kings, ordering them to desist from hostilities, and threatening to lay their kingdoms under an interdict in case of refusal. John willingly acquiesced; but Philip, angry that a stop was put to his victories, appealed to Rome, and in the mean time insisted upon prosecuting his right; but the legates refusing to pay any regard to his appeal, unless he desisted from hostilities, he agreed to a suspension of arms, and sent some bishops to Rome to prosecute his appeal, where no body appearing for the king of England, the cause was dropt.

- DURING these transactions, Alexius, the son of the emperor Isaac Angelus, who had been dethroned and imprisoned by his brother, having applied to the Croises wintering at Zara for their assistance against his uncle the usurper, they entered into a treaty (U) with him, in consequence of which, instead of sailing to Syria, they directed their course to Constantinople, which they made themselves masters of by assault after eight days siege; and taking the old man out of prison again, saluted him emperor, he having confirmed to them what had formerly been stipulated by his son. Innocent having acknowledged the late usurper, who had flattered him with specious embassies, was greatly offended at this proceeding of the Croises; but their expedition being crowned with success, and being informed that they had engaged the new emperor to send a body of men into the Holy Land, he was easily reconciled to them; and even, upon a submissive embassy from the Venetians at Constantinople, absolved them from the sentence of excommunication. About the same time he wrote to John, king of England,

<sup>c</sup> Vita Innocent, apud eund.

<sup>d</sup> BOETH. Hist. Scot. l. xiii.

(U) The substance of the treaty was, that Alexius, after the restoration of his father, should furnish the Croises with provisions, during their expedition into Syria, and should give them 200,000 marks for their assistance against the usurper; that he should either go himself, or send an army of 10,000 men into the Holy Land for a year, and should maintain 500 horse during his life, to preserve the conquests already made; and, lastly, he promised, after his promotion to the throne, to reunite the Greek church to that of Rome.

to desist from persecuting the bishops and clergy; he exhorted the king of France to admit his queen to his presence, and to allow her to live with him; and threatened the king of Arragon with excommunication, unless he allowed the king of Castile to dissolve the incestuous marriage he had contracted with his daughter.

The emperors neglect to fulfil their agreement with the Croises; A. D. 1204. undertake Constantinople, and make a partition of the empire.

In the mean time the emperors of Constantinople not only neglected to fulfil the treaty with the Croises, but endeavoured by various means to destroy them; and while they were encamped in the neighbourhood of the city, one Murtzuphle, having surprized the emperors, and seized the government, sent sixteen fire-ships against their fleet, which with great difficulty were prevented from doing execution. The Croises, with great danger, having grappled the fire-ships, and towed them off to sea, in return for the hostilities committed against them, resolved upon attacking the city, which they made themselves masters of upon the second assault; and having taken possession of all the palaces and castles, and enriched themselves with the immense booty, they determined to secure their conquest. Making a new treaty with the Venetians, they assigned to them the islands in the Egean Sea, and unanimously elected Baldwin, count of Flanders, emperor; but having agreed, that whatever nation should obtain the imperial dignity, the other should possess the patriarchal, they accordingly conferred that dignity on Thomas Maurocenus, a noble Venetian, and sent an embassy to the pope, informing him of their proceedings, and asking the confirmation of the apostolic see. Thomas the patriarch likewise went to Rome to be confirmed in his dignity; but as he had been chosen by laymen, Innocent annulled his election. However, at the intreaty of the emperor Baldwin, he elected him by his own authority, and afterwards consecrated him. Having severely reprimanded the princes for the rapine and sacrilege committed by them in the storming of the city, he at length granted his confirmation of their proceedings; but at the same time admonished them to recal the Greeks to the obedience of the Roman church, and to introduce the Latin rites into their churches; and prohibited them, under pain of excommunication, from alienating the ecclesiastical possessions.

The pope confirms their conquests.

Sends a crown to the prince of Bulgaria.

He crowns the king of Arragon at Rome.

INNOCENT at the same time sent cardinal Leo as his legate into Bulgaria, with a crown and scepter for that prince; sent preachers into Livonia, to instruct those people in the faith of Christ; granted the pall to the archbishop of Upsal; and appointed the archbishop of Lunden to collect the tax of St. Peter in Denmark and Sweden. Mean while Peter, king of Arragon, arriving with a splendid retinue at Rome, was anointed on the feast of St. Martin by the bishop of Porta, and crowned by Innocent; and having laid aside his royal ornaments, and received a sword from the hand of the pope, professed himself a soldier, according to the customs in use among the Spaniards, the successors to the throne among them not assuming the title of king till they were married, or were created soldiers. Peter, in return for the favour conferred upon him by the pope, declared his kingdom tributary to the holy see, and promised to pay yearly a tribute of two hundred and fifty mahozemutins, or crowns of gold.

DURING these transactions one Almaricus, of the university of Paris, published several heretical doctrines, such as, if Adam had never sinned, there would have been no distinction of sexes, but men would have been multiplied like the angels; there was no heaven or hell except in the breasts of the virtuous or wicked; the invocation of saints, and the worshipping of altars or images was idolatry; that God was the materia prima, or primitive matter; that whatever sin was committed from benevolence, had no guilt; and several other such like tenets, which have been collected by the writers on heresies. As he was not able to defend all his propositions, he was first condemned by an assembly of the bishops and divines of Paris, and afterwards by the pope; but as he publicly abjured them at Paris, upon his death, which happened soon after, he was buried with the usual ceremonies. As Aristotle's books of natural philosophy and metaphysics, lately brought from Constantinople, were supposed to have given rise to these heresies, they were ordered to be burnt by the council of Paris, and prohibited under the penalty of excommunication.

The emperor Baldwin defeated, and taken prisoner by the king of Bulgaria.

THE following year Innocent being informed that Calo John, king of Bulgaria, had defeated the emperor Baldwin, at Adrianople, and carried him prisoner into Mysia, he wrote to the king, desiring him to set the emperor at liberty; in answer to which letter, the king replied, that he had desired to live in peace with the Latins at Constantinople; but their insolence had obliged him to give his assistance to the Greeks, and that Baldwin had died in prison. Innocent at the same wrote to all the clergy and Christians in the Latin army, ordering them not to quit Constantinople, but to endeavour to bring the Greeks to the obedience of the Roman church; for which purpose he desired the bishops of France, and the doctors of the university of Paris, to send clergymen and students into the East to revive the study of learning, which had originally come from thence into the western parts of Europe. At the same time he refused the pall to a the archbishop of Zara, unless the doge, who requested it, would promise that the republic of Venice should make satisfaction for the storming and pillaging of that city. He likewise excommunicated the archbishop of Cologne, who had deserted the party of the emperor Otho, and crowned the emperor Philip with the empress at Aix la Chapelle. As the archbishop neglected to appear at Rome, he ordered him to be deposed, and Bruno, provost of Bonn, to be elected in his place.

<sup>c</sup> Vita Innocent, ubi supra. BLOND. Villarduinus. ARNOLD. in Chron. Selac. <sup>f</sup> SURIT. Indic. rer. Arragon, l. i. MARIAN. de reb. Hisp. l. ii. c. 21. <sup>g</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>h</sup> EXMER. Direct. p. ii. c. vii. GUALTER in tab. Chron. Sec. xiii. c. 1. RIGORD. Allissiodor. <sup>i</sup> LUTZENB. PRAT. CASTR. de hæres. <sup>k</sup> SPOND. Annal. not. an. 1204. <sup>l</sup> Vita Innocent ubi supra.

b MEAN while hostilities still continued in Apulia betwixt Walter count of Brenna, and Diopoldus who commanded the Germans; but Walter being rendered careless by his successes, was, in the month of June, surprized near Sarno by Diopoldus, and died in a prison a few days afterwards of his wounds. Innocent being informed of his death, came to an accommodation with Diopoldus, then sending for him to Rome, absolved him and his followers from the sentence of excommunication, and allowed him to return to Salerno with some command; but obliged the Apulians and Sicilians to take the oath of allegiance to the officers of the apostolic see<sup>m</sup>. Innocent likewise wrote to Thomas the patriarch of Constantinople, and Henry, the brother of the late emperor Baldwin, confirming the composition made betwixt them in the presence of his legate, with regard to ecclesiastical revenues<sup>n</sup>: and as there was a dispute betwixt the patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem, about their right of superiority over the church of Tyre, he summoned the patriarch of Jerusalem to appear at Rome within a certain time, to answer the claims of the patriarch of Antioch. Being also informed, that the king of Denmark had imprisoned Waldemar, bishop of Sleswick, he wrote to that prince, threatening him with ecclesiastical censures, if he did not release the bishop. The king complied with the command of the pope; but as the bishop was of a restless and turbulent disposition, he obtained from Innocent, that he should not any longer reside in the neighbourhood of his kingdom<sup>o</sup>.

The Sicilians and Apulians take the oath of allegiance to the pope. A. D. 1206.

c MEAN while Innocent wrote to the bishops of Spain, exhorting them to reconcile the kings of Castile and Leon; to the archbishop of Saltzburgh, to inquire into the justice of the divorce imposed by Othogar, king of Bohemia, on his queen; and to his legate in England, ordering him to threaten the king with ecclesiastic censures, if he did not cease from troubling the clergy. About this time Didacus, a Spanish bishop, arriving at Rome, desired leave to abdicate his bishopric, that he might the more freely employ himself in preaching to the Pagans. Innocent refusing his request, and ordering him to return to his church, he submitted and set out for Spain. Upon his arrival at Montpellier, he found Arnold, abbot of the Cisterians, with two of his monks, who had been preaching to the heretics of that province. Though they were greatly dispirited upon account of their bad success, Didacus exhorted them to persevere, and assisted them in their labours. However, though they were joined by twelve French abbots of the same order, and a great many monks, they had but very few converts (W), being opposed by the count of Thoulouse and the nobles of the country<sup>p</sup>.

d IN the mean time Philip, emperor of Germany, having intirely defeated his competitor Otho, and obliged him to fly into England, resolving now to reconcile the pope to his cause, sent the patriarch of Aquileia, and the burgrave of Magdeburgh, with many nobles and learned men, to Rome, upon whose representations Innocent consented to absolve Philip, and acknowledge him as emperor, on condition that he gave one of his daughters in marriage to his brother Richard, whom Innocent had honoured with the command of an army, and who the following year was created count of Sora<sup>q</sup>. The German ambassadors declared, that they had no instructions with regard to that article; upon which the pope sent two legates into Germany, with power to absolve Philip, upon his consenting to that proposition, and together with his daughter resigning the disputed territories of Matbilda, and others in Tuscany, Spoletto, and the march of Ancona, in favour of Richard. Philip was not a little surprized at the interested views of the pope; however, he received the legates with great respect, and by his courtesy and liberality obtained from them public absolution, upon his swearing, says Spondanus, to stand to the judgment of the pope in every thing for which he had been excommunicated. Soon after a diet being called at Parthausen, a truce was concluded with Otho for one year, without any regard being had to the proposed marriage with the brother of the pope<sup>r</sup>.

1207.

and is absolved from the sentence of excommunication.

<sup>m</sup> Chron. de S. Germ. apud MURATOR, l. vii. p. 981. SPOND. Annal.
• ARNOLD. Lubec.      <sup>p</sup> ALLISIDOR. PETR. Villaffarnensis.
• Abbas URSPERG.

<sup>n</sup> Innocent, Epist. 106. an. 9.
<sup>q</sup> Chron. Fossæ novæ ad an. 1208.

(W) William of Puy en Velay, who lived afterwards at Thoulouse, and wrote the history of the Albigenses in that neighbourhood, describing the state of that province at this time, says, that by the negligence of the prelates, and the ignorance of the clergy, the number of heretics had so increased, that they preached their doctrines every where publicly and without restraint; that they were so revered, that dying persons bestowed more and greater legacies upon them than upon the clergy; and that if they were known when they travelled, they were safe from the insults of robbers, who always spared their houses and effects (1).

(1) Guil. de Podio in Prolog.

Disputes betwixt the king of England and the
pope;

DURING these transactions in Germany, Innocent was engaged in disputes with John, king of England, with regard to the election of an archbishop of Canterbury. Upon the death of the late archbishop, the monks of that church had elected Reginald, their superior, without the knowledge of the king, and sent him to Rome to be confirmed. The king being afterwards informed of their proceeding, they, to appease him, asked leave to elect another, and, at his desire chose the bishop of Norwich. The pope disapproving of both elections, caused the monks of Canterbury, assembled at Rome, to chuse a third person, one Stephen Langton, an Englishman, who for his great learning had been chosen chancellor of the university of Paris, and that same year created a cardinal. The king, highly displeased that the bishop of Norwich had been rejected, expelled the monks from Canterbury, confiscated the revenues of the archbishopric, and prohibited Langton from entering the kingdom. He wrote likewise to the pope in an exasperated stile, complaining of his ingratitude; to which Innocent replied, that he endeavoured to obtain his consent by letters and messengers, before he had ordained Stephen, although the approbation of princes was not usually required to elections made at the apostolic see. He concluded with reminding him of the example of Thomas Becket, and cautioned him to beware of engaging in an affair from which he would find it difficult to extricate himself. But John continuing firm in rejecting Langton, and at the same time exclaiming with angry expressions against the bishops and court of Rome, Innocent laid his kingdom under a general interdict, which was published on the 22d of March, the publishers immediately flying into France. The king, as soon as he was informed of the interdict, confiscated all the goods of the ecclesiastics, spiritual as well as temporal, imprisoned all the relations of Langton, and the bishops who had published the interdict, and ordered the other bishops to depart the kingdom.

A. D. 1208. who lays his kingdom under an interdict;

and excommu-nicates the count of Thoulouse.

MEAN while, Innocent being informed that Peter de Castro Novo, a monk of the Cistercian order, and apostolic legate in the province of Narbonne, had been murdered by the soldiers of Raymund, count of Thoulouse, he excommunicated the count, and absolving his subjects from their allegiance, allowed any one to seize upon his possessions. Raymund immediately sent messengers to Rome, and accusing the Cistercians of too great severity (X), begged that the pope would send another legate, to whom he promised all obedience. Innocent accordingly sent Milo, one of the notaries of the court, who, upon his arrival in France, presented the pope's letter to Philip, exhorting him to an expedition against the Albigenses; and afterwards having an interview with the count at Valentia, received from him seven castles as securities for his future obedience.

Innocent
sends a legate
to the emperor
Otho.

A. D. 1209.

who makes great concessions in favour of the see of
Rome.

DURING these transactions, news arriving at Rome, that the emperor Philip had been murdered at Wamberg, Innocent immediately wrote to the bishops and nobles of that kingdom, exhorting them to unite in chusing Otho, who was accordingly unanimously elected at Frankfort, on the feast of St. Martin; and to strengthen his interest with the party of the late emperor, married his daughter Beatrice. After his election, Otho received an embassy from the city of Milan, inviting him to come to receive the crown of Italy; Innocent likewise sent legates, with letters of congratulation, offering to confer upon him the imperial crown upon his arrival at Rome. Otho's good success in succeeding so unexpectedly and easily to the crown, after he had in vain fought for it ten years, made him very liberal in his concessions to the pope, who, during all his adversity, had continued his steadfast friend. Accordingly, before he set out for Italy, he wrote to his holiness, promising to allow the elections of bishops to be made freely; to renounce all right to the revenues of vacant benefices; to endeavour earnestly to extirpate heresy; to leave to the holy see all the territories granted by his ancestors, or others, especially the countess Matilda; to preserve to the Roman church its rights upon the kingdom of Sicily; and to allow appeals to be made without restraint to the see of Rome. This letter, dated at Spire, the 22d of March, was signed by the bishop of that city, and sealed with the golden bull; but the concessions it contained were two prejudicial to the empire to be long observed.

Soon after, Otho sent the patriarch of Aquileia to prepare the cities of Italy for his reception. Having assembled a considerable army at Augsburgh, he passed the Alps in the month of August, and arriving at Milan, received the iron crown from the hands of the archbishop Hubert. From thence, proceeding to Viterbo, he was there received by the pope

* MATTHEW PARIS.

† Hist. Albigenf. c. viii.

“ Rec. Bzov. l. iii. de neg. Imp.

(X) This Peter de Castro Novo, together with Arnold, abbot of the Cistercians, and friar Kadulphus, in order to be successful in converting the heretics, had erected a tribunal of inquisition, by the severities and cruelties of which court, they hoped to conquer the resolution of those who continued unmoved by their preaching. And the author of his life boasts, that all the glorious actions performed afterwards, owe their original to the labours of this martyr, who established that holy office by his blood (2).

(2) In Fasciculo Sanctor. Ord. Cist. l. i. D. 21.

a with great affection, who, upon his arrival at Rome, crowned him with great solemnity in the church of St. Peter. Immediately after the coronation, there happened a dispute between the Romans and Germans, many of whom had entered the city from curiosity, and to buy provisions. The quarrel was inflamed to such a degree, that the citizens taking up arms, killed above a thousand of the Germans. The emperor not being able to obtain any satisfaction for this outrage, took his leave of the pope, and marched with his army towards Lombardy; but being informed that several fiefs of the empire in Tuscany and Campania had been seized by the church of Rome, during the troubles in Germany, he sent some troops into Campania, to recover the usurped territories, and retook several cities in Tuscany that were garrisoned with the soldiers of the pope. He is crowned by the pope.

b DURING these transactions, Innocent had ordered John, king of England, to be excommunicated by name, through his whole kingdom; and had published a bull in France, with the offer of plenary indulgences to all those who should undertake a crusade against the Albigenses; in consequence of which bull, no less than 50,000 Croises assembled at Lyons, about the middle of June, distinguished from those against the Saracens, by wearing their crosses upon their breasts. These Croises were commanded by the archbishop of Sens, and several other bishops, and by the duke of Burgundy, the counts of Nevers, St. Paul, Montfort, and others, with the count of Toulouse, who took the cross from fear rather than affection. Their first expedition was against the city Beziers, which they took by storm, putting all the inhabitants, to the number of 60,000, to the sword; from whence they marched against Carcaffone, whither the Albigenses had carried their most valuable effects. This city they forced to surrender, allowing the inhabitants to march out in their shirts (Y). After these successes, they unanimously conferred the chief command on Simon, count of Montfort, who, tho' abandoned by the greatest part of his army, continued to act with great vigour, and made himself master of several towns (Z). The king of England is excommunicated. The Croises march against the Albigenses.

c THE following year Innocent wrote to the count of Thoulouse, who was again suspected of favouring the heretics, and threatened, if he gave them any retreat in his territories, to order the extirpers of heresies to take possession of all his estates. Notwithstanding this threatening, Raymund soon after entirely abandoned the Catholics, and was excommunicated in a council of bishops at St. Gille. Mean while Simon Montfort, having received several new reinforcements of Croises from France and Germany, proceeded in his conquests, but not without frequent considerable losses to his own army, as his enemies, who were driven to despair, made a most obstinate resistance. A. D. 1210.

d IN the mean time the emperor Otho still continuing in Italy, and by the advice of Diopold or Bertbold, whom he created duke of Spoletto, seizing upon the territories of the church in Tuscany and Romaniola, and by the assistance of the Pisan fleet invading the dominions of the king of Sicily in Apulia, Innocent having in vain endeavoured to persuade him to desist from hostilities, at last denounced a sentence of excommunication and deposition against him, which he ordered to be published in Italy and Germany, and commanded his legate to punish the bishops canonically, who neglected to execute his orders*. Otho paid no regard to this sentence, but continued his conquests in Apulia, and even threatened to revenge the indignity he had received upon the ecclesiastics; however, in Germany the archbishops of Mentz and of Triers, with several other nobles, assembled in the beginning of December, and chose Frederic, king of Sicily, then sixteen years of age, who had been declared king of the Romans when an infant. The emperor Otho is excommunicated by the pope. Several nobles of Germany chose Frederic of Sicily as emperor.

e WHILE these things were transacting in Germany, Innocent wrote to Henry, emperor of Constantinople, ordering him to repeal the law, which he had made, that no person should leave any of his immoveable estates to the church. It appears by the letters of the pope, that Henry complied with his desire. Besides this letter to the emperor, Innocent wrote to the Innocent re-proves several princes in Europe, * Hist. Albigens. c. xiv. usque xxxii. Hist. comitum Tolos. GUILL. CATELAI, l. ii. c. 6. Annales.

* SPOND.

(Y) The transactions of Simon Montfort against the Albigenses are circumstantially related by Peter Villarsen, who observes, that if the Croises had not separated after the surrendering of Carcaffone, they would have soon conquered the heretics; but as the expedition was only undertaken by them to enjoy the benefit of the indulgences, they no sooner appeared at the camp than they returned home, thinking that they had performed their vow, so that the legates were obliged to determine the time which gave a title to the indulgence, which they ordained to be forty days at least.

(Z) This year the pope confirmed the order of the most Holy Trinity, for the redemption of captives; which, according to Robert Gaguin, afterwards grand-master, was first instituted in the year 1198, by John de Mala, a divine of Paris, and Felix, a monk, in the Pays de Veaux, who, after living in a solitary manner for several years, arrived at Rome, where they obtained the confirmation of the rules of their order, and were appointed to wear white garments, with a blue and red cross (3).

(3) Gaguin Hist. Franc. l. vi.

king of Bohemia, ordering him and the two queens to submit to the judgment of the apostolic see, and to send proxies to Rome. He likewise wrote to the bishops of England, desiring them to admonish the king to submit to the church; he ordered the bishop of Samora to put the king of Portugal under an interdict, if he did not make satisfaction for the injuries done to the bishop of that kingdom; and he charged the king of France to make restitution of the revenues of the bishops of Orange and Toulon, which he had seized.

He confirms the election of Frederic;
A. D. 1211.

MEAN while, one of the ambassadors from the nobles of Germany arriving at Rome, informed Innocent of the election of Frederic, and having obtained his confirmation of the election, he proceeded to Sicily, and acquainted Frederic with his promotion to the imperial dignity. Innocent not only confirmed the election of Frederic, but sent Gerhard, bishop of Novara, as his legate, to prevail with the cities of Lombardy to abandon the party of Otho, and took under his protection all those who should furnish money or other assistance against that enemy of the church<sup>r</sup>. Otho, who was proceeding in his conquests in Apulia, being informed of this revolution in Germany, returned by sea to Lombardy, and having put the Italian cities that had revolted to the ban of the empire, marched immediately with his army to Germany, tho' in the middle of a very severy winter.

and deposes the king of England.

INNOCENT in the mean time sent two legates into England, to endeavour to reconcile the king to the church; but John refusing to make restitution for the losses of the priests, and consenting only to allow those who were banished to return, Innocent recalled his legates, and having again excommunicated the king, absolved his subjects from their allegiance, conferred his kingdom upon the king of France, and exhorted him and the Croises to make war upon him. He likewise excommunicated the king of Armenia, because he had seized the possessions of the knights Templars in his dominions, and refused to submit to the judgment of the apostolic see<sup>2</sup>. Sancho, king of Portugal, was also reproved by him, and threatened with an anathema, because he usurped the possessions of ecclesiastics, and imprisoned the bishops who proposed to visit the see of Rome.

Frederic arrives at
Rome;

In the mean time Frederic, king of Sicily, having left the administration of that kingdom to his queen Constantia, sister of the king of Arragon, arrived at Rome, in his way to Germany, and was received with great honour by the pope. Innocent, however, delayed conferring upon him the imperial crown; but sent a cardinal legate into Germany, to desire the nobles and cities of that kingdom to leave Otho, and submit to Frederic. After a short stay at Rome, Frederic went by sea to Genoa, from whence he passed over the Alps into Germany, and arrived at Constance, with an escort of sixty horse, notwithstanding the attempts of several of the Italian cities, and the partisans of Otho in Germany, who endeavoured to intercept him on his journey.

and goes for Germany.

A crusade against the Moors in Spain
A. D. 1212.

WHILE Germany was embroiled by the two factions of Frederic and Otho, Innocent, by his letters, exhorted the Christians of Europe to undertake a crusade against the Moors in Spain; in consequence of which exhortation, no less than 110,000 foreigners crowded into that kingdom, the greatest part of whom were obliged to return, upon account of the excessive heat of the climate. However, those who continued, being joined by a great number of Spaniards, about the middle of July they gained a signal victory over the Moors, having killed 100,000 of the enemy, with the loss to themselves of only 115 men<sup>3</sup>. Alphonfus, king of Arragon, immediately informed the pope of this victory, and sent the chief standard of Mahomet to Rome, which was hung up in St. Peter's church, where the Moorish prince boasted that he would erect it himself<sup>4</sup>. Mean while cardinal Robert de Corceo, being sent by Innocent as his legate into France, to encourage a crusade against the Albigenses, held a council at Paris, in which several decrees were made for the reformation of manners, and restoring the discipline of the church. One of the decrees is somewhat remarkable; he prohibited both seculars and regulars from binding themselves by an oath not to lend their books<sup>5</sup>.

A new crusade preached.
A. D. 1213.

WHILE his legate in France was encouraging a crusade against the Albigenses, Innocent sent circular letters through Europe, addressed to all the faithful, exhorting them to an expedition into the Holy Land. He likewise published other letters, addressed to all the bishops and nobles in Christendom, inviting them to a general council, to be held at Rome at the end of thirty months. In consequence of the pope's letters, the crusade was preached with so great ardour, that upwards of 30,000 boys took the cross, and by no means could be diverted from the expedition into the Holy Land. In imitation of them, many old people, and persons of both sexes, likewise took the cross; but the greatest part of the boys being seized by pirates, and sold to the Saracens, or perishing in the deserts for want of subsistence, the others were at length prevailed upon to return home<sup>6</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> SIGON. l. xvi. p. 16.

c. 23, & seq.

sect. xiv. MATH. Paris in Joan. Reg.

<sup>2</sup> SPONDANI Annales.

<sup>b</sup> CÆSARIUS, v. Dial. 21.

<sup>c</sup> SPOND. Annales.

<sup>3</sup> RODER. de reb. Hisp. l. viii. MARIAN. l. xi.

<sup>4</sup> Cantipart ii. de Apip. iii.

- a IN the mean time the emperor Frederic, being now master of the greatest part of Germany towards the Rhine, was crowned at Aix la Chapelle, by the archbishop of Mentz; but, before his coronation, in gratitude to the pope, he drew up a writing, in which he promised obedience to Innocent and his successors, and to restore to the Roman church all the possessions which it had received from his ancestors or others, particularly specifying the march of Ancona, the duchy of Spoletto, and the territory of the countess Matilda. After confirming this writing with an oath, in presence of the ecclesiastics, he, with many of the nobles, made a vow of undertaking an expedition for the relief of the Christians in the Holy Land. While Frederic was thus strengthening his party in Germany, Innocent omitted nothing to prevail with the cities of Lombardy to favour his interest; and as the city of Milan, from a hatred to the race of Barbarossa, distinguished itself by its fidelity to Otho, he threatened to confirm the sentence of excommunication that had been denounced against them by his legate; to prevail with the king of France and the nobles of that kingdom and Italy to retain their manufactures, and not to pay them their debts; to absolve the bishops of Lombardy from the jurisdiction of their archbishop; and, lastly, to order the croises to attack their city. Innocent, at the same time, wrote to the king of England, extolling him for his wisdom and piety in resigning his crown into the hands of his legate Pandulphus, and for rendering his kingdom tributary to the holy see<sup>f</sup>. By this concession John having rendered himself odious to his nobles, who refused to attend him in an expedition into Guienne against the king of France, the pope gave orders to Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury to absolve him from the sentence of excommunication.

The emperor takes the cross.

The king of England declares his kingdom tributary to the holy see.

- MEAN while the pope, upon the complaints of the king of Arragon, the count of Toulouse, and many other counts, against the proceedings of Simon Montfort, and the apostolic legate in the province of Narbonne, ordered a council to be held in the city of Vaurum, under the direction of the archbishop of Narbonne, as his legate. The council refusing to redress the grievances complained of, the king of Arragon and the nobles immediately had recourse to arms, and assembled an army of upwards of 100,000 men; but Simon Montfort, according to the authors of those times<sup>e</sup>, having only 1000 men, ventured to engage them, and gained a complete victory, killing the king of Arragon, with 20,000 of the enemy, and losing himself only one miles, or knight, and a very few servientes, or squires (A).

A remarkable victory gained by Simon Montfort.

- d DURING these transactions in Narbonne, Innocent wrote to the patriarch of Grada, desiring him to order the inhabitants of Pavia to desist from attacking Aldebrandinus, marquis of Este, vassal of the Roman see, who was then employed in reducing the march of Ancona, which had no inclination to submit to the church. Innocent likewise sent Pelagius, a Spaniard, as his legate to Constantinople, to prevail with the Greeks to submit to the church of Rome. Though Pelagius acted with great severity, imprisoning the monks, putting the priests in irons, and shutting up the churches, yet he could not prevail with the people to forsake their antient rites; and the emperor, at their solicitation, notwithstanding the opposition of the legate, opened the churches, and set the prisoners at liberty<sup>h</sup>.
- e THE following year Innocent sent Peter of Benevento, a cardinal deacon, as his legate into the province of Narbonne, to demand from Simon Montfort the young son of the late king of Arragon, whom he restored to his subjects. Being informed that the Saracens inclined to quit the Holy Land to the see of Rome, on condition of receiving a yearly tribute from the patriarch of Jerusalem, and obtaining security for their other conquests, he wrote to Se-phadine, sultan of Damascus and Babylon, exhorting him to an exchange of captives, and to deliver up the Holy Land, to prevent any more effusion of blood<sup>i</sup>.

The pope writes to the sultan of Damascus.

- f MEAN while, being informed that the emperor Otho had been entirely defeated by the king of France, in the famous battle of Bovines, and forced to fly into Saxony, he gave authority to his legate, the archbishop of Mentz, to crown Frederic again at Aix la Chapelle, where the emperor renewed his vow of an expedition into the Holy Land. Innocent likewise sent a nuncio with a mandate to Simon Montfort, confirming to him the provinces of Guienne and Narbonne, which had been granted to him by a council held in the beginning of the year at Montpellier. About the same time having received a deceitful embassy from the king 1215. Orders his legate to crown the emperor Frederic;

<sup>e</sup> TRITHEM. Chron. SIGON. de Regno Ital. lib. xvi. p. 18.

<sup>f</sup> Harpsfeld. Hist. Eccles. Ang. sect. xiii. c. 2.

<sup>g</sup> Hist. Albigens. c. 66. usque 73. GULIEL. de Pod. Laurentii. c. 21, 22. Brit Philp. l. viii.

<sup>h</sup> SPONDANI Annales.

<sup>i</sup> Richard. de S. German. apud MURATOR. tom. vii. p. 988.

(A) The sons of the nobility, by the writers of this age, were called milites, and always fought on horseback; though much more anciently those who were honoured by princes and prelates with a sword, a military belt, gilded spurs, or other ornaments of that kind, were distinguished by the name of milites. The servientes, or 'squires, fought likewise usually on horseback (though they are found sometimes mentioned as infantry), but they were not descended of the nobility, or had not yet attained the honour of the belt. Their business was to serve the milites, or knights, from whom they were distinguished by their arms, which were not so complete or heavy as those of the knights. Some authors affirm, that Simon had only 1000 men, both knights and 'squires, but others say, that he had 1000 foot, and 800 knights.

of England, complaining that his nobles had obliged him by force to publish laws that were a destructive to the kingdom, although he had appealed from their violence to the holy see, Innocent, by a bull, annulled the agreement that had been made between the king and the nobles, and ordered them to be obedient to their king, who had assumed the cross, and become a vassal of the Roman church. The nobles paying no regard to this sentence, but resolving to defend their privileges by arms, the pope ordered Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, to excommunicate them, distinguishing them first by the title of disturbers of the public peace, and afterwards by that of barons; Stephen refusing to execute the mandate of the pope, was suspended from his office. Innocent in the mean time ordered Conrad, a monk of Marpurg, apostolical inquisitor in Germany, to proceed against the heretics that were appearing in the diocese of Straßburgh, and were accused of believing that fornication was no b sin, and that it was lawful to eat flesh on every day of the year. Conrad exerted himself in his inquisition with more zeal than prudence; for trusting solely to the proof of the red hot iron, he put more innocent than guilty persons to death<sup>k</sup>. During these transactions in Germany, Innocent having gone to Ferentino, deposed the abbot of Monte Cassino, for disobedience and other crimes, and appointed one Stephen in his place.

and holds a general council
at Rome.

Upon his return to Rome, he opened the famous Lateran council, at which were present the patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem, 412 archbishops and bishops, both Greek and Latin, besides the proxies of the absent, and upwards of 800 abbots and priors, the whole number of prelates being 1215, besides the ambassadors of the emperors Frederic and Henry, and of the kings of France, England, Hungary, Jerusalem, Cyprus, and Aragon, and c deputies from other princes, nobles, and states<sup>l</sup>. The archbishop of Milan appeared likewise as ambassador from the emperor Otho, who offered to submit to the decision of the council; but the marquis of Montferrat rising up in defence of Frederic, and urging, with great vehemence, several things against Otho, as a person excommunicated and perjured, his ambassador was not admitted by the pope, who went out of the church to put a stop to the disturbance that was arising in the assembly on that account<sup>m</sup>.

THE council made many decrees for restraining and punishing heretics; explained the doctrine of the trinity; and admitted the word transubstantiation of the bread and wine in the eucharist. They granted large privileges and indulgences to those who should undertake the expedition into the Holy Land, and denounced an anathema against all who furnished the d Saracens with ships, arms, or assistance of any kind. The sentence against the archbishop of Canterbury was confirmed, and the English barons, with Lewis the son of the king of France, to whom they had offered their crown, were excommunicated. The emperor Frederic having promised not to annex the kingdom of Sicily to the empire, his election was confirmed, as were likewise the acts of the council of Montpellier in favour of Simon Montfort. Several canons were also made regarding the sacraments, the reformation of manners, and the state and discipline of the church<sup>n</sup>. At this council were present St. Dominic (B) and St. Francis (C), desiring the confirmation of the orders they had lately instituted. Innocent having formerly approved of the order of St. Francis, ratified it in the council; but as Dominic had not yet formed a rule for the members of his order, the pope gave him only a verbal ap- e probation,

<sup>k</sup> TRITHEM. in Chron. Sponheim. Naucier. Gener. Germ. ubi supra.

<sup>l</sup> Vita Innocent, ubi supra.

<sup>m</sup> Chron. de S.

<sup>n</sup> SPOND. Annal. MAT. PARIS, Hist. Albigenf. l. iii.

(B) Dominic de Gusman was born, according to some, at Calaborra, but, according to others, at Calavega, in Spain, in the year 1170. After finishing his studies at the university, Didacus, or Diego, bishop of Osma, gave him a canonicate in his cathedral, and afterwards made him sub-prior. He accompanied Diego, in 1206, to Rome, and returning with him to Thoulouse, he remained in that province, and by his great zeal in converting the Albigenses to the faith of Rome, was greatly revered by the catholics, and respected by Simon Montfort. With the design of bringing the Albigenses to submit to the church, he had instituted an order of preachers, and came to Rome to have it confirmed by the council. Innocent had made him his inquisitor in Languedoc, but gave only a verbal approbation to his order; which was confirmed the following year by Honorius III. This order has multiplied to such a degree, that at present it is divided into 45 provinces, 11 of which are in Asia, Africa, and America, without reckoning 12 congregations governed by vicars general. It has given to the church of Rome three popes, 48 cardinals, 23 patriarchs, 43 legates, 600 archbishops, 1500 bishops, &c. The inquisitors of the faith in many countries, for a long time, were likewise taken from this order; but at present the Dominicans exercise that office only in 32 tribunals of Italy, in quality of provincial inquisitors, and as delegates of the cardinals, who compose the congregation of the holy office (1).

(C) St. Francis was born in 1182, at Assisi, a city of the ecclesiastical state. At his baptism he was called John, but acquired the name of Francis afterwards from his knowledge of the French language. He spent the first years of his life as a merchant, which was the profession of his father; but the poor of Lyons being then the subject of conversation, Francis renounced all temporal possessions, and likewise made profession of evangelic poverty, in conformity to Christ and his apostles. His austerities were so extraordinary, that he was reckoned by his fellow citizens a madman, and his father even caused him to be put in prison; but, finding that nothing could prevail with him to alter his resolution, he again set him at liberty. By his preaching and manner of life,

(1) Theodoric de Podio, in Vita Dominic.

- a probation, but promised to grant a confirmation of the order, when St. Dominic should once have fixed upon a rule.

THE council being dismissed, Innocent, the following year, sent Gualo, or Walo, as his legate into France, to order Lewis, under pain of excommunication, to desist from his intention of invading England; but that prince paying no regard to the remonstrances of the legate, and in the beginning of May transporting his troops into Britain, Walo privately sailed thither after him, and published a sentence of excommunication against him. Innocent was greatly enraged upon hearing that he had actually invaded the island, and immediately excommunicated him and his followers. He likewise proposed to have excommunicated his father Philip, king of France, whom he suspected to have assisted him in his enterprise; but, being prevailed upon to defer that sentence, he in the mean time conferred the church of St. Benedict in Capua upon the late abbot of Monte Cassino, and sent two cardinal legates, with special mandates, to Milan, who calling a council in that city, required them, in the name of the pope, to forsake the party of Otho, and to cease hostilities against their neighbouring cities. The inhabitants of Milan refusing obedience to their demands, the legates excommunicated them, and laid their city under an interdict<sup>o</sup>. This sentence only exasperating them, they assembled a great army, and passing the Po, made an irruption into the territory of Pavia. At the same time the Pisans and Genoese being engaged in a war, Innocent resolved to go himself into Lombardy, to put an end to the dissensions among the cities in that part of Italy, in order to promote an expedition into the Holy Land; but he died on his journey at Perugia, on the 14th of July, and was buried in the cathedral church of that city<sup>p</sup>.

Lewis, son of the king of France, is excommunicated for invading England.
A. D. 1216.

Death of Innocent and election of Honorius III.

Two days after the death of Innocent, the cardinals present elected Cencius Labellus, a Roman, and cardinal priest, who took the name of Honorius III. and immediately wrote to all the faithful, informing them of his promotion<sup>q</sup>. Upon his arrival at Rome, he wrote to the emperor Frederic, desiring him to resign the kingdom of Sicily, and to leave it to the disposal of the apostolic see<sup>r</sup>. Soon after St. Dominic returning from Thoulouse, and declaring that he was content with the rule of St. Austin, Honorius confirmed his order by a bull, signed by himself and twenty-two cardinals (D).

- MEAN while Peter de Courtenai, count of Toulon, who, the year before, had been chosen emperor of Constantinople, arriving at Rome with his wife Jolanta, Honorius, on the 10th of April, crowned him emperor, in the church of St. Laurence, without the city, that he might not pretend to any authority in the western empire. At the same time he wrote to the patriarch of Constantinople, declaring that he did not intend to infringe his privileges, but that, after he had denied it several times, he had consented to crown the emperor, at the earnest solicitation of Peter himself, and many other nobles<sup>s</sup>. The croises in great numbers assembling in Germany, France, Hungary, and Italy, Honorius appointed the cardinal Columna as his legate in Greece and Syria, and sent him to the emperor Peter, and a considerable army to Brindisi. From Brindisi the empress sailed directly for Constantinople, but the emperor and the legate sailed over the streights with the forces, and besieged Durazzo, which was then possessed by Theodore Comnenus, a Greek, and prince of Epire. After continuing a considerable time before the city, they were obliged to raise the siege, and march

The emperor of Constantinople crowned at Rome;
A. D. 1217.

<sup>o</sup> SIGON. l. xvi. c. 22.

<sup>p</sup> Vita Innocent, apud MURAT.

BLOND. Dec. vi. l. ii. PLATINA in Vita Pont.

<sup>q</sup> ONUPH. in Chron. et de Rom. Pont. Chron.

<sup>r</sup> SPOND. Annales.

<sup>s</sup> Idem Ibid. Richard. de S. Germ.

life, he quickly gained a great many disciples; upon which he formed a design of instituting a new order, and, in the year 1208, came to Rome, and received the approbation of the pope, which Innocent this year again confirmed in the Lateran council. Francis having established several convents of his order in Italy, travelled through France and Spain, with the design of going to preach the gospel in Africa; but being prevented by a distemper from passing into Africa, he established several convents in Spain and France, and returned to Rome; from whence he went to Damiata in Egypt, and offered to the sultan to throw himself into the fire to prove the truth of the Christian religion. Upon his return to Rome, he received from pope Honorius III. a confirmation of his order for women as well as men: he then resigned his generalship, and retired to one of the highest of the Appenine mountains, where it is pretended he saw a seraphim, from whence his order is called Seraphic. Being weakened by his great austerities, and continual preaching, he was attacked with several distempers, and died at his native city, in the 45th year of his age. His followers, at first, were called Poor Minors, in opposition to the poor of Lyons, but afterwards they took the name of Brothers Minors, or Friar Minors, laying aside the title of Poor, that they might not seem to boast of the poverty of which they made profession. Their order is the most numerous in all Christendom, and was divided by St. Francis into three branches, for friar minors, the poor sisters, and the penitents of both sexes (2).

(D) Dominic continued for some time at Rome, and observing that there were a great many persons walking idly about the pope's palace, while the cardinals were employed with his holiness, he persuaded Honorius to establish the office of master of the sacred palace, whose business is to give a lecture upon some part of the sacred scripture, and to grant a licence to all books and writings published in the city.

(2) S. Bonaventur. in Vit. Franc.

who is taken prisoner in Theffaly, together with the pope's le-gate.

over-land for Constantinople, but were intercepted, and cut off by Theodore, in the woods of Theffaly, the emperor and legate, with many others, being taken prisoners.

In the mean time great part of the German crusards, with those of Hungary, under the command of Andrew their king, embarked at Venice for the Holy Land, while those of Westphalia and Saxony, having embarked upon the Elb, and joined the Grifons and Flemings, passed the streight of Gibraltar, and arrived at Gaeta. At the same time others were embarking at Genoa, Pisa, and Messina. Honorius, in the mean while, wrote to Alexander, king of Scotland, desiring him to break his alliance with Lewis, who was invading England. He likewise confirmed the disposition of his kingdoms, made by Andrew, king of Hungary, before his departure for the Holy Land, and ratified the agreement made betwixt the emperor Frederic, and Waldemar king of Denmark. He received the consuls and people of Montpellier under the protection of the apostolic see, and reprov'd the king of Bohemia, because the clergy in his kingdom were not only subject to secular courts, but likewise capitally punished by laymen; that he slighted the interdict denounced by the archbishop of Prague, imposed grievous exactions upon clergymen, and usurped the investiture of churches. Honorius likewise prohibited the Pisans from invading Sardinia, laid the inhabitants of Milan and Placenza under an interdict, for attacking the Cremonese, and threatened to send his chaplain to reform the monastery of Cassino, which, he complained, was become a sink of all manner of vices.

The legate is set at liberty.
A. D. 1218.

THE following year, at the intreaty of the pope, John de Columna, who had been taken prisoner with the emperor Peter, was set at liberty, and went to the empress Jolanta at Constantinople, the croises being then besieging Damiata, in Egypt. In the mean time, Honorius, being forced by the tumults of the Romans to quit the city, retired to Reate, and being informed that Simon Montfort had lately been killed by a stone at the siege of Thoulouse, he wrote to the king of France to assist the catholics in that province, who were in great distress, and prohibited James king of Arragon from giving any protection or assistance to Raymond, the late count of Thoulouse, or to any of his followers. He likewise wrote to the bishop of Winchester, and to Walo his legate in England, ordering them to compel the king, by ecclesiastical censures, to cease from oppressing the two dowager queens, Berengaria and Isabel, the widows of Richard and John; and lest the bishops, by the instigation of the king, should inflict any censure upon the two queens, he exempted them from their jurisdiction, and took them under the protection of the apostolic see, which favour he also conferred upon Alexander king of Scotland; it being usual with the popes, about this period, from what they called the plenitude of their power, to grant protections and exemptions to particular princes, who, by the influence of their money, or blind submission to the tyrannical usurpation of the court of Rome, rendered themselves worthy to be accounted favourites. Hugonius at the same time, being desirous of restoring peace to the cities of Lombardy, absolved the inhabitants of Milan from the censures under which they had been laid by Innocent, and gave a commission to cardinal Hugolin to conclude a peace among the cities who were at war. Hugolin effected an accommodation without great difficulty; and as the emperor Otho had lately died at Hartsburgh, Milan, and the other cities of his party, embraced that opportunity of putting an end to the destructive war.

A peace concluded between the cities of Lombardy.

1219.
The Croises
take Damiata.

DURING these transactions in Europe, a great many croises, wearied with the fatigues of the siege of Damiata, returned home; but a new body arriving, under the command of cardinal Pelagius, and James count of Andria, Damiata was at last taken, in the month of November, after a siege of eighteen, or, according to others, twenty-two months, during which, upwards of 75,000 Saracens were slain. The sultan of Damascus, being alarmed at the success of the Christians, immediately ordered the walls of the city of Jerusalem to be destroyed, that, if the Christians again got possession of that country, it might not serve them for a place of defence. Mean while the king of France, at the intreaty of Honorius, having concluded a truce for four years with the king of England, sent his son Lewis with an army against the Albigenses, who, after continuing some months before Thoulouse, was obliged to raise the siege, and retire with his army, upon which a great many castles again submitted to count Raymond. While Lewis was before Thoulouse, Reginald, king of the islands in the neighbourhood of Britain, made a solemn resignation of the Isle of Man to the Roman church, and received the investiture of it again from Pandulphus, the apostolic legate, and bishop of Norwich, promising to pay an annual tribute of twelve marks sterling, and desiring to be taken under the protection of the holy see.

The king of France sends his son with an army against the Albigenses.

The emperor
enters Italy
with an army.
A. D. 1220.

THE following year the emperor Frederic, having settled the affairs of Germany, entered Italy with a considerable army, attended by his queen Constantia, in order to receive the imperial crown. The inhabitants of Milan refusing to admit him into their city, he dissembled u Chron. de S. Germ. Bernar. Thesaur. de Acquisit. Ter. Sanct. apud MURATOR. tom. vii.

* Idem ibid.

w GUILL. de Pod. Chron. c. 32.

x SPOND. Annales.

- a his resentment, and directed his march for Rome. While he was encamped at St. Leo, in the duchy of Urbino, he took the usual oath to the pope's legate, to defend all the rights and possessions of the Roman see; and upon his arriving at the city, having again renewed the oath, Honorius crowned him and his queen emperor and empress in the church of St. Peter; after which ceremony Frederic again renewed his vow of performing a crusade, and received the cross from the hands of cardinal Hugolin. The same day he likewise published several edicts against heretics, for the liberty of the churches, and the security of husbandmen and travellers, which were confirmed by Honorius, who ordered them to be observed through all the church<sup>y</sup>. As the winter was already advanced, Frederic excused himself from going into Syria, upon account of the danger of the navigation, and leaving Rome, held a general assembly of the states at Capua, where he created Thomas de Aquino count of Acerra, and chief justiciary of Apulia; then marching with his army to Calabria, he passed over into Sicily, and held an assembly of the states at Messina<sup>z</sup>. Mean while St. Dominic assembled the first general chapter of his order at Bologna, where the vow of poverty was confirmed, and the curse of God denounced against those who should seek to pervert the order of preachers, by leaving them temporal possessions<sup>a</sup>.

- At the same time Honorius, having received pressing letters from the crusards in Egypt, desiring him to send them speedy assistance, he wrote to the emperor, who was then employed in reducing the Saracens in Italy, urging him to fulfil his vow of an expedition into the Holy Land, as the crusards were then without a commander, John king of Jerusalem having quarrelled with cardinal Pelagius, and retired to Ptolemais. The pope likewise reproved the emperor for having presumed to dispose of the bishopric of Aversa, and the vacant see of the province of Salerno. Frederic found it necessary for his affairs to continue in Europe: however, that he might not seem altogether to neglect his vow, he sent a considerable body of troops into Egypt, under the command of the duke of Bavaria, ordered the twentieth part of the possessions of ecclesiastics, and the tythe of those of laymen, to be collected through his kingdom, which money he sent, with forty-three galleys, to Damiata, under the command of Walter de Paelear the chancellor, and the count of Malta. But, before their arrival, the Christian army, by the imprudence and obstinacy of cardinal Pelagius, had been exposed to such difficulties, by the overflowing of the Nile, that, to save themselves from perishing, they were obliged to deliver up Damiata to the sultan, and to conclude a truce with him for eight years<sup>b</sup>.

- MEAN while Honorius sent cardinal Gregory as his legate into Poland, Bohemia, Sweden, and Denmark, with full power to reform the abuses in those kingdoms; and sent the cardinal Conrad, bishop of Porta, as his legate into Thoulouse: but being soon after informed of the loss of Damiata, he wrote to the emperor Frederic, severely blaming him for delaying his expedition into the Holy Land, at the same time accusing him of violating the rights of the church by nominating bishops, and laying taxes upon the ecclesiastics. Frederic excused himself from going into the Holy Land, by the necessity of his affairs; but he mutually blamed the pope for affording protection to several disaffected nobles whom he had banished, and justified his proceedings with regard to the ecclesiastics in his kingdom, by pretending only to exercise the same prerogatives which had been enjoyed by his predecessors; and alleging, that the treaty concluded betwixt his mother Constantia and Innocent III. was of no force.

- To prevent this misunderstanding with the pope from proceeding to an open rupture, a conference was held at Veroli, in the month of April, between Honorius and Frederic, and it was proposed that a congress should be held in the month of November, at Verona, to which the Christian princes should be invited, to consult for the relief of the Holy Land. Frederic, in the mean time, to satisfy the pope, resigned the possessions of the countess Mathilda into the hands of the apostolic legate, and published severe edicts against the heretics, which seem to have been adopted by the tribunal of the inquisition. He ordered that those, who were convicted of heresy, should be deprived of their offices and fiefs, and punished as traitors; that those who relapsed into the errors which they had abjured, should be punished with death; and that the children of heretics, to the second generation, should be deprived of all offices and fiefs, unless they became informers against their parents<sup>d</sup>.

- In the mean time John king of Jerusalem, with the patriarch of that city, and the masters of the knights Templars and Hospitallers, arrived at Rome; and the conference appointed to be held at Verona, having been transferred to Ferentino; the following year Honorius, with the emperor, the king of Jerusalem, and other nobles; assembling in that city, Frederic again engaged by oath to go within two years to the relief of the Holy Land; and, in order

<sup>y</sup> SIGON. l. xvii. p. 28. BELLARM. tom. i. Honor. III. Abbas Usperg.

<sup>a</sup> SPOND. Annal. <sup>b</sup> Chron. de S. Germ.

de Vincif. l. i. Ep. 25 & 26.

<sup>c</sup> Chron. S. Germ. VILLAN. Hist. l. vi. c. i.

<sup>z</sup> Chron. de S. Germ.

<sup>d</sup> PETR.

to interest him the more in that expedition, the pope, as the empress was lately dead, prevailed with him to promise to marry Jolanta, the only daughter and heiress of the king of Jerusalem. The conference being concluded, Frederic returned to the kingdom of Naples, and gave orders for fitting out a large fleet in the ports of Sicily, while Honorius, who had gone to Rome, wrote to the Christian princes, informing them of the determination of the emperor, and exhorting them to imitate his example. Nuncios were likewise sent into all the provinces, to compose all differences between princes or private persons, and to preach up the crusade, appointing the time of departure for the feast of St. John in the following year. At the same time John, king of Jerusalem, went to France, to solicit the assistance of Philip, who dying soon after his arrival, is said to have left him in his will 100,000 livres, and as much to each of the masters of the military orders, the Templars and Hospitallers.

The Albigenses elect a pope.

MEAN while the Albigenses, having not only spread into Spain, but even towards Bulgaria, Croatia, and Dalmatia, where they brought over some bishops to their party, chose themselves a pope, to be the head of their consultations; which the cardinal legate being informed of, he immediately appointed a national council to be held at Sens. But the new pope dying soon after his promotion, without having any successor, the fears of the legate were thereby allayed. This story depends solely upon the authority of Matthew Paris, who is the only ancient author that we have seen who mentions it. However, we find from other authors, that Raymond, the young count of Toulouse, with many others of the Albigenses, at this time sent ambassadors to Rome, offering to submit to the Roman church; that, upon confirming their obedience with an oath, their submission was accepted, on condition that they became the feudatories of the Roman see, restored the clergy to their possessions, and, within three years, paid 25,000 merks of gold, or, according to some, 15,000, as a reparation of the damages sustained, and should use their utmost endeavours to extirpate heresy from their territories<sup>d</sup>.

A. D. 1224.
The emperor gratifies the ecclesiastics,

DURING these transactions the emperor Frederic, at the solicitation of the pope, set the disaffected counts at liberty, upon their leaving their sons as hostages; and, in order to soothe the clergy, he published new edicts against the heretics, and ordered that all ecclesiastics, and those belonging to them, should be exempted from the taxes that were levying upon the laymen in his kingdom, unless it could be proved, that they were comprehended together with them in those taxes during the reign of William II.<sup>e</sup> Honorius, in the mean time, being informed that Lewis king of France had attacked the territories of the king of England, in Guienne and Limousin, he wrote to him, desiring him to desist from that war, and to lead his army against the Albigenses, great part of whose territories had now become subject to him, by the voluntary resignation of Americus, the son of Simon Montfort. Being soon after obliged to quit the city upon account of the tumults raised by one Parentius a senator, he retired to Tivoli, where he received an embassy from the emperor, desiring a further prolongation of the time for his expedition into Syria, as he was informed that Milan, Bologna, and other cities in Lombardy, had entered into an association against him; therefore he could not leave Italy at that time, without giving them an opportunity to revolt. Honorius, upon this representation of the emperor, sent for the archbishop of Milan, and the chief of the malecontents, and by their means reconciled the disaffected cities to the emperor; but Frederic then alleging the injustice of breaking the eight years truce concluded with the sultan, detained with him all the prelates of his kingdom till his ambassadors (E) should receive a favourable answer from the pope.

1225.
and desires the pope to prolong the time for the sacred expedition.

Honorius at length consented that the expedition should be delayed for two years, from the month of August, on condition that the emperor again renewed his vow; and he sent the cardinals Pelagius and Walo to St. Germano, where Frederic, in presence of his nobles, swore to undertake in person the expedition within two years, upon which the legates absolved him from the oath which he had made at Veroli, and denounced against him a conditional sentence of excommunication, if he failed to accomplish his vow<sup>f</sup>. A few months after, Honorius, appointing bishops for five vacant churches in the kingdom of Naples, without consulting the emperor, Frederic would not allow them to be admitted, reckoning it an infringement upon his authority; and proceeding to Brindisi, there celebrated his marriage

<sup>d</sup> ANTONIUS, l. xiii. c. 3. sect. 6. SPOND. Annal. Chron. de S. Germ.

<sup>e</sup> Chron. de S. Germ.

<sup>f</sup> SIGON. l. xvii. p. 32.

(E) His ambassadors were the patriarch of Jerusalem and king John, who, after receiving the legacy of the king of France, went into England to solicit the assistance of king Henry; and returning to the continent, proceeded on a pilgrimage to St. James of Compostella.

During his residence in Spain, he married Berengaria, the sister of Ferdinand, king of Castile, and, returning this year to Italy, resided at Capua, where his queen was delivered of a daughter.

- a with Jolanta, by some called Isabella, the daughter of the king of Jerusalem (F). In the mean time, according to Matthew Paris, Honorius sent nuncios to all the princes of Christendom, demanding the perpetuity of the revenues of two prebendaries in each cathedral, and two cells in each monastery, to be appropriated for the use of the popes; but his nuncios every-where met with a repulse (G). This demand was made to the princes of Germany by Conrad the pope's legate, who, after the death of the king of France, had come into Germany, to forward the crusade, and this year held a national council in the city of Mentz, in which he published 14 canons, directly against simony and the concubinage of the clergy, and likewise excommunicated Frederic, count of Isenburgh, who had assassinated his own kinsman (H), Engelbert, archbishop of Cologne.<sup>s</sup> An extravagant demand of the pope.
- b MEAN while the king of Jerusalem, having been forced by the emperor to resign his title in his favour, Honorius conferred upon him the government of the territories of the church from Viterbo to Monte-Fiascone. Soon after receiving an embassy from Frederic, desiring him to act as mediator in reconciling the associated cities of Lombardy to his authority, Honorius concluded an accommodation upon the following terms; That the emperor should forgive all injuries past, and should revoke all decrees against the associated cities, particularly that relating to the transferring the university of Bologna to Naples; that they on their side should furnish the emperor with 400 knights for two years, in his expedition into the Holy Land; that they should conclude a peace with the cities of his party, and observe the laws published by the emperor or church against the heretics. Upon the conclusion of this peace, The king of Jerusalem resigns his title. A. D. 1220.
- c the emperor having gone to Sicily, Honorius wrote to him, earnestly desiring a supply of provisions for the city of Rome, which was in great distress; and the time fixed for the departure of the emperor drawing near, he wrote to Germany and Hungary, pressing the crusade with great earnestness; but, while the croises were entering Italy in great numbers, he died at Rome, on the 18th of March, and was buried in the church of St. Mary major. A peace between the emperor and cities of Lombardy 1229.
- Two days after the death of Honorius, the cardinals unanimously chose Hugolin, born at Anagni, of the noble family of the Conti, and cardinal bishop of Ostia, who took the name of Gregory IX. and, immediately after his promotion, wrote to the emperor, desiring him, under the pain of an anathema, to depart for the Holy Land as soon as possible. Frederic being able to plead no excuse for his delay, appointed the month of August for the embarkation
- d at Brindisi, whither the crusards were resorting from all parts, no less than 60,000, according to Matthew Paris, having come from England. About the same time the archbishop of Palermo returning from the sultan, brought with him an elephant, several mules, and many other valuable presents for the emperor, which occasioned a suspicion afterwards, that the emperor had entered into a treaty with the sultan, and, upon that account, had thwarted the expedition into the Holy Land. However, till the time of the embarkation, Frederic shewed himself very active and earnest in forwarding the preparations for the voyage. He ordered several prelates in the kingdom of Naples to make ready for the expedition, and required the abbot of Cassino to furnish 100 squires, well armed, for one year, in place of whom he afterwards accepted 1200 ounces of gold, raised from the lands of the monastery. Mean
- e while the croises being exposed to the excessive heats of the summer in the neighbourhood of Brindisi, without any shelter, were attacked with various distempers, which proved very mortal; but the time for the embarkation arriving, they were ordered on board, and put to sea. Three days afterwards Frederic put into Otranto with the landgrave of Hesse, who died in that city, and the emperor himself falling sick, or pretending to be so, laid aside all thoughts of prosecuting the voyage; upon which account upwards of 40,000 of the croises likewise returned.<sup>h</sup> Death of Honorius.
Gregory IX. is elected.
The crusards embark for the Holy Land.

<sup>s</sup> See the History of the German Empire.<sup>h</sup> Chron. de S. Germ.

(F) Sigonius says the marriage was celebrated at Rome, the pope having, before the ceremony, conferred the crown of Jerusalem upon Jolanta, in the Vatican church; but we have followed the account of Richard, the notary of St. Germano, a contemporary author, who is acknowledged by the learned Muratori and others to be exact and impartial in his account of the transactions of Frederic II.

(G) Polydore Virgil makes no mention of this demand; but only says, that Otho, the pope's nuncio, requested the tythe of all the ecclesiastical revenues for the war against the Saracens; which tax was accordingly levied (3).

(H) The abbot of Ursperg, and Aventine, relate, that murders were very frequent in Germany about this time, and attribute them to the influence of the doctrines published by the preachers of the crusade, who, in their exhortation to the people, affirmed, that whoever were guilty of parricide, incest, sacrilege, or other crimes, immediately upon their taking the vow, and sewing the cross upon their cloaths, were absolved both from the guilt and the punishment; in consequence of which doctrines very many assassinated those they were at enmity with, and then took the cross, which protected them from all prosecution (4).

(3) Polyd. Hist. Angl. l. xvi. Annal. Bior. l. vii.
MOD. HIST. VOL. IX.

(4) Ursperg. in Chron. 1221. Avent.
7 U

GREGORY,

The emperor is excommuni-
cated.

GREGORY, who was then at Anagni, upon hearing of the return of the emperor, immediately declared that he had thereby exposed himself to the sentence of excommunication formerly denounced against him at St. Germano. And returning soon after to Rome, though the archbishops of Reggio and Bari, with the duke of Spoletto and the count of Malta, had come as ambassadors from the emperor, pleading the excuse of his illness, he gave no credit to their report; but, assembling as many bishops from Lombardy and Naples as he could, he publicly excommunicated the emperor, and wrote to all the princes in Christendom, informing them of the sentence. Frederic, in the mean time, arriving at Capua, and being informed of the proceedings of the pope, sent letters in justification of himself to Germany, and the Christian princes; and calling an assembly of the states at Capua, he appointed the ninth of May next year for the time of his embarkation.

DURING these transactions in Italy, the pope's legate in France, having quieted the factions among the nobles, occasioned by their disputes about the guardianship of the young king, and having prevailed with them to submit to the administration of the queen, according to the disposition of Lewis, who had died the year before in Toulouse, he assembled the forces of the kingdom against the remains of the Albigenses.

Gregory is expelled out of
Rome.
A. D. 1228.

THE emperor, in the mean time, having, by his money, procured a strong party in Rome, sent a justification of himself in writing to that city, which was publicly read in the Capitol, with the consent of the senate and people. He likewise confiscated the possessions of the ecclesiastics in his kingdom, who approved of the pope's proceeding, pillaged the houses of the knights Templars, and invaded the patrimony of St. Peter. Gregory, in return for these outrages, again excommunicated the emperor; but the party of Frederic prevailing in the city, he went from thence to Rieti, and afterwards to Perugia, where he excommunicated Reginald, the son of the duke of Spoletto, who had advanced with an army into the duchy of Spoletto and the march of Ancona. The imperial army, in which were a great many Saracens, paying no regard to the anathema, Gregory sent John, the late king of Jerusalem, with a considerable body of troops, to oppose their ravages; at the same time, by his legate cardinal Godfrey, he excited the associated cities of Lombardy to attack the cities of the emperor's party, and threatened to send the late king of Jerusalem, in a Venetian fleet, to command the cruises, and recover his kingdom.

The emperor goes to the Holy Land.

FREDERIC, fearing the departure of king John, at last determined on the Syrian expedition; and assembling a fleet at Brindisi, sailed from thence to the Holy Land; but, before his departure, wrote to the pope, that he had left a full power with Rainald to conclude a peace with the holy see. Gregory was greatly enraged that the emperor had presumed to depart upon the sacred expedition before he was reconciled to the holy see; and refusing to have any conference with Rainald, who was a persecutor of the church, he sent his army into the kingdom of Naples, commanded by the banished counts, together with Pandolph of Anagni his legate, while he ordered cardinal Colonna and king John to oppose the progress of the imperialists in the march of Ancona. But Frederic, having left a great many forces in the kingdom of Naples, commanded by expert generals, and having found means to justify his delay in the preceding year, had a great many friends through all Italy, who alleged that he was unjustly persecuted by the pope. On the other hand, Gregory, disdaining to retract his proceedings against the emperor, used every art to bring him to submission; and, not contented with spiritual arms, publicly endeavoured, to the utmost of his power, to raise a general revolt, and succeeded so well, that all Italy was involved in a war, the cities not only being at variance with one another, but even the inhabitants of the same city, and of the same family, taking different parties, and persecuting each other with the greatest rancour and animosity<sup>1</sup> (I).

Italy involved in a civil war.

DURING these disturbances in Italy, Gregory went from Perugia to Affisi, and canonized St. Francis. He likewise wrote to the patriarch of Jerusalem, ordering him to proclaim the emperor excommunicated and perjured, and to prohibit the cruises from obeying him. At the same time he endeavoured, by means of his legate, to prevail with the queen-regent of France to declare war against the emperor<sup>2</sup>. But that prudent queen refused to violate the treaties with Frederic, but this year sent an army against the Albigenses, which taking possession of Toulouse, obliged the count to submit to the Roman church, to destroy the fortifications of Toulouse and of thirty other cities, and to pay a yearly salary to four professors of divinity, two of law, six of liberal arts, and two grammarians, who should reside in Toulouse<sup>3</sup>.

The Albigenses are entirely reduced.

<sup>1</sup> SIGONIUS, l. xvii. p. 37. Chron. de S. Germ. SANUT. Chron. GUIL. de Podio. Laurent.

<sup>2</sup> MATH. PARIS.

<sup>3</sup> SPOND. Annal.

(I) These two factions distinguished themselves by the names of Guelphs and Gibelines, the Guelphs denoting the party of the pope, and the Gibelines that of the emperor, which party distinction was first used during the pontificate of Innocent II. and being now revived, continued for a long while after to disturb the peace of Italy, the mutual hatred descending, for many generations, from father to son, and occasioning much bloodshed to both parties, long after they were ignorant of the cause of their animosity.

a THE following year the emperor, being informed that the army of the pope had repulsed Frederic con- his troops from the march of Ancona, and pursued them into the kingdom of Naples, he cludes a truce concluded a truce with the Saracens for ten years, and, after having crowned himself in Je- with the Sa- rusalem, returned in May, with a great many German croises, to Brindisi, and sent am- racens, and returns to Italy. A. D. 1229. bassadors to the pope, desiring a reconciliation<sup>m</sup>. But Gregory was so far from hearkening to terms of peace, that he sent nuncios into the different provinces of Christendom, asserting that the emperor had betrayed the cause of the Christians by concluding a truce with the Saracens; and representing the pressing necessities of the church, demanded their assistance against its oppressors. In England, Scotland, and Ireland, the tythe of all moveable effects was raised, not without great severity, for the use of the Roman see<sup>n</sup>. But the nuncios being unsuccessful in the other kingdoms of Europe, and the emperor having, in a few months, recovered Apulia and Campania, Gregory at length hearkened to an accommodation, and, in the month of November, sent the master of the Teutonic order, and a cardinal, with preliminary terms, to the emperor, at Aquino<sup>o</sup>. At the same time, by means of his legate Walo, he concluded a truce for eight years between Bologna and Mantua<sup>p</sup>.

MEAN while Romanus, his legate in France, held a council in Thoulouse, which confirmed the peace concluded the year before with count Raymond, and ordained sixteen very severe canons concerning the method of detecting and punishing heretics, of receiving their conversions and adjurations, and of punishing those who were negligent in discovering them; which canons served for the rules of the inquisition then established at Thoulouse<sup>q</sup>. At the same time the cardinal bishop of Sabino, legate in Spain, made a progress through that kingdom, and held a council in the dominions of each of the kings, and, in the kingdom of Aragon, dissolved the marriage of the king with Leonora, the aunt of the king of Castile, under pretence of consanguinity, but allowed of the legitimacy of their son Alphonfus, who was heir to the crown<sup>r</sup>.

THE bishop of Sabino, returning soon after to Italy, found the peace between the emperor and the pope in great forwardness; and, by the great application of the archbishop of Reggio, A peace con- cluded between him and the master of the Teutonic order, the articles being almost all agreed to, he went with cardinal Thomas of St. Sabina to Capua, to absolve the emperor; but Frederic objecting to pope. one of the articles of the treaty, their journey was without effect. However, Walo, who, A. D. 1230. the year before, had acted as legate in Lombardy, arriving at St. Germano, the emperor at length agreed to refer the disputed article to his determination; and the peace being concluded, Frederic came to Anagni, where, after kissing the pope's feet, he was absolved by him, and entertained by him for three days<sup>s</sup>. Soon after the conclusion of the peace, Gregory was invited to Rome by the senate; but, before he left Anagni, he wrote to the archbishops and bishops of Naples and Sicily, ordering them to correct the licentious manners of their clergy. He likewise published several severe edicts against the heretics of Germany and Lombardy, who were said to be exceeding numerous, to know one another by private signs, and to have a primate settled in Milan, who received from the other provinces a yearly revenue. In consequence of those edicts of the pope, many of the heretics were at this time convicted and burnt.

e THOUGH the peace was concluded between the emperor and pope, animosity and dissensions Great dissensions in Lom- bardy. 1231. still reigned in the cities of Lombardy, especially in those of the emperor's party, who expelled all those who favoured the pope, many of whom were received by the city of Bologna, and proscribed all the other faction, the fathers being engaged against the sons, and the sons against the fathers. Gregory, to remedy these disorders, sent cardinal Columna as his legate to Perugia; and a great sedition arising in Rome, headed by one Hanibal a senator, he went himself to Rieti, The pope is obliged to quit Rome. where he had a conference with the king of Jerusalem, and gave his consent to an alliance between the emperor of Constantinople and his daughter, and that, during the minority of the emperor, the king should be administrator of the empire.

f THE king departing, on board a Venetian fleet, for Constantinople, Gregory proceeded to Perugia, where, having in some measure quieted the disturbances, he conferred a large sum He reconciles the inhabitants of money upon the late sufferers, and proposed to continue with his court, for some time, in of Perugia. the city. Mean while, being informed that the pretor of Bologna had opposed the bishop in collecting the tythe of the corn, he ordered the city to be laid under an interdict; and hearing that the emperor had seized all the possessions of the knights Templars and Hospitallers in his kingdom for his own use, he wrote to him, desiring him to restore their possessions, as they were under the protection of the church. Having also received letters from the patriarch of Jerusalem, informing him that the king of Persia was approaching, with a formidable army, He intreats the emperor to send to take possession of Syria, he intreated Frederic to think of succouring the Holy Land, which emperor to send

<sup>m</sup> Chron. de S. Germ.<sup>n</sup> Chron. de Podio Laurentii.
Chron. de S. Germ.<sup>o</sup> MAT. PARIS.<sup>p</sup> MARIAN. Rer. Hispan. l. xii. c. 14.<sup>q</sup> Chron. de S. Germ.<sup>r</sup> SIGON. l. xvii. c. 38.<sup>s</sup> SIGON. l. xvii. p. 40.

succours to the Holy Land. was now his own. He likewise exhorted the kings of France and England to take arms <sup>a</sup> against the Infidels. But the English, instead of assuming the cross against the Saracens, formed an association against the Roman and Italian priests, of whose exactions and oppressions they had, for a long while, complained: the associators, pretending the authority of the king, attacked all those of the Italian nation, and plundered them of their effects; upon which the rioters were excommunicated by the bishops; and Gregory wrote to the king, ordering him, under pain of excommunication, to search out and punish the authors of the outrage <sup>1</sup>.

He reconciles the Romans with the inhabitants of Orvieto.
A. D. 1232.

THE seditious Romans at this time attacking Viterbo, and ravaging the territories of that city, Gregory sent the bishop of Ostia thither, with the cardinal of St. Sabina, by whose mediation a peace was concluded between the contending parties. He likewise wrote to his <sup>b</sup> legates, whom he had sent into Lombardy, to reconcile the associated towns with the emperor, desiring them to exhort the new pretor and council of Bologna to restore the possessions of their bishop; and, upon their refusing to comply with his demand, he wrote to the bishops of Spoletto, Parma, and Mantua, to excommunicate the city of Bologna, to publish the sentence in Lombardy, Romaniola, and Tuscany, and to order all the scholars to quit the city. Gregory, in the mean time, went to Spoletto, where he canonized St. Antony, a monk of the order of Minors, who had died a year before at Padua, and was become very famous by the miracles pretended to be done by him since his death. From Spoletto the pope returned soon after to Rieti, and hearing that the Romans, from their hatred to him, were marching with an army to plunder Campania, he sent immediately three cardinals to Rome, who made a <sup>c</sup> composition with the Romans, and, by paying a large sum of money, prevailed with them to to recall their army <sup>2</sup>.

He creates a bishop in Russia.

1233.

DURING these transactions in Italy, Gregory created Gerard, a monk of the Dominican order, as the first bishop of the Russians, and appointed several bishops and abbots as visitors of the monks, nuns, and regular and secular clergy, through Christendom, to reform their manners, and restore their discipline. At the same time he received a letter from Germanus, the patriarch of the Greek church, who, since the taking of Constantinople by the croises, had resided at Nice, in Bitbrynia. The patriarch acknowledged the supremacy of the Roman church, and offered his utmost endeavours to promote an union of the Greek and Latin churches. Gregory, in return, promised to send to him religious men, who should explain to him the <sup>d</sup> rites of the Roman church. Accordingly, the following year, he sent two friars of the order of Preachers, and two of the order of Minors, into Bitbrynia, with letters for the patriarch. He likewise sent some Franciscans with letters for the sultan of Damascus, exhorting him to embrace the Christian faith.

The Romans solicit his return to Rome.

He sends missionaries into Africa and Babylon.

MEAN while a great mortality prevailing in Rome, which almost swept off one half the inhabitants, the Romans sent a submissive embassy to the pope at Anagni, intreating him to return to the city. Gregory complied with their request; and, upon his return, dispatched other friars of the Franciscan order into Georgia, Babylon, and Africa, to preach the gospel to the Saracens in those parts. And ever since the peace concluded with the emperor, having laboured in vain by the cardinals to reconcile the associated cities of Lombardy to his authority, he now <sup>e</sup> employed the Franciscan and Dominican friars, who were at this time in high reputation, to prevail with the cities to cease their hostilities, and to submit their differences with the emperor to the arbitration of the holy see. Those friars were extraordinary successful in their preaching, particularly one friar John, who reconciled the city of Bologna with their bishop, and, upon account of his powerful preaching and appearance of sanctity, was greatly revered by the people, who chose him for the arbitrator of all their differences, and submitted, without reluctance, to his regulations for the reformation of manners. From Bologna the friar proceeded through the march of Ancona, from thence to Mantua, and then to Verona, every where recommending peace. The other friars, who were employed in the different parts of Lombardy, had likewise such influence with the people, that they assembled in great numbers, <sup>f</sup> making solemn processions in the cities and fields, with crosses and lighted tapers; so that this year was afterwards termed the year of general devotion <sup>3</sup>.

He excommunicates the Florentines.
1234.

GREGORY, in the mean time, excommunicated the Florentines, for having attacked the territories of Sienna, and gave a commission to the bishop of Vicenza and others to inquire into the truth of the complaints against the doge and senate of Venice, who were accused of having made several decrees against the privileges of the ecclesiastics. He likewise wrote to the king of Hungary, not to deprive the duke of Bosnia of his territories, on account of his having been a heretic, as he was now converted to the faith of the Roman church, by the preaching of the Dominicans <sup>4</sup>. Being informed also, that, by the conquests of the Teutonic order, the

<sup>1</sup> MAT. PARIS.

<sup>2</sup> Chron. de S. Germ.

<sup>3</sup> SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>4</sup> SPOND. Annales.

2 Christian religion was prevailing in Prussia, he erected the province of Pomerania into a bishopric. Soon after, having received a letter from the emperor, desiring his mediation with the cities of Lombardy, he wrote to the associated cities in his favour, and having a conference with him and the patriarchs of Constantinople, Antioch, and Jerusalem, a general expedition into Syria was resolved upon, and the chief command conferred upon Theodoric archbishop of Ravenna, by the joint authority of the pope and the emperor, Gregory appointing him his legate in the kingdom of Jerusalem, and employing the Franciscan and Dominican friars to preach up the crusade in the different kingdoms of Europe.

GREGORY, at the same time, being informed that the remains of the Albigenses had again taken arms to revenge themselves upon the inquisitors, who acted with great severity, wrote to the king of France, desiring him to march an army into the province of Thoulouse. He likewise ordered a crusade to be preached against the Stadingi, who resided in the confines of Bre-men, Saxony, and Friesland, and were infected with heresy (K). In consequence of the pope's bull, and grant of indulgences, a considerable army of croises, under the command of the duke of Brabant, the count of Flanders, and the archbishop of Bremen, marched against the heretics; and, after killing 9000 of them in an engagement, obliged the rest to submit to the see of Rome.

In the mean time the Romans, renewing their seditions, demanded of the pope that none of their citizens should be subject to excommunication, and that the Roman church should pay an annual tribute to the senate; but Gregory denying their request, they expelled him from the city, and destroyed some houses belonging to him. The pope again retired to Perugia; but being joined by some of the emperor's troops, he ruined several villas belonging to the Romans, who in return marched with a numerous army against Viterbo, a city in the pope's interest; but the pope's army, being strengthened by the Germans, forced them to an engagement, and obliged them to retire to the city with considerable loss. The peace among the Lombard cities was of as short a continuance as that in Rome; for instead of putting in execution the resolutions they had been inspired with by the preaching of the monks, their former diffensions were renewed with as much animosity as ever.

While Gregory resided at Perugia, he appointed several Dominican friars inquisitors of the faith in different kingdoms and provinces, and published an edict, regulating the manner of proceeding against the Cathari, Patarini, and Bulgari, or Bugari, who, according to Matthew Paris, were very numerous at this time in the neighbourhood of the Alps and in Flanders. He likewise ordered the council of Narbonne to give their advice to the inquisitors lately appointed in that province, who, in obedience to the mandate of the pope, drew up twenty-nine articles concerning the punishments to be inflicted upon the heretics or their favourers, and the marks by which they may be detected. Mean while the emperor, having gone into Germany to punish the rebellion of his son Henry king of the Romans, Gregory wrote to the princes of Germany, dissuading them from engaging in the revolt; and, after Frederic had quelled the rebellion, he granted him a dispensation to marry Isabella, the daughter of the king of England. At the same time taking those Germans that had been left in Italy into his pay, he obliged the seditious Romans to accept of an accommodation; however, he did not then return to the city, but went from Perugia to Spoletto, where he published a bull, exhorting a new expedition into the Holy Land.

Soon after Gregory received a letter from the emperor, complaining that the associated cities of Lombardy had offered assistance to his rebellious son, and had even promised to confer upon him the crown of Italy, which they had hitherto refused to himself; therefore he intreated his holiness, either to prevail with them to consent to a peace, or to assist him in reducing the authors of the revolt, and the protectors of the heretics. Gregory was greatly embarrassed with this letter, as the associated cities, who opposed the emperor, upon pretence of defending their liberties, had likewise espoused that party which stood up for the rights of the Roman church. That he might seem to act an impartial part, he wrote to the emperor, begging him not to attack the Lombards, in violation of the truce that had been granted to them to prepare

<sup>y</sup> SICON. l. xvii. p. 46. BLOND. Dec. ii. l. vii. Chron. de S. Germ. <sup>z</sup> SICON. ubi supra.

(K) John of Leyden gives us an account of the first rise of this heresy, and attributes it to the avarice of a priest, who, not content with the offering of a denier, given him at Easter by a lady of that province, to testify his contempt, instead of the wafer, put the same denier into her mouth, when she came to communicate. The lady, having her eyes shut from devotion, received the piece of money into her mouth, and was in great confusion when she found she could not chew it; attributing it to her own sins that made it impossible for her to swallow the wafer. However she kept it in her mouth till she went home, and discovering the insult, related it to her husband, who, in a rage, went and murdered the priest and prevailed with the whole province to renounce the authority of the Roman church (5).

(5) Chron. Belg. l. xxii. c. 14.

succours for the Holy Land; and that, if he would refer his differences with those cities to his arbitration, he would conclude an accommodation with the greatest impartiality. The emperor, willing to continue in good correspondence with the pope, agreed to his proposal, and sent the master of the Teutonic order as his deputy to the pope's legate then in Lombardy. But no deputies from the associated cities appearing, Frederic recalled the grand master, and soon after entered Italy with a formidable army, and commenced hostilities against the Lombards, by taking and burning Vicenza<sup>a</sup>.

The king of Tunis is seized by the Sicilians. A. D. 1237. GREGORY, in the mean time, being informed that the Sicilians had seized and imprisoned the king of Tunis, as he was sailing past their island to Italy, in order to be baptized, he wrote to the emperor and to the Sicilians, insisting upon the king's being set at liberty. About the same time he received a letter from Philip, a Dominican friar, and prior of the Holy Land, informing him that the patriarch of the Jacobites in Armenia, with many of his archbishops and bishops, having come to visit the sacred places of Jerusalem, had abjured their heresy, and promised obedience to the Roman church. But Matthew Paris informs us, that the motive of their proceeding was the fear of the Tartars, against whom they expected the assistance of the croises, and that, soon after, their country being freed from the incursions of those barbarians, they again renounced all obedience to the church of Rome<sup>b</sup>. Mean while the cities of Lombardy, finding that the emperor's troops were daily making new conquests, intreated the pope to act as mediator. Gregory accordingly sent a nuncio to the emperor, who was then in Germany, intreating him to order hostilities to cease in Lombardy, and to renew the privileges granted to the associated cities by his father and grandfather. This negotiation had no effect; for Frederic, in the beginning of autumn, entering Italy with a formidable army, and being joined by 10,000 Saracens from Apulia, attacked the army of the confederates, and gained a complete victory, killing 10,000 of the enemy, and taking a great many prisoners.

The emperor defeats the confederates in Lombardy.

Gregory returns to Rome.

DURING these transactions in Lombardy, the city of Rome was greatly harassed by the dissensions of the nobles and senators, some of whom favoured Gregory, and others the emperor; but the pope's party at length prevailing, he was received into the city with great rejoicing, and distributed an immense sum of money to the relief of the poor<sup>c</sup>. Before he returned to the city, Gregory sent cardinal Otho as his legate into England, who at York composed some differences between the kings of England and Scotland, and returning to London, held a national council in that city, where he had determined to proceed against those who held a plurality of benefices; but, as the incumbents were supported by their powerful relations, he thought proper to desist, for fear of raising a disturbance in the kingdom. After dismissing the council, he set out for Scotland; but he was prevented from entering that kingdom by a message from the king, informing him that no legate had ever entered Scotland, and that he intended to make no innovations; besides, if he should enter the kingdom, there were many men who could not even be restrained by the royal authority from attacking him. The legate desisted upon this message, and returning to London, the following year held a council of the abbots of the order of Benedictines.

1238. THE emperor, in the mean time, having reduced all the cities of Lombardy, except Milan, Bologna, Alexandria, and Brescia, the inhabitants of Milan, dreading the effects of his resentment, intreated the pope to mediate a peace between them and the emperor, offering to submit to him as their sovereign, and to send 10,000 men to the Holy Land, on condition that he would preserve their liberties, and make no alteration in the government of their city. Frederic insisting upon their surrendering at discretion, the treaty was broke off; and the pope, fearing the growing power of the emperor, who every day was turning more despotic, from this time attached himself to the interest of the associated cities; in consequence of which resolution, he sent legates to the king of Arragon, desiring him to enter into an alliance with the associated cities, offering him the annual tribute that was due to the emperor in Lombardy, and 150,000 imperial pounds for the expences of the present succours which they wanted. As the king of Arragon was then engaged in a successful war against the Moors, he only promised to send 2000 knights into Italy; but it appears from the Spanish historians, that he did not even fulfil this promise<sup>d</sup>.

He sides with the confederates.

GREGORY likewise, to strengthen the confederacy in Lombardy, concluded a peace between the republics of Genoa and Venice, the Venetian fleet immediately after sailing to Constantinople, and relieving that city from the siege of the Greeks. The emperor Baldwin having come to France to solicit assistance, the pope wrote to the bishops of France and England, desiring them to bestow upon him a part of their revenues; and as Baldwin proposed to march by land to Constantinople with an army of 60,000 men, which he had raised, Gregory granted him an indulgence, that, if he should be forced, in the countries through which he passed, to

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. SPOND. Annal.

<sup>b</sup> MATH. PARIS, hoc Ann.

<sup>c</sup> Vita Greg. apud MURATOR.

<sup>d</sup> ZURIT. in Indic. hoc an. MARIAN. de Reb. Hispan. lib. xii.

a swear any thing to the prejudice of the empire of Constantinople, his oath should not be binding<sup>c</sup>.

Soon after Gregory, being informed that the emperor had created his natural son Henry The emperor is king of Sardinia, in violation of the rights of the see of Rome to that island, and that he had likewise published an edict, subjecting ecclesiastics, guilty of capital crimes, to the judgment of temporal courts, he solemnly excommunicated him at Rome, and sent nuncios and legates to all bishops and Christian princes, ordering the sentence of excommunication to be published in their dominions. The emperor, who was then at Padua, appeared not at all uneasy at the news of his being excommunicated, but having immediately ordered his secretary to justify his conduct, in a discourse to those who were present, he wrote to all the Christian princes, clearing himself of the crimes of which he had been accused by the pope, and inveighing against that prelate as an unworthy pastor, whose ambition and avarice troubled the church. In answer to these letters of the emperor, Gregory published others, addressed to all the faithful, wherein he recapitulated the actions of the emperor from his infancy, and stiled him the Forerunner of Antichrist, and a heretic, as he alleged that the pope had no authority of binding and loosing. But the pope, not finding that assistance from foreign states that he expected, concluded an alliance with the confederate cities, and with the republics of Venice and Genoa, and sent Gregory de Monte Longo as his legate into Lombardy, a man of an active spirit, who, with the assistance of the archbishop of Milan, exerted himself vigorously to oppose the imperialists, and even compelled the clergy to insist<sup>f</sup>.

c THE pope's nuncios, not being able to raise any disturbance in Germany, Frederic was at leisure to prosecute the war in Italy; and being highly exasperated against the pope, observed no measures in his resentment. He ordered all the Dominicans and Franciscans, who were natives of Lombardy, to be expelled from Naples and Sicily, and assembling his army, he ravaged the march of Trevise and the Milanese; but, being defeated in an engagement with the troops of Milan, and hearing that the Venetians had taken possession of Ravenna, had defeated his fleet off Apulia, he left strong garrisons in the cities of Lombardy, and directed his march for Rome. Gregory was greatly terrified at the approach of the imperialists, but, to animate the Romans in his defence, he made a procession from the Lateran to the Vatican church, with the heads of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and, after a long discourse, taking the two skulls in his arms, he protested with tears that he could not defend those relics nor himself without the faithful assistance of the Romans. Observing the people moved by his harangue, he immediately published a crusade against the emperor, as an enemy of Christianity; and was so successful, that even those who had conspired against him, and were bribed by the emperor, took the cross with the greatest ardour; so that, when Frederic approached the city, he found himself opposed by a numerous army. The emperor, not having forces sufficient to venture an engagement, ravaged the country, and marched with his army towards Naples; but having taken some of the Roman crusaders prisoners, he put them to death by various tortures, impressing the figure of a cross upon their foreheads with a red-hot iron, and cutting the heads of others into four pieces, in form of a cross<sup>g</sup>.

e FREDERIC, upon his arrival in Apulia, being informed that the crusaders in Syria had lately met with some disadvantages, he sent letters to the princes of Europe, inveighing against the pope, who had prevented him from going to their assistance. Gregory, in the mean time, sent to the kings of England and France, desiring their assistance against the emperor, and offered the imperial crown to the brother of the king of France. The offer of the crown was rejected: however, the legates obtained a twentieth part of the ecclesiastical revenues in France, and the fifth of those in England<sup>h</sup>. But the kings, Henry and Lewis, advising his holiness to call a general council, as the best means to settle the disturbances of Italy, Gregory accordingly wrote letters to all the bishops in Christendom, appointing a general council to be held at Rome the following Easter. The emperor consented to the calling of a council, and concluded a truce with the pope till after the celebration of that assembly, but excepted the city of Milan and its allies. Mean while hostilities still continued betwixt the confederates and the emperor. During his absence in Apulia, they made themselves masters of Ferrara, after a siege of five months, which he being informed of, returned with his army towards Lombardy, and retook Ravenna, from whence he proceeded to the siege of Faenza, which continued several months; and observing that the letters, published by the pope for convoking a general council, made no mention of treating of peace, but only of the affairs of the church, he revoked the passports that he had given, and wrote to the Christian princes not to allow the bishops of their dominions to proceed to Rome.

<sup>c</sup> SPOND. Annal. Regest. Greg. Vita Greg. apud MURATOR.

<sup>f</sup> SIGON. l. xviii. p. 55. SPOND. Annal. MAT. PARIS. BLOND. Dec. ii. l. vii.

<sup>g</sup> SIGON. ubi sup.

DURING these disturbances in Italy, the pope's legate in France held several councils in that kingdom; but, if we believe Matthew Paris, the king, upon receiving the letter from the emperor against the general council, ordered all the money which the legate had raised to be detained till he should see the issue of the affair. At the same time the exactions of Otho, legate in England, occasioned great murmurs among the people; and a Carthusian monk was apprehended at Cambridge, and imprisoned in the tower of London, for affirming that the devil was let loose; that the pope was a heretic, and not the head of the church<sup>i</sup>. Notwithstanding the great murmurs in England, Richard earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, assembled a large fleet, and sailed this year with 40,000 crusards for the Holy Land.

MEAN while the bishop of Vacia in Hungary arriving at Rome, and imploring the assistance of the pope against the Tartars, who were ravaging Hungary with the greatest barbarity, Gregory wrote a consolatory letter to king Bela, who, having been expelled by the Tartars, was then skulking in the islands on the coast of Dalmatia; and he ordered a crusade to be preached against the Tartars, accusing the emperor of preventing him from furnishing other assistance. Notwithstanding the prohibition of the emperor, a great many bishops being now arrived at Genoa, in their way to Rome, they embarked on board the galleys of that republic, to perform the rest of their journey by sea, as there was no security in going by land, on account of the troops of the emperor. The Genoese galleys, on their voyage, meeting with those of Pisa, an engagement ensued, in which the Pisans were victors, having taken or sunk all those of the enemy, excepting five vessels which escaped. The legates and prelates, who were on board the galleys that were taken, were carried to Naples, and kept prisoners in separate castles in that kingdom. Gregory no sooner heard of their imprisonment, but he wrote to them, exhorting them to patience, in imitation of the primitive martyrs: at the same time he excited the Lombards and Venetians to a vigorous prosecution of the war. But being deeply affected with the captivity of the bishops, and hearing that cardinal Colonna had gone over to the party of the emperor, he was seized with a distemper which carried him off on the 21st of September, when he had lived, according to Matthew Paris, almost 100 years, his weak administration and unchristian resentment against the emperor having been the occasion of great desolation and calamities to Italy, the greatest part of the nobility of that kingdom having been cut off in the wars during his pontificate.

He orders a crusade for the protection of Hungary against the Tartars. A. D. 1241.

The emperor seizes the prelates on their voyage to Rome.

Death of Gregory.

Election of Celestine IV.

Death of Celestine.

1242.

AFTER the death of Gregory the Roman see continued vacant for 30 days, occasioned by the disputes among the cardinals, who were only ten in number. At length cardinal Geofry was elected, and took the name of Celestine IV. As he was born of a noble family in Milan, it was feared that he would prosecute the war with more vehemence than his predecessor; but immediately upon his election he sent an embassy to the emperor, proposing to treat of peace. However, he died on the 18th day of his pontificate, before an answer could return from Frederic, and was buried in the church of St. Peter<sup>k</sup>.

UPON Celestine's death, the cardinals not being able to agree about a successor, the Roman see continued vacant upwards of twenty months. In the mean time, the cardinals pretending that, during the vacancy, the apostolic authority resided in them, decided all causes in the usual manner; and we find from Matthew Paris, that, in some causes from England, they annulled a decree that had been surreptitiously obtained from Gregory. The following year the emperor continued with his army chiefly in the neighbourhood of Rome, and sent the master of the Teutonic order to the cardinals to negotiate a peace, but without effect; upon which hostilities recommenced, the imperialists ravaging the territories of Rieti, Parma, and Ascoli, while the Romans made an attempt upon the city of Tivoli. But while their army was engaged before that city, the emperor ravaged the territory of Rome, and obliged them to return. Proceeding afterwards with his army to Naples, he set the two cardinals, that had been taken on board the Genoese galleys, at liberty, and urged those who were at Rome no longer to delay the election of a pope, as he had been unjustly charged of being the occasion of the delay.

The emperor compels the cardinals to proceed to an election.

1243.

Innocent IV. is chosen.

HAVING, by repeated letters<sup>l</sup>, urged the cardinals to proceed to the election, without any effect, he assembled his army on the 1st of April, and marching towards Rome, began to pillage its territories; but the Romans declaring it was only the cardinals and prelates who occasioned the delay, he ordered his troops only to ravage the territories of the sacred college; and at last obtaining their promise to proceed immediately to the election, he withdrew his troops, and marched back into the kingdom of Naples. The cardinals soon after assembling at Anagni, unanimously elected cardinal Sinigald, a Genoese, who took the name of Innocent IV. and was consecrated in the same city upon the 28th of June<sup>m</sup>. The emperor, who was then at Melfi, when he heard of the election of Innocent, ordered Te Deum to be sung through all the kingdom of Naples, and immediately sent ambassadors to Anagni with offers of peace.

<sup>i</sup> MATH. PARIS.

VINEIS I. Epist. 14 & 17.

<sup>k</sup> PLATINA in Vit. Pont. Vit. Celestine apud MURATOR.

<sup>m</sup> Chron. S. Germ. Vit. Pont. Rom. apud MURATOR.

<sup>l</sup> PETR. DE

Innocent,

- a Innocent, in return, sent the archbishop of Rouen, the bishop of Modena, and the abbot of St. Facundus, as legates to the emperor, to treat of a reconciliation with the holy see, on condition that he set the captive prelates at liberty, and made satisfaction for the crimes for which he had been condemned by Gregory; the pope at the same time promising to stand to the arbitration of a general council, assembled in a place of security, as to the grievances which the emperor alleged he had received from the church. The emperor rejecting these preliminaries, the negotiation went no farther; upon which account several cities, that were disappointed in their expectations of peace, revolted from his party, and adhered to that of the church. During these dissensions betwixt the emperor and the pope, a great controversy arose among the Dominicans and Franciscans, about the priority and dignity of their respective orders, both of them being already distinguished by their pride and avarice, building for themselves magnificent houses, and hunting after pious legacies and last wills in their favour, for which they were not even ashamed to go to law<sup>a</sup>.

- FREDERIC, in the mean time, being greatly solicited by his friends, again sent an embassy to the pope, to treat of peace, and Raymond count of Thoulouse, who had lately come to Italy, together with Peter de Vineis and Thaddeus de Sueffa, swore, in his name, that he would stand to the judgment of the pope in all the articles relating to the church. But Innocent soon after proceeding to Castellano, and from thence to Sutri, and in vain urging the emperor to fulfil his oath, by restoring all the territories subject to the church, and setting the captive prelates at liberty, he resolved to retire from Italy, as Frederic was in possession of almost all the places in the neighbourhood of Rome. He accordingly sent for some Genoese galleys, and escaping privately from Sutri, he embarked at Civita Vecchia; from whence he failed to Genoa, where he was received with the greatest honours, the streets through which he passed being hung with tapestry and silk<sup>b</sup>. Upon his arrival at Genoa, being seized with a fever and dysentery, he continued three months in the monastery of St. Andrew near the city, and recovering his health in some measure, he proceeded by land to Lyons, where he arrived on the 2d of December. Negotiations for a peace between the pope and the emperor. A. D. 1244.

- Soon after his arrival at Lyons, he created twelve new cardinals, and granted them the privilege of wearing a red hat. He likewise sent the archbishop of Sabino as legate into Normandy, and Albert archbishop of Livonia and Prussia, as legate to the Russians, to persuade them to embrace the rites of the Latin church<sup>c</sup>. The emperor, in the mean time, publishing circular letters, accusing the pope of being the occasion of breaking off the negotiations, Innocent appointed a general council to be held at Lyons on the 24th of June, to which he solemnly invited all the christian princes, with the archbishops, bishops, and abbots, but contented himself with summoning the emperor by name, upon every occasion when he preached to the people. Mean while he sent a legate to Sbentapellus duke of Pomerania, exhorting him to submit to the church, he having been excommunicated for entering into an alliance with the Pagan Prussians against the Teutonic knights. Several Dominicans and Franciscans were, at this time, likewise sent to preach the gospel to the Tartars, who, after suffering many hardships among those barbarians, returned some years afterwards with letters for the pope<sup>d</sup>. Innocent quits Italy and goes for Lyons. 1245.

- THE time for the general council being at length arrived, there were found 140 archbishops and bishops, three patriarchs, besides a great many abbots and priors, and the proxies of the absent prelates. The emperor of Constantinople was likewise present, with the counts of Thoulouse and Provence, and the ambassadors from other christian princes. The emperor, who was then at Verona, where he had held an assembly of the states of Lombardy, sent Thaddeus de Sueffa, with several other nobles, as his ambassadors to the council, who, after declaring that the emperor was willing to give satisfaction for all grievances complained of, offered the kings of France and England as sureties for the performance of what he promised. The pope rejected the offer of the ambassadors, under pretence that Frederic would still break his word, which would oblige him to proceed against the sureties with ecclesiastical censures. Thaddeus, finding that his offers were rejected, demanded time to acquaint the emperor, that he might come himself to the council. Innocent at first refused to consent to that request, and declared, that, if the emperor appeared at the council, he would quit the city; but at the intercession of the French and English ambassadors, he granted a delay of two weeks. Frederic, who had then advanced to Turin, rejected the proposal of his ambassador, as derogatory to his dignity; upon which the pope pronounced a sentence of excommunication and deposition against him, notwithstanding the interposition of the English ambassador, who, to engage the attention of the council, accused the ministers of the court of Rome of great extortions in England, and complained of the excessive tribute that was exacted every year from that kingdom<sup>e</sup>. A general council at Lyons. The emperor is excommunicated and deposed.

<sup>a</sup> MATH. PARIS. Wadding. in Annal. Minor. an 1244.

l. xviii. p. 92. MATH. PARIS.

<sup>b</sup> VITA Innocent. ubi supra.

<sup>c</sup> Vita Innocent apud MURATOR. SIGON.

<sup>d</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>e</sup> MATH. PARIS.

The pope exhorts the princes of Germany to a new election ;

THE council held only three sessions, in which some decrees were made for the recovery of <sup>a</sup> the Holy Land, and for the extirpation of heresy ; and it concluded with a solemn denouncing of the sentence of excommunication and deposition against the emperor, his ambassador Thaddeus at the same time appealing to a future general council. Upon dismissing the council, the pope sent the bishop of Ferrara to the princes of Germany, and particularly to the electors, exhorting them to elect another emperor, in obedience to which mandate, several princes assembled the following year at Wurtzburg, and elected Henry landgrave of Thuringia.

THE emperor in the mean time, being highly exasperated against the pope, wrote to the kings of England and France in his own justification, and offered to submit his cause to the arbitration of St. Lewis, and the peers of his kingdom. Lewis accordingly had a conference with the pope for several days at Cluny, but could not prevail with him to remit any thing of his rigour. Innocent mean while, having received a petition from the nobles and bishops of Portugal, complaining of the inactivity of their king, and desiring that he might be deposed, he appointed Alphonfus the king's brother to govern the kingdom, on condition that the royal dignity should be preserved to Sancho during his life, and conferred upon his children if he ever should have any. <sup>b</sup> and orders a crusade to be preached against Frederic.

A. D. 1246.

BUT being chiefly intent upon opposing the emperor, he ordered a crusade to be preached against him, and sent persons into Sicily to promote a rebellion in that kingdom. Hearing likewise of the election of the landgrave of Thuringia, he sent him 15000 merks of silver, to assist him in opposing Conrad. In consequence of these proceedings of the pope, the faction of the Guelphs began to turn very powerful in Italy, and several of the Italian nobles entered into a conspiracy to assassinate the emperor ; but the plot being discovered, the conspirators, and their relations to the fourth and fifth degree of consanguinity, were put to death <sup>c</sup>. Frederic was at great pains to publish the conspiracy, imputing it to the pope, who had ordered a crusade to be preached against him as an infidel and heretic. In return, he likewise hired several assassins to murder Innocent, but though they attempted it at different times, they were all apprehended and executed <sup>d</sup>. Mean while, the war continuing in Italy, that kingdom, and especially Lombardy, became a scene of misery and desolation. Agriculture was almost wholly interrupted, the olive trees and vineyards were destroyed ; troops of banditti and robbers infested the whole country ; and even the foxes and wolves entered the cities, and seized upon children ; neighbours became mutually suspicious of each other, and lived in continual expectation of being made prisoners or massacred <sup>e</sup>.

The war occasions great calamities in Italy.

Innocent writes to the soltan of Babylon in favour of the Christians.

THESE miseries had no influence with the pope, to incline him to an accommodation with the emperor. He still continued at Lyons, from whence he wrote to the soltan of Babylon, desiring him to conclude a peace, or at least a truce, with the Christians of Syria. That soltan having a dissension with the soltan of Damascus, wrote to his holiness, testifying his desire of peace, but at the same time declared, he would not treat without the assent of the emperor. Innocent, at this time, likewise wrote to the kings in Mauritania, in behalf of the Christians of Africa, and sent Lupus as bishop into that province, granting him an indulgence of not visiting Rome for ten years, as the Moorish princes made a difficulty of allowing any person to quit their dominions. At the same time being informed that the king of Aragon had ordered the bishop of Girona's tongue to be cut out, on suspicion that he had discovered a clandestine marriage, which the king then wanted to disown, Innocent excommunicated the king, and laid his kingdom under an interdict, and, upon his acknowledging his fault, and offering satisfaction, he sent two legates into Spain, who held a council of the nobles and bishops at Lerida, in presence of which they reprehended the king, and, upon his falling down upon his knees, and protesting his abhorrence of the crime, absolved him from the sentence of excommunication <sup>e</sup>.

Excommuni-
cates the king of Arragon.

Frederic in-treats the mediation of the king of France.
1247.

MEAN while the emperor endeavoured, by means of the king of France, to conclude a peace with the pope ; and hearing of the death of his competitor, the landgrave of Thuringia, in Germany, he advanced to Turin, with the design of proceeding to Lyons, to have a conference with the pope, but, according to some authors, to seize upon his person. Innocent rejected the mediation of St. Lewis, and sent several legates to desire the assistance of the christian princes against the emperor. At the same time he sent Peter Capaebio as his legate into Germany, by whose means several of the princes assembled at Nuitz, and elected William count of Holland, to whom the pope immediately sent a present of 30,000 merks of silver. About the same time he sent cardinal William, bishop of Sabino, as his legate into Norway, who anointed and crowned Haquinus, or Aquinus, king ; and, upon his making a vow of an expedition into the Holy Land, granted him the 20th part of the ecclesiastical revenues in his kingdom for three years. Cardinal Ostavianus was likewise sent into Lombardy with a con- <sup>f</sup>

Innocent
sends a legate
into Norway.

* COLLENUTIUS Hist. Neap. l. iv.
de reb. Hisp. l. xiii. c. 6.

† MATH. PARIS.

‡ SIGON. l. xviii. p. 65.

§ MARIAN.

a fiderable body of troops, and a large fum of money; but Amadeus, count of Savoy, opposing him in his passing the Alps, his forces were obliged to disperse, and he only with a few attendants arrived in Italy. Innocent also appointed friar Laurence, of the order of Franciscans, as his legate in the east, to the Iconians, Armenians, and Babylonians, to all the Greeks, as well in Greece as in the patriarchates of Antioch and Jerusalem, and to the Jacobites, Maronites, and Nestorians.

Soon after he received the news of a great victory, which the garrison of Parma had gained over the emperor, by surprizing and storming his camp, in which was found an imperial crown, and the emperor's most valuable jewels, besides an immense treasure in money. A. D. 1248;

b This victory was very fatal to the affairs of Frederic, who, though he assembled his scattered troops, and made a shew of renewing the siege of Parma, yet was obliged to desist from that enterprize, and retired into Apulia, to secure the fidelity of his hereditary kingdoms. The affairs of the emperor are ruined in Lombardy. Mean while, his natural son, Hentz king of Sardinia, was taken prisoner by the troops of Bologna; and Conrad king of the Romans, not having been able to relieve Aix-la-Chapelle, that city surrendered after a siege of six months, to his competitor William count of Holland, where he was crowned by the pope's legate, or, according to some authors, by the archbishop of Cologne; while Conrad, affording his protection to a certain sect of heretics in Suabia, upon that account lost the favour of a great many nobles of Germany. These heretics were called Circumcelliones, and asserted that the pope was a heretic; that all the prelates and bishops were heretics, and guilty of simony; and that neither they, nor any other priests, being guilty of mortal sins, had authority to bind or loose, or even to consecrate; and that they ought not to pray for the pope, but for Frederic and Conrad.*

In the mean time, St. Lewis, king of France, having prepared every thing for his expedition into the Holy Land, arrived at Lyons with a numerous retinue of nobles and bishops, and having had a conference with Innocent, and received the pontifical benediction, he sailed down the Rhone, and joined his fleet, which was already at sea. Innocent sent cardinal Otho bishop of Tusculum, and Andrew a Franciscan, as his legates, with the king of France; and hearing that friar Laurence, who had been sent legate into Greece, was received honourably by the emperor and patriarch, the following year he sent John of Parma, the general of the Franciscans, with letters to the emperor and the patriarch, to intreat them to consent to an union of the Greek and Latin churches. The king of France fails for the Holy Land. 1249.

d Frederic, with letters to the emperor and the patriarch, to intreat them to consent to an union of the Greek and Latin churches. And the year after, being informed that the army of the king of France had been entirely defeated, and himself with many of his nobles taken prisoners by the Saracens in Egypt, he wrote a consolatory letter to him, exhorting him to fortitude in his adversity. At the same time he also wrote to the archbishops and bishops of France, desiring them to put up public prayers for the delivery of their king, and to exhort the people to take the cross for the assistance of the Holy Land. Lewis having concluded a truce for ten years with the sultan, was set at liberty upon certain conditions. Mean while the emperor Frederic having reinforced his army, was preparing to march into Lombardy to attack Bologna, and procure the liberty of his natural son Hentz; but falling sick in Apulia, he died on the 13th of December, and was buried at Montreale in Sicily, by his natural son Manfred, who was suspected of having hastened his death by violent means†. A legate sent into Greece. 1250.

e Innocent, upon hearing of the death of Frederic, immediately excommunicated Conrad and all his adherents, and again confirming the empire to William count of Holland, he sent cardinal Hugh, of the title of St. Sabino, as his legate into Germany, to support the interest of the count. He likewise sent the bishops of Ostia and Albano as his legates into Apulia, to bring the Neapolitans and Sicilians to submit to the see of Rome, and to prohibit them from giving their allegiance to any other. Innocent exerts himself in favour of count William, 1251. Being resolved also quickly to return to Italy, he granted several privileges to the city of Lyons, and desired an interview with William count of Holland; who, at his request, came from Germany, and continued with him several days; receiving a promise of the imperial crown upon his arrival at Rome. Before he left Lyons, Innocent granted to those who used the Sclavonic language a privilege of celebrating divine service in their native tongue‡; and having celebrated his Easter in that city, he proceeded by land to Genoa, where he received ambassadors from all the associated cities, and from some cities in the late emperor's interest. Having continued fifteen days at Genoa, he went to Milan, where he resided three months, and proceeded afterwards through Brescia, Mantua, Ferrara, and Bologna, to Perugia, where he fixed his court, refusing to go to Rome, as the Romans would not consent to abrogate the extraordinary authority committed to the two annual senators. and returns to Italy.

* KRANTZ 3. Metrop. 18. &amp; 8. Saxon. 16.

† SIGON. l. xviii. p. 76. SPOND. ANNAL.

‡ SPOND. ANNAL.

MEAN while Conrad, being informed of the death of his father, assembled a strong army <sup>a</sup> and marched into Italy to take possession of his hereditary dominions. Upon his arriving at Mantua, he held an assembly of the deputies of the cities in his interest, and afterwards embarking on board some Venetian ships went by sea into Apulia, and immediately joined his brother Manfred, who was besieging Naples, which, with Capua and Aquino, had put themselves under the protection of the church of Rome.

He offers the kingdom of Naples to Charles duke of Anjou.
A. D. 1252.

INNOCENT, the better to oppose the pretensions of Conrad to Naples and Sicily, offered these kingdoms to Richard, the brother of the king of England<sup>2</sup>; but he refusing to accept of them, he sent Albert, notary of the apostolic see, with the same offer to Charles count of Anjou and Provence, and brother of the king of France, who at that time was prevented by his relations from giving his consent. He likewise ordered all the crusards speedily to depart <sup>b</sup> for the Holy Land, under the pain of excommunication, and wrote to the king of England, exhorting him to go to the assistance of St. Lewis and the Christians in Syria. That prince, moved by the pope's letters, took the vow of the cross, but appointed the time for the expedition at the distance of three years. Mean while cardinal Octavian, the legate in Lombardy, at the command of the pope, assembled a council of the deputies of the confederate cities in Brescia, where they all renewed their alliance, and agreed to maintain a body of 600 horse, to be stationed on both sides of the Po, one half of them to be maintained by the church, and the other by the confederates.

Proceedings against the heretics.

Soon after, Innocent being informed that the heretics were very numerous in Milan, and through all Lombardy, he gave a commission to Peter of Verona, a Dominican friar, to make <sup>c</sup> an enquiry after the heretics, and convict them. Peter executed his commission with great rigour, and put several of the heretics to death, which so irritated the rest of the sect, that they murdered him and his companion Dominic as they were coming to Milan from Como. The Milanese, to free themselves from all suspicion of being concerned in the murder, brought the dead bodies into their city, and buried them with great respect: they likewise punished the murderers and their associates with great severity, which occasioned new dissensions in their city betwixt the nobles and the people. Friar Peter having been reckoned a martyr, his tomb was greatly frequented, and quickly became famous for miracles, on which account Innocent, the following year, at the request of the archbishops and nobles of Milan, numbered him among the saints.

1253.
The Romans invite the pope to return to Rome.

THE Romans in the mean time had sent for Brancaleo Andalus from Bologna, to whom, upon account of his reputation for justice, they had trusted the sovereign authority of their city for three years, and had sent thirty hostages to Bologna as a security for their obedience. Being soon disgusted with his severity, they sent an embassy to the pope at Perugia, desiring him to return to the city, and threatening to attack the Perugians if they detained him. Innocent, to protect the Perugians from their resentment, went to Affisi; but the Romans renewing their embassy, and threatening to attack the Affisians, Innocent at last returned with his court to Rome, where he was received by Brancaleo and the nobles with the greatest honours <sup>d</sup>. Before he set out for Rome, Innocent ordered the kings of Portugal and Castile to desist from arms, and to refer their dispute about the kingdom of Algarve to the arbitration of the apostolic see <sup>e</sup>. He likewise granted privilege to the provincial of the Dominicans in Poland of appointing the brothers of that order, for the conversion of the Russians, Bulgarians, Greeks, Saracens, Ethiopians, and Indians.

Conrad proposes a peace,

but is excommunicated, and dies in Apulia.
1254.

Soon after his arrival at Rome, Innocent received an embassy from Conrad, now in possession of Naples, with an offer of an accommodation with the church, but in reality to bribe Brancaleo and the Romans to join his party against the pope. Innocent rejected the offer of the ambassadors, and, a few weeks after, in presence of some Greek archbishops and bishops, who had lately come to Rome, he excommunicated Conrad and Ezzelino, who had been one of the chief commanders of the late emperor in Lombardy <sup>d</sup>. Conrad survived his sentence but a few months, and died on the 21st of May, leaving an infant son named Conradin, whom <sup>f</sup> he committed to the guardianship of Berthold de Honebruch, and some Bavarian nobles, recommending them to put the young prince under the protection of the apostolic see. Innocent, who was then at Affisi, hearing of the death of Conrad, immediately repaired to Rome, and ordering Manfred to desist from his pretensions to Apulia and Sicily, he sent a considerable army towards Apulia, to take possession of the kingdom of Naples for the see of Rome. Manfred refusing obedience to the order of the pope, Innocent excommunicated him, and soon after advanced himself towards Naples, where he was received with great honour by the nobles of the kingdom, and even by Manfred, who pretended to be reconciled to the church. This reconciliation was of very short continuance; for some of his attendants killing an Apulian baron, a favourite of the pope, and Manfred's protestations of his ignorance of the mur-

<sup>a</sup> MATH. PARIS, Anno 1252. Vita Innocent apud MURATOR. t. iii. Annal.

<sup>d</sup> Vita Innocent apud MURATOR.

<sup>b</sup> Ibidem ibid.

<sup>c</sup> SPOND.

a der not being credited, he fled to Lucera, where he was joyfully received by the Saracens, and being assisted by them, defeated the army of the pope<sup>c</sup>. Innocent was then sick at Naples, and the news of the defeat increasing his distemper, he died soon after in the beginning of December. Innocent dies at Naples, and is succeeded by Alexander IV.

IMMEDIATELY upon the death of Innocent, the pretor of Naples shut the gates of the city, and obliged the cardinals to proceed to the election of his successor. They accordingly assembled, and, after thirteen days, elected the bishop of Ostia, who took the name of Alexander IV. The first concern of Alexander was to oppose the progress of Manfred, who, in consequence of the late victory he had obtained, was now very powerful. He likewise published some decrees of his predecessor Innocent, against the heretics of Lombardy; and St. Lewis being now returned from the Holy Land, he granted a bull in his favour, that no legate, or any person whatever, should have authority to excommunicate him or his queen, or their successors, or to lay his kingdom under an interdict, without especial mandate from the apostolic see. He granted the same privilege to the king of Bohemia; and, at the same time, wrote to the university of Paris in favour of the Dominicans and Franciscans, who had been expelled the university for pretending an exemption from its statutes, upon account of their order. A. D. 1255. who opposes Manfred.

MEAN while hostilities still continued with great animosity betwixt the Guelphs and Gibelines in Lombardy; and Manfred having reinforced his army with some Saracens from Africa, had defeated Ottavian, the pope's general, and obliged him to conclude a treaty of peace, by which Naples and Sicily were left to Manfred, and Campania ceded to the Roman see. Alexander refused to ratify this treaty; and claiming the disposal of the kingdom of Sicily, he sent a legate into England with a grant of it, confirmed by a golden bull, in favour of Edmund the second son of Henry III. The legate, upon his arrival, gave the ring of investiture to Edmund, in a full assembly of the states, published a crusade against Manfred with the usual indulgences, and absolved the king from his vow of a crusade into Syria, on condition of his undertaking an expedition against Manfred. The king bound himself, for his son, to pay yearly 2000 ounces of gold to the Roman see, and to leave the disposal of all the benefices in Sicily to the pope. He promised likewise, under the pain of ecclesiastical censures, to conduct an army himself into Sicily, against the month of October, in the following year<sup>d</sup>. Manfred defeats the army of the pope; who gives the investiture of Naples to the king of England's son, and

DURING these transactions in England, Alexander excommunicated the inhabitants of Turin and Asti, who had surprized and imprisoned their sovereign, Thomas count of Savoy; and being intreated by the marquis of Este, and the nobles of the march of Ancona, to oppose the cruelties of Ezzelino, he denounced a sentence of excommunication against him, and sent Philip, archbishop of Ravenna, as his legate into Lombardy, who, by preaching a crusade against him in the cities of Bologna, Ferrara, and Venice, assembled a formidable army, and, after a siege of a few days, took possession of Padua<sup>e</sup>. Alexander likewise sent the bishop of Orvieto as his legate to Constantinople, to treat of an union of the Greek and Latin churches, offering to the Greeks to assemble a general council to facilitate the union. About the same time, receiving an embassy from the sultan of Persia, who professed his desire to become a Christian, the pope wrote to that prince, and sent him a short abstract of the Christian faith, promising likewise to send learned and religious men into his kingdom, by whom he would be fully instructed in the doctrines of that religion<sup>f</sup>. excommunicates the inhabitants of Turin and Asti.

MEAN while great disturbances happened at Rome, concerning the senator Brancaleo; who, upon account of his punishing criminals, without respect or favour, had become odious to both the nobles and the people; and a conspiracy being formed against him, he was unexpectedly seized and thrown in prison. His wife escaping to Bologna, prevailed with that city to set a guard upon the Roman hostages, while the Romans, intent upon punishing Brancaleo, influenced the pope to intercede with the Bolognese for the liberty of their hostages. His intercession having no effect, Alexander threatened to lay the city of Bologna under an interdict; however, he could not prevail with them to abandon the interest of their citizen<sup>g</sup>. The Romans revolt against the senator Brancaleo.

While these things were doing in Rome, Germany was a scene of anarchy and disorder (L). William count of Holland, having been killed in the beginning of the year in an expedition Great confusions in Germany.

<sup>c</sup> BARTH. de Neocastro. Hist. Sicul.

<sup>f</sup> MATH. PARIS. hoc Anno.

<sup>g</sup> SIGON. l. xix. p. 86.

<sup>d</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>e</sup> SIGON. ubi supra, MATH. PARIS.

(L) This year a dispute arose betwixt the Genoese and Venetians, at Ptolemais or Acon, which completed the ruin of the Christian affairs in Syria. The Genoese authors (1) relate, that the dispute was first occasioned by a private quarrel betwixt a Genoese and a Venetian; but according to Sanutus, Ricordanus, and others (2), the inhabitants of those two republics at Acon first quarrelled about the propriety of a monastery and church, which

(1) Nebiens. l. iii. Foliet. l. iv.

(2) Sanut. l. iii. part ii. c. 5. Ricord. c. 159.

many by the death of the count of Holland.

A. D. 1257.
Two competitors for the empire.

expedition against the Frieslanders, the nobles divided into separate factions, and neglected to choose a successor to the empire. Some of them proposed to elect Conradin, then an infant; but Alexander opposed the promotion of the grandson of Frederic II. with great earnestness; and from Anagni wrote to the archbishop of Mentz, the chief elector, ordering him, under pain of excommunication, to acquaint all the electors with his apostolical prohibition, and ordaining, that if any thing should be attempted contrary thereto, in favour of Conradin, that the election should be reckoned void, and the electors excommunicated<sup>k</sup>.

CONRADIN being thus excluded, the factions nevertheless continued in the empire; and Richard duke of Cornwall, brother of the king of England, professing himself a candidate, was elected at Frankfort, about the middle of January, by the archbishops of Mentz and Cologne, and other two electors. But the other faction, headed by the archbishop of Triers, assembled soon after in the same city, and conferred the imperial dignity on Alphonso, king of Castile. Each of the competitors immediately sent ambassadors to Rome, soliciting the confirmation of the pope: Alphonso likewise wrote to the city of Padua and other cities of Lombardy, desiring them to appoint deputies to wait upon him, at his arrival in Italy.

BUT those letters were supposed to have been forged by Ezzelino, who, hearing of the loss of Padua, had returned to Verona from the siege of Mantua; and having endeavoured in vain to recover Padua, declared himself the head of the Gibeline faction in Lombardy, and acted as lieutenant for the emperor, though at that time Italy acknowledged none<sup>l</sup>. Notwithstanding the repeated solicitations of the ambassadors of the two competitors, Alexander, under pretence of deliberating, deferred giving sentence in favour of either of them. But he was soon freed from this embarrassment, for the money of Richard failing him, his party deserted him, and he returned the following year to England, after he had in vain lavished away 700,000 pounds sterling<sup>m</sup>.

THE pope at the same time published an edict, ordaining the archbishops, bishops, and abbots of every church, to visit the apostolic see at certain times<sup>n</sup>. He likewise, at the solicitation of the chapter of Salzburg, deposed Philip their archbishop, because, though he had been elected ten years, he had neglected to take orders, and had misapplied the revenues of his church. One Ulric was substituted in his stead; but Philip being assisted by the troops of the king of Bohemia and the duke of Austria, refused obedience to the order of the pope: however, a sentence of excommunication being denounced against him, and Ulric being assisted by the Hungarians and Bavarians, Philip was at last obliged to submit<sup>o</sup>.

SOON after Alexander, upon account of the great disturbances in Rome, was obliged to quit that city, and retire to Viterbo. These disturbances were owing to a sedition of the people, who, being oppressed by the new senator, brought Brancaleo out of prison, and conferred upon him the supreme authority. Brancaleo immediately expelled the chiefs of the other faction out of the city, and ordered two of the nobles to be hanged, without any regard to the pope, who had excommunicated him and his followers. After the departure of the pope, having entered into a treaty with Manfred, who had now taken the title of king, he destroyed 140 castles of the nobles of Rome, and imprisoned many of those who favoured the church; but falling sick while he was besieging Corneto, he was carried to Rome, where he died. The Romans, as a testimony of their regard for him, put his head in a golden vase, which they placed on the top of a marble pillar, and immediately elected his uncle Catellanus, as his successor, notwithstanding the prohibition of the pope<sup>p</sup>.

MEAN while Ezzelino, having surprized the army of the Guelphs, commanded by the legate Philip, had gained a signal victory, and taken the legate himself prisoner, with many other persons of distinction. Immediately after, taking possession of the city of Brescia, he exercised all manner of cruelties against those of the opposite faction. The fate of Brescia alarming the cities of Padua, Ferrara, and Mantua, they sent to the pope, intreating him to appoint another legate, to protect them against the Gibelines. Alexander, who was then at

<sup>k</sup> SPOND. Annal. PARIS.

<sup>l</sup> SIGON. ubi supra. AVENTIN. l. vii. p. 561.

<sup>m</sup> RYMER. t. i. vel Edit. p. 762.

<sup>n</sup> MATH.

<sup>o</sup> SIGON. l. xix. p. 90. MATH. PARIS.

they had long possessed in common, but which the Venetians now claimed as their sole property. The dispute being laid before the pope, he determined that the monastery and church should still remain common: but the Genoese having no regard to that decision, fortified the church, and, by the assistance of the prefect of the city, expelled the Venetians. The news of this outrage being brought to Europe, the two republics, instead of prudently accommodating the difference, immediately sent fleets into Syria, to support each their own citizens, and the two fleets engaging off Ptolemais, the Venetians, by the assistance of the Pisans, gained a complete victory over the Genoese, and expelled them and the prefect from the city. Notwithstanding the intercession of Alexander, another engagement was fought two years afterwards off the same place; and the Genoese being entirely expelled from that city, were obliged to reside at Tyre. The pope having then obliged the two republics to a cessation of arms, hostilities ceased for some years; but the mutual rivalry and animosity still remaining, the war was soon after renewed, and continued, with several interruptions, for some ages, till the decay of the Genoese republic rendered them unable to cope with the power of the Venetians.

Viterbo,

a Viterbo, at their request sent another legate to command the army; and as the Dominicans and Franciscans distinguished themselves in opposing heresies, he published a bull in their favour, granting them a great many particular privileges. About the same time he sent Arlot, or Herlot, notary of the Roman church, as his nuncio to England, to solicit the succours which the king had promised for Sicily. That prince made a demand of money from his parliament for this purpose, but both at London and Oxford he met with a denial. Alexander in the mean time going to Anagni, wrote from thence to all the metropolitans in Christendom, urging them to a reformation of ecclesiastical discipline, and severely condemning those priests who lived with concubines, he prohibited any one from being present when they celebrated mass<sup>a</sup>.

The king of England is desired to take possession of Sicily.
A. D. 1257.

b WHILE he continued at Anagni, the nobles of Rome, in opposition to the people, chose themselves two senators, and assembling a body of men, besieged the uncle of Brancaleo in a certain castle in the city. The animosity likewise still continuing between the factions in Lombardy, and the nobles of Milan being at variance with the people, Ezzelino, in hopes of making himself master of that city, marched thither with his army, having been secretly invited by the leader of the nobles. But the marquis of Este, with the troops of Ferrara, Padua, Mantua, and Milan, intercepting him betwixt the Ollio and Addua, forced him to an engagement, in which he was defeated and taken prisoner; and, being wounded in the ankle, he died a few days after, in the 65th year of his age, having, for more than thirty years, harrassed, not only the march of Treviso, but all Lombardy, by his tyranny and cruelties<sup>c</sup>.

c Mean while Alexander deposed the bishop of Ratisbon for assisting the king of Bohemia in his incursions in Germany, and in the following year appointed the famous Albertus Magnus as his successor<sup>d</sup>. Being informed likewise that the Tartars had over-run Armenia, Antioch, Tripoli, and Damascus, and were threatening Acon, and the cities subject to the Christians in Syria, he ordered councils to be held in the several provinces of Europe, for the assistance of the Christians in Asia against those barbarians.

Albertus Magnus created bishop of Ratisbon.
1260.

Soon after the despot of Peloponese having arrived in Italy, to solicit succours for the emperor of Constantinople, endeavoured to conclude a peace betwixt the pope and Manfred, who was now in possession of Apulia and Sicily. As the king of England had neglected the affairs of Sicily, and had even made a formal renunciation at Rome of his son's right to that kingdom, Alexander willingly hearkened to proposals of peace, and offered to be reconciled to Manfred, on condition that he restored the earls to their possessions, and banished the Saracens. These conditions were rejected by that prince, who not only declared that he would protect the Saracens, but likewise sent for others from Africa. What encouraged him to reject the terms of peace, was, the success of his party in Lombardy; for the marquis Pallavicini, who had always been attached to the interests of the emperor Frederic, having, since the death of Ezzelino, been declared the general of the Gibelines, had assembled a formidable army, with which he soon after gained a signal victory over the troops of Bologna and Florence, which last city he made himself master of, and obliged the inhabitants to take the oath of allegiance to Manfred<sup>e</sup>.

A peace proposed with Manfred, but without effect.

e ALEXANDER in the mean time still residing at Anagni, at the solicitation of the Romans, laid the city and university of Bologna under an interdict (M). He likewise granted a dispensation to legitimate Nicolas, the natural son of Othogar king of Bohemia; and sent Bernard, a writer of the apostolic see, as his nuncio into that kingdom, to satisfy the nobles that he had no intention, by his dispensation to Nicolas, to favour his succession to the throne<sup>f</sup>. Being intent also upon reconciling the Genoese and Venetians, he appointed a council to be held at Viterbo, and went from Anagni to that city, but died before the opening of the council, on the 24th of May. He is celebrated for his learning and love of peace, for 1261.

Alexander dies at Viterbo.

<sup>a</sup> STERON. Annal. AVENTIN. ubi supra.
supra.

<sup>c</sup> RICORDAN. c. 163, & seq. SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>e</sup> SIGON. l. xix. p. 93 & 94.

<sup>f</sup> AVENTIN. ubi

<sup>u</sup> SPOND. Annal.

(M) About this time the sect of Flagellants began to appear in Italy; they were at first looked upon as mad enthusiasts, but a few years afterwards they were treated as heretics, on account of some doctrines which they professed. One Rainerius, a hermit of Perugia, was the first promoter of that sect. In his discourses to the people he warned them, in the name of God, to have recourse to penance, to avert the plague which would otherwise soon cut them off. His exhortations being looked upon as oracles, his hearers, both men and women of every age and condition, immediately stripped themselves naked to the waist, and went in procession through the streets, scourging themselves severely, and calling upon the Virgin Mary to intercede with her son to grant them mercy. They then went into the neighbouring cities, where they quickly made a great many proselytes, and, in a short time, there was scarcely a city of Italy where there were not a great many of these Devotees, as they were then called. Many authors make mention of them, some commending them, others blaming them. The monk of Padua inveighs against Manfred and the marquis Pallavicini for prohibiting any one to follow them, under pain of capital punishment (3).

(3) Sigon. l. xix. p. 66. Steron in Annal. hoc Ann. Paduan l. ii. Chron.

the sake of which he is said to have abstained from any promotion of cardinals during his pontificate<sup>w</sup>.

The patriarch of Jerusalem is elected, and takes the name of Urban IV.

AT the death of Alexander, the college of cardinals was reduced to nine persons, one of whom was absent in his native country of Hungary. The other eight, instead of immediately proceeding to any election, divided into several factions, and none of them consenting to yield to another, they at last, after a vacancy of three months and three days, chose Peter Pantaleo, patriarch of Jerusalem, who assumed the name of Urban IV. Peter was born at Troyes in France, of very poor parents; but being distinguished by his learning and abilities, he had passed through all the ecclesiastical degrees, and being now at Rome about the affairs of his patriarchate, was thought worthy by the contending cardinals of the pontificate. A few months after his promotion, he created the bishop of Agen in Guienne his successor in the patriarchate, and likewise made a promotion of eight cardinals, to whom he soon after added six others.

He offers the crown of Sicily to one of the princes of France.
A. D. 1262.

BUT being chiefly intent upon opposing the power of Manfred, he sent a legate into France, with an offer of the crown of Sicily to any of the younger sons of St. Lewis, whom the father should chuse. In the mean time he ordered a crusade to be preached against Manfred, in consequence of which he quickly assembled a considerable army of Guelphs; and the legate in France, having published the crusade in that kingdom, a great many persons took the cross, and entering Italy in a body, defeated the troops of Pallavicini, who endeavoured to oppose them, and joined the pope at Viterbo. Having received his benediction, they marched against the Saracens, and, in conjunction with the other forces, drove them from the duchy of Spoleto and Campania; however, the crusaders themselves, for want of pay and subsistence, quickly dispersed, though they were earnestly solicited by the pope to march against the Romans. Manfred in the mean time, to strengthen himself against the intrigues of the pope, gave his eldest daughter and heiress of his dominions in marriage to Peter, the son of the king of Arragon; and, assembling an army of Saracens, marched into the territories of the church<sup>x</sup>.

The Greeks recover Constantinople.

URBAN, waiting for the success of his negociation in France, still continued at Viterbo; and being informed that the friends of the house of Suabia, taking advantage of the unsettled state of Germany, were forming a party in favour of the young Conradin, he renewed the prohibition of his predecessor Alexander against that prince. He likewise published a crusade against the Greeks, who, the year before, had recovered Constantinople by surprise, and had expelled the Latins after they had been in possession of that empire fifty-nine years. He absolved Henry king of England, and his son Edmund, from the oath which the barons had exacted from them, to restore the antient laws and privileges of the kingdom; and he strictly prohibited the Genoese from giving assistance to the Greeks against the Venetians.

The pope upon certain conditions confers the crown of Sicily on Charles count of Anjou.
1263.

MEAN while Charles, count of Anjou and Provence, having obtained the permission of his brother St. Lewis to accept of the offer of the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, made to him by the pope's legate, entered into a negociation with Urban upon that affair. As the Romans, who, for more than a century, had pretended to an independency of the emperor or the pope, had about this time conferred the title of perpetual senator of their city upon count Charles, it was agreed, that he should renounce that dignity within five years; but, as his oath to the Romans was contradictory to this agreement, Urban granted him a dispensation with regard to that oath, on condition of his fulfilling the agreement of the holy see<sup>y</sup>. Charles likewise agreed to several other conditions, namely, to leave an entire liberty to the ecclesiastics in his dominions, never to unite the imperial dignity to the kingdom of Sicily, and to pay yearly 8000 ounces of gold to the apostolic see. This negociation being published in Italy, greatly alarmed Manfred, and gave fresh spirits to the Guelphs, who hoped, by the assistance of the French, entirely to conquer the Gibelines, who, by the confusions in Germany, could draw no succours from the empire, which was without a head, though the two competitors still kept up their pretensions. Urban, to put an end to their contention, wrote to them both to submit to the decision of the apostolic see, and to appear by their proxies against the month of May, in the following year<sup>z</sup>. Having likewise received an embassy from Michael Palæologus, emperor of Constantinople, desiring to treat of an union of the Greek and Latin churches, he sent four friars of the Dominican order for that purpose to Constantinople, though it was believed the embassy of the emperor was only a feint, to prevent the effects of the crusade preached against him<sup>a</sup>.

The competitors for the empire desired to submit to the decision of the pope, who sends a legate to England. 1264.

THE following year, Urban, being informed of the great dissensions in England betwixt the barons and the king, sent Guido bishop of Sabino as his legate a latere, to mediate a recon-

<sup>w</sup> Paduan. Chron. l. iii. spinal. 2. c. 9. ap. MURATOR, t. viii. p. 808. ibid.

<sup>x</sup> SURIT. in Indiſt. l. ii. An. 1260. SPOND. Annal.

<sup>z</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>y</sup> Sabas Mala-
<sup>a</sup> Idem

a ciliation; but he being prevented by the barons from entering the kingdom, stopped at Boulogne in France, and sending for some of the English bishops, ordered them to publish a sentence of interdict and excommunication against all those who should disturb the peace of the king. But the bishops, instead of complying with the command of the legate, appealed to the apostolic see, or to a general council, and even to the supreme judge of all, for the justice of the cause which was espoused by the barons<sup>b</sup>. Mean while Urban falling sick at Perugia, died in that city on the 2d of October.

Urban dies at Perugia, A.D. 1265.

UPON the death of Urban, the Roman see continued vacant upwards of four months, occasioned by the disputes among the cardinals. At length they unanimously agreed, and chose cardinal Guido, who was then upon his return from Boulogne. As he was informed that Manfred had ordered the roads to be beset, he disguised himself in the habit of a merchant, or, according to some, of a friar, and arriving at Perugia, he went from thence with the cardinals to Viterbo, where he was consecrated, and took the name of Clement IV. (N). He immediately confirmed the treaty made between his predecessor and the count of Anjou, who having now assembled a considerable army at Lyons, repaired himself to Marseilles with 1000 horse, and embarking on board thirty galleys and some other vessels, arrived soon after at the Tyber, the tempestuous weather having prevented him from falling in with the fleet of Manfred, which was endeavouring to intercept him. He was received by the Romans with great honours, and immediately took possession of the dignity of senator; and Clement being informed of his arrival, sent six cardinals to Rome, who, upon his swearing to fulfil the conditions agreed to with the holy see in the Lateran church, gave him the investiture of Sicily and Naples, excepting the city of Benevento.

Clement IV. is chosen pope.

The count of Anjou arrives at Rome.

CLEMENT being resolved to spare nothing in supporting the interests of Charles, borrowed large sums from the count of Poitiers, and from the merchants of Florence and Sienna, and likewise mortgaged the possessions of the greatest part of the churches of Rome for three years<sup>c</sup>. As these sums were not sufficient for the expedition, he granted to Charles the tythe of all the ecclesiastical possessions in France. Mean while his legate in Lombardy published a crusade against Manfred, by which he raised 10,000 men in the territory of Bologna; and procuring an assembly at Mantua of the deputies of Milan, Verona, Modena, and several other cities, they concluded an alliance with Charles against the Gibelines, and promised to supply his army with provisions in their march through Lombardy<sup>d</sup>. Clement in the mean time published several severe decrees against the heretics, enlarged the privileges of the inquisitors, and wrote to the king of Arragon, exhorting him to extirpate the Moors<sup>e</sup>. He likewise sent cardinal Guido, a Cistercian monk, as his legate to the northern kingdoms, and appointed cardinal Othobonus, a nephew of Innocent IV. as his legate in England, writing at the same time to St. Lewis, to assist king Henry against his subjects.

Clement exerts himself in his favour.

THE army of the count of Anjou at length arriving at Rome, to the number of 60,000, besides a numerous body of the Guelphs<sup>f</sup>, Clement sent five cardinals to Rome, who receiving the homage of Charles in the church of St. Peter, crowned him and his wife Beatrice, king and queen of both Sicilies, immediately after which ceremony he marched with his army into Apulia, and engaging Manfred in the neighbourhood of Benevento, gained a complete victory, his competitor being slain in the action. His easy conquest rendering him insolent, he allowed all manner of barbarities to be committed in the city of Benevento, which he made himself master of immediately after the battle. Clement, informed of his cruelty, exhorted him to gain the hearts of his new subjects by affability and moderation, and reproved him severely for his behaviour to the Beneventans, who ought to have been accounted subject to the holy see. In Lombardy the news of the defeat and death of Manfred struck the Gibeline faction with the greatest consternation. As they were expelled from several cities by the Guelphs, they invited the young Conradin into Italy against Charles, to be the head of their ruined faction. Clement being informed that such a negotiation was carrying on, about the middle of April published a mandate in the church of Viterbo, prohibiting any one to acknowledge Conradin as king of Sicily, or to disturb Charles in the possession of that kingdom, under pain of excommunication and deprivation of fiefs or benefices<sup>g</sup>.

Charles is crowned king of Sicily at Rome.

1266.

Manfred defeated and slain.

Conradin invited into Italy, but prohibited by the pope.

<sup>b</sup> Vita Urban. ap. MURATOR, t. iii. GULIEL. Westmonaster.

l. xx. p. 161. <sup>c</sup> SURIT. Indict. l. ii. hoc. an.

Annal. SIGON. ubi supra.

<sup>e</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>f</sup> Chron. Parmens. apud MURATOR, t. ix.

<sup>d</sup> SIGON.

<sup>g</sup> SPOND.

(N) Clement was born at St. Giles's in Narbonne, of a noble family. In his youth he followed the profession of arms, but applying himself afterwards to the study of the law, he soon acquired the reputation of being the most skilful lawyer in France, and was chosen one of the privy counsellors of St. Lewis. After the death of his wife, by whom he had two daughters, he entered into holy orders; was first archdeacon, and then bishop of Puy en Velay; soon after he obtained the archbishopric of Narbonne, and Urban IV. created him a cardinal, and bishop of Sabino. After his promotion to the pontificate, he wrote to all his relations, ordering them not to come to him till he sent for them, and not to expect riches or dignities in consequence of his present elevation.

MEAN while his legate in England held a council at Northampton, and excommunicated all those bishops and clergy who adhered to Simon Montfort and the barons against the king; he likewise, by the authority of the pope, granted to the king the tythe of all ecclesiastical revenues in his kingdom for seven years<sup>b</sup>. Guido, who had been sent as his legate into Denmark, excommunicated the king and queen, and laid that kingdom under an interdict, because the king refused to set the archbishop of Lunden at liberty, whom he had imprisoned on account of a dispute about the payment of tythes. Clement in the mean time wrote to the king of Hungary in favour of the bishop of Zagabria, whom that prince had rejected on account of his mean birth. Being likewise informed that the sultan of Egypt, after an attempt upon Ptolemais, had taken the castle of Saphet, and threatened the entire destruction of the Christians, he sent a nuncio into Syria to animate them to constancy, and to assure them of speedy assistance from the king of France, who had again taken the cross.

A. D. 1267.
Who creates the count of Anjou vicar of the empire.

Soon after, having received a letter from the Greek emperor, with a form of agreement with the Latin church, he returned an answer to that prince, disapproving of the prescribed form, and sent an abstract of the faith of the Roman church, to be publicly professed by the emperor, patriarch, and clergy. At the same he granted to the competitors for the empire a further prolongation of the time for determining their claim; and as the report prevailed of Conradin's preparations for entering Italy, he created Charles vicar of the empire. But the two competitors complaining of this proceeding, he wrote to them, declaring that he had not appointed him vicar, but conservator of the peace in Tuscany for three years only; and that, if within that time any person should be absolutely declared emperor, he had bound him by oath to resign that title. Mean while the Gibeline faction in Lombardy and Tuscany were earnestly soliciting Conradin to hasten his expedition; deputies were sent to him from Verona, Pavia, Sienna, Pisa, and several other cities; Sicily was on the point of revolting in his favour; Apulia was full of malecontents, who promised him their assistance; and Henry brother to the king of Castile, then senator of Rome, secretly supported his interest in that city, though publicly he professed an attachment for the pope.

CLEMENT, to support the faction of the Guelphs and the interests of Charles, sent a legate into Lombardy, who renewed the former alliance of the associated cities, while he, residing at Viterbo, again published his prohibition against Conradin, unless he came in a peaceable manner to submit to the decision of the apostolic see. But soon after, hearing that this prince had arrived at Verona with an army of 10,000 horse, he declared him excommunicated, if he did not within a month leave Italy. About the same time he likewise granted to St. Lewis the tythe of estates in his kingdom, to support him in his expedition into Syria; and hearing that several Christians had become profelytes to the Jewish religion, he ordered the inquisitors to proceed against them as heretics<sup>c</sup>.

Denounces excommunication against Conradin and his party.

1268.

MEAN while the Saracens of Lucera or Nocera, openly declaring in favour of Conradin, the pope published a crusade against them; and being informed that Conradin had advanced to Pavia, he again denounced a sentence of excommunication against him, and deprivation of his right to the kingdom of Jerusalem, and, if he did not within a month submit to the apostolic see, he declared him for ever incapable of possessing any dignity. He also excommunicated all his adherents, and laid all those cities who should favour him under an interdict. Notwithstanding these fulminations of the pope, Conradin, being reinforced by the Gibelines, defeated a large body of French cavalry at Arezzo, and marching in parade within sight of Viterbo proceeded to Rome, where he was received by the senator Henry and the Romans with all the honours due to an emperor<sup>d</sup>. This prosperity was of very short continuance; for marching soon after into Apulia, he was entirely defeated by Charles, and being taken prisoner, he and some of his chief friends were executed as criminals<sup>e</sup>. Upon the news of the victory, Clement confirmed to Charles the dignity of conservator of the peace for ten years, and created him vicar of the empire in Tuscany. He likewise granted particular indulgences to the king of Portugal, who pretended to undertake an expedition into the Holy Land. Soon after falling sick at Viterbo, he died on the 29th of November, having never been at Rome during his whole pontificate<sup>f</sup>.

Clement dies
at Viterbo.

A vacancy in the Roman see.
1269.

AFTER the death of Clement the Roman see continued vacant two years and nine months, owing to the disputes among the cardinals, who still continued at Viterbo. Mean while the cities in Lombardy, upon various pretences, harrassed each other with mutual hostilities. The family of the Turriani, prefects of Milan, raised factions in that city, and attacked Lodi and Brescia; Bologna declared war against the Venetians, in defence of their navigation in the Adriatic and upon the Po; and the Guelphs harrassed the Gibeline faction all over Italy.

<sup>b</sup> GULIEL. Westmonaster.
VILLAN. l. vii. c. 24. usque 30.

<sup>c</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. Chron. Parmense.

<sup>e</sup> Paduan. Chron. l. iii. RICORD. c. 191, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> SPOND. Annal.

a Charles king of Sicily, however, in order to facilitate the transactions of the crusards into Syria, granted a peace to the Pisans; and soon after, he himself, with his brother St. Lewis, the king of Navarre, Edward, heir of the crown of England, the count of Flanders, and the three sons of St. Lewis, regulated the plan of their expedition. It was agreed that Edward should sail directly for the Holy Land, but that St. Lewis and Charles should first attack the Saracens of Tunis, who interrupted the navigation of the Mediterranean. A new crusade determined upon. A. D. 1270.

ACCORDINGLY the following year, St. Lewis embarking about the middle of June at Marseilles, with cardinal Rodolphus bishop of Albano the apostolical legate, he arrived with his fleet after a dangerous voyage at Carthage, which he quickly made himself master of. But marching afterwards against Tunis, while he continued before that city, his army was seized with sickness, which carried off a great many of the nobles and soldiers. While the king was deliberating about reembarking his troops, he was seized with the distemper, and died on the 25th of August, his brother the king of Sicily arriving the same day at the camp, together with the fleet of Edward prince of England<sup>n</sup>. The distemper still continuing in the camp of the crusards, and raging likewise in the city and camp of the enemy, a truce was concluded with the Tunisians for ten years, the Saracens engaging to defray the expences of the expedition, to pay yearly to the king of Sicily a sum equal to the tribute given by him to the holy see, to dismiss all prisoners, and to allow christianity to be preached freely in their country. These terms being ratified, Edward prince of England proceeded with his fleet to the Holy Land: but as Philip king of France, with his uncle Charles, and the king of Navarre, sailed for Sicily, in order to return to their own dominions, Edward sent back his cousin Henry, son of Richard duke of Cornwall, to take care of Guienne, who, in his journey through Italy, was massacred in a church at Viterbo, by a son of the late Simon Montfort<sup>o</sup>. St. Lewis dies at Tunis.

THE fleet that sailed for Sicily meeting with a storm on that coast, a great many ships were lost, and the princes escaped with great difficulty. The king of France immediately passed over into Italy, and attended by his uncle Charles he went to Viterbo, where both the kings earnestly solicited the cardinals to proceed to an election; but their intreaties having no effect upon them, who every one aspired to the papal dignity, they took leave of each other, and proceeded to their own dominions<sup>p</sup>. The contention among the cardinals continued for several months afterwards; but at length, on the 1st of September, they chose Thedald, or Thibaut, a native of Placenza, and archdeacon of Liege, who was then in the Holy Land with Edward prince of England. Upon receiving the news of his election, he set sail for Italy, and arrived at Brundisi about the middle of January. The king of Sicily conducted him to Cepperano with great respect, and Thibaut proceeding from thence to Viterbo, he was joined by the cardinals, and went with them to Rome, where he was consecrated on the 25th of March, and assumed the name of Gregory X. 1271. Gregory X. is elected pope. 1272.

BEFORE he left Viterbo he solicited the kings of France and Sicily to send succours into the Holy Land, and he prohibited, under pain of excommunication, the sending of any ships or military stores to the Saracens. He likewise raised 500 horse, which he sent in three Venetian ships to Syria<sup>q</sup>. Immediately after his consecration, he published letters, addressed to all the princes and prelates, appointing a general council to be held within two years, in some city to be afterwards determined. Soon after going to Orvieto, he sent some Dominicans and Franciscans to the king of Portugal, to exhort him to cease oppressing the ecclesiastics; and he granted a suspension for seven months of the general interdict, which had been denounced by the bishops of that kingdom<sup>r</sup>. He likewise continued the negotiations of his predecessor for uniting the Greek and Roman churches, and sent four Dominicans to Paleologus, inviting him to be present at the council. Soon after Edward, who had now succeeded to the crown of England by the death of his father, arriving at Orvieto on his return from the Holy Land, Gregory received him with great affection, and declared that he had excommunicated the son of Simon who had murdered his cousin. He sends succours to the Holy Land, and

THE following year he again published his letters for a general council to be held at Lyons; and having appointed Aldebrandinus Cavaleante, bishop of Viterbo, his vicar in Italy, he left that city, and set out for Florence. During his residence in this city, he effected a reconciliation betwixt the Guelphs and the Gibelines, by the assistance of the king of Sicily; but the Guelphs a few days afterwards violating the terms of the treaty, he was so offended, that he left the city, and laid it under an interdict. After he departed from Florence, he went to his native city of Placenza, taking with him Otho Visconti archbishop of Milan, who, for more than nine years, had been rejected by the Turriani, who were prefects of the city. Gregory, in order to facilitate a reconciliation, made one of the Turriani patriarch of Aquileia; however, being informed that their faction would still oppose Otho, he left him behind when he proceeded to that city. The Milanese received him with great honour and respect; but as he appoints a general council to be held at Lyons. 1273.

<sup>n</sup> Pod. Laurent. Chron. c. 51.

<sup>o</sup> Vita Pontif. Rom. apud MURATOR. t. iii. Chron. Parmen.

<sup>p</sup> NANG:

<sup>q</sup> Philip. III. Chron. Parmen. apud MURATOR. t. ix.

<sup>r</sup> SPOND. Arenal.

<sup>s</sup> Idem ibid.

Lays the city of Milan under an interdict.

was dissatisfied with them for rejecting their archbishop, he granted no indulgences while he continued in their city, and, upon his departure, laid it under an interdict. Arriving at Lyons about the middle of November, he immediately received a visit from Philip king of France, who left a strong body of men in the city, as a guard to the pope and the members of the council.

Rodolphus
chosen emperor.

MEAN while Gregory, having urged the German princes to proceed to the election of an emperor, and even threatened, in case of their further delay, to appoint one to that dignity by his sole authority, the electors at length assembled at Frankfort, and notwithstanding the protestations of Alphonso's ambassadors, and the opposition of those of Bohemia, chose Rodolphus count of Habsburgh, in the diocese of Constance, near Basil, who had been for many years master of the horse to the king of Bohemia, and was more eminent for his military genius than for his large possessions. The election of Rodolphus was not disagreeable to Gregory, who obliged Alphonso to resign in his favour, after the celebrating of the council, which assembled on the 1st of May.

Proceedings of the council of Lyons.
A. D. 1274.

THIS council was the most numerous that had ever assembled, there being no less than five hundred bishops, sixty abbots, and about a thousand other prelates. There were present likewise the king of Arragon, the masters of the Hospitaliers and Templars, the ambassadors of Rodolphus and of Philip and Hugh kings of France and Cyprus, besides the ambassadors of the Greek emperor, and king of Tartary, and of the metropolitans of the East. The pope, after the prayers, and the usual ceremonies at the opening of the council, informed the members that he had assembled them to procure succours for the Holy Land, to consult about an union of the Greek and Latin churches, as well as of the reformation of discipline and manners, and lastly, to prescribe some method for the speedy election of a pope upon a vacancy in the holy see. Accordingly, after the first session, the prelates, by themselves, decreed the tythes of all ecclesiastical possessions for the six following years for the relief of the Holy Land. In the second session, which was held on the 18th of the same month, some articles of faith were published; and in the third, held on the 7th of June, some canons were decreed, relating to the elections and conferring of benefices, the immunity of the clergy, the reformation of manners, and the regulations of processions. Before this session, the king of Arragon left the council, as Gregory had refused to crown him, unless he paid the tribute granted by his father to the holy see.

The Greek emperor swears to submit to the church of
Rome.

THE Greek ambassadors arrived before the fourth session, which was held the 24th of June. They consented to allow the supremacy of the Roman see, and the procession of the Holy Ghost from both the father and the son; but, in compliance with the weakness of the people, they desired that the creed might be repeated in their churches in the same manner as before the schism, and that those ceremonies that were not opposite to the Roman faith might still be preserved. The smaller matters being overlooked by the council, the chief articles were sworn to by the ambassadors in the name of the emperor. Several authors affirm that this was the thirteenth time the Greeks had subscribed to the doctrines of the church of Rome. In this session Henry bishop of Liege was deposed, for his debauched and scandalous life (O), as was Frederic abbot of St. Paul of the city of Rome, for his excesses. In the fifth session, which was held on the 16th of July, Gregory published the constitutions for regulating the election of the popes, ordaining, that the cardinals on that occasion should be shut up in the conclave, and allowed only one dish of simple victuals till they had concluded the election. Next day Gregory, having exhorted the prelates to a voluntary reformation of manners, and to preach up a crusade into Syria, dismissed the council, and sent the abbot of Cassino with the Greek ambassadors to Constantinople, to congratulate the emperor upon the union of the two churches.

In the council the ambassadors of the king of Castile insisted upon the rights of their master to the empire; but Gregory would not admit his claim, as he had never been crowned at Aix la Chapelle; however, to prevail with him to make a voluntary resignation, he sent a nuncio into Spain, offering him the tythes of all ecclesiastical revenues in his kingdom, to assist him in his wars with the Moors. In the mean time the ambassadors of Rodolphus, promising in the name of their master fidelity and obedience to the Roman see, and not to attack Charles * PLATIN. in Vit. Greg. BLOND. d. ii. l. 8, &c.

(O) He was a cousin-german of William count of Holland, formerly elected king of the Romans against Frederic II. He neglected his consecration for eleven years after his election, minding nothing but war and temporal affairs, and was threatened with excommunication by Urban IV. and Clement IV. He struck Gregory when he was his archdeacon with his foot, for reproving him upon account of debauching a young woman of noble birth. After his deposition he lived twelve years, and made war upon three of his successors. But at last he was killed by the relations of the young lady whom he had debauched, leaving at his death sixty-five bastards (4).

(4) Hoefam p. 275.

king

a king of Sicily, nor invade the patrimony of St. Peter, Gregory, in a consistory of the cardinals and several German prelates, confirmed his election, and invited him to receive the imperial crown at Rome. During these transactions at Lyons, Lombardy was continually harrassed by the different factions; Napus Turrianus at Milan, was appointed general-vicar of that city, by the emperor Rodolphus; the city of Bologna was greatly afflicted by opposite factions, distinguished by the names of their leaders, Jerom and Lamberti. The pope confirms the election of Rodolphus.

A CONTAGIOUS distemper raging in Lyons, Gregory left that city, and the following year went to Beaucaire in Provence, where he had an interview with Alphonso king of Castile, who came thither in hopes of prevailing with the pope to revoke the confirmation of the empire, given to Rodolphus. But Gregory being unmoved by his representations, he departed greatly dissatisfied, and, upon his return to Spain, re-assumed the imperial ensigns. Before he removed from Beaucaire, Gregory wrote to the king of Arragon, reproving him for taking away the wife of one of his nobles, and threatening him with excommunication if he did not dismis her. He likewise threatened the king of Portugal with an anathema, for violating the liberties of the church, and refusing to pay the accustomed tribute to the holy see. Advancing afterwards to Lausanne, in his way to Italy, he had an interview in that city with the emperor Rodolphus, who confirmed by oath what his ambassador had sworn to at Lyons, and promised to undertake an expedition into Syria against the Saracens without delay. Upon his arrival at Milan, he desired the archbishop Otho still to continue in exile; and proceeding from thence to Arezzo, he died in that city the following year on the 10th of January, being prevented from executing his purpose of returning to the Holy Land. The king of Castile has a conference with Gregory; A. D. 1275. who dies at Arezzo;

TEN days after the death of Gregory, the cardinals elected the bishop of Ostia, called Peter of Tarantaise, from the place of his birth. He was consecrated at Rome on the 22d of February, took the name of Innocent V. and immediately applied himself to put an end to the factions and civil dissensions in Italy. He absolved the Florentines from the interdict of Gregory, and sent an embassy to the Greek emperor; but he was prevented from reconciling the Genoese and Venetians by death, which happened to him at Rome on the 22d of June, in the sixth month of his pontificate. Innocent V. elected pope.

AFTER a vacancy of nineteen days, Othobonus, a native of Genoa, and nephew of Innocent IV. was elected pope, and took the name of Hadrian V. Immediately after his election, Blondus and Trithemius affirm, that he secretly solicited the emperor Rodolphus to come into Italy, to repress the exorbitant power of Charles, who acted very arbitrarily at Rome. While he was expecting the answer of Rodolphus, he died at Viterbo, in the thirty-seventh day of his pontificate. Hadrian V.

TWENTY-FIVE days after the death of Hadrian, John Peter, born at Lisbon, and cardinal bishop of Tusculum, was elected pope at Viterbo, and took the name of John XXI. Stero, Bernardus, Guido, Platina, and other authors, relate, that, though he was accounted a learned man, he disgraced the pontificate, by the inconstancy and levity of his behaviour; yet they reckon him worthy of praise for assisting poor scholars with pensions and preferments. The following year he put the emperor Rodolphus in mind of his vow of a crusade, and sent the archbishop of Corinth for the same purpose to Philip king of France. He likewise sent nuncios to the great cham of Tartary, for the confirmation of the faithful in his dominions. He is accused by Platina of neglecting to assist the inhabitants of Ancona against the exactions of the Venetians, who would not allow the others to trade to Dalmatia, unless they paid high duties to their republic. Another author likewise affirms, that he published some decrees to the prejudice of the monks, and that he neglected and despised the constitutions of the council of Lyons, particularly that relating to conclave of cardinals, which had been suspended by his predecessor Hadrian. While he was promising himself a long life, he was killed in the ninth month of his pontificate, by the fall of the roof of a chamber, which he had caused to be built at Viterbo. John XXI. chosen pope. 1277. He sends nuncios to the cham of Tartary. He is killed at Viterbo.

MEAN while the war was renewed betwixt the two factions of the Visconti and Turriani in Milan. Otho Visconti the archbishop, immediately upon the death of Gregory, consulting with the other noble exiles at Pavia, they assembled a body of forces, and gave the command of them to count Godfrey of that city. Their troops were twice defeated by the Turriani; but the cities of Como, Novara, and Pavia, declaring in their favour, they in their turn gained a signal victory, and made themselves masters of several towns in the territory of Milan, which occasioned another engagement, in which the Turriani were entirely defeated, and Napus the Otho Visconti obtains possession of the archbishopric of Milan.

<sup>t</sup> Vita Greg. apud MURATOR. t. iii. PLATINA. Chron. Parmenf. SPOND. Annales. STRUV. period. ix. p. 518. <sup>u</sup> SIGON. l. xx. p. 113. <sup>w</sup> Chron. Parmenf. <sup>x</sup> SIGON. ubi supra. <sup>y</sup> Vita Greg. apud MURATOR. <sup>z</sup> Vita Innoc. ap. eund. <sup>a</sup> BLOND. Dec. ii. l. 8. TRITHEM. in Chron. Hirfang. <sup>b</sup> PLATIN. in Vit. Joan. <sup>c</sup> PTOL. Lucens. in Annal. SPOND. Annales.

prefect, and several other nobles of his party, taken prisoners. Otho used this victory with a great moderation. Being now invited by the inhabitants of Milan to take possession of the archiepiscopal dignity, he entered the city, and proceeding to the church of St. Ambrose, was there declared their spiritual and temporal sovereign <sup>d</sup>.

Nicholas III. <sup>a</sup>
elected pope.
A. D. 1278. At the death of John, the college of cardinals was reduced to seven, three of them Frenchmen, and four Italians; but notwithstanding the smallness of their number, it was more than six months before they determined upon their choice of a pope, being chiefly interrupted by the intrigues of the king of Sicily, who laboured earnestly to have one of the French cardinals elected <sup>c</sup>. At length John Cajetan a Roman, of the family of the Orsini, and cardinal arch-deacon, was elected, and took the name of Nicholas III. He was consecrated soon after at Rome; but before he left Viterbo, he sent a Dominican and Franciscan as his legates into France <sup>b</sup> and Spain, to reconcile Philip and Alphonso king of Castile, who both pretended to the kingdom of Navarre. Upon his arrival at Rome, he dismissed those legates to Tartary, who had been ordered thither by his predecessor; and having received an embassy from the Greek emperor, he sent the bishop of Grasseto in Tuscany, with three Franciscans, as his nuncios to that emperor, to satisfy the scruples of those Greek bishops who still continued in the schism, and to confirm the peace betwixt Palæologus and Charles king of Sicily, and Philip the successor of Baldwin, commonly stiled emperor of Constantinople, who still possessed Negroponte, and some other places on the coasts of Greece.

Rodolphus <sup>c</sup> confirms the articles which he had sworn to at Lausanne. MEAN while Nicholas was very importunate with the emperor Rodolphus to fulfil what he had promised to Gregory at Lausanne. The emperor justified his delay, by alleging, that the king of Sicily had not yet been obliged to quit the title of vicar of Tuscany; however, he sent Conrad of Tubingen as his plenipotentiary to Rome, who, in the presence of Nicholas, twelve cardinals, and a great many bishops and nobles, ratified the articles formerly agreed to by Rodolphus at Lausanne, whereby he ceded to the holy see all the fiefs situated betwixt Radicophani and Cepperano, the exarchate of Ravenna, Pentapolis, the march of Ancona, the duchy of Spoleto, the estate of the countess Matilda, the county of Bertinoro in Romania, and all the lands granted by the emperors to the holy see since the time of Lewis the Debonnaire. Rodolphus, by these concessions, only parted with a right to receive homage from subjects who had been contesting that privilege for near 100 years with the emperors, and who, in their submissions to the pope, reserved all the privileges they were then in possession of, which rendered them <sup>d</sup> almost entirely independent and sovereign. During these transactions, Charles was prevailed upon to resign the vicariate of Tuscany and the senatorial dignity to the pope, who immediately published a decree, that no emperor, king, or any person possessing an eminent title, or any relations of such, should be capable of enjoying the senatorial dignity, which, for the future, should only be an annual office <sup>e</sup>.

Charles resigns the senatorial dignity and title of vicar of Tuscany. SOME authors affirm, that Nicholas reserved the senatorial dignity to himself during his life; and he is accused by several historians of having had ambitious views in his transactions with the emperor and king of Sicily, the last of whom he had resolved to repress, because he had disdainfully refused to give his grand-daughter in marriage to one of his nephews, declaring, that though the pope wore red shoes, yet his blood was unworthy to be allied with that of kings. <sup>e</sup> Nicholas is likewise said to have intended to have created two kings of the family of the Orsini, one in Tuscany, and another in Lombardy; but his short pontificate prevented the execution of his schemes <sup>f</sup>. About this time he sent his brother, whom he had created count of Romaniola, with an army into that country, to reduce some cities that refused to submit to the church. He likewise sent his nephew Latinus, a Dominican friar, and bishop of Ostia, as his legate into Tuscany and Lombardy, to reconcile the contending factions in those parts. Mean while Philip, bishop of Formo, who had been sent as legate into Germany, reconciled some of the princes to Rodolphus, and proceeding to Hungary, excommunicated Ladissaus the king, who oppressed his Christian subjects, and plundered the churches and monasteries. This sentence produced a reformation in the king, who was thereupon absolved by the legate <sup>b</sup>. About the same time cardinal Jerom, general-minister of the Franciscans, while he was exercising his office of legate in Paris, by the advice of a great many of his brethren, condemned the doctrines of Roger Bacon, a friar of the same order, who, for his surprising knowledge in divinity, natural philosophy, and mathematics, had acquired the title of the wonderful Doctor. According to Pitseus, Roger's great merits having drawn upon him the envy of his ignorant brethren, his doctrines were not only condemned, but he himself was likewise imprisoned by order of his general <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> SICON. l. xx. p. 116, & 117.
supra.

<sup>b</sup> Vita Nicol. ap. MURATOR. SPOND. ANNAL. PLATIN. BLOND. Istor. di Ricordan. ap. MURATOR, t. viii.

<sup>c</sup> SPOND. ANNAL.

<sup>d</sup> PLATIN. in Vita Nicol. BLOND. D. 2. l. viii.

<sup>e</sup> SICON. ubi

<sup>f</sup> WADDING. ANNAL. t. ii. PITSEUS de script. Angl. hoc an.

<sup>a</sup> THE following year Nicolas received an embassy from the Greek emperor, informing him of what he had done, to prevail with his subjects to acknowledge the supremacy of the Roman church. But notwithstanding all his endeavours, the greatest part of his own relations and kindred still violently opposed the union of the two churches, and had broke out into an open rebellion, which his army had not then been able to quell. He informed him besides, that a synod of 100 monks, a few abbots, and eight bishops, had assembled, and excommunicated the pope, the emperor, and the patriarch of Constantinople, and all those adhering to them; therefore that he could not urge the intended union any further at that time, lest he should be deposed by his rebellious subjects <sup>k</sup>.

He receives an embassy from the Greek emperor.
A. D. 1279.

<sup>b</sup> AT the same period Latinus, the legate in Lombardy, denounced a sentence of interdict and excommunication against the city of Parma, on account of a violent outrage committed against the inquisitors of that city, who having ordered a certain noble lady to be burnt for heresy, were attacked by the mob, and one of them killed, and many of the rest greatly wounded. The house was likewise plundered and pulled to the ground. The magistracy of Parma sent ambassadors to the pope, begging absolution; which they could not at that time obtain <sup>l</sup>. Nicolas was then engaged in reconciling the emperor and the king of Sicily; Rodolphus having given the investiture of the counties of Provence and Forcalquier to Margaret, widow of St. Lewis, in opposition to the pretensions of Charles, which were founded on his contract of marriage, and the last will of his deceased father-in-law. After several months spent in the negotiation, Nicolas at length being appointed arbitrator, the peace was signed in the month of April, when it was agreed, that the counties above-mentioned should be ceded to Charles as fiefs of the empire; and that a marriage should be concluded betwixt his grandson Charles Martel, and Clemence, the emperor's daughter <sup>m</sup>.

He reconciles Rodolphus and the king of Sicily.
1280.

<sup>c</sup> THE pope seems to have engaged in this affair more from a regard to the emperor than to Charles; for he entered into the conspiracy which the Sicilians were forming against their king. The chief promoter of this conspiracy was John de Procida, of Salerno, formerly one of the counsellors to the emperor Frederic, and his son Manfred, who, knowing the great aversion of the Sicilian nobles to the French government, concerted with him the plan of a revolt in favour of Peter king of Arragon, who had married the only daughter of Manfred. John Franciscan, and obtained the consent of the pope. Nicolas likewise gave him letters to the king of Arragon, to whom he promised the investiture of Sicily and Naples; but before the plot could be put in execution, he died of an apoplexy, on the 20th of August, at Suriano, in the diocese of Viterbo <sup>n</sup>.

Nicolas enters into a conspiracy against Charles.

He dies at Viterbo.

<sup>d</sup> IMMEDIATELY upon the death of Nicolas, the inhabitants of Viterbo expelled his nephew Ursus, who had been appointed their pretor; and the family of the Hannibali at Rome, having assembled their party in the capitol, deprived the Orsini of part of their authority. These disturbances occasioned great contests in the conclave at Viterbo; for two of the cardinals of the Orsini family declared, that they would not allow an election to be made, till their relation Ursus was restored to his pretorship. But the inhabitants of Viterbo, at the instigation of the king of Sicily and Richard, of the family of the Hannibali, who had the guard of the conclave, broke in upon the cardinals, and carrying off the two Orsini, kept them prisoners in irons; upon which the others, on the 21st of February, elected Simon de Brio, a Frenchman, and cardinal of the title of St. Cecilia, who took the name of Martin IV. and was consecrated at Orvieto, having laid the city of Viterbo under a sentence of interdict and excommunication, on account of the violence they had committed against the cardinals <sup>o</sup>. Immediately after his consecration, having received the senatorial dignity from the Romans, he appointed the king of Sicily as his deputy. He likewise recalled Berthold from Romaniola; and sent John Eppa, his nephew, to carry on the war in that province, against those who still refused to submit to the church. Great confusions still continuing at Rome, cardinal Orsini, the late pope's brother, was sent thither to compose the factions. Upon his arrival, he found his family in possession of the chief authority, and the Hannibali banished; but both parties referring their disputes to his arbitration, peace was restored; upon which Martin granted the Romans a power of choosing annually two senators from among themselves to govern the city.

A. D. 1281.

Martin IV. is elected.

He confers the senatorial dignity on Charles.

<sup>e</sup> MARTIN in the mean time being alarmed at the great preparations of the king of Arragon, who was fitting out a formidable fleet, under pretence of invading the Saracens, he sent a legate to him, to enquire against what Saracens his expedition was intended, with an offer of assistance. But Peter replying, that if he thought his shirt knew his intentions he would tear it off and burn it, the legate took his leave, but prohibited him, under pain of excommu-

<sup>k</sup> WADDING, t. ii. hoc an. SPOND. Annal.

LUCENS. VILLAN. l. viii. c. 55. RAINER. ad an. 1279. p. 10.

206 & 207. FAZELL, Dec. ii. l. viii. c. 4

COLLEN. Hist. Neap. l. v. Vit. Nicol. apud MURATOR. See also the History of Naples.

<sup>l</sup> Chron. Parmens. SIGON. l. xx. p. 119.

<sup>m</sup> PTOL.

<sup>n</sup> Istor. di Ricord. ap. MURATOR. t. viii. c.

<sup>o</sup> Vita Nicol. ut supra. BLOND. D. ii. l. viii.

and at his desire excommunicates the Greek emperor.

nication, from turning his arms against any christian prince. Charles, however, instead of guarding his own dominions, was preparing to invade those of the Greek emperor, against whom he solicited the pope to publish a sentence of excommunication. Martin, who was only a tool to his ambition, accordingly excommunicated Michael, upon pretence of his not observing the articles of union agreed to at the council of Lyons, and his unjustly possessing the empire belonging to the son of Baldwin. He likewise prohibited all kings and princes from entering into any alliance or society with the Greek emperor, under pain of excommunication<sup>p</sup>. Mean while the emperor Rodolphus, at the solicitation of the Gibelines, sent his chancellor Otho, with 300 horse, to demand the allegiance of the cities of Tuscany. But none consenting to swear allegiance but Pisa and Sauminiano, by their assistance he attacked the inhabitants of Lucca and Florence, and the other Guelphs in those parts; but after some unsuccessful skirmishes, an accomodation was agreed to, and he returned to Germany<sup>q</sup>.

The French massacred by the Sicilians; A. D. 1282. who are excommunicated by the pope.

THE following year, while Charles was with the pope at Orvieto, they were alarmed with the news of the revolt of the Sicilians, who, on Easter Monday, on the ringing of the bells for the vespers, had surprised and massacred all the French in their island, not sparing even their own countrywomen, whom they suspected to be with child by Frenchmen<sup>r</sup>. Upon receiving the news of this massacre, the pope made a public procession through the streets of Orvieto, excommunicated the Sicilians, and laid their island under an interdict. To those likewise who assisted Charles against the Sicilians, he granted the same indulgences as the crusards had formerly enjoyed. Soon after, hearing that the king of Arragon had landed with an army in Sicily, to take possession of it in right of his wife, he excommunicated him and all his adherents, and laid his kingdom of Arragon under an interdict (P). This sentence having no effect upon the king, a few months after Martin deposed him from the kingdom of Arragon, which he gave to Charles of Valois, the youngest son of the king of France. He likewise sent cardinal Coletus to the king of England, desiring him to prohibit the kings of Sicily and Arragon from fighting the duel which they had agreed to at Bourdeaux. Peter still continuing his hostilities against Charles in Sicily, and appealing for the justice of his cause to the decision of a future pope, Martin ordered cardinal Coletus, his legate in France, to confirm the cession of Arragon to Charles of Valois, and to preach a crusade against Peter, with the usual indulgences. Being informed likewise, that Edward king of England proposed to give his daughter Leonora to Peter's eldest son, he prohibited the alliance, under pain of excommunication<sup>d</sup>.

The king of Arragon is deposed for invading Sicily. A. D. 1283.

The prince of Castile excommunicated for rebelling against his father.

AT the same time Sancho, eldest son of the king of Castile, having rebelled against his father, he excommunicated him and his followers, and laid those cities that favoured his party under an interdict. Mean while Michael Palæologus dying at Constantinople, his son Andronicus succeeded to that empire, and quickly discovered his attachment to the Greek ceremonies; for because his father had adhered to the Roman church, he buried him at night in a private manner in the fields. He likewise ordered a Greek patriarch to be elected, who restored the exiles, and oppressed those who adhered to the union of the Latins<sup>r</sup>.

A. D. 1284.

DURING these transactions at Constantinople, Charles the lame, eldest son of the king of Naples, was defeated at sea by the Sicilian admiral, and carried prisoner to Sicily. Martin immediately sent two cardinals as his legates into that kingdom, to demand the liberty of the prince, and to mediate a peace between the Sicilians and Charles; but the rebels refusing all accommodation, the legates renewed the sentence of excommunication, and left the island.

The death of the king of Naples, and the pope. 1285.

A few months after, Charles dying at Foggia, while his son was still in captivity, the pope appointed his legate cardinal Gerard, bishop of Parma, as baillie or administrator of the kingdom, in conjunction with Robert count of Artois, and Mary of Hungary, the wife of the captive prince. Martin survived the king of Sicily only a few weeks. He died at Perugia, on the 28th of March, and was buried in the cathedral church of that city.

Honorius IV. is elected pope; and FOUR days after the death of Martin, James Sabellus, a Roman, and cardinal deacon, of the title of St. Mary, in Cosmedin, was elected pope, and took the name of Honorius IV. Before his consecration, which was performed at St. Peter's, on the 16th of April, he gave

<sup>p</sup> Istor. di Ricord. ubi supra. PLATIN. FAZEL. 2. D. viii. c. 4.

<sup>r</sup> Istor. di Ricord. FAZEL. See the History of Naples.

Eccles. Gregoras, l. v. ad finem.

<sup>q</sup> SIGON. ubi sup. VILLAN. l. viii. c. 55.

<sup>s</sup> FAZEL, ut supra.

<sup>t</sup> ONUPHR. in Chron.

(P) Spondanus complains, that, to the great disgrace of Christianity, the Paduans this year shewed, that they valued their priests no more than a penny; their senate, upon account of the great insolence and profligacy of their clergy, having made a decree, that whoever should kill a priest, should only be fined in one gross, which is a penny; in consequence of this edict, many persons quickly forfeited their penny; which the pope being informed of, he ordered the patriarch of Aquileia to excommunicate the senate of Padua, and to lay the city under an interdict: though the senate quickly repealed the decree, yet they were not absolved from the sentence of the patriarch till seven years afterwards (1).

a an answer to the ambassadors of the king of England, who requested, that in his expedition against Scotland, he might be allowed to raise the tythes granted for the crusade by the synod of Lyons. Honorius refused to allow him any authority over his neighbouring kingdom; and at the same time appointed him a limited time for performing his expedition into Syria. He likewise renewed the sentence of his predecessor against the king of Arragon; and in order to carry on the war against the Sicilians, he raised the tythes in the dioceses of Liege, Metz, Basil, and in some others in their neighbourhood, notwithstanding the petition of the imperial ambassadors, who requested an exemption from that tax. This same year also, he wrote to his legate in France, desiring him to appoint masters in the university of Paris for teaching the Arabic and other eastern languages, in order to convert the Saracens, and re-
b claim the schismatics of the east. Soon after, being informed of the death of Peter king of Arragon, which happened in the beginning of November, he excommunicated both his sons, Alphonso, the eldest, for detaining Charles the lame, king of Naples, and James, for usurping the kingdom of Sicily. A. D. 1285.

Honorius likewise solicited the emperor Rodolphus, to come and receive the imperial crown at Rome; but that emperor, more intent upon establishing his family, and providing honours for his children, thought it not prudent to march into Italy, where he knew he would meet with great opposition, if he should insist upon the rights of the empire, which for more than 100 years had been contested by the powerful cities of Lombardy. However, he pretended still an intention of visiting Italy, as soon as his affairs would permit; and in c the mean time sent the bishop of Basil, as his chancellor, to receive the allegiance of the Italian cities. But the greatest part of them, during the troubles that succeeded in Germany upon the death of Frederic II. having acquired a kind of superiority and independency, they refused to take the oath prescribed by the chancellor. Rodolphus being informed by him of their opposition, and finding himself unable to reduce them by force, wrote to his chancellor to confirm their privileges in their full extent, on condition of their paying certain sums of money as an equivalent. This condition was very acceptable to the Italian cities; accordingly Florence, Genoa, Bologna, and Lucca, obtained the confirmation of their liberties, upon payment of the sums specified by the chancellor; while several others, sensible of the small authority of the empire in Italy, asserted their independency, but refused to give any d money for the liberty of which they were then in possession. Though Rodolphus, by this accommodation, only extended the privileges which the cities had obtained from Frederic Barossa, and did not absolutely separate them from the empire, which they even then acknowledged, yet this period is reckoned the beginning of the Italian independency and liberty, for the German emperors afterwards had but the mere shadow of authority in Italy.
The Italian cities purchase their liberty from Rodolphus.

THE pope was greatly pleased with this proceeding of the emperor, as he foresaw that it would be a strengthening of the authority of the holy see, which, by the assistance of Guido Montfort, the English refugee, had at last reduced Romaniola. As another accession of power, the chancellor at this time, in the name of Rodolphus, made a new cession of the exarchate of Ravenna to the apostolic see. Honorius in return, as a mark of his regard for the chancellor, e created him archbishop of Mentz, and, upon his departure from Italy, sent John Buccamali, bishop of Tusculum, along with him, as legate into Germany. The pope likewise wrote to the archbishop of Strigonia, to reprove the king of Hungary for his attachment to the pagan rites of Cumani or Culmacks. Soon after, being informed that Edward I. king of England, had acted as mediator betwixt the king of Arragon and the king of France, and had proposed that Sicily should be ceded to James, the brother of the king of Arragon, on condition that Charles the lame should be set at liberty, and left in quiet possession of the kingdom
f of Naples, he disapproved of their disposing of Sicily, which was a fief of the apostolic see, without his consent, and prohibited them, under pain of excommunication, from proceeding further in that treaty. Mean while John Buccamali, legate in Germany, held a council at Wirtzburg, and having published several canons, to be observed in Germany, Bohemia, Denmark, and the other northern provinces, made a demand of the fourth-part of all ecclesiastical revenues in Germany for four years. Conrad, bishop of Toul, opposed this demand; and after severely exclaiming against the court of Rome, appealed to a future general council: his opinion was seconded by the whole assembly, which, immediately fell into great confusion and uproar; so that Rodolphus was obliged to send soldiers into the church to rescue the legate from their fury. The legate did not appear abroad for several days; and soon after being informed of the death of Honorius, which happened at Rome, on the third of April, he immediately departed for Italy.
Honorius disapproves of the mediation of the king of England betwixt the kings of France and Arragon.
He dies at Rome.

UPON the death of Honorius, the Roman see continued vacant almost eleven months; for an earthquake happening soon after his death, and several cardinals dying of an epidemical
Nicolas IV. is elected pope;

<sup>u</sup> SPOND. Annales. <sup>v</sup> SURIT. Indic. l. ii. STRUV. period. ix. Catena Histor. l. xxix. c. 2.

<sup>x</sup> SIDON. l. xx. p. ult. BLOND. ut supra. KRANTZIUS. <sup>y</sup> AVENTIN. l. vii. p. 572 & 573 SPOND. Annal.

A. D. 1218. sickness, they delayed the election till the 22d of February, when they chose cardinal Jerom,<sup>a</sup> bishop of Pilastrina, who took the name of Nicolas IV.; and immediately after his consecration, sent two nuncios to the king of Arragon, to intercede for the liberty of Charles the lame, and to summon the king to appear at Rome within six months, to justify his conduct to the pope. As Alphonso gave his consent, provided he might come with security to himself, Nicolas granted him a safe conduct, and prevailed with the king of France and his allies to do the same. He likewise desired the kings of France and England, together with his legate, to endeavour in the mean time to procure the liberty of Charles, which they accordingly effected, by a treaty concluded in a village of the Pyrenees. Nicolas in the mean time wrote to the king of France, for the immunity of the clergy in his dominions, that they might not be oppressed by the exactions of those who collected the taxes. He likewise published a<sup>b</sup> decree to be observed by the Franciscan and Dominican inquisitors, in their proceedings against those Christians who should embrace judaism, or those Jews, who, having once embraced Christianity, should return to their former religion<sup>c</sup>.

Receives an embassy from the Tartars of Lesser Tartary.

A. D. 1289.

The king of Portugal makes satisfaction for the injuries done to the clergy.

ABOUT the same time, having received an embassy from the king of the Tartars in Lesser Tartary, expressing his affection for the Christian religion, and desiring to receive baptism in the city of Jerusalem, which he intended to take from the Saracens, Nicolas wrote to him not to delay his baptism, and granted large privileges to the Franciscans in that kingdom, to encourage them in their labours<sup>d</sup>. He likewise ordered Latinus, bishop of Ostia, with two other cardinals, to judge of the complaints of the archbishop of Braga against the king of Portugal, who was accused of violating the immunity of the ecclesiastics in their persons and revenues, and of publishing some decrees against the authority of the church. The ambassadors of the king and the clergy appearing at Rome, it was agreed, that the laws to the prejudice of the ecclesiastics should be repealed, and heavy penalties were decreed against the king or any others, who, for the future, should infringe the privileges of the clergy. Nicolas having confirmed this decree of the cardinals, sent it to the prior of the Dominicans and the Franciscans at Lisbon, with orders to take off the sentence of interdict upon the king's swearing to submit to the apostolic mandate<sup>e</sup>. A few weeks after, the pope having gone to Rieti, there crowned Charles, king of Naples and Sicily, upon his submitting to the same conditions which his father had sworn to upon receiving the investiture from Clement IV. The pope likewise annulled all the pactions which he had agreed to<sup>d</sup> with the king of Arragon, as prejudicial to the rights of the Roman see<sup>e</sup>. About the same time he erected an university at Montpellier; and having received another embassy from the king of the Tartars of Lesser Tartary, informing him, that the great cham, the emperor of all the Tartars, was desirous of having some Latin priests in his dominions, he wrote to the cham, and exhorted him immediately to receive baptism.

The Saracens take and destroy Tripoli.

MEAN while the sultan of Egypt, after a long and difficult siege, surprised and took Tripoli, which he entirely destroyed, killing 7000 Christians, and carrying the rest into captivity, excepting a few that fled to Acon and Cyprus. He seized some other christian garrisons; but that he might not awaken the resentment of the European powers against him, he concluded a truce with the other Christians in Palestine. However, Nicolas immediately sent considerable succours thither on board some Venetian ships at his own expence; but as the sultan had withdrawn his forces, they came too late to be of any great service. He likewise exhorted the christian princes to another crusade, but without effect; for since the misfortunes of St. Lewis, the zeal for that foreign expedition was greatly abated in Europe<sup>d</sup>.

A. D. 1290. The pope appoints a legate in Africa.

THE following year Nicolas published another decree against the Jews; and likewise against some Christians, who, as a protection against diseases and other misfortunes, frequented the synagogues of the Jews with lamps and lighted candles. He likewise created Roderic, a Franciscan, archbishop of Morocco, and appointed him apostolic legate in all Africa. Having also received many complaints of the great oppression of the clergy in England, he sent a legate into that kingdom, to reform the abuses and discipline of the church, and to prohibit the oppression of ecclesiastics, under pain of excommunication. About the same time, being informed of the death of Ladislaus, king of Hungary, he allowed his legate at Naples to crown Charles Martel, son of Charles the lame, king of Hungary, in his mother's right, who was only sister to Ladislaus, who died without issue. He delayed sending him into Hungary, because the Hungarian nobles, even before the death of Ladislaus, had chosen another king, from another branch of the royal family; but he sent two nuncios to Rodolphus, to prohibit him from attempting any thing to the prejudice of the rights of Charles Martel, in favour of his own son Albert, duke of Austria<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Ap. EYMER. Director. inquis. par. ii. p. 44.

& WADDING. hoc an.

Bell. Sac. &c.

<sup>c</sup> SURIT. Indic. l. ii. MARIAN. l. xiv. c. 11. NANG. in Chron.

<sup>e</sup> SPOND. Annal. See also the History of Hungary.

<sup>a</sup> Annales MINOR. t. ii. hoc an. SPOND. Annal.

<sup>b</sup> BZOV.

<sup>d</sup> SANUT. contin.

<sup>a</sup> MEAN while the king of Arragon, being still attacked by the French and their allies the Castilians, in consequence of his deposition by Martin IV. was now very desirous of being reconciled to the apostolic see, and sent an ambassador to the pope, intreating his mediation to procure a peace. Nicolas was likewise solicited to the same purpose by Edward, king of England, who, as he had been the chief instrument of procuring the liberty of Charles, thought himself obliged to see the articles performed. Accordingly the pope, at his intreaty, granted a commission to two legates to compose all differences, who, holding a congress at Tarasco, in Provence, with the ambassadors of the kings of France, Arragon, and Sicily, and of Charles Valois, pretender to the crown of Arragon, concluded a peace on these conditions; <sup>b</sup> that the king of Arragon should pay, according to the agreement of his ancestors, an annual tribute of thirty ounces of gold to the see of Rome; should restore the hostages of Charles king of Naples; should oblige his mother and brother to restore Sicily; should go to Rome and ask pardon of the pope, and afterwards lead an army to the assistance of the Christians in Palestine. On performance of those conditions, Charles Valois agreed to quit his pretensions to his kingdom, and the pope promised to take off the sentence of interdict<sup>f</sup>. Alphonso was prevented from fulfilling the conditions of the treaty by death, which happened to him a few months afterwards.

The king of Arragon is reconciled to see of Rome. A. D. 1291.

DURING these transactions in Provence, Nicolas, at the desire of the king of Servia, appointed inquisitors of the faith in Bosnia, against the heretics in that principality; and wrote to George, emperor, as he stiled himself, of the Bulgarians, to invite him to an union with the Roman church. But his attention was chiefly engaged in opposing the Saracens, who had <sup>c</sup> lately taken Ptolemais or Acon, and intirely expelled the Christians from Asia. Upon receiving this melancholy news, he ordered a crusade to be preached every where, and earnestly exhorted the christian princes to lay aside their mutual divisions, and to turn their arms against the Infidels. He not only wrote to the western princes, but likewise to the emperors of Constantinople and Trebisond, to the king of the eastern Tartars, and to the king of the Armenians, Iberians, and Georgians, soliciting them to give their assistance against the Saracens; and informing them, that Edward, king of England, had already taken the cross, and was to sail in a short time for Syria. He also prohibited, by a very severe edict, any one from carrying arms, timber, iron, or any other merchandize, into any other port belonging to the Saracens<sup>g</sup>. <sup>d</sup> As the knights Templars and Hospitallers, the two most powerful orders, harrassed each other with perpetual animosities and dissensions, he consulted with the emperor of Constantinople, the kings of England and France, and with the masters of the orders, and the bishops, about uniting the orders under one general, and under the same regulations. Councils were likewise ordered to be celebrated through the different provinces of Europe, in order to hasten the succours; but nothing was effected that year, on account of the death of the emperor Rodolphus, who had declared himself the most forward to undertake the sacred expedition. A few months after, Nicolas received an embassy from the king of Armenia, imploring the assistance of the European princes against the Saracens: as <sup>e</sup> the ambassadors had likewise letters to the kings of France and England, he sent them to those princes, with letters also from himself; but he died quickly after at Rome, on the 18th of April, and was buried in the church of St. Mary Major.

The Christians entirely expelled from Syria.

A. D. 1292.

Nicolas dies at Rome.

UPON the death of Nicolas, the cardinals went to Perugia to chuse a successor; but two Roman cardinals, of the families of the Orsini and Colonna, from their antient rivalry, divided the college into factions, and delayed the election for more than two years. At length cardinal Latinus naming Peter di Murro, who lived a solitary life in a valley near Sulmo, they <sup>f</sup> unanimously chose him pope, on the 5th of July, and sent the archbishop of Lyons, with four other persons, to acquaint him with his promotion. He, with great reluctance, accepted of the papal dignity; but being prevailed upon by the intreaties of king Charles and his son, the king of Hungary, and many other persons, he mounted on an ass, and set out for Aquila, in the kingdom of Naples, where he was consecrated, on the 28th of August, no less than 200,000 people being present on that occasion, according to the relation of Ptolemy of Lucca, who was an eye-witness<sup>h</sup>. At his consecration he took the name of Celestine V. and having confirmed the order which he had lately instituted, he proceeded to Naples, where he created twelve cardinals, two of whom were monks of his own order, and some others Frenchmen, and friends of king Charles<sup>i</sup>. As he continued in his former manner of life, without assuming any thing of the splendor of a pope, and from his ignorance and simplicity conferred benefices on improper persons, and even granted the same things to different suitors, the cardinals quickly thought of deposing him. Benedict, cardinal Cajetan, being in hopes of the pontificate for himself, and having great influence with Celestine, who of himself was willing

Celestine V. is chosen pope. 1294.

<sup>f</sup> SUMMONT. l. iii. c. 2.

<sup>g</sup> SPOND. Annal. Cont. Bell. Sacr. l. v. c. 5. VILLAN. l. vii. c. 144.

<sup>h</sup> PTOL. Luc. Hist. l. xxiv. c. 32. Vita. Celest. V. apud MURATOR. PLATINA.

<sup>i</sup> SPOND. Annal.

He abdicates
the dignity.

to abdicate, prevailed with him to hasten his resolution. Accordingly the pope, notwithstanding the opposition of king Charles and the people of Naples, on the 15th of December made a decree for his own abdication, which having read to the cardinals, he immediately pulled off his pontifical ornaments, and laid them at their feet*. He is blamed by some authors for his abdication; but by others greatly extolled, especially by Alvarus and Petrarch<sup>1</sup> (Q).

Boniface VIII.
elected pope.

THE cardinals having received a power to proceed to a new election, ten days after the abdication of Celestine, chose Benedict, who was born at Anagni, of the noble family of the Cajetans. He took the name of Boniface VIII. and, on the 3d day after his election annulled all the acts, not yet executed, of Nicolas IV. and his predecessor Celestine, and revoked all the dispensations, indulgences, and bulls of reversion granted by them. This proceeding created him a great many enemies, who accused him of arrogance and pride, and that he had acquired the pontificate by indirect and fraudulent means. To stop this clamour, he published a confession of his faith, which he presented at the altar of St. Peter, in which church he was consecrated, about the middle of January, in the presence of the kings of Sicily and Hungary, who, upon his return from the church, walked on both sides of his horse, which they held by the bridle.

He imprisons Celestine.

As the legality of his election was greatly questioned, Boniface was afraid lest his enemies should oblige Celestine to re-assume the papal dignity; he therefore made diligent enquiry to find him out, while Celestine, on the other hand, as earnest to hide himself from the world, had thrice endeavoured to pass over into Dalmatia, but was prevented by the wind. Upon being discovered, he was carried back to the pope, who chid him in an arrogant manner for departing without his leave, and accepting of no excuse, confined him in a strong castle during his life<sup>m</sup>. He likewise confirmed his abdication by a bull, and prevailed with a monk of the order of St. Austin to write a learned apology in his defence, proving him a true and lawful pope<sup>n</sup>.

Concludes a peace betwixt
the French and the Ar-ragonians.

AFTER he had thus provided for his own security in his new dignity, he sent the bishops of Albano and Pilastrina, as his legates, to reconcile the kings of France and England; and being informed that the emperor Adolphus had accepted of a subsidy from the king of England to act against France, he sent two legates to him in Germany, to exhort him to desert that alliance, but without any effect at that time. He was more successful in concluding the peace betwixt the French and the Arragonians at Anagni; the king of Arragon promising to deliver up Sicily, and all he possessed in Italy, to the king of Naples, and to furnish forces against the Sicilians if they refused to submit. But these islanders thinking it the worst of evils to be again subject to the government of the French, immediately chose Frederic, brother to the king of Arragon, for their king, Boniface in vain opposing their proceeding by his nuncios, who were obliged to withdraw from the fury of the populace. The pope likewise resolving to procure peace in Italy, sent for the bishops and deputies from the republics of Venice and Genoa, then engaged in a ruinous war, and earnestly persuaded them to a reconciliation; but as their demands on both sides were extravagant, an accommodation could not be effected<sup>o</sup>. Isarnus, bishop of Carcassonne, was likewise sent as legate into Denmark, to procure the liberty of the archbishop of Lunden, whom the king had put in chains on account of a dispute about the different rights of the church and the crown.

A. D. 1296. THE following year Boniface again ordered his legates to exhort the kings of France and England to a reconciliation; and at the same time to appoint a truce to be observed by them under pain of excommunication. As Edward was engaged in a war with Scotland, he willingly accepted of the truce; but Philip having met with some success, refused to comply with * CIACON. in Celest. V.

<sup>1</sup> PLANET. Eccles. l. ii. c. 11. PETRARCH. de Vit. Solit. l. ii. c. 18.

<sup>m</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>n</sup> ÆGID. de Renunciat. Pap. l. i.

<sup>o</sup> FOLIET. Hist. Gen. l. vi.

(Q) During the pontificate of Celestine, the famous chapel of the Virgin Mary is said to have been transported by angels into Italy. According to the story, after the Saracens had made themselves entirely masters of Palestine, the pilgrims being denied access to the chapel at Nazareth, it was conducted, in the year 1291, at midnight, into Dalmatia, and placed upon a little hill near the shore of the Adriatic. At the same time it was revealed to a curate in the neighbourhood, that it was the chapel of Nazareth; upon which the governor of Dalmatia sent four persons of note into Palestine, to enquire into the truth of his assertion, who, upon their return, confirmed the revelation of the curate. Three years afterwards, the angels transported the chapel into the march of Ancona again, at midnight, and placed it in a wood belonging to a religious lady. About eight months after, it was removed from the wood to a hill, about two miles distance, belonging to two brothers, who immediately quarrelled about the possession of the chapel; when it unexpectedly took another leap to the place where it now stands. Notwithstanding pope Boniface is quite silent with regard to this miracle, and it is never mentioned by Dante, Petrarch, St. Antonin, Vincent, Ferrier, or other authors of those times, nay, even though Vincent seems to mention the chapel as still in Nazareth, yet the story is firmly believed by many persons in the communion of the Roman church (2).

a the orders of the legates, alleging, that the temporal government of his kingdom belonged to himself alone. To assert his right, he published an edict, forbidding all strangers, ecclesiastics not excepted, from entering his kingdom, or any Frenchmen to go out without his express permission. Mean while Boniface, having received great complaints against the king of England, for obliging his clergy by force to submit to a new tax, together with the rest of his subjects; and other princes being likewise accused of oppressing their clergy, he published a bull, prohibiting all kings, princes, or nobles, from raising any subsidy, or tax, under any pretence whatever, from ecclesiastics, or the ecclesiastics from giving what was demanded of them, without the permission of the pope, under pain of excommunication, both against the givers and the exactors<sup>p</sup>. But being informed of the edict of the king of France, he published another bull, somewhat more moderate, allowing, that sovereigns in great necessities of state had an authority to raise taxes, even upon ecclesiastics<sup>q</sup>. About this time we are informed by Spondanus<sup>r</sup>, that Boniface confirmed the vicariate of Tuscany, granted by the emperor, to John de Cabilon; but the cities of Italy being desirous of shaking off the yoke of the empire, drew the pope into their party by a present of 80,000 florins, who, in consequence of that sum, soon after persuaded the vicar to overlook the rights of the empire, by conferring the bishopric of Liege upon his brother.

He likewise began at this time to persecute the family of Colonna, in resentment of the opposition made to his election by two cardinals of that name, who had even published some libels against him, addressed to all christian princes, accusing him of pride, ambition, and avarice, and asserting, that none were obliged to obey him, as he was not a lawful pope. Boniface embraced the first opportunity of taking revenge; and Stephen Colonna seizing and carrying off some of the sacred utensils, the pope cited him, and his brother and uncle, both cardinals, to appear and justify themselves at Rome. But they neglected the summons, and trusting to the power of their family, and the strength of the Gibeline faction, fortified themselves in Pilastrina. The pope being informed of their contempt, called a council of the cardinals and bishops who were then at Rome. There he deposed the two cardinals from their dignity and honour, deprived them of their benefices, confiscated the estates of their relations, and declared their adherents excommunicated. Soon after he ordered a crusade to be preached against them and their adherents, as schismatics, took some of their castles and towns, which he pillaged and destroyed, and pursued them where-ever he suspected they had fled<sup>s</sup> (R).

WHILE he thus persecuted the two cardinals of the family of Colonna, that he might not raise the resentment of the rest of the college against him, he published a most severe bull, against any one that should injure a cardinal, adding some articles for the immunity of the clergy. He likewise canonized St. Lewis, late king of France; and expelled the regular canons from the Lateran church, upon account of the depravity of their manners, and neglect of discipline. Having also appointed James, king of Arragon, standard-bearer, general, and admiral of the church, upon his arrival at Rome, he crowned him king of Corfica and Sardinia, which two islands he granted him as fiefs of the see of Rome, under an annual tribute of 2000 merks sterling, and a certain number of ships and land-forces, according to the necessities of the church<sup>t</sup>. The design of the pope was to animate him against his brother Frederic, possessor of Sicily; accordingly James published an edict, ordering all the subjects of Castile and Arragon to quit Sicily, under pain of being accounted deserters and traitors<sup>u</sup>. He likewise solicited his brother to a conference in the island of Ischia near Naples, but without effect: however, his mother Constantia and sister Violante came thither, and went with him to Rome, together with John di Procida and Roger di Doria, the famous Sicilian admiral, who both deserted the party of Frederic, on account of some affront they had received from him.

MEAN while the princes of Germany, dissatisfied with the government of Adolphus, sent the count of Hohenberg to Rome, to procure the consent of the pope to the deposition of

<sup>p</sup> SPOND. Annal. & alii auctor. Cod. MS.

<sup>q</sup> Histor. Dissid. inter Bonif. & Philip.

<sup>r</sup> SPOND. Annal. ex auctor.

<sup>s</sup> VILLAN. l. vii. c. 21. BLOND. D. ii. p. 334 & 335. SPOND. Annal.

<sup>t</sup> SURIT. Indic.

<sup>u</sup> SUMMONT. Hist. Neap. l. iii.

(R) Being informed, though falsely, that they had fled to Genoa, he testified his resentment by his behaviour to the archbishop of that city, who being at Rome on Wednesday, came with others, according to custom, and kneeled at his feet. Boniface, when he addressed himself to him, instead of using the common form, Remember man that thou art ashes, and to ashes shalt thou return; said, Remember man that thou art Gibeline, and with the Gibelines to ashes shalt thou return, and instead of crossing his head with the ashes, he threw them into his eyes. The same day he likewise deprived him of his archbishopric; but being soon after informed that the banished cardinals had never been at Genoa he restored him to his dignity (3).

(3) Blond. Dec. ii. l. 9, Platina in Vit. Bonif. & alii.

to the deposti-tion of Adolphus.
A. D. 1298.

emperor; but notwithstanding the count's solicitations and presents, Boniface would not agree to the desire of the electors; but declared to the ambassadors of Adolphus, that if he would come to Rome he would confer upon him the imperial crown. About the same time he sent the general master of the Dominicans, and the general minister of the Franciscans, to reconcile the kings of France and England, who prevailed with them to agree to a truce for two years, and to send deputies to the pope, who offered to negotiate a peace, not as judge, but as mediator<sup>w</sup>. Soon after he was informed, that the electors had deposed the emperor Adolphus; and that he was killed in the battle by his competitor Albert; which news was quickly after confirmed by an embassy from Albert, desiring the confirmation of his election by the pope. Boniface refused the request of the ambassadors, and declared, that Albert ought to be accounted a traitor, for rebelling against his lawful sovereign. Mean while he applied himself to settle the articles of the treaty betwixt the kings of France and England, and the count of Flanders, the king of England's ally. He determined that the peace should be confirmed by a double alliance; namely, that the king of England and his son should marry, the one the sister and the other the daughter of the king of France, who should likewise restore the cities, and the captive daughter of the count Flanders. This last article greatly enraged king Philip, who declared that he would not observe it; and one of his nobles is said to have snatched the pope's letter from the hands of the archbishop of Rheims, to have torn it with his teeth, and to have thrown it into the fire. As this behaviour of the king, and the edict published by him three years before, tended to an open rupture with the pope, he concluded a treaty with the emperor Albert, which he strengthened by an alliance betwixt the emperor's son Rodolphus, and Blanch his own sister.

He disapproves of the king of England's invasion of Scotland,

DURING these proceedings of the king of France, Boniface ordered the king of England to set John Baliol, his prisoner, and king of Scotland, at liberty. He likewise ordained a truce to be observed for two years between England and Scotland; and declared to Edward, that the kingdom of Scotland was not subject to England, but belonged to the Roman see; he therefore required him to set the Scotch bishops and ecclesiastics, who had asserted the independency of their kingdom, at liberty; and, if he thought he had any claim to Scotland, he desired him to send deputies to Rome, to justify his pretensions before the apostolic see<sup>x</sup>. Soon after being informed that the king of Arragon, after some successes, had deserted Sicily, he wrote to him, reproaching him with neglecting his engagements; he likewise reprov'd the king of Naples for trusting the command of his armies to his sons, who were without experience; and having sent for Charles of Valois, the brother of the king of France, to command in Italy, he strictly prohibited the king of Naples in the mean time from entering into any accomodation with Frederic and the Sicilians.

The first jubilee held at
Rome.
A. D. 1300.

THE following year being accounted the beginning of a new century, Boniface, says Spondanus, opened a short way to heaven, and published a bull, promising a full pardon and remission of all things, to those who, being confessed and penitent, should visit the churches of the apostles Peter and Paul for fifteen days. From this general indulgence he excepted those who traded with the Saracens; and likewise Frederic the possessor of Sicily, with all those that adhered to him, especially the Genoese, whom, together with the cardinals of the family of Colonna, he excommunicated in the Lateran church on Good Friday. In consequence of this bull granted by the pope, such great numbers of people of all conditions flocked from all parts of Europe to Rome, that during the greatest part of the year there were reckoned no less than 200,000 strangers in the city; and the author of the chronicle of Parma declares, that the travellers on the Claudian road had the appearance every day of the march of a numerous army<sup>y</sup>. Notwithstanding this great concourse of foreigners in Italy and at Rome, Villani, who was an eye-witness, relates, that there was the greatest abundance of provisions, which never rose above the common price<sup>z</sup> (S).

The king of the Tartars

DURING these rejoicings at Rome, Boniface received an embassy from Casquus, king of the Tartars, informing him, that, together with the kings of Georgia and Armenia, he had marched with an army of 200,000 men into Syria, and had defeated the sultan

<sup>w</sup> WALSINGHAM, in Edw. I. VILLAN. l. viii. c. 20. MURATOR. <sup>x</sup> SPOND. et regest. Vatic. <sup>y</sup> Chron. Parm. ap. l. ix. p. 842. <sup>z</sup> VILLAN. l. viii. c. 36. TRITHEM. in Chron. Hirsang. ANTON. tit. xx. c. 8. Sect. 11.

(S) This institution of Boniface afterwards got the name of Jubilee, and was kept up by his successors, who observed it every fifty years. But that Boniface may not be said to have first instituted it, in imitation of the Sæculum of the antient Romans, or the Jubilee of the Jews, Spondanus assures us, that the observation of this century indulgence was much more antient than that pope; and from a treatise of cardinal Cajetan, Boniface's nephew, concerning the jubilee, relates, that in the beginning of the year, the Romans, assembling of their own accord in crowds at the Vatican church, the pope, moved by their devotion, made diligent enquiry, and found an old man of 107 years of age, who remembered to have heard his father say, that he went to Rome upon the institution of a general indulgence in the year 1200. This relation being verified by two old men in France, and others in Italy, the pope confirmed the antient institution by a bull, which he published on the 22d of February.

<sup>a</sup> of Egypt, and afterwards taken possession of Damascus; but upon hearing that his own kingdom was invaded, he had marched back with his army, and therefore in-treated the pope and the princes of Europe to send succours into Syria, to secure his conquests, before the Saracens should reinforce their army. This embassy caused great joy at Rome; but no succours were sent into Syria, the pope and the christian princes, according to Villani and Antoninus, being too much employed in prosecuting their own private resentments, to mind the public welfare<sup>a</sup>. Boniface, however, prevailed with the king of Naples to permit a galley to be fitted out in Apulia, to carry back Guisc- card, the Tartarian ambassador<sup>b</sup>. He likewise confirmed the edict of Charles against the Saracens of Lucera or Nocera, obliging them to receive baptism upon pain of death, <sup>b</sup> in consequence of which, the greatest part of them quitted Italy, a few of them only, who were afterwards called Marrani, chusing to receive baptism<sup>c</sup>.

THE pope likewise held a council at Rome, to deliberate upon the affairs of the Holy Land, The pope orders and sent persons to preach a crusade in the different provinces of Europe; writing also to Philip king of France, exhorting him to take the cross. His exhortations with Philip had a crusade to no effect; for that prince was animated against him, on account of his intermeddling in the dispute betwixt him and the king of England; he therefore afforded his protection to the banished cardinals, who were the occasion afterwards of widening the breach: however, at this time he allowed his brother Charles to raise the tythes that had been granted him by the pope for his journey into Italy. Boniface in the mean time received another embassy from <sup>c</sup> the emperor Albert, desiring his election to be confirmed by the apostolic see; but he would not even give audience to the German ambassadors; and appearing in public with a sword at his side, and dressed like a general, he affirmed, that he himself was both emperor and pope<sup>d</sup>.

Soon after Charles de Valois arriving at Anagni, accompanied by his wife, and a great body He creates of French nobility, the pope received him with great affection, and created him governor of Charles of all the territories of the church, pacificator of Tuscany, and vicar of the empire. He Valois vicar likewise gave him hopes of raising him to the empire of Germany, which he then rec- of the empire.
koned vacant; and even talked of conferring upon him the empire of Constantinople, A. D. 1301.
in right of his wife, who was grand-daughter to Baldwin, the last Latin emperor.
<sup>d</sup> In the mean time he sent him to Florence, to compose the dissensions in that city, which was then divided into the factions of the Whites and the Blacks, who persecuted each other with as great animosity as the Guelphs and Gibelines had done formerly. These two factions arose some years before, from the discords among the descendents of the same family, which the Florentines at first endeavoured to quell, but insensibly were led to patronize; and the Whites becoming inferior, had recourse to the party of the Gibelines, which drew upon them the hatred of the pope. Charles, upon his arrival at Florence, instead of acting as an impartial mediator, fomented the discords; and, after five months residence, left the city more embroiled than he found it at his arrival<sup>e</sup>.

MEAN while Boniface sent the bishop of Pamiers as his legate to the king of France, to Difference be- <sup>e</sup> excite him to an expedition to Syria, and to prohibit him, under pain of excommunication, twixt the pope from appropriating the tythes raised for that purpose, from conferring vacant benefices with- and the king of out the consent of the pope, and from retaining the revenues of vacant bishoprics. As the France.
legate a few years before had been created a bishop by the pope, contrary to the inclination of the king, he executed his commission with great indiscretion and insolence; and affirmed, that he was subject to none but the pope, both in spiritual and temporals. Philip, to repress his insolence, called an assembly of the nobles and bishops at Senlis; and producing several articles of accusation against the legate, committed him as a prisoner to the archbishop of Narbonne, his metropolitan. Boniface, informed of the imprisonment of his legate, sent a nuncio to order the king of France, in his name, to set him at liberty, and to desist from <sup>f</sup> oppressing the clergy, declaring at the same time, that the pope was sovereign of the whole world, both in temporals and spirituals, and to think otherwise was a heresy. The nuncio likewise had orders to summon the bishops and doctors to a council, to be held the following year at Rome; and if the king should refuse to set the legate at liberty, to absolve his subjects from their allegiance, and declare the kingdom of France fallen to the apostolic see.

THE bull was no sooner produced, but the count of Artois snatched it from the nuncio, and threw it into the fire; and he, together with the legate, who was set at liberty, were ordered immediately to depart the kingdom. The king likewise called a parliament, and decreed, that no ecclesiastic should go to Rome; and that no person should carry any gold or silver out of the kingdom. Guards were also placed on the confines, to prevent any other

<sup>a</sup> HAYTHON. c. 41. VILLAN. l. viii. c. 35.<sup>b</sup> SUMMONT. l. iii. c. 2.<sup>c</sup> BLOND. D. ii. l. 9. COL-

LENUF. l. viii.

<sup>d</sup> SPOND. ANNAL. BAILLET, DEMALES, de Boniface, p. 69.<sup>e</sup> VILLAN. l. x. c.

48. BLOND. ubi supra. Chron. Parmens.

letters to be brought from the pope; and Peter Flota, one of the king's counsellors, was a sent to Rome, to defend the rights of the king; who is said to have behaved with great intrepidity; and upon the pope's threatening the king with excommunication, to have replied, Holy father, your sword is only verbal; but that of my master is real. The church of Rome being expressly specified in the prohibition for carrying gold and silver out of the kingdom, Boniface, on the 4th of December, published a suspension of all the privileges and favours conferred on the kings of France by the apostolic see; and prohibited the ecclesiastics from paying any tythes or subsidy whatever, without the express mandate of the same see; ordering, at the same time, the bulls, containing the aforesaid privileges and favours, to be laid before the future general council, to which he again summoned the clergy of France<sup>f</sup>.

The bishops of Hungary excommunicate the pope.

A. D. 1302.
He receives an embassy from the king and the nobles of France.

DURING this dispute with the king of France, Boniface sent a legate into Hungary, to prevail with the nobles and bishops of that kingdom to chuse Carobert, the son of Charles Martel, for their king; but that kingdom being divided into factions, the most powerful party chose the son of the king of Bohemia; and the legate no sooner expressed his resentment at their proceeding, but they in their turn assembled, and excommunicated and banished the pope, and all his adherents<sup>g</sup>. A few months after Boniface received an embassy from France by three bishops, who brought letters to him from the bishops, nobles, and the king. The bishops declared their astonishment at his unheard-of proposition, of the dependency of France upon the apostolic see, and excused themselves from leaving the kingdom. The letter of the nobles was in French, and in a stile much more severe than that of the bishops; and that of the king expressed his contempt of the pope, and his resentment for the injuries he had received. In answer to these letters, the pope wrote to the king, protesting, that he never intended to usurp his jurisdiction; and if he would send noblemen of probity to Rome, he would revoke whatever they should think had been said or done to the prejudice of the rights of the king or kingdom of France. At the same time he insisted that the bishops should obey his summons to the council at Rome, under pain of being deposed and deprived of their benefices. Soon after he published a bull, concerning the authority and power of the church, and the two swords granted to her by Christ; in answer to which several treatises were published in France concerning the papal and regal power, demonstrating, that the church had no authority in temporal affairs.

Confirms the election of the emperor.

1303.

MEAN while Boniface, being resolved to humble the king of France, at length consented d to acknowledge the validity of the election of the emperor Albert, on condition that he renounced all treaties and alliances made with any princes to the prejudice of the holy see; that he took an oath of fidelity to the pope, and confirmed all the grants of his predecessors. During this negotiation with the emperor, he sent another legate into France, with twelve articles to be assented to and subscribed by the king; the chief of which were, that Philip should allow the ecclesiastics to come to Rome; that the conferring of benefices belonged to the pope, who had likewise an authority of sending nuncios or legates into any kingdom, without the request or consent of any one; that no layman had any authority of disposing of ecclesiastical revenues; that the supreme authority belonged to the apostolic see, which might impose a tythe or subsidy upon ecclesiastics, without the consent of any prince; e that the king ought to appear by his proxy before the pope, to give satisfaction for the contempt of the apostolic see, in burning the bull sealed with the pictures of St. Peter and St. Paul; that the city of Lyons and its suburbs were not within the bounds of the kingdom of France; and that the spiritual sword ought to be restored to the clergy, notwithstanding any privileges of the king or his officers.

The king of France is excommunicated, appeals to a general council.

THE king of France, to justify himself from the accusation of oppressing his clergy, published an edict for the reformation of his kingdom, by which he allowed all the ecclesiastics to enjoy the same privileges they were in possession of during the reign of St. Lewis; but he absolutely refused to sign the articles above-mentioned. On which account the pope, having then concluded his treaty with the emperor, published a sentence of excommunication against f Philip, and ordered the bishops of France to appear personally, or by their proxies, within three months, at Rome, under pain of deposition. Philip immediately called a parliament at Paris, in which assembly the nobles drew up a long accusation against Boniface, accusing him of divers heresies, of the death Celestine, of intrusion into the apostolic see, of simony, sacrilege, magick, and other enormous crimes; and appealing to a future general council, they were joined in their appeal by the king and the bishops, with a salvo of the honour and reverence due to the Roman church, from which they had no intention to recede. The pope, who was then at Anagni, being informed of the proceedings of the parliament at Paris, cleared himself by oath of the crimes laid to his charge by that assembly; he then confirmed the censures against the king by another excommunication; he likewise laid his kingdom under an interdict, absolved his subjects from their allegiance, ordered the emperor to a take possession of France, and excited the king of England and the Flemings to make war upon Philip.

<sup>f</sup> DEMELES ut supra. SPOND. Annal. Vit. Bonif. ap. MURATOR.

<sup>g</sup> BONFIN. D. ii. l. ix.

MEAN while the cardinals Colonna being still in France, formed a scheme with William Nogaret, one of the counsellors of the king, of seizing upon the pope: they accordingly set out for Italy, and arriving in Tuscany, Nogaret pretended that he came to treat of peace with the pope; but having some secret associates at Anagni, he privately hired three or four hundred French horse that had come into Italy with the count of Valois, who assembling in the neighbourhood of Anagni, on the 7th of September, surprized the town, and immediately took possession of the pope's palace. Boniface, on the first alarm, was deserted by all the cardinals except two; and Nogaret and Sciarra Colonna entering his chamber, used him with great indignity, and threatened to carry him bound to Lyons, to be deposed by a general council. After they had detained him three days, and plundered all his treasures, which were immense, the citizens of Anagni, awaking from their surprize, expelled the French, and set the pope at liberty. Boniface a few days after returned under a strong guard to Rome; but the grief and vexation of his imprisonment made such an impression on his spirits, that he was seized with a fever, of which he died on the 12th of October, and was buried the next day in the church of St. Peter.<sup>b</sup>

Boniface is seized by the French and Colonna at Anagni;

and dies of grief.

A FEW days after the death of Boniface, the conclave assembled in the Vatican palace, and unanimously chose friar Nicolas Bocasini, bishop of Ostia (T), who took the name of Benedict XI. Benedict, by some reckoned the Xth, but by others the XIth of that name. Immediately after his election, he cited Nogaret, Sciarra, and all those concerned in seizing Boniface, to appear at Rome; and soon after he received letters of congratulation from the emperor and the king of France. An embassy likewise arrived from the Tartars, intreating a reconciliation among the christian princes, and succours to be sent into the Holy Land. About the same time Benedict also received a letter in the Chaldaic language from Insibrain, patriarch of the eastern christians, acknowledging the pope to be the chief pastor and judge of all christians, and the Roman church the mother of all other churches<sup>1</sup>. In the mean time Italy being still harrassed by the opposite factions of the Guelphs and Gibelines, Benedict sent a legate into Tuscany to procure a general peace. The legate appointed new officers in Florence; but having proposed to recall the Gibelines and Whites who were banished, the opposite faction rose against him, and in a violent manner obliged him to desist. On account of this insult, he laid the city under an interdict, and excommunicated the citizens, and then returned to the pope, who, by reason of the seditions at Rome, had gone to Perugia. While Benedict resided in that city, he absolved the king of France from the sentence of excommunication, and annulled all the acts of his predecessor against him, restoring likewise the cardinals of Colonna family to the communion of the church, but not to their former dignity. He also endeavoured to reconcile the Venetians and Paduans; received homage from the king of Aragon for Sardinia and Corfica; sent a legate to compose the differences betwixt England and Scotland; and reproved Frederic, the possessor of Sicily, for not being contented with the title of king of Trinacria, according to the articles of the peace agreed to betwixt him and the king of Naples. At the same time he exhorted him to an expedition into the Holy Land; but while he was intent on animating the princes to a crusade, he died at Perugia, on the 7th of July, not without the suspicion of poison<sup>2</sup>.

He endeavours to reconcile the factions of Italy;

A. D. 1304.

Annuls the acts of his predecessor against the king of France.

He dies at Perugia.

UPON the death of Benedict, the college of cardinals was divided into two parties, the one endeavouring to chuse a pope that would confirm the acts of Boniface, the other intent upon having one a friend to the king of France and the Colonna family. Each party persevered so obstinately in their purpose, that the papal see was vacant near the space of ten months. At length they agreed that the one party should name three Frenchmen that were not of the college, one of whom should be chosen pope by the other party within forty days after. According to this agreement, the party averie to the king of France named three Frenchmen who were known to be his enemies. Philip, being informed of the nomination, by his friends, immediately sent for the archbishop of Bourdeaux, one of the candidates, to France, who, upon his arrival, offered to agree to the terms proposed by the king, on condition of his procuring for him the pontificate. Philip then proposed that he should give a fuller pardon of the violence committed against Boniface, whose memory he should condemn;

A. D. 1305.

<sup>b</sup> DEMELE ut supra. SPOND. Annal. Chron. Parmenf. VILLAN. See also the history of France. ex regist. Vatic.

<sup>1</sup> Vita Benedicti. ap. MURATOR, PLATINA. WILL. Westmonast.

<sup>2</sup> SPOND.

(T) He was born at Trevifo, of mean parentage, his father being a shepherd. At fourteen years of age he took the habit of a Dominican, and by the several decrees of preferment, arose to a general of the order. Upon his promotion to the pontificate, his mother came to visit him, richly dressed, by the presents she had received from the Roman ladies; on which account, it is said, he pretended not to know her, affirming, that his mother was not a lady, but a poor washer-woman. But after she had laid aside her finery, and resumed her usual dress, he received her with great affection and respect.

The archbishop of Bourdeaux is elected pope,
and takes the name of Clement V.

He revokes the bulls of Boniface against the king of France.
A. D. 1306.

Sends a legate into Italy, to quiet the troubles in that kingdom.

He excommu-nicates the Greek emperor.

He creates bishops in Great Tar-
tary; and that he should grant him the tythes of his kingdom for five years, and restore the cardinals of the Colonna family to their former dignity; which articles the archbishop swearing to perform, a messenger was dispatched to the cardinals at Perugia, who immediately declared the archbishop pope, and sent the decree of his election into France, intreating him to hasten his return into Italy. Upon receiving the decree of the college, he assumed the name of Clement V.; and, sending for the cardinals to Lyons, he was consecrated in that city on the 14th of November, in the presence of the king of France, the dukes of Britany, Burgundy, and Lorraine, and many other princes (A). Clement, immediately after his consecration, reconciled the king of France to the church in the fullest manner; and, in the Advent following, restored the cardinals of the Colonna family, and made a promotion of ten others, all of whom, except one, were Frenchmen<sup>1</sup>.

THE following year he revoked the bulls of Boniface to the prejudice of the king of France, and granted him the tythes of his kingdom for five years. About the same time we find that he granted the tythes for two years to the king of England, for an expedition into the Holy Land; and afterwards he made the same concession in favour of other Christian princes, to assist them against the Moors and Turks, and, in general, all the enemies of the church. Having likewise created the bishop of Durham patriarch of Jerusalem, he ordered him to go the emperor, and the kings of Hungary, Cyprus, and Armenia, to implore their assistance in recovering Palestine; and, as he thought it would be of service to the affairs of Syria that Constantinople were recovered from the Greeks, he desired the count of Valoris to invade that empire, and not only assisted him with some supplies of money, but likewise prevailed with the Venetians to enter into an alliance with him, and to promise him the assistance of their fleet.

CLEMENT, being likewise desirous of quieting the troubles of Italy, which kingdom, during the vacancy of the pontificate, had been harrassed by the party of the Guelphs, he sent two nuncios to the Florentines and Luccese, who, under the command of Robert, eldest son to the king of Naples, were besieging the Gibelines in Pistoria. The nuncios, in the name of the pope, ordered the Guelphs to desist from the siege, but their remonstrances had no effect upon the troops of Florence and Lucca; only Robert left the command of the army, and went to congratulate the pope. Clement, being informed of the obstinacy of Lucca and Florence, appointed cardinal Neapoleo Ursini, a Roman of great reputation, as his legate over all Italy and the adjacent islands, with a most ample commission. But as Neapoleo seemed inclined to favour the Gibelines, and the Albi or Whites, the Florentines refused to admit him into their city; and he was expelled from Bologna with the hazard of his life, and the loss of all his furniture and baggage; on which account he not only laid that city under a sentence of excommunication and interdict, but also deprived it of the privilege of teaching, whereupon the greatest part of the professors went and fixed their residence at Padua<sup>m</sup>.

DURING these transactions in Italy, Clement went with his court to Bourdeaux, where he suspended the archbishop of Canterbury, who was accused by the king of raising disturbances in England, while he himself was absent in Flanders. After residing several months at Bourdeaux, the pope went to Poitiers, to reconcile the kings of France and England; and as Charles of Valois and the Venetians were now prepared for attacking the empire of Constantinople, he excommunicated the emperor Andronicus, as the encourager of the Greek schism and heresy. Being likewise very earnest to recover the Holy Land, he published a severe edict, prohibiting the Christians from furnishing the Saracens with arms or military stores. About the same time frier Haythonus, a relation of the king of Armenia, coming to Poitiers, Clement received him with great affection; and, desiring him to declare his opinion of an expedition into Syria, he dictated a treatise of the affairs of Armenia, which was wrote by Nicolas Salco, and in which he proved that then was the most proper time for attacking the Saracens, because the Christian princes were not involved in war, and the Saracens were then engaged in civil wars, being likewise greatly weakened by the king of the Tartars, who still professed Christianity, and offered all the assistance in his power against the Infidels<sup>n</sup>.

NOTWITHSTANDING the arguments of Haythonus, and the intreaties of the pope, the princes of Europe could not be prevailed upon to engage in a new crusade. Clement, nevertheless, being informed of the great success of frier John de Monte Corvino, who eighteen years before

<sup>1</sup> Vit. Clement. ap. MURATOR. SPOND. ANNAL. PLATINA. tit. 20. c. 9. §. 2. & tit. 21. c. 1.

<sup>m</sup> VILLAN. l. viii. c. 82. & 85. ANTON. <sup>n</sup> HAYTHON c. 55. SANUT. l. iii. par. 15.

(A) The court of the pope being thus translated to France, continued in that kingdom for more than 70 years, to the great detriment of Italy and Rome, in which city many of the churches fell to ruins by the absence and neglect of the priests. The Italians give the name of the Babylonish Captivity to this residence of the pope's court in France (1).

- a had been sent by Nicolas IV. as legate into Ethiopia, India, and Tartary, he ordered seven Franciscans to be consecrated bishops, and sent into Tartary, that they might consecrate the legate archbishop of Cambalu, in the kingdom of Kathay, and continue themselves in that kingdom as his suffragans. He likewise wrote to the great Khân, exhorting him to embrace the Christian faith, and thanking him for his kindness to the profelytes of that religion<sup>o</sup>. About the same time he received a visit from the king of France, who intreated him, according to his oath, to condemn the memory of Boniface the eighth, and to order his bones to be thrown into the fire, as those of a heretic. Clement had no intention of fulfilling this part of his oath; but, that he might not give offence to the king, he declared to him, that Boniface could not be condemned without at the same time annulling the promotion of all those cardinals that had been made by him. Besides that, except in a general council, a pope could not be lawfully accused or convicted, he therefore would summon one for that purpose<sup>o</sup>.

- THE king, resting satisfied with this answer, transacted another affair with the pope, which at that time made a great noise in Europe. This was the extirpation of the knights templars, who were accused of horrid impieties, the discovery of which was owing to one of their order, who was imprisoned at Paris for some capital offence. He, in hopes of saving his life, informed the king of the wickedness authorized and practised by the order to which he belonged; and Philip, at this conference, acquainting the pope with the discovery made by the criminal, obtained leave from his holiness to seize upon all the templars in his kingdom, who were accordingly apprehended on the 10th of October, orders having been sent to the magistrates of all the cities to be ready with a body of troops to execute, the following night, an order contained in another letter, then only to be opened. Clement in the mean time wrote to all the bishops of Christendom, ordering them to make inquisition into the crimes of which the templars were accused, informing them in his letters, that, having received repeated accusations of that order, he had sent for a knight of eminent nobility and authority, who had secretly confessed upon his oath, that, upon receiving any one into their order, they obliged the initiated person to spit upon the cross, and to deny Christ, and that many other horrid crimes were allowed of, and generally practised, by the order. Upwards of seventy other knights having made the same voluntary confession, Clement ordered the possessions of all the templars to be confiscated, published a bull for the suppression of the order, and wrote to the ordinaries and inquisitors of the different provinces to imprison the templars, and to make inquisition into their crimes. He likewise sent two cardinals to Paris, who, publishing the bull against the order, condemned those templars, who had made a voluntary confession, to be burnt by a slow fire. The criminals recanted their former confessions; but acknowledged themselves worthy of death, because they had unjustly accused the order of crimes of which they were innocent. Several authors of those times wrote in defence of the order; and Boccace alleges, that its extirpation was owing to the avarice of the king of France, who coveted the rich possessions the templars then enjoyed in France. But as their extirpation extended to all Christendom, and their possessions were not secularised, there is no ground for this suspicion: nor is it probable that the pope would have consented to the suppression of an order which his predecessors had honoured with so many privileges, unless the evidence of their crimes had been very explicit<sup>a</sup> (B). About the same time Clement sent a legate with an army against one Dulcinus, a leader of a sect of heretics, whose chief tenets were, that all things were common; that the pope and the bishops were not true pastors, because they did not live an evangelical life; that whatever action was done from charity was free from sin. After pursuing the heretics in the Alps, the legate at last dispersed them, and seized Dulcinus and some others, who were burnt at Vercelli.

- THE following year the emperor Albert being murdered by his nephew, Clement was informed that the king of France intended to solicit him to transfer the imperial dignity to France, or to procure it for his brother Charles, according to the intention of Boniface. The pope, to free himself from the embarrassment of either disobliging the king of France, or offending the Germans, by the advice of one of his cardinals secretly informed the electors suppresses the order of the templars.

A. D. 1308. He is solicited to transfer the empire to France.

<sup>o</sup> WADDING. Annal. minor. t. 3. an. 1305, & 1307. sect. 2.

<sup>a</sup> P. PUTEANUS, GAGUIN. l. vii. Hist. Franc. Contin. Bell. Sac. l. v. c. 13. VILLAN. l. viii. c. 92. ANTON. ut supra. BLOND. D. ii. l. ix. SPOND. Annal. BOCCAC. de casibus vir. illustr.

(B) The crimes of which they were accused were said to have been first introduced among them about forty years before their extirpation, by one of their masters, who, having been taken prisoner by the sultan, could not obtain his liberty on any other condition. But the corruption of the order may be justly attributed to the immense wealth of which it was possessed, which gave an opportunity to its members to indulge in all manner of luxury and vice; for, instead of distinguishing themselves, as at their first institution, by their military exploits, they were then only remarkable for their arrogance and intemperance, so that it became a proverbial reproach against any one who wasted his time in gluttony and drunkenness, to say, that he drank like a templar.

of the intentions of Philip, and advised them to proceed to an election without delay, before a he should have time to negotiate the affair. The electors followed his advice; and, according to his recommendation, on the 27th of November, chose Henry duke of Luxemburgh for emperor, while the king of France was on the road to Poitiers, to solicit the interest of the pope<sup>r</sup>. Clement in the mean time proposing to remove his court to Avignon, a city in Provence, under the dominion of the king of Sicily, he allowed his attendants then to disperse, but ordered them to assemble at Avignon about the middle of January, in the following year. Soon after his arrival at that city, being informed that the Venetians had taken possession of Ferrara, a city belonging to the church, he excommunicated them in a grand procession, deprived them of all commerce with other states, and granted all their dominions to any one who was able and willing to seize upon them<sup>s</sup>. He received likewise an embassy from the emperor, desiring the confirmation of his election, and swearing fidelity to the apostolic see. b He granted the request of the ambassadors, on condition that the emperor should come to Rome within two years, to receive the imperial crown; and as a mark of his respect for Henry, he sent two cardinals into Germany, to accompany him in that journey. The Venetians, notwithstanding their excommunication, still keeping possession of Ferrara, he sent his relation Arnald de Pelagria, a cardinal deacon, against them, with an army of French crusaders, who, having entered into an alliance with Bologna, Florence, and the cities of Lombardy, defeated the Venetians near the Po, and recovered the city of Ferrara. In consideration of the assistance which the cities of Florence and Bologna gave to his legate, Clement absolved them from the sentence of excommunication and interdict which had been denounced against them c by Neapoleo Ursini.

He confirms the election of the duke of Luxemburgh.
A. D. 1309.

Gives the investiture of Sicily to Robert, the son of king Charles;

ABOUT the same time Charles king of Naples dying, Clement, upon receiving the homage of Robert, the king's eldest surviving son, crowned him king of both Sicilies at Avignon, on the 8th of September, setting aside Charobert, the king of Hungary, who pretended to the crown of Sicily in right of his father Charles Martel, Robert's elder brother. Robert, upon receiving the investiture of his father's dominions, declaring his desire to undertake a sacred expedition, the pope created him general vicar of the patrimony of the church in Italy, and count of Romaniola; he likewise remitted the debt which his father had contracted to the apostolic see during his war against the Sicilians; but he renewed the obligation to pay the annual tribute of 8000 ounces of gold, as an acknowledgement of his fief<sup>t</sup>. d and annuls all the acts of Boniface against the king of France.

1310.

Soon after, at the instance of the king of France, he published, in the consistory, that all persons, who had any thing to propose for or against the late pope Boniface, should appear at Avignon before the middle of Lent, after which time no accusation would be heard. This citation being pasted up in public places, William Nogaret, who had seized the pope, and William Pleffianus, the author of the appeal to a general council, renewed their accusations against Boniface, whose character was defended by one of the cardinals with great warmth. The accusation of Boniface gave offence to several Christian princes, particularly to the kings of Castile and Arragon, who sent ambassadors to the pope, desiring him to put a stop to the proceedings against the memory of Boniface. Besides, as both parties appeared at the consistory with numerous attendants, some tumult was apprehended. Clement therefore prevailed e with the king of France not to insist upon the present trial, but to refer the determination of the whole affair to the pope and his council of cardinals; and, having received a letter from Philip, signifying his consent, he published a bull, nullifying and declaring void all that had been transacted betwixt Boniface and the king of France since the beginning of the century, commanding all writings on that subject to be erased from the registers of the Roman see, and to be expunged from all books and tablets, prohibiting any one, under pain of excommunication, from retaining or concealing any originals or copies of the writings on that subject<sup>u</sup>. From the general pardon granted to all persons concerned in the late dispute, Clement excepted William Nogaret, Sciarra Colonna, the citizens of Anagni, and those who were concerned in plundering the treasure of the church. He likewise declared Boniface a catholic, f free from all heresy, and a true pope. Soon after, upon the penitent submission of Nogaret, he absolved him from all censures that he had incurred, on condition that he should transport himself for life with arms and horses into the Holy Land, at the first general expedition thither, and in the mean time should undertake a pilgrimage to St. James of Compostella, and several other sacred places. About the same time he received an embassy from the Venetians, begging an absolution of the ecclesiastical censures, and offering to make reparation for the damages they had done to the territories of the church. Clement delayed granting their request; and, being resolved to put off the meeting of the general council, which, according to the citation, was to assemble in October, he published letters addressed to all the prelates, ordering them to

<sup>r</sup> VILLAN. l. viii. c. 101.

<sup>u</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>s</sup> Id. ibid. Bzov. hoc anno.

<sup>t</sup> VILLAN. vit. Clem. ut supra.

a assemble the following year at Vienne in Dauphiné, on the 1st of October<sup>w</sup>. Mean while the knights hospitallers, who, upon the loss of Palestine, had retired to Cyprus, having for two years attacked the Turks in the island of Rhodes, at length expelled the infidels, and made themselves masters of the island, which had before been granted to them by Andronicus, the emperor of Constantinople. Rhodes taken from the Turks by the knights hospitallers.

ABOUT the same time the emperor Henry, according to his agreement with the pope, and at the intreaty of the Gibelines, assembled a considerable army, and set out for Italy. Upon his arrival at Lausanne, he sent commissaries to the pope, who renewed the oath of fidelity, and confirmed, in the name of their master, the donations of former emperors to the Roman church. From Lausanne he advanced, in the month of November, to Turin, where he was joined by the militia of several Italian cities, particularly of Pavia, Vercelli, and Lodi, the chief of the faction of the Guelphs, who were then greatly pleased with his conduct, as he refused to hearken to some accusation of the Gibelines, declaring that he had no party in Lombardy, but came to receive homage for the whole. The Guelphs likewise then advised him not to restore any of the exiles till after his coronation; but he followed the advice of the Germans, and restored the Gibelines at Hiericuri. At Asti having heard the dispute betwixt the marquis of Saluzzo and Montferrat, about the territory of Montferrat, he decided in favour of the latter, which sentence greatly offended the Gibelines. Henry soon after marched to Milan, where he kept his Christmas, and surprised the Italians with his moderation, as he allowed Guido Turriceno, the chief of the Guelphs, and his enemy, still to reside in the common palace. A few days after he concluded a peace between him and the family of the Viconti; and, on the 6th of January, receiving the iron crown from the hands of the archbishop, he afterwards restored many of the Guelph and Gibeline exiles in several cities of Lombardy. This calm was of very short continuance; for, a violent sedition arising in Milan, the emperor was in great hazard of his life, and, with great difficulty and much bloodshed, quelled the tumult. Upon the news of this sedition, the faction of the Guelphs openly revolted from the emperor, and expelled his vicars from their cities, and entered into an alliance with Robert king of Sicily, to prevent his journey to Rome<sup>x</sup>. The emperor enters Italy with an army, and is crowned at Milan. A. D. 1311.

CLEMENT in the mean time wrote to the cities of Italy, to receive the emperor with honour, and gave a commission to five cardinals to crown him at Rome, he himself being engaged to attend the general council at Vienne. He soon after went thither with the cardinals, and the patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch, and opened the council, at which were present, according to Villanius and Antoninus, upwards of 300 archbishops and bishops, though others say only 114, and a great number of other prelates and abbots. The first session was held on the 16th of October, and it was then determined that a crusade should be preached all over Christendom. The king of France was present at the second session, which was held the following year in the month of April, and in which the council approved of the suppression of the order of templars, and agreed that all their possessions should be given to the knights hospitallers, now called the knights of Rhodes<sup>y</sup>. But their possessions in Castile, Aragon, Portugal, and Majorca, were given to other orders of knights in those kingdoms, who were employed against the Moors. The king of France likewise obtained from the council the tythes of his kingdom for six years, having engaged to take the cross within that time, and obliged his son, in case of his death, to fulfil his vow. At the third session, which was held on the 7th of May, several canons were ordained against heretics, and for the reformation of manners; after which Clement dismissed the council<sup>z</sup>. The pope likewise confirmed the decree of Gregory X. concerning the election of a bishop of Rome, and, at the solicitation of Raymund Lully, who was present at the council, he ordained, that the Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldaic, and Greek languages, should be publicly taught at Paris, Oxford, Bologna, and Salamanca, and where-ever the pope should keep his court; and that the books in those languages should be faithfully translated into the Latin tongue. The pope holds a general council at Vienne. 1312.

f MEAN while the emperor Henry, notwithstanding the great opposition of the Guelphs, and Robert king of Sicily, having marched with his army to Rome, took possession of part of the city on the north side of the Tiber, the greatest part being still in possession of the Guelphs, headed by the family of the Ursini, and supported by John prince of the Morea, brother of the king of Sicily. As the opposite faction were in possession of St. Peter's church, the emperor made several attempts to expel them, but, after skirmishing in vain for two months, a messenger was sent to the pope, to obtain the consent of his holiness to the performing of the ceremony in the Lateran church. The time for the return of the messenger being elapsed, and the tumults still increasing in the city, the cardinals were prevailed upon, by the intreaties of the emperor, to perform the ceremony without waiting for the pope's consent. Accordingly, on the 1st of August, the three cardinals who survived, having received a new oath of The emperor is crowned at Rome.

<sup>w</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>x</sup> Iter Italic. Hen. VII. apud MURATOR. l. ix.l. ix. <sup>y</sup> BOSIUS, Histor. Hospital. t. ii. lib. i. Continuat. Nangii.

Hist. Luxemb. l. xlv. BLOND. D. ii.

<sup>z</sup> SPOND. Annal.

fidelity from Henry, conferred upon him the imperial crown. Immediately after his coronation, the emperor sent ambassadors to Frederic, king of Trinacria or Sicily, and entered into an alliance with him against Robert, king of Naples, whom he intended to have attacked, in return for the assistance that he had given to the faction of the Guelphs in Rome and in Tuscany. But, the Germans insisting upon returning into their own country, he marched with his army to Tivoli, from whence the duke of Bavaria, and several nobles, with their troops, set out in their return to Germany. After their departure, the messenger arrived from the pope, with the permission to crown the emperor, at the same time ordering a new oath to be taken by him, and likewise commanding him to agree to a truce with the king of Naples for a year. Henry refused to take the oath, as he was already crowned; and, by the advice of his counsellors, he affirmed, that the pope, neither by the canon or civil law, had any power to command a truce betwixt the emperor and his vassal. However, from his regard to the pope, he promised not to attack the king of Naples for a twelvemonth; and, after a second journey to Rome, to quell the disturbances raised by the prince of Morea, he marched with his army towards Perugia, and from thence to Florence, the territories of which city he ravaged<sup>a</sup>.

The pope grants indulgences to those who would engage against the Turks.
 A. D. 1313.

WHILE the emperor was thus punishing the perfidy and ingratitude of the Guelphs in Italy, Clement wrote to Frederic king of Trinacria, and Philip prince of Taranto, desiring them to assist the emperor Andronicus against the Turks, and, for that purpose, he granted them the tythes of all the ecclesiastical revenues in their dominions: to all those likewise who would engage in that war, he granted the same indulgences as the crusaders had formerly enjoyed. About the same time, being informed of the dissensions betwixt the king and the barons of England, he sent two legates into that kingdom to reconcile the contending parties. But the barons refusing to receive the pope's letter, or accept of their mediation, they were obliged to quit the kingdom. Soon after Clement received from the emperor a copy of his sentence against the king of Naples; Henry had declared him an enemy of the empire, and guilty of treason, and therefore deprived him of all authority, and absolved his subjects from their allegiance. This proceeding of the emperor was not agreeable to the pope; however, he did not then openly condemn it, but declared that he would consider of the affair. Not long after, the great preparations of the emperor then at Pisa, and of Frederic of Sicily, equally alarming the kings of Naples and France, Clement was prevailed upon, by the solicitation of Philip the Fair, to publish a bull, prohibiting any one, under pain of excommunication, from attacking the kingdom of Naples by land or by sea, under any pretext. However, Henry, being privately assured by the pope that he would not be displeased at his conquest of Naples, he continued his preparations, and marched towards Gaeta, where he was to be joined by Frederic; but, being seized with a violent fever, he died on his road at Bonconvento, and was buried at Pisa<sup>b</sup>. Upon the death of the emperor, Clement, considering that the intended expedition against Naples would not take effect, published a bull, condemning the sentence of the emperor against the king of Sicily, because that kingdom was a fief of the apostolic see, and Robert had been condemned in his absence, without a fair trial<sup>c</sup>. He likewise created Robert vicar of the empire in Italy, and senator of Rome; and, being informed, that Frederic had seized Reggio, he excommunicated all those who should attack the kingdom of Puglia. About the same time he sent a legate to Paris about the affairs of the Holy Land, who gave the cross to the kings of France, England, and Navarre, and to many other nobles then assembled in that city. Soon after, being seized with a dysentery, and several other distempers, he proposed to go for his health to his native air of Bordeaux; but he died on the road the following year, on the 19th of April.

The emperor dies at Bonconvento.

Clement dies upon the road to Bordeaux.

1314.
 A dissension in the conclave.

UPON the death of Clement, a dissension arose among the cardinals about electing a successor; those of Guienne, or Gascony, desiring one of their own country to be chosen pope, while the other French cardinals, together with the Italians, wanted to elect another. After the contest had continued several months, the Gascons, to oblige the other party to desist from their opposition, set fire to the conclave; which had a greater effect than they intended, and burnt a great part of the city. This calamity obliging them to separate, they dispersed themselves into different cities, and delayed assembling again for more than two years, notwithstanding the intreaties of several princes and bishops. Mean while hostilities still continued between the two factions in Italy. The Pisans, being afraid of the resentment of the Guelphs, on account of their attachment to the late emperor, took into their pay all the Germans that chose to continue in Tuscany, and, by their assistance, made themselves masters of the rich and populous city of Lucca, where they seized the treasure of the Roman church, to the value of one million of florins of gold<sup>d</sup>, which was deposited there in a monastery, those

<sup>a</sup> Iter Ital. ut supra.
<sup>c</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>b</sup> Iter Ital. ut supra, FERRET. VICENT. Hist. ap. Murator. t. ix. p. 1112, &c.
<sup>d</sup> ALBERT. MUSSAT. de Gest. Ital. ap. Murator. t. x. FERRET VICENT. ut supra.

a had the charge of it being afraid to proceed to Avignon, on account of the depredations of both the factions. In Lombardy likewise, Guido Turriano, being assisted by Robert king of Sicily, defeated the troops of the Vicenti, which victory occasioned Guido's brother, the archbishop, to be expelled from Milan by Mapheo Vicenti, who, though almost seventy years of age, despised the sentence of excommunication denounced against him by the archbishop, and assumed the title of prince of Milan.

ABOUT this period the sect of Lollards began to appear in Austria and the neighbouring countries, taking their name from one Walter Lolhard, whose doctrines they followed, the chief of which are mentioned by Spondanus, namely, That mass, baptism, and extreme unction, are useless ceremonies; that the virgin Mary, after she was a mother, was not a virgin; that the real presence in the sacrament was a falsehood; that it was lawful to eat flesh on any day; that the Roman church was not the church of Christ; that the merits and intercession of saints ought to be despised, and likewise the observation of holidays and canons of the church; that perjury was no sin; that the devils would be re-admitted into heaven, and Michael and other angels thrust down to hell; that God did not punish any crimes that were committed under the earth; from whence they are accused of committing all manner of wickedness in caverns under-ground. These, and several other such tenets, they are said to have professed with such obstinacy, as to have suffered death rather than forsake them<sup>c</sup>.

The sect of the Lollards appears in Germany.

A. D. 1315.

b virgin; that the real presence in the sacrament was a falsehood; that it was lawful to eat flesh on any day; that the Roman church was not the church of Christ; that the merits and intercession of saints ought to be despised, and likewise the observation of holidays and canons of the church; that perjury was no sin; that the devils would be re-admitted into heaven, and Michael and other angels thrust down to hell; that God did not punish any crimes that were committed under the earth; from whence they are accused of committing all manner of wickedness in caverns under-ground. These, and several other such tenets, they are said to have professed with such obstinacy, as to have suffered death rather than forsake them<sup>c</sup>.

THE cardinals still continuing dispersed in different places, and, notwithstanding the solicitation of Lewis king of France, delaying to proceed to an election, that prince sent his brother Philip, count of Poitiers, to Lyons, who prevailed with them singly to come to that city, under pretence of a negotiation, and, upon their arrival, shut them up, against their inclination, in a convent of the Dominicans, threatening them with confinement till they had finished the election. After they had been shut up forty days, they at last came to an agreement to receive him as pope who should be named by the bishop of Porto. That cardinal, at the persuasion of Neapoleo Ursini, named himself; and, his brethren giving their consent, he assumed the name of John, by some reckoned the 20th, by others the 21st, but commonly called the 22d of that name<sup>f</sup>. He was consecrated in the cathedral church of that city, on the 9th of September, and immediately published the residence of his court to be at Avignon (C).

The cardinals confined in Lyons.

1316.

John XXII. chosen pope.

d The news of his election reaching Germany, he soon after received an embassy from Lewis duke of Bavaria, and Frederic duke of Austria, both competitors for the empire, and each demanding a confirmation of his election by the apostolic see. John delayed declaring in favour of either of them, under pretence of considering which of them had the preferable right. At the same time he annulled the election of John, the king of Arragon's son, to the bishopric of Tarragona, but translated thither the bishop of Saragossa.

He receives an embassy from the competitors to the empire.

THE following year, taking the advantage of the civil dissensions in Germany, he resolved effectually to crush the Gibelines in Italy, and to confirm the usurpations of his predecessor Clement upon the rights of the empire. He therefore published the constitutions of Clement, and appointed schools where they should be read and explained. Among these constitutions there were some that asserted, that the emperors were vassals of the holy see; and that the oath taken by them at their coronation was not only a promise of defending the church and the pope, but an oath of allegiance and homage; and that, during an interregnum, it belonged to the pope to dispose absolutely of all affairs of the empire, not only as superior of the empire, but from the plenitude of power which he possessed as successor of St. Peter, and vicar of Christ<sup>e</sup>. To confirm these claims of his predecessor, on the 31st of March he published a bull, declaring, that, as the empire was vacant, the administration of it, both by right and custom, belonged to the pope; he therefore prohibited, under pain of excommunication and interdict, any one, of what dignity soever, from assuming the title of vicar of the empire, without the leave of the apostolic see. At the same time he granted the vicariate of the empire in Italy to Robert king of Naples, till the coronation of the emperor, and cited the two competitors to justify their claims before the apostolic see. By this bull the pope hoped to ruin the power of Mapheo Vicenti at Milan, Canis Scaliger at Verona, Passerini Bonacossi at Mantua, and other chiefs of the Gibelines in other places of Italy, who, in their several territories, assumed the title of vicars of the empire, and generally favoured the interest of Lewis duke of Bavaria. John likewise about the same time erected several new bishoprics in France, 1317.

He claims the administration of the empire during the interregnum;

<sup>c</sup> SPOND. Annal. TRITHEM. in Chron. hoc an. HOESEM. de Gest. Pontif. Leodicus. MURATOR. VILLAN. lib. ix. cap. 79.

<sup>f</sup> Vit. Joan. apud

<sup>e</sup> SPOND. Annal ad an. 1313.

(C) John XXII. was formerly called James de Ossa, and was born at Cabors in France. He was the son of a taylor, but, distinguishing himself in his youth in the service of the archbishop of Arles, chancellor of the king of Sicily in Provence, by his assistance he found means to accomplish his studies, and procured the bishopric of Frejuli. He afterwards succeeded him as chancellor, was created bishop of Avignon, then cardinal bishop of Porto, and, when he was chosen pope, he was upwards of seventy years of age.

by dividing several dioceses; and, at the request of the king of Arragon, he created a new order of knights, under the title of St. Mary and St. George, and conferred upon them the revenues of the knights templars in Valentia. This same year also he made inquiry into the accusations of several persons who were said to have conspired against his life, and those of the whole cardinals. Among the conspirators was found Hugh bishop of Cabors, who, after his conviction and degradation, was delivered over to the secular magistrates, by whose sentence he was first partly flayed, and afterwards burnt alive<sup>a</sup>. The pope then published several bulls against necromancy, and those who practised magical arts. Being likewise informed of great disturbances in England, he sent two legates into that kingdom to compose the dissensions, and to receive the tax of St. Peter, and the oath of homage for the kingdoms of England and Ireland, which had been formerly given to Innocent III. The legates were also commissioned to settle the disputes with Scotland; and carried letters from the pope to Robert Bruce, who was only styled governor of Scotland. Robert at first refused to allow the legates to enter his kingdom; but afterwards, sending for them, he declared, that he would neither treat of peace nor a truce with England, unless he had the title of king from the pope. Upon receiving this declaration from the king, the cardinals returned to London; and Robert still refusing to agree to a peace, they excommunicated him and all his adherents, and laid the kingdom under an interdict<sup>i</sup>.

and sends two legates into Britain.

He condemns a sect of Franciscans. A. D. 1318.

Soon after the pope published a bull against a sect of Franciscans, who had proposed to live up to the rigour of the rules composed by St. Francis, neglecting the dispensation of those rules by the popes Nicolas III. and Clement V. They were not only accused of being schismatics, but also of being heretics; and were said to have asserted that there were two churches, one carnal, abounding in wealth and wickedness, at the head of which was the pope and prelates; the other spiritual, adorned with poverty and sanctity, in which they and their followers were included; that an oath at all times was unlawful; that the gospel of Christ, till they appeared, lay hid, and was even lost; with several other tenets. In consequence of the pope's bull, these friars were persecuted in Sicily, and four of them were burnt at Marseilles. However, they were protected in some places of Italy, and especially at Milan, by Mapheo or Matthew Viconti, who was himself accused of being a heretic, and believing erroneously of the resurrection of the dead, and some other articles, of plundering monasteries, violating the chastity of nuns, and stopping the office of the inquisition, on which account the pope renewed the sentence of excommunication pronounced against him and his followers by his archbishop. Mapheo, in resentment for this proceeding of the pope, prevailed with Canis Scaliger, Passerini, and other chiefs of the Gibelines, to form a league against him and his party, and appointed Canis the general of the alliance, who attacked several cities of the Guelphs, while Mapheo sent an army, commanded by his son, against Genoa. In consequence of this league, hostilities were renewed in Italy with great fury; and Genoa and its territory, for several years, were so exposed to the ravaging of both friends and foes, that, according to Petrarch, its shore, which was formerly covered with palaces, appeared a desert<sup>k</sup>. In the mean time the pope, being informed that several cities in the ecclesiastical state, encouraged by the league of the Gibelines, had expelled the governors appointed by him, and had chosen others, he published a severe edict against them, and likewise excommunicated the family of Este, who had accepted the government of Ferrara.

He sends a legate into Italy. 1319.

THE following year he sent his nephew cardinal Bertrand, as his legate, into Lombardy, to assist the Guelphs against the Gibeline faction; and being informed that the sect of the Waldenses began again to appear in France, he ordered those convicted of that heresy to be delivered to the secular magistrate. About the same time he renewed the edicts of his predecessors against the Jews, and ordered the books of their talmud to be sought out and burnt. He likewise granted a power to some bishops of Denmark of taking off the interdict which Boniface VIII. had laid upon that kingdom, on account of the imprisonment of the archbishop of Lunden. Mean while, finding that his spiritual arms had no effect upon the Gibelines in Italy, he sent Philip of Valois, son of Charles, and cousin of the king of France, with a body of French troops into Lombardy, against Mapheo. Philip, upon his arrival at Asti, was joined by the legate with some horse, and marched from thence to relieve Vercelli; but, being opposed by a superior army of the Gibelines, he was obliged to halt; and, having a conference with Galeatius, Mapheo's eldest son, he was persuaded by him to return to France, excusing himself to his father and the king, by alleging the delay of the money and succours promised him by the pope and the king of Naples<sup>l</sup>.

A body of French march to the relief of the Guelphs. 1320.

THE sudden departure of Philip encouraging the Gibeline faction, John entered into a stricter alliance with the kings of France and Naples, and, to supply the expences of the war,

<sup>a</sup> Vita Joan. ut supra. 1. ix.

<sup>i</sup> SPOND. Annal. ex Regest. Vatic. VILLAN. l. ix c. 108. CORIUS, Par. iii.

<sup>k</sup> Verba Petrarch. ap. BLOND. D. ii.

- a assumed to himself the first-fruits of all vacant benefices for three years. At the same time he renewed his anathema against the rebels in Italy, and particularly excommunicated Frederic king of Trinacria, and laid his kingdom under an interdict, because he had not observed the truce appointed by the pope betwixt him and the king of Naples, and, upon his return from his expedition against Genoa, had seized some of the ecclesiastical revenues in Sicily<sup>m</sup>. Soon after John returned an answer to the ambassadors of Poland, and commissioned the archbishop of Gnesna, with two other prelates, to examine the complaints against the Teutonic knights, who were accused of unjustly seizing all Pomerania. The pope at the same time refused to grant the title of king to Uladislaus, lest he should offend the kings of Bohemia and France; but he declared secretly to the ambassadors, that he would not hinder the Poles from using their own right. A few months after he condemned the doctrines of John a Poliano, a Parisian divine, who asserted, that those who confessed their sins to the monks were likewise bound to confess them over again to their parish-priest. Having published a bull against that doctrine, he commissioned other Franciscans to go to Tartary, Ethiopia, and Armenia, and other eastern nations, writing by them to George king of the Georgians, and to the princes of Tartary, exhorting them to return to the unity of the Roman church. He likewise restored the bishop of Kiovia in Russia, and created a Dominican bishop of Armenia. Mean while the war still continuing in Italy, and Frederic king of Trinacria, in resentment for the sentence of excommunication denounced against him, granting fresh succours to the Gibeline faction, John renewed his anathema against Mapheo Visconti and his adherents, and promised to confirm the election of Frederic duke of Austria to the empire, if he would send an army to the assistance of the Guelphs in Italy. Frederic willingly embraced the offer of the pope, and sent his brother Henry into Italy with 2000 horse; but Mapheo represented to him, that, if he aspired to the empire, he was acting against his own interest, by endeavouring to ruin the Gibelines, who were only engaged in supporting the rights of the empire; and that, if their faction were extirpated, Italy would then become subject to the popes. Upon this representation, Frederic wrote to his brother to quit Italy; and to appease the pope, who was highly offended at that proceeding, he sent commissaries into Italy, to procure a truce betwixt the contending parties, but without any effect, he himself being defeated and taken prisoner a few weeks after by his rival Lewis duke of Bavaria<sup>n</sup>.
- d John in the mean time received an appeal of the Franciscans from a sentence of the inquisitor at Narbonne, who had accused one of their order as a heretic, for asserting, that Christ and his apostles had no property either in common or in part, which opinion was justified by a decree of Nicolas III. The pope proposed the affair to the universities and learned men in Europe; and, till he should receive their decision, he superseded the decree of Nicolas. The Franciscans soon after, holding a general chapter at Perugia, declared that they adhered to the decree of Nicolas; and that to renounce the propriety of all temporal goods was pious and meritorious, as it was following that perfection which was taught by Christ and his apostles, and confirmed by their example. The pope, being informed of this determination, published a bull, affirming, that the obstinate asserting of the opinion, that Christ and his apostles had no property, was erroneous and heretical; and in another bull he prohibited the Franciscans from asking any thing for the future in the name of the Roman church<sup>o</sup>. As the pope, and several of them went over to the party of the Gibelines, notwithstanding the strength of that faction appeared then on the decline, owing in some measure to the death of Mapheo Visconti, which happened a few months before. The pope's general soon after defeated Mark Visconti, and in the month of June besieged Milan. However, the Gibelines had sent into Italy, and marching to the relief of the city, the Guelphs were obliged to raise the siege, which had continued near two months<sup>p</sup>.
- f THE pope, in resentment for the assistance given to the Gibelines by the emperor, wrote a monitory to him, which he likewise sent to be published in Germany, Italy, France, England, and in other kingdoms. In this writing the pope declared, that Lewis of Bavaria had, without the approbation of the apostolic see, not only assumed the title of king of the Romans, but also usurped the administration of the empire in Germany and Italy, to the manifest prejudice of the Roman church, to whom that right belonged during an interregnum; that as he had assisted the Visconti, though condemned for heresy, and had likewise aided the other rebels of the church, and done many other things to the detriment of Christianity, he therefore warned him, under pain of excommunication, to desist from all exercise of the functions

<sup>m</sup> VILLAN. l. ix. c. 133. FAZEL. D. ii. l. ix.
 Empire. <sup>o</sup> SPOND. Annal. WADDING. Annal. minor. t. iii. hoc. an.
 196. 211, 212.

<sup>n</sup> VILLAN. l. ix. c. 174. See also the History of the P VILLAN. l. ix. c. 195, of an emperor within three months, and not to resume the same without the approbation of the apostolic see. He likewise prohibited any one, of what character or dignity soever, from assisting him in any thing relating to the administration of the empire<sup>a</sup>. About the same time, being informed that the siege of Genoa, after continuing five years, was at last raised, he sent for deputies from both the factions in that city, and in vain endeavoured to reconcile them. He sent messengers also to the king of Servia, to exhort him to return to the unity of the Roman church; renewed the bulls of his predecessors against carrying arms or warlike stores to the Saracens; and entered into an alliance with the king of France and the Venetians, to oppose the progress of the Turks in Syria.

A.D. 1324.

MEAN while the monitory being published in Germany, the emperor sent three messengers to the pope, to know the reasons of his proceeding, and to ask some delay; and, in a diet at Nuremberg, drew up a protestation against the assertions contained in the monitory, appealing to the see of Rome, and a future general council; and declaring, that the pope himself was a favourer of heresy, as he discouraged penitents to come confession, and endeavoured to abolish the sovereignty of kings. The deputies, upon their arrival at Avignon, pretended to believe, that the monitory was a forgery; but being assured that it was real, they asked a delay of two months, which was granted by the pope, to allow the emperor time to repent.

The emperor is excommunicated, and deposed by the pope.

The two months elapsing without any submission on the part of the emperor, John declared him fallen under the sentence of excommunication; but granted him three months longer, within which time he ordered him, under pain of deposition, to appear personally, or by his proxies, before the apostolic see. At the same time he declared all those prelates and ecclesiastics, who had acted against the monitory, to have fallen under the sentence of suspension from their offices and benefices. The emperor still continuing to despise his fulminations, the pope at length, on the 20th of July, denounced a definitive sentence against him, and declared him deprived of all sovereignty which he might pretend to in right of his election, and summoned him to appear at Avignon before the 1st of October. Mean while the Vicenti in Italy having defeated the troops of the church, and taken two of their generals prisoners, John renewed the censures against the Gibelines, and ordered a new crusade to be preached against them. However, their arms still continued successful, and towards the end of the year they made themselves masters of Monza.

He publishes a manifesto in his own defence.

THE emperor, upon being informed of the sentence of deposition denounced against him by the pope, resolved vigorously to defend his authority and character; and several of the Franciscans, who, upon account of adhering to the primitive institutions of their order, were reckoned schismatics, from their hatred to the pope, repairing to the emperor's court, Lewis made use of their pens in defending his cause; and a few months after published a long manifesto, which is preserved in Aventine<sup>r</sup>, in which he accuses the pope of sowing discord and sedition among all Christians; of publicly boasting, that, when the Christian princes were at war, then the bishop of Rome was truly pope; that he would bruise the brazen serpent, meaning the empire of the Germans, to the dust; and that he would not leave one in Italy who acknowledged the empire. He likewise asserted, that he was antichrist, and had the spirit of satan, in allowing himself to be worshipped, which even an angel would not accept of from St. John; that the temporal jurisdiction, which the pope possessed, was owing to the liberality, or rather the weakness, of the emperors; that, if he was the servant of the servants of God, he ought not to be of all men the most ambitious of honours and wealth; that he was a heretic, by condemning the orthodox opinion of the poverty of Christ and his apostles; from him therefore he appealed to the sentence of a general council (D). The pope, to defend himself from the accusation of heresy, published

<sup>a</sup> Bzov. hoc ann.

<sup>r</sup> AVENT. l. vii. p. 610—613.

(D) This manifesto was supposed to have been written by John di Gadone or Ghent, and Marsilius de Menandrino of Padua, the last of whom published a book this year concerning the imperial and pontifical jurisdiction, which he dedicated to the emperor, and intitled, Defensor pacis, or, An advocate for peace. John also published a book concerning the ecclesiastical power. They both affirmed, that when Christ paid tribute to Cæsar, he paid it as a debt due to the emperor for his civil protection; therefore the temporal possessions of the church were subject to the emperor. 2dly, That Christ, at his ascension into heaven, left no visible head of his church, and appointed no vicar, nor had Peter any more authority than any other of the apostles. 3dly, That it belonged to the emperor to appoint or depose, and punish, the pope, since Christ, as a subject, was crucified by Pilate; and Marsilius added, that, during a vacancy of the apostolic see, the emperor might succeed the pope, and govern the church. 4thly, That all priests, whether the pope, archbishops, or simple priests, according to the institution of Christ, were equal as to authority and jurisdiction; and that one of them possessed more than another was owing entirely to the gift of the emperor. 5thly, That the whole church united could not inflict a coercive punishment upon any one, without the authority of the emperor. In answer to these books, others were likewise published that same year, particularly by the archbishop of Ravenna, concerning the jurisdiction of the empire, and the authority of the pope. Pelagius Alvarus, a Spaniard, and bishop of Sylves, published another work in justification of the pope; and Peter de Palude, a Dominican, wrote a treatise on the immediate origin of ecclesiastical power (1).

(1) Possess. Appar. Sac. t. i. Bzov. an. 1327. Prætol. & Gualter. de Hæres. Alvar. de Planctu Eccles. l. i. c. 68.

another

a another bull, explaining his former decrees against the Franciscans, many of whom, for adhering to the opinion of the council of Perugia, were then burnt as heretics in different parts of the world *.

Not finding likewise that ready submission from the prelates of Germany that he expected, in publishing his monitory, he resolved to raise up a powerful competitor against the emperor; he accordingly negotiated with Leopold, brother of the duke of Austria, in favour of Charles the Fair, king of France; and it was stipulated, that Charles should compel Lewis of Bavaria to quit his pretensions to the empire; and, after his election, give 30,000 marks of silver to Leopold, on condition that his brother, Frederic of Austria, would likewise quit his claim to the empire. In consequence of this agreement, the pope exerted himself to procure the votes of the electors in Germany; and Leopold, having solicited the princes in the interest of his brother, and receiving a favourable answer from others that had hitherto embraced no party, wrote to the king of France, desiring him to repair to Bar-sur-Aube, on the confines of the empire, to have a conference with the German princes, who had promised to go thither. Charles accordingly went to that city with a splendid retinue, but, to his great disappointment, found only duke Leopold†. This affront greatly cooled the ardour of the king of France; and, notwithstanding the pope and Leopold assured him that a little money would procure him the interest of a great many princes, who had but a weak attachment to Lewis of Bavaria, on account of his being excommunicated, yet Charles refused to concern himself any farther in the affair, and intirely dropt his pretensions. The pope was soon after greatly surprised with the news of an accommodation betwixt the emperor and his competitor Frederic of Austria; Frederic, in consideration of his renouncing all pretensions to the empire, being set at liberty, and not only allowed to retain the title of king of the Romans, but also appointed to govern Germany during the emperor's absence in Italy, whither he intended to march with an army to the assistance of the Gibelines‡. As this agreement intirely broke the measures of the pope, he immediately declared it null and void, absolved Frederic from the obligation of his oath, and prevailed with several electors to deny their assent to the accommodation, asserting, that neither of the competitors had a right to resign in favour of the other. To support the expences of the war in Italy, he likewise solicited the payment of the penny of St. Peter in the kingdoms of Scotland, Sweden, Norway, Portugal, and Sicily; but in Poland, instead of the usual tax of three-pence a measure of oats for each house, he only exacted a penny, because the kingdom was weakened by the revolt of Silesia to the king of Bohemia§.

ABOUT this time he likewise condemned some propositions of Peter John Olive, a Franciscan, who, in his comments on St. Matthew's gospel, the canonical epistles, and the revelations, had advanced some doctrines which were interpreted by the schismatic Franciscans to favour their opinion (E). The pope, to prevent the propagation of those doctrines into the distant provinces, published a bull, denouncing an anathema against the monks, of whatever order, who should dare to go beyond seas without letters patent from their superiors, charging the superiors not to grant those letters but to men of learning and experience. At the same time, at the request of the Dominians, he granted a power to the general of their order to appoint a vicar over all the monks who were employed in preaching the gospel among the infidels, from whence is generally dated the original of the society of missionaries¶, though some refer it to the time of Innocent IV. seventy-two years before this period‡. This year likewise, John being informed that the heretics, who had been expelled from other provinces, had taken refuge in Bosnia, he wrote to Charles king of Hungary, and to Stephen prince of Bosnia, desiring them to extirpate the heretics, and to give their assistance and protection to the Franciscans.

* EXMER. Director. Inquis. par. ii. qu. 11. ANTON. tit. xxi. c. 5.
t. xiii p. 561. † Idem, c. 293. HOESSEM, de Gest. Pont. Leodien. l. ii. c. 10. Chron. Aulæ Reg. c. 15. apud Scriptor. rer. Boem. ‡ Bzov. Pol. hoc ann. § SPOND. Annal. hoc anno.

¶ VILLAN. l. ix. c. 207. ap. MURATOR, t. 4. an. 1399.

(E) Peter John Olive was born in France, and died in 1297, in the 50th year of his age. In his youth he wrote a book in praise of the virgin Mary, which was condemned during the pontificate of Nicolas III. as containing some things too extravagant. He was afterwards frequently accused by the brothers of his order, whose resentment he had drawn upon himself by his severe reproofs of their luxury, and his endeavours to recall them to the poverty and rigour of their first institution. After his death his body was dug up, he was condemned as an heretic, and his writings were burnt, and remained prohibited till the time of Sixtus IV. who, having ordered them to be examined, declared they contained nothing expressly contrary to the catholic faith. The propositions condemned by John are mentioned by Emmericus, in his directory of the inquisition, under twenty-two heads; and the chief of them are, "That the pope was the mystical antichrist; that St. Francis was the angel in the revelations, said to have the mark of the living God, and that his rule was the true gospel; that the perfect state of the church began with St. Francis, and that Christ and his apostles had no property either in common or in particular, but had only the use-fruit of what they enjoyed." (2) {2} Direct. Inquis. Par. ii. iv. ix. Wadding. Annal. Claren. in 5. Tribul. ordin. Anton. tit. xxiv. c. 9. sect. 11, & 13.

The pope is invited to Rome.
A. D. 1326.

THE following year, the Romans, having expelled their nobility, and appointed Sciarra Colonna as their governor, and settled likewise a council of fifty-two citizens, sent ambassadors to the pope, desiring him, as his predecessors had done, to come and reside in their city, otherwise they would consult for themselves as they thought proper. Whether they really desired his presence is uncertain; for about the same time they sent deputies both to the emperor and the king of Naples, acknowledging their submission to both those princes. John replied, that he desired greatly to comply with their request; but excused himself on account of his great age, and the danger of the journey; but, to oppose the designs of the emperor in Italy, he again declared the king of Naples vicar of the empire in that kingdom; appointed cardinal John d'Orsini, a Roman, as legate in Tuscany, Campania, and Sardinia; and created James Sabellus and Stephen Colonna as consuls in Rome. The legate, upon his arrival at Florence, excommunicated Castruccio Castracani, commonly called tyrant of Lucca, and chief of the Gibelines in Tuscany. The bishop of Arezzo, who adhered to that party, was likewise excommunicated and deposed<sup>2</sup>.

The emperor enters Italy;
1327.

and is crowned at Milan.

Soon after, the emperor arriving with a small army at Trent, he was immediately joined by the chiefs of the Gibeline faction, and a great number of ecclesiastics of all degrees, particularly by the Franciscans, who were greatly irritated against the pope. He there held a council, which drew up sixteen articles against the pope; and, having condemned him as guilty of heresy, excommunicated him and all his adherents<sup>3</sup>. From Trent Lewis proceeded to Milan, where he was crowned with the iron crown by the deposed bishop of Arezzo, together with the bishops of Reggio and Brescia; the archbishop of Milan, who was of the opposite party, being then a refugee at Genoa. Having taken the government of Milan from the Vicenti, on a suspicion of treason, he held a diet at Orzi, in the territory of Brescia, where he created three new bishops, and received a subsidy of 200,000 florins of gold. The emperor then advancing to Pisa and Lucca, the Romans, who had received a denial from the pope, invited him to their city, while the legate again renewed the sentence of excommunication against him in the city of Florence. Though the emperor, in the diet held at Trent, had excommunicated the pope, yet, according to Cuspinianus and Trithemius, he sent to Avignon, and desired John to confer upon him the imperial crown<sup>4</sup>. The ambassadors were treated with ignominy by the pope, who, on the 20th of October, pronounced a definitive sentence of excommunication and deposition against the emperor, ordered the electors to proceed to a new election, and prohibited any one, of what dignity soever, from giving him any assistance<sup>5</sup>. About the same time he likewise excommunicated Marsilius of Padua and John di Gandone, and condemned the errors contained in their books<sup>6</sup>. His legate, in the mean time, with the prince of Morea, entered Rome by surprise, and took possession of the Leonine part of the city; but the emperor's party ringing the alarm bell of the capitol, the Neapolitans were next morning expelled with great loss.

He receives the crown at Rome.
1328.

Soon after the emperor arrived with his army at Rome; and a few days after held an assembly in the capitol, in which he thanked the Romans for their kindness, and promised to defend and enlarge their privileges. They in return created him a senator and captain of the people for one year, and chose four of the most noble of the citizens to assist at his coronation; which ceremony was performed in the church of St. Peter, on the 17th of January, with great magnificence, Lewis being consecrated by two schismatic bishops, and crowned by Sciarra Colonna. After his coronation, the emperor created a great many knights, and caused three imperial decrees to be read concerning the catholic faith, the honouring of the clergy, and the protection of widows and orphans. Upon the approach of the emperor to Rome, all the clergy, that adhered to the pope, retired from the city, which was then put under an interdict; and John, being ignorant that the emperor was already crowned at Rome, about the end of January published a bull for a crusade against Lewis of Bavaria and his adherents. This fulmination was too late to have any effect; for the emperor, having now secured the affection of the Romans, was resolved in his turn to depose his antagonist. Accordingly, about the middle of April, he held a solemn assembly in St. Peter's church; and ordered a crier to call out three times, if any person would undertake the defence of the priest James of Cabors, who called himself pope John. Nobody making answer, an abbot of Germany read a long sentence against the pope, whom he accused of being a deserter of his see, of unjustly claiming the disposal of all ecclesiastical benefices, which he conferred by simony on unworthy persons, of raising dangerous schisms and wicked heresies in the church of God, of oppressing the cardinals and other prelates, of confounding the temporal and spiritual power, and of deciding concerning the poverty of Christ and his apostles contrary to the catholic opinion; the emperor therefore

<sup>2</sup> SPOND. Annal. l. ix. c. 348. l. x. c. 3.
utroque Chron.

<sup>3</sup> VILLAN. c. 68.

<sup>4</sup> Idem, c. 15.

<sup>5</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>6</sup> CUSPIN. de Cæsar. TRITHEM. in a pronounced a sentence of deposition against the said James, whom he left to be punished by the secular power; and condemned all his adherents, of what rank or quality soever, to the confiscation of their effects, and the punishment of death<sup>c</sup>. A few days after the emperor published some laws about the future popes, ordaining that they should not be absent from Rome above three months a year, nor go above two days journey from the city, without leave of the people; and if, after they were recalled three times, they refused to return, a new one was to be elected. He then, with the consent of the Romans, created a Franciscan antipope, by the name of Nicolas V. who, a few days after, made a promotion of seven cardinals, appointed governors in the cities of the ecclesiastical state, and sent legates into the different provinces of Christendom. Nicolas likewise published a bull, confirming the deposition of John, and declaring his adherents guilty of heresy.

b Lewis, after these proceedings at Rome, marched against the king of Naples; but being disappointed in his succours from the Gibelines and the king of Sicily, he returned soon after to the city, where his interest was so greatly fallen, that, in a mutiny against his troops, the party of the Guelpbs had the advantage<sup>f</sup>. Finding that he could not with safety continue any longer at Rome, he left that city on the 4th of August with his antipope, and marched to Viterbo, and from thence to Fodi. Upon his departure from Rome, the pope's legate entered the city, and annulled all the acts of the emperor and Peter di Corbaria the antipope, the Romans testifying their consent with great acclamations, and the boys even digging up the bodies of the Germans, and throwing them into the Tyber. Lewis, in the mean time, marching to Pisa, at the intreaty of Michael Cesena, general of the Franciscans, and William Oakham, an Engliffman, published his sentence against the pope, who again excommunicated the emperor and his adherents, particularly Cesena and Oakham; and was so exasperated against the Franciscans, that, according to Antoninus, he deliberated upon suppressing the whole order<sup>g</sup>.

c THE interest of the emperor daily declining in Italy, the following year the march of Ancona, and the whole patrimony of the church, returned to the obedience of the see of Rome; the city of Milan likewise submitted to the pope; and John Viconti, the brother of Matthew, resigned his dignity of cardinal, which he had received from the antipope, and was created bishop of Novara. The emperor, being in great distress for want of money, and finding himself deserted by the Gibelines, marched towards Trent, to hold a council with the chiefs of his party in Italy, and the nobles in Germany; but being informed of the death of the duke of Austria, he pretended this as a reason for his quitting Italy, and accordingly marched with his army into Bavaria<sup>h</sup>. In the mean time the pope again excommunicated Cesena, and appointed the bishop of Tusculum vicar of the order of Franciscans, till a new general should be elected. He likewise answered the libels of Cesena, which answers were examined by Oakham; and, in return, his objections were answered by friar James Fonerius, who had been lately promoted to the dignity of cardinal<sup>i</sup>. The same year John wrote to Robert Bruce, king of Scotland, allowing him and his successors to be crowned by the bishop of St. Andrew's or Glasgow<sup>k</sup>. He likewise offered great rewards for apprehending the antipope, by which means that unhappy person was discovered in the house of count Boniface at Pisa, where he had concealed himself for several months. Finding himself without resource from the emperor or his party, he resolved to throw himself on the clemency of the pope, and voluntarily surrendered to the archbishop of Pisa and the bishop of Lucca, who, having received a commission from the pope, absolved him, upon his abjuring certain articles prescribed to him by his holiness<sup>l</sup>.

d DURING these transactions in Italy, the pope was greatly alarmed at Avignon by the approach of William count of Hainault, the emperor's father-in-law, with 1800 horse, who, in consequence of a vow, proposing to march into Granada against the Moors, was desirous of receiving the benediction of the pope. John, greatly suspicious that the count intended to do him an injury, sent for the nobles in the neighbourhood, armed his retinue, and prohibited the count from entering Provence, under pain of excommunication, absolving him likewise from his vow, on condition that he returned home<sup>m</sup>. John, however, a few weeks after, received a visit from the king of France, with whom he had some secret conferences, relating, as it was afterwards known, to the wars in Italy, and to an expedition into the Holy Land, for which last purpose Philip obtained the tythes of all ecclesiastical revenues in his kingdom. About the same time John received an embassy from Germany, proposing a reconciliation between him and the emperor, who offered to abandon the antipope, to retract his appeal, annul all that had been done against the holy see, and acknowledge himself justly excommunicated, provided the

<sup>c</sup> VILLAN. c. 68.
SPOND. Annal.
ex Regest. Vatic.

<sup>b</sup> VILLAN. c. 146.

<sup>f</sup> RAINALD, ad an. 1328. VILLAN. c. 76.
<sup>i</sup> EYMER. Direct. Inquis. Par. ii. qu. 15—17.
<sup>l</sup> RAINALD. an. 1330. WADDING. eod. an.

<sup>g</sup> ANTON. sect. 15.

<sup>k</sup> SPOND.

<sup>m</sup> VILLAN. c. 155.

pope would acknowledge him as emperor. John rejected these generous preliminaries with a great disdain; and, in his letter to the king of Bohemia, ordered him and the other electors to proceed to a new election. About the same time the antipope arrived at Avignon from Pisa, and appeared in a public consistory with a rope about his neck, begging absolution from the pope. Having publicly made a long confession of his crimes, and a profession of faith agreeable to the tenets of the Roman church, John confirmed the absolution which he had received at Pisa, but confined him as an honourable prisoner in the palace, where he lived three years, and, at his death, was buried in the church of the Franciscans <sup>a</sup>. The pope likewise this year sent a form of the catholic doctrine to the emperor of the Tartars, wrote to the Armenians to continue in the unity of the Roman church, granted a great many privileges and indulgences to the Dominicans and Franciscans, who were preaching the gospel among the infidels, and ordered the inquisitors of the faith to proceed against those who practised magic, or other unlawful arts <sup>b</sup>.

A.D. 1331.

THE following January he again renewed his anathema against Michael de Cesena; and prohibited, under severe penalties, Oakham, Bonagratia, and Thalheim or Chalheim, from obeying him. This decree of the pope was published in all the houses of the order of the Franciscans by the general, who, in a general chapter of the order at Perpignan, confirmed the sentence against the schismatics, published two years before in the chapter at Paris; and condemned Cesena, Thalheim, Francis de Esculo, Oakham, and Bonagratia, to perpetual imprisonment, on account of their contumacy, and of the heresies which they publicly taught <sup>c</sup>.

The king of Bohemia reduces Lombardy, and Mean while the king of Bohemia, having entered Italy with an army as vicar of the empire, and conquered the greatest part of Lombardy, his great successes equally alarmed the emperor and the faction of the Guelphs. Lewis, being informed that he had had a conference with the pope's legate, was apprehensive lest he should be prevailed upon by the pope to aspire to the empire; while the Guelphs, imagining that the pope had secretly invited the king into Italy, and connived at his conquests, entered into a league against him and the legate, in which they were joined by the Gibelines, who believed that the king did not act so much to serve the emperor, as to aggrandize his own family. The king of Bohemia having returned to Germany, to repel some enemies that had invaded Bohemia in his absence, the emperor sent two of his secretaries, as ambassadors to the pope, to treat of a reconciliation with the holy see, but without any effect. Soon after, according to Villani, John received an embassy from the king of France, informing him, that he intended to undertake an expedition into the Holy Land, and desiring, for that purpose, the tythes of all Christendom for six years, the right of conferring all ecclesiastical benefices in his kingdom, the kingdom of Italy for his brother Charles, and the title of king of Arles and Vienne for his own son; which extravagant demands, if they were really proposed, were made, as Spondanus observes, to excuse the king from his vow <sup>d</sup>.

is solicited by the pope to desert the emperor.

1332.

JOHN, still intent upon opposing the emperor, wrote to the king of Bohemia and the duke of Austria, exhorting them to abandon his party. His solicitations at last prevailed with the duke of Austria, who not only deserted the interest of the emperor, but acknowledged himself the vassal of the pope, and that he held his hereditary dominions of the holy see. But the king of Bohemia, hoping that the great confusions in Italy would influence the pope to hearken to an accommodation, went to Avignon, and solicited him in behalf of the emperor. John remained inflexible to all the solicitations of the king, notwithstanding Lewis, at the intreaty of the king of France, sent another embassy to him to treat of peace. He even deposed the bishop of Castello, for reporting in Germany, that the emperor was reconciled to the holy see, and made an offer of the empire to the king of Bohemia, who rejected that proposition, and soon after quitted Avignon.

The pope is accused of professing an heretical doctrine.

1333.

THE following year John raised a new set of enemies against himself, by asserting, in a discourse at Avignon, that the souls of the happy or damned are not perfectly blessed or miserable till after the resurrection, when they shall have again received their bodies. Though this opinion seemed to have been embraced by Justin, Ireneus, Origen, and other antient fathers, both Greeks and Latins, yet it raised a great many adversaries against the pope, not only among the cardinals and prelates, but among all ranks of men, especially the Dominicans, some of whom were so zealous in opposing it, as to draw punishments upon themselves. But many of the Franciscans declared for the opinion of the pope; and Gerard, general of the order, preached in favour of that doctrine at Paris. His discourses occasioned disturbances in that city; and the king, having received the opinion of the doctors, ordered him publicly to retract his doctrine, otherwise he would be burnt as a heretic. Philip likewise wrote to the pope, signifying to his holiness, that it did not become a pope to propose doubtful questions, but rather to decide those that were proposed by others. John excused himself, and declared, <sup>a</sup> Idem, c. 162.

<sup>b</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>c</sup> BZOV. hoc an.

<sup>d</sup> VILLAN. c. 196. ap. Mu-

rator. l. xii. p. 720. SPOND. Annal.

a that he had not mentioned that opinion by way of assertion, but as a probability, and a subject of dispute, with an intention to have the opinion of the learned; and had therefore ordered the cardinals, prelates, and doctors, after diligent inquiry, to give their judgment of that doctrine<sup>r</sup>. The pope, by explaining his opinion, and declaring, that he never intended to maintain a doctrine contrary to the catholic faith, stopped the clamour that was raised against him. However, the schismatic Franciscans, or Fratricelli, continued to exclaim against him as a heretic, not only on account of his opinion concerning the state of departed souls, but likewise for his decrees against their doctrine of the poverty of Christ and his apostles, which they founded on that declaration of our Saviour, He that does not sell all that he has, and give to the poor, cannot be my disciple.

b MEAN while the king of Bohemia, having returned to Italy, joined his troops to those commanded by the legate; but, being defeated by the confederates near Ferrara, he thought proper to evacuate Italy, and to abandon all his conquests in Lombardy. The pope, being likewise soon after informed that the emperor, fearing to die out of the communion of the church, had consented to resign his sceptre, and return to a private station, he wrote a letter to him, exhorting him to put such a laudable design in execution; and even sent two legates to Munich to receive his abdication, ordering them, in case of his refusal, to absolve the princes and barons of the empire from their oath of allegiance to Lewis. The legates, upon their arrival at Munich, were not allowed to enter upon any negotiation; which so exasperated the pope, that he wrote to the bishops of Bremen, Magdeburgh, and Cologne, to publish new anathemas against the emperor and his adherents, and excited several princes to ravage his hereditary dominions<sup>s</sup>. About the same time he commissioned the archbishop of Rouen to give the cross to the king of France, and to the kings of Navarre and Bohemia, and to many other nobles who were then at Paris<sup>t</sup>. The emperor, in the mean time, in order to oppose the designs of the pope, resolved to conclude a peace with Robert king of Naples, and to call a general council, to proceed against John as a heretic; for which purpose he entered into a secret negotiation with cardinal Neapoleo d'Orsini, who was likewise offended with the pope, because, contrary to his promise, he had resided in France<sup>u</sup>.

BEFORE the emperor could execute his design, his adversary was removed by death, which happened to him on the 4th of December, at Avignon. John, being sensible of the great scandal he had raised by his doctrine of the state of departed souls, on the 3d of December sent for the cardinals into his chamber, and, in their presence, revoked his opinion of that doctrine; and submitted all questions, upon which he had either discoursed or written, to the determination of the church and his successors. Having confirmed this declaration by a bull, he died the next day, leaving behind him an immense treasure; Villani affirming, upon the credit of his brother, who was merchant to the pope, and informed by the officers who assisted at the weighing of it, that it amounted in money and jewels to 25 millions of florins of gold<sup>v</sup>. This sum is greatly lessened by other authors; but, whatever it was, according to Villani, he acquired it by reserving to himself the conferring of benefices through all Christendom, under pretence of preventing simony, though it appears that he himself did not bestow them for nothing. He likewise reserved the annates, or first year's revenues, of all new collated benefices, which were very numerous during his pontificate, as he generally supplied vacancies by transporting the incumbents from other benefices. He is also said to have instituted the tribunal of the twelve chaplains of the pope, called Rota Auditores, which was to determine appeals from all the parts of Christendom<sup>x</sup> (F).

A FEW days after the death of John, the cardinals, to the number of 24, went into the conclave to chuse a successor. They divided, as usual, into parties; and cardinal Colonna, who was at the head of the weakest faction, proposed John Raimund, cardinal bishop of Porta, who was approved of by the other party, on condition that he would promise not to go to Rome. As he refused to agree to this condition, some of the conclave carelessly proposed James Fournier, a Cistercian monk, and the lowest of the order of cardinals, who was thereupon immediately elected, he himself being astonished at their choice, and calling out, that they had chosen an ass. He was consecrated on the 1st of January, and took the name of

<sup>r</sup> VILLAN. c. 228. BZOV. an. 1331. WADDING. hoc an.

<sup>s</sup> PTOL. Luccens. Hist. Eccles. Inst. l. xxiv. c.

42. <sup>t</sup> MAT. VILLAN. l. vii. c. 2.

<sup>u</sup> RAINALD, ad an. 1324.

<sup>v</sup> WADDING. & BZOV.

hoc an. VILLAN. l. xi. c. 20.

<sup>x</sup> POLYD. de rer. invent. lib. vi. c. 12. CIACON. in Joannem XXII.

(F) John XXII. added a third crown to the pontifical tiara. The first crown worn by the popes was sent by Clowis king of France as a present to St. John de Lateran, and was placed by pope Hormisdas, about the year 515, upon his own head, above the cap which he usually wore. His successors, till Boniface VIII. used the single crown;

but that pope, on the occasion of his disputes with Philip the Fair, king of France, assumed a double crown, to signify his claim to both the spiritual and temporal authority. At last John added a third crown to the tiara, in which form it has been worn by all his successors. (1).

(1) Hist. de Philip de Valois, l. i.

Benedict XII. bestowing upon the cardinals 100,000 florins of gold, and, according to Nau- a clerus, sending 50,000 to repair the churches of Rome<sup>y</sup>. He immediately sent letters to all the Christian princes, except the emperor and the king of Sicily, informing him of his elevation. He likewise denounced an anathema against the Fratricelli; revoked the benefices granted by his predecessor, if the incumbents were not in peaceable possession of them; and reserved to himself the bestowing of all the benefices that became vacant at his court, or within two days journey thereof. About the same time he also sent Bertrand, archbishop of Yverdon, to the Romans, who were persuaded by him to govern the city under the name of the pope.
Being desirous likewise of extirpating heresies, he wrote to the king of Bohemia and the bishop of Olmütz, to proceed against those who published any doctrines contrary to the faith of the church of Rome. Mean while the wars betwixt the two factions still continued to b desolate Italy; and, as the authority of the emperor was disregarded, each powerful prince attacked the weaker neighbour, for the enlargement of his own territory. The emperor, to recover his authority in that kingdom, sent an embassy to the pope, to treat of a reconciliation with the holy see; but, the pope insisting upon the emperor's abdication, nothing was effected. Benedict, however, not having the same animosity to Lewis as his predecessor, was not active in raising enemies against him, but contented himself with the formality of publishing the sentence of excommunication against him and his adherents.

He receives an embassy from the emperor, and publishes a bull concerning the beatific vision.

A. D. 1336.

A peace proposed betwixt him and the emperor,

but without effect.

A. D. 1337.

The pope endeavours in vain to reconcile the kings of France and England.

THE following year, Benedict having, together with the cardinals and doctors, examined the opinion of his predecessor concerning the beatific vision, published the recantation of John, with a commentary of his own, to establish the catholic doctrine, and to clear the reputation c of his predecessor. He therefore declared, that the souls of those who die free from guilt, or after death are purged from their sins, and likewise the souls of children, who, having received baptism, die before they arrive at the use of free-will, immediately after death, or the purgation above-mentioned, were admitted into the presence of God<sup>z</sup>. A few weeks after the ambassadors of the emperor again arrived at Avignon, to negotiate a peace with the pope, having full power from Lewis, who offered to revoke all that he had done against John XXII.
to annul the sentence published by Henry VII. and himself against Robert king of Naples, and several other articles greatly in favour of the see of Rome. As the pope gave a favourable reception to the ambassadors, the emperor soon after sent others with further concessions.
But the negotiation was prevented from coming to a favourable conclusion by the intrigues d of the kings of Naples, Bohemia, and France, which last being threatened with a war from the king of England, was afraid lest the emperor, after his reconciliation with the holy see, should give assistance to Edward III. his brother-in-law. The king of Bohemia, who the year before had contracted an alliance with France, was intirely in the interest of Philip; and therefore wrote to the pope, that he, with the assistance of some other nobles, proposed to elect another king of the Romans. The interest of those princes with the cardinals being superior to that of the emperor, the negotiation was broke off, and the ambassadors of the emperor returned to Germany<sup>a</sup>. The pope, being at this time desirous to prevent a war betwixt the kings of France and England, wrote to the emperor, to turn him from his alliance with Edward; but being likewise offended with the king of France, for neglecting his ex- e pedition into the Holy Land, he revoked the grant of the tythes which Philip had obtained from his predecessor. He also laboured to reform the discipline of the church, particularly the Benedictines, Cisterians, and regular canons of St. Augustin. He restrained the Domi- nicans from preaching promiscuously, and from receiving confessions in the streets and public roads, excommunicated the Bolognese for refusing to submit to the church, and confirmed the sentence of excommunication of the bishop of Wratistlaw against the king of Bohemia, for unjustly seizing and possessing a castle belonging to that bishopric<sup>b</sup>.

As hostilities had already commenced betwixt France and England in Gascony and Xaintonge, and the emperor, together with the German princes, had entered into a league with Edward at Cologne, the pope endeavoured to put a stop to the further progress of the war, and sent f two legates into France and England, to treat of an accommodation. The legates were received with great respect at Paris; but Edward would not allow them to enter England, but sent deputies to treat with them on the continent, where, after several conferences, nothing was concluded on. Benedict, finding the king of England inflexible, wrote to the emperor, exhorting him not to engage in the war against France. But Lewis not returning a favourable answer to this letter, the pope wrote to all the faithful, prohibiting them from entering into an alliance with Lewis. Soon after he received an embassy from the king of England, who desired leave to enter into an alliance with the emperor; but Benedict refused to give his consent, and, not being certain that the league was already concluded, he prohibited him from entering into any treaty with the enemy of the church. Lewis, however, being resolved

<sup>y</sup> NAUCLER. Gen. 25.

<sup>z</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>a</sup> VILLAN. l. xi. c. 54.

<sup>b</sup> BZOV. hoc. an.

VILLAN. c. 69. MICHOV. l. iv. c. 22. CUREUS in Annal. Siles.

a to break with the king of France, wrote to the pope, complaining of that prince for having seized several fiefs of the empire, and desiring the assistance of his holiness in obliging Philip to restore what he had usurped. Benedict returned no answer to Lewis, but informed the king of France of the emperor's intention, and therefore intreated him earnestly to a reconciliation with the king of England.

A FEW months afterwards Benedict receiving an embassy from several bishops of Germany, soliciting him to be reconciled to the emperor, he declared to them, that unless Lewis concluded a peace with the king of France, he could not consent to grant him absolution, as Philip had threatened to use him worse than his predecessors had done Boniface, if he should absolve the emperor without his consent. The ambassadors returning without obtaining their purpose, the German princes, in defence of their own privileges, in a diet at Frankfort, published a perpetual edict, declaring, that whoever was elected king of the Romans by the majority of the electors, was thereby real king or emperor of the Romans, and did not need the consent or the approbation of the pope; and whoever dared to oppose that decree, should be accounted guilty of treason. A copy of this decree was sent to the pope, who, according to the relation of Dr. Albert of Straßburgh, the messenger, seemed not to be greatly offended, but sent a nuncio to the emperor, desiring him to send ambassadors to Avignon, to treat of an accommodation with the holy see. About the same time Benedict, being informed that the king of England had assumed the title of vicar of the empire, and was about to march into France with a powerful army, threatened him with excommunication if he did not resign that title.

b Soon after, hearing that the English army had retreated without any action, he again wrote to the king, exhorting him to a peace with Philip, and offering himself as mediator. This year also, according to Surita, he sent two legates into Sicily, who laid that kingdom under an interdict, because the Sicilians had refused, since the death of Frederic, to return to the obedience of the king of Naples.<sup>a</sup>

The German nobles and bishops intreat the pope to be reconciled to the emperor. A. D. 1338.

THE following year, the king of Arragon arriving at Avignon, Benedict gave him the investiture of Sardinia and Corfica, but refused to confirm his claims to the islands of Majorca and Minorca. About the same time he received an embassy from Andronicus, emperor of Constantinople, offering to treat of an union with the Latin church, on condition that the chief cities of the empire possessed by the Turks should be recovered by the Latins from the infidels, and restored to the Greeks; and a general council should be appointed, where the Greeks might have liberty to defend the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit. Benedict answered, that, if the Greeks would agree to the union, the princes of the west would then give their assistance against the Turks. He then dismissed the ambassadors, because they declared, that they had no commission from the patriarch or bishops, but were only sent privately by the emperor. Mean while Azo Visconti dying at Milan, his brother Luchino succeeded to the principality; and the power of the emperor being disregarded in Italy, he was reconciled to the holy see, and purchased the title of vicar of the empire from the pope for 50,000 florins of gold, and a yearly tribute of 10,000. His example was imitated by the other princes in Lombardy, who, being reconciled to the pope, acknowledged the empire to be vacant, and obtained the sanction of the apostolic see for their usurpations. Maßlin Scala, or Scaliger, obtained the vicarage of Verona and Vicenza for a yearly tribute of 5000 florins; and, in like manner, William Gonzaga was appointed vicar of Mantua and Reggio; Albert Carraria of Padua; Opizo Este of Ferrara, Modena, and Argenta, in consideration of certain sums of money paid to the pope; on account of which contracts Villani exclaims, "O avaricious and mercenary church, how art thou degenerated from the good, humble, poor, and holy, institution of Christ!" The city of Bologna, imitating the princes of Lombardy, the following year submitted to the pope, and, promising to pay an annual tribute to the holy see, was absolved from the sentence of excommunication and interdict.

The pope gives the investiture of Sardinia and Corfica to the king of Arragon; 1339.

and sells the title of vicar of the empire to several nobles in Lombardy.

A. D. 1340.

f ABOUT the same time Benedict being informed that Margaret, heiress of Carinthia and Tyrol, had obtained a pretended divorce from her husband John, the king of Bohemia's son, and married Lewis marquis of Brandenburgh, son to the emperor, he annulled the marriage, because the divorce had been illegally obtained, and no dispensation granted of her consanguinity with Lewis. He likewise excommunicated the count of Hainault, and laid his province under an interdict, because he had rebelled against his sovereign the king of France, and entered into a league with Edward king of England. Soon after these two princes having agreed to a truce till the middle of the following summer, they intreated the pope to send two legates to Arras, who, with their plenipotentiaries, might in the mean time negotiate a peace. Not long after, the king of France having prevailed with the emperor 1341.

The emperor enters into an alliance with

<sup>a</sup> ALBERT. Argent. Chron. p. 129. ap. Murat. t. xiii. p. 83.

<sup>d</sup> SURIT. Indict. l. iii. FAZEL. D. ii. c. 9. <sup>f</sup> Idem, ut supra.

<sup>e</sup> VILLAN. c. 100.

<sup>z</sup> Idem, c. 108—111.

the king of France.

A. D. 1342.
Benedict dies
at Avignon.

Clement VI. elected pope.

He excuses himself from going to Rome;

but, at the desire of the Romans, he appoints a jubilee to be held in Rome.

A. D. 1343.

The emperor makes most submissive concessions to the pope.

1344.

The diet of Frankfort support the rights of the empire.

to renounce his alliance with the king of England, and to enter into a treaty with him, he sent ambassadors to Avignon, to excuse his proceeding to the pope. Benedict declared, that he had long desired that accommodation; however, he blamed the king for treating with Lewis before he was reconciled to the holy see. About the same time he prevailed with the kings of France and England to continue the truce for another year; and not many months after he died at Avignon, on the 25th of April, in the 7th year and 4th month of his pontificate.

THE cardinals, according to a constitution of Gregory X. having mourned nine days for pope Benedict, entered the conclave on the 7th of May, and unanimously chose cardinal Peter Proger, a Benedictine monk, whom Petrarch, his cotemporary, calls a most learned pope<sup>h</sup>. Peter, having assumed the name of Clement VI. was consecrated in the church of the Dominicans, on the feast of Whitsuntide; and soon after received an embassy from the Romans, intreating him to come to Rome, and to appoint the celebration of the jubilee for the middle of the century (G). Clement declared, that he could not with safety then return to Italy, as the emperor was threatening to enter that kingdom with an army, and had appointed vicars in many of the cities of the ecclesiastical state, in return for those of Lombardy that had received them from the pope. He excused himself likewise on account of the differences betwixt England and France, which he desired to accommodate. He accordingly sent two legates to these princes, who prolonged the truce for two years longer, in hopes of concluding a peace. The two legates were also sent into Lombardy, to form a league among the cities to oppose the emperor, against whom Clement ordered the anathemas of his predecessor to be again renewed; and because the archbishop of Mentz refused to publish them, he cited him to appear at Avignon. The following year, in the month of January, Clement published a bull, appointing a jubilee to be held at Rome, on the 50th year from the beginning of the century. Soon after he renewed all the censures of John XXII. against the emperor, whom he declared guilty of contumacy, and deprived of all dignity and honour; and wrote to the archbishop of Triers, and the other electors, to proceed to a new election. About the same time he entered into an alliance with the king of Cyprus and the Venetians against the Turks; and, having ordered a crusade to be preached against those infidels, he exhorted the knights of Rhodes to arm against them, appointing Henry the Latin patriarch of Constantinople, as his legate, to have the command of the expedition. Clement likewise appointed a certain sum to be raised from all the vacant benefices in England, as a revenue for two cardinals; but being informed, that the agents of the cardinals had been imprisoned by the king's officers, and afterwards ignominiously expelled the kingdom, he wrote to the king, complaining heavily of the indignity offered to the agents. Edward, having called a parliament, by their advice wrote to the pope, desiring him to forbear for the future from claiming the first-fruits of vacant benefices, or from conferring bishopricks or abbacies upon foreigners who did not reside in the island, as the right of patronage belonging to himself and his nobles was thereby totally annulled<sup>i</sup>.

MEAN while the emperor, alarmed with the violent proceedings of the pope, and sensible that a great many princes of Germany secretly favoured his designs, he sent an embassy to Avignon, offering to submit to any terms that Clement should prescribe. The ambassadors appeared in the consistory, before the pope, on the 16th of January; and, having presented the emperor's submission, signed by his own hand, acknowledging all the heresies of which he was accused, resigning his children and all his possessions into the hands and will of the pope, and abdicating the empire, not to resume it, unless from the hands of his holiness. They then desired to know the articles of penance which the pope would be pleased to prescribe to Lewis. Clement, instead of using that opportunity to conclude an accommodation, insulted his submissive adversary, and required several other grievous articles against the rights of the empire, which the ambassadors had no authority to agree to. These articles being laid before the diet at Frankfort, that assembly sent deputies to the pope, desiring him to moderate his demands, and declaring, that they would never agree to the articles which he had proposed. This unexpected firmness in the princes of Germany greatly irritated the pope against the emperor; he resolved to push his resentment to the utmost, and began to treat with the king of Bohemia, the archbishop of Triers, and some other princes, to proceed to the election of another emperor. About the same time he created Lewis of Spain, count of Clermont, then at Avignon, as ambassador from France, king of the Fortunate Islands, or Canaries, on con-

<sup>h</sup> PETRAR. l. ii. rer. memor. c. i.

<sup>i</sup> BZOV. ex. cod. Vatic. de reb. Angl. WALSING. in Edward. III.

(G) Petrarch, who, the year before, had been created poet laureat by the king of Naples, was one of the deputies; and, upon his arrival at Avignon, in the name of the city and church of Rome, presented the pope with a poem upon his promotion.

a dition of his converting the inhabitants to Christianity<sup>k</sup>; and, to gratify the king of Bohemia, he erected the church of Prague into an archbishopric, granting the archbishop the honour of the pall, and the right of crowning the kings of Bohemia, which privilege formerly belonged to the archbishop of Mentz.

As the factions increased in Germany the following year, Clement again renewed his anathemas against the emperor, exhorted the electors to proceed to a new election, and sent a legate a latere into Italy, to support the factions of the church in that kingdom. Being soon after informed of the murder of Andrew king of Naples, and husband of Jean the granddaughter of Robert, he ordered an inquiry to be made after the murderers, against whom he denounced a sentence of excommunication, and gave a full commission to some counts to b punish them, whether they should be found to be laymen or clergymen<sup>l</sup>. About the same time, hostilities being again renewed betwixt the kings of France and England, Clement sent two cardinals to those princes, to endeavour to conclude an accommodation; but the English refused to hearken to any terms proposed by the cardinals, accusing the pope of partiality to the king of France. Clement, then despairing to reconcile the princes by intreaties or embassies, published a letter, addressed to all the prelates, ordering public prayers to be used for procuring peace among Christian princes. Being likewise informed, that his fleet, in conjunction with that of the Venetians and Genoese, had taken Smyrna, he ordered a crusade to be preached against the Turks, and appointed Humbert, Dauphin of Vienne, as general of the land army<sup>m</sup>.

c In consequence of the intrigues of the pope, John king of Bohemia arriving at Avignon, with his eldest son Charles marquis of Moravia, to negotiate for the empire in favour of Charles, Clement, to strengthen their party, deposed the archbishop of Mentz, as guilty of contumacy, and conferred that see upon Gerlac of Nassau, grandson of the emperor Adolphus. A few days after he published a bull against the emperor, deposing him from his dignity, and absolving all his subjects from their allegiance. This bull, which was dated on Good Friday, the 13th of April, was sent to all the prelates in Christendom, with a circular letter, ordering them to publish it in their churches. Clement at the same time wrote to the electors, enjoining them to proceed to a new election; but excluded the marquis of Brandenburgh from the privilege of voting, under pretence that his father, the emperor, being an usurper, had

d no right to confer that fief. Having thus secured a majority among the electors, he embraced that opportunity for extending the authority of the see of Rome, and accordingly entered into a treaty with the marquis Charles, who promised to revoke and annul all the acts made by Lewis of Bavaria, to confirm all the grants of former emperors to the see of Rome, to resign all pretensions to the territories of the countess Matilda, not to enter Rome but upon the day of his coronation, and never to return but with the leave of the pope, and to annul all proceedings of his grandfather Henry VII. derogatory to those concessions. This treaty, which ruined the authority of the empire in Italy, and established that of the popes, being sworn to by Charles, and confirmed by his father the king of Bohemia, Clement recommended him as a candidate for the empire, and he was accordingly chosen emperor a few months after by e four electors at Rentz, three of the electors still adhering to the interest of Lewis of Bavaria. Charles, immediately after his election, sent ambassadors to the pope, who having sworn in his name that he would fulfil the former treaty, Clement published the news of his election in the consistory; and having with difficulty obtained the consent of the majority of the cardinals, he published a bull, confirming his election<sup>n</sup>. About the same time he sent several nuncios into Armenia, to extirpate the errors prevailing in that church, and to exhort the king to give his assistance to the Christians against the Turks. He likewise admonished the doctors of the university of Paris not to employ their time in vain and useless questions, but to explain the catholic faith according to the sense of the fathers.

during these transactions in Germany and Avignon, a great revolution happened at Rome, owing to one Nicolas Gabrini di Rienzo, the son of a miller and washer-woman, who, having received good education from his parents, and being of an active and enterprising genius, was created a public scribe or notary. He having been sent with the ambassadors to pope Clement, to invite him to Rome, and having received a denial from his holiness, upon his return he assembled the Romans in the capitol, and made a long and warm discourse to them, of the deplorable state of their city, and the happiness of their antient liberty. His words had such an effect on the people, that they unanimously declared him tribune of the people, and conferred upon him the supreme power. He immediately degraded the senators appointed by the pope; ordered several of the nobility, convicted of oppression, to be put to death; and banished the Corfini, the Colonnæ, and many other noble families. Having established his authority by the attachment of the people, and made himself respected by his

<sup>k</sup> PETRAR. de vit. solit. l. ii. sec. 6 c. 3. WALS. ut supra.
Kingdom of Naples.

<sup>m</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>l</sup> VILLAN. c. 50, 51. See also the History of the

<sup>n</sup> RAINALD. ad an. 1346. VILLAN. c. 59.

regard to justice, he sent letters to all the cities of Italy, informing them of the liberty of a the Romans, and desiring them to give their assistance to their mother city. His messengers were every-where treated with great respect; and several of the cities, concluding that the Romans were about to recover their antient grandeur, promised their assistance, and sent golden rings as tokens of their fidelity. Not only the Italian cities, but even foreign princes, sought his alliance: he received an embassy with an offer of friendship from Lewis, king of Hungary, who was preparing to enter Italy with an army, to revenge the murder of his brother the king of Naples. About the same time ambassadors arrived from Jean queen of Naples, desiring his mediation with the king of Hungary. The tribune likewise received an embassy from the emperor Lewis, asking his friendship; and Clement wrote to him from Avignon, commending his proceedings, and exhorting him to govern Rome in his name. b

THIS grandeur was of very short continuance; for Nicolas, being intoxicated with his authority, disdained to have any dependence upon the pope, and resolved to be absolute master in Rome. Accordingly, being desirous of the dignity of knighthood, he bathed himself in the font in which Constantine the Great had formerly been baptized, and then received his arms from the syndic of Rome and two knights before the altar of St. Peter; at the same time being crowned with the different crowns, he assumed the title of Candidate knight of the Holy Ghost, severe and merciful, deliverer of Rome, assertor of the liberties of Italy, lover of the universe, and august tribune. He likewise published a letter, declaring Rome the head of the world; and cited Lewis and Charles of Bohemia, with the other electors, to appear at Rome, to justify the rights and privileges which they assumed. These extravagant proceedings c ruined his character; and the pope, looking upon him as a mad enthusiast, published several bulls against him, accusing him of schism and heresy, upon which the ardour of the people in his favour greatly abated. Soon after, the banished nobles, entering the city by surprise with some troops, Nicolas was deserted by the people, and fled to Lewis king of Hungary, who was then at Naples. He afterwards skulked for some time, in the habit of a pilgrim, among the mountains, and at length was brought to Avignon, where he was detained a prisoner °.

The emperor is killed by a fall.

Jean queen of Naples arrives at Avignon;

A. D. 1348.
Jean queen of Naples sells that city to the see of Rome.

A great plague rages in Europe.

WHILE Nicolas was in the height of his grandeur at Rome, Clement was informed of the death of the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, who was killed by a fall from his horse, on the 9th of October. Soon after, hearing that the king of Hungary had entered Italy, he wrote to his d legate, to prohibit the king, under pain of excommunication, from seizing any of the territories belonging to the apostolic see. The king replied, that the kingdom of Naples belonged to him by right of his grandfather Charles Martel, and that he did not regard an unjust excommunication, as God, who was superior to the pope, knew the justice of his cause °. A few months after Jean queen of Naples arrived at Avignon, having fled from the resentment of the king of Hungary. She pleaded her cause with such eloquence before the consistory, and in the presence of the Hungarian deputies, that the pope declared her innocent of the murder of her husband, and confirmed her marriage with Lewis, duke of Tarento, and nephew of the late king Robert, Jean's grandfather. At the same time he purchased from her the city of Avignon, with all its territory, for 80,000 florins of gold °; e though some authors assert, that the sale was only pretended, and that Jean gave the city to the see of Rome, to procure the favour of the pope. Others allow the sale to be real, but say, that the price was paid by remitting the annual tribute due by the queen for the kingdom of Naples°. The instrument of the sale, whether real or pretended, is still extant, as is likewise a golden bull granted by the emperor Charles IV. resigning to the pope and see of Rome all right and title to the empire of that city °. About the same time Clement ordered the Dominicans and Franciscans of the province of Hungary to appoint learned men to preach the gospel to the Cumani, and other infidels of that kingdom, who adhered to the pagan rites of the Tartars. He likewise absolved Waldemar, king of Denmark, from the sentence of excommunication that he had incurred for visiting the sepulchre of Christ without leave from f the apostolic see; and as the plague raged in a most violent degree in Italy, and other countries of Europe, Clement granted a general indulgence to all those who were penitent, and confessed their sins, and to the priests who attended and administered the sacrament to the sick, supporting at his own charge those that were seized with the distemper at Avignon; and, to prevent the dead from lying unburied, hiring people to carry them to the field which he had purchased for that purpose ° (H).

As

• VILLAN. c. 89. & 104. PETRAR. de reb. famil. BZOV.

° BZOV. hoc an. vit. Clement. a Bosqueto edit.

• VILLAN. c. 206.

° SPOND. Annal.

° SPOND. Annal.

° SPOND. Annal. MATH. VILLAN. c. 4.

(H) A great many authors give an account of this kingdom, but ravaged progressively the greatest part of plague, which was not confined to one province or Asia and Europe, and part of Africa, carrying off almost one

- a As the Jews, in consequence of this plague, were massacred in great numbers in Germany A. D. 1349. and Poland, Clement published a bull in their favour, which was not able to stop the fury of the people, who accused them of being the authors of their calamity, and for two years continued to persecute them and put them to death without any distinction of age or sex. Mean while, The sect of flagellants refrom Hungary marched in troops through Upper and Lower Germany, Poland, France, Eng- vives. land, and other countries, their numbers increasing as they went along. Both men and women marched naked to the waist, and whipped themselves twice a day, and once during the night. Notwithstanding this great appearance of penitence and mortification, their sect is said to have been composed of the most profligate people, and to have professed absurd and pernicious b doctrines, as that the gospel ceased upon their appearing, that their scourging was preferable to martyrdom, and that the blood which they lost by that exercise mixed with the blood of Christ; that if any one scourged himself for thirty days, the guilt and punishment of his sins would be forgiven. These and many other errors being discovered to be the tenets of the sect, the pope published a bull against them, and prohibited all Christians from using those public scourgings, in consequence of which several princes published edicts against them, as disturbers of the public peace, so that in a short time they were totally dispersed.

- WHAT, according to Spondanus, was of much greater efficacy in removing the general calamity, was a bull published by the pope on the 10th of April, appointing a jubilee to be held the following year at Rome, promising a full remission of all their sins to those penitents who should visit the churches of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John di Lateran. Two cardinals were sent as legates to Rome, to superintend the solemnity, with full power to grant dispensations to those pilgrims who did not chuse to continue the full time prescribed by the pope, which was fifteen days for the Italians, and ten or five days for the Ultramontani, or foreigners. About this time Cantacuzenus, who had seized the empire of Constantinople, sent ambassadors The Greek emperor sends an embassy to the pope. to the pope, to justify himself from the false accusation of having made an alliance with the Turks, and exhorting his holiness and the princes of Europe to undertake an expedition into Asia against those infidels. Clement received the ambassadors with honour, and, upon their return, sent two bishops with them to Constantinople, declaring, that he accepted of the emperor's excuses, and desiring him to procure an union of the Greek church to that of Rome.
 d Cantacuzenus, in return, wrote to the pope, expressing his desire of an union, but proposed, that a general council of the eastern and western bishops should assemble in some city near the sea-coast, where both the pope and he himself might be present.

- WHILE this affair was transacting betwixt the Greek emperor and the pope, the jubilee commenced at Rome, where, notwithstanding the plague still raged with great violence in several parts of Europe, such numbers of people assembled, that, according to Matthew Villani, from Christmas to Easter, which happened that year on the 18th of March, there were continually from a million to twelve hundred thousand foreigners in Rome. During the summer, the number of pilgrims in the city was supposed to amount to 200,000; but, towards the end of the year, the concourse was almost as great as at the beginning, and chiefly e of the better sort of both sexes, as the dispensations were then easily granted with regard to the time. According to Meyerus, scarce the tenth part of the pilgrims returned home, being cut off by the plague, or the fatigues of the long journey. And Villani relates, that the Romans, with great rapacity, practised all manner of extortion upon the pilgrims; and were so exasperated against the cardinal legate for dispensing with the time of visitation, that

A jubilee celebrated at Rome.
1350.

<sup>a</sup> TRITHEM. in Chron. Hirsang. l. iv. c. 9. SPOND. Annal. l. xiii.

NAUCLER. Gener. 45. WALSING. in Edw. III.

* MATTH. VILLANI, ap. Murator, t. xiv. l. i. c. 56.

<sup>w</sup> CANTACUZEN. <sup>y</sup> MEYER.

one third of the inhabitants, and in some places scarce leaving the tenth, or even the twentieth person. Cantacuzenus, the Greek emperor, has very elegantly described the various symptoms and different effects of the distemper (1), which is said to have appeared in the kingdom of Kathay, in the year 1346, and to have proceeded gradually westward to Constantinople and Egypt, emptying cities of their inhabitants, and raging in one place about five months. From Constantinople it passed into Greece, Italy, France, Spain, and Africa, and by degrees along the coasts of the ocean into Britain and Ireland, and afterwards into Germany, Hungary, Poland, Denmark, and the other northern kingdoms. According to Antoninus, archbishop of Florence, the distemper carried off 60,000 people in that city, among whom was the historian John Villani (2); but, by the account of Boccace, the number of dead in Florence amounted to 100,000. Notwithstanding such a heavy scourge, several authors relate, that a general corruption of manners immediately after prevailed, those who survived being enriched with the possessions of the dead, and indulging themselves in vice and dissoluteness, from which the religious orders were not exempt, owing to the great wealth arising from the many pious legacies they then received, so that, according to Petrarch, the world was empty of men, but full of crimes (3).

(1) Cantacuz. l. iv. c. 8.

(2) Anton. tit. xxi. c. 8. §. 3.

rer. famil. l. viii. epist. 7. Marian. l. xvi. c. 13. Nauclet. Gener. 44. Walsing. in Edw. III.

(3) Petrarch. de reb. Senil. ad Boccac. & they attacked him and his retinue in the streets; and, as he endeavoured to shun their violence by retiring into Campania, he was poisoned, with several of his relations upon the road<sup>2</sup>. Mean while Clement being informed that the archbishop of Milan, who, since the death of his brother Lucbino, was both spiritual and temporal sovereign in that city, had seized Bologna, and annexed it to his dominion, he laid the city of Milan under an interdict, and summoned the archbishop and his nephews to appear at Avignon. The archbishop neglecting the citation, Clement excommunicated him and his adherents; and afterwards, hearing that he solicited the assistance of the Gibelines, he sent the bishop of Ferrara as his legate into Italy, to form a league among the cities of Lombardy and Tuscany for their mutual defence, and the protection of the church.

The archbishop of Milan is excommunicated for seizing Bologna.

The queen of Naples declared innocent of the murder of her husband.

A. D. 1351.

The usurpations of the pope are opposed in England.

In the mean time his legate at Naples having concluded a truce betwixt the king of Hungary and queen Jean, who was now returned to Naples, it was agreed that all hostilities should cease till April next, and the cause of Jean in the mean time be again examined by the apostolic see. Accordingly, the following year, her cause was re-examined before the consistory, who admitted of her excuse, namely, that she was under the power of witchcraft or incantation, which prevented her from loving her husband as she ought. This plea being confirmed by witnesses, the benevolent judges declared her innocent of all actions subsequent to that incantation; in which decision the king of Hungary, after some difficulty, at last acquiesced<sup>3</sup>. This affair being determined, Clement, upon a complaint from the king of France that the English had broke the truce, sent two legates to accommodate the differences betwixt the two kings; but their mediation having no effect, the war was again renewed. Mean time the parliament of England, finding no redress from the pope of the grievances they had formerly complained of, decreed, that whoever should accept any benefice in England from the gift of the pope, should be punished with perpetual imprisonment: that, upon a vacancy, if the patrons neglected for four months to supply the benefice, their right should devolve to the king. They likewise ordained, that the king should supply those benefices then enjoyed by foreigners residing in France, and annulled the grants of money made by the pope to some cardinals from the provinces of Canterbury and York. These proceedings against the court of Rome, according to Nauclerus, were owing to the resentment of Edward, who was affronted because the pope had refused to confer the dignity of cardinal upon one that he had recommended, though the year before he had promoted twelve cardinals at the request of the king of France<sup>4</sup>; and Harpsfield, in his history of the English church, relates, that the act was soon after rendered ineffectual by the opposition of the legates, and the archbishop of Canterbury<sup>5</sup>.

At this time, according to Matthew Villani, great disturbances happened at Rome, in consequence of the wealth the Romans had acquired the year before by the concurrence of foreigners. The bishop of Orvieto, the vicar of the pope, finding his authority despised, fled to the capitol, but he was expelled from thence by James Savelli, of the faction of the Colonnæ, and the city continued for some time without any governor. At length the people chose one John Cerro, an eminent plebeian, as their rector or chief, and, in contempt of the nobility, obliged the vicar to confirm their choice<sup>6</sup>. During these disturbances in Rome, Clement received an embassy from the emperor Charles, informing him of his intention of entering Italy to receive the imperial crown, and promising to attach himself to the party of the Guelphs. Soon after deputies arrived at Avignon from the allied cities of Italy, complaining of the hostilities of Viconti, and desiring the assistance of pope. Clement received the deputies very graciously, though he was not a little disconcerted upon their arrival, as he had entered into a private negotiation with Viconti, who, by the influence of his money, had procured the interest of a great many cardinals, and by the same means had purchased the intercession of the king of France. The pope, that he might seem disinterested, proposed the choice of three things to the deputies, either to conclude a peace with the archbishop, or a league with the church against him, or, lastly, to invite the emperor to their assistance. They being informed of the archbishop's interest with the pope, referred the choice of the three expedients to his holiness; who accordingly absolved the archbishop from the censures denounced against him, and granted him and his successors the vicariate of Bologna for twelve years, on condition of paying a yearly tribute of 12,000 florins to the holy see, and 100,000 florins for the expences of the war; but, that the interest of the allies might not seem neglected, a truce was concluded betwixt them and Viconti for twelve months. Thus, says Villani, for money the greatest affairs may be transacted with the pastors of the holy church<sup>7</sup>. Viconti seems to have been determined to this accommodation from an apprehension of the emperor's arrival in 1352.

Viconti by his money, purchases a peace with the holy see.

<sup>2</sup> VILLAN. ut supra.

<sup>3</sup> VILLAN. l. ii. c. 24. SUMMONT. l. iii.
<sup>4</sup> HARPSFIELD. Hist. Eccles. Angl. secul. 14. c. 5.
& 5.

<sup>5</sup> VILLAN. l. ii. c. 47.

<sup>6</sup> NAUCLER. Gen. 46.

<sup>7</sup> Idem, l. ii. c. 4.

- a Italy; for, before that expedition was mentioned, he treated the pope with the greatest contempt (I).

THE allied cities in Italy, being thus abandoned by the pope, entered into an alliance with the emperor, who promised the following year to enter Italy with 6000 horse, and to attack the territories of Vicenti, the allies stipulating to join his army with 3000 horse, and to grant him a subsidy of 200,000 florins of gold<sup>f</sup>. Clement survived this transaction but a few months, and died at Avignon in the beginning of December. From his regard to the kings of France, he granted them a power of communicating under both kinds, whenever they pleased to desire the eucharist<sup>g</sup>. He likewise moderated the rigour of the constitution of Gregory X. with regard to the cardinals, when shut up in the conclave at an election. He is accused of

- b having conferred honours and dignities upon his relations without measure, or regard to their merit, having created his nephew Peter a cardinal when only seventeen years of age.

THE cardinals, upon the death of Clement, being informed that the king of France was hastening to Avignon, to have a pope chosen in his interest, they thought proper to prevent him; and, on the 18th of the same month, chose Stephen Albert, bishop of Ostia, who took the name of Innocent VI.; and, immediately after his consecration, wrote to all the Christian princes, informing them of his promotion (K). He likewise suspended, and afterwards annulled, the grants of reversion of benefices given by his predecessor Clement; at the same time commanding all prelates, and other ecclesiastical persons, to repair to their churches, under pain of an anathema, declaring, that flocks ought to be kept by their own shepherds, and not by hirelings<sup>h</sup>. Being intent also upon reforming his own court, he reprehended the cardinals for their luxurious lives, and ordered them to follow the example of frugality set by himself. As the ecclesiastical state was at this time almost wholly usurped by different princes, and the city of Rome a scene of confusion and uproar, the Romans, upon account of a great dearth, having stoned their senator to death, Innocent sent cardinal Aegidius Alvarus, a Spaniard, descended from the ancient kings of Leon, as his legate into Italy, appointing him vicar over all the ecclesiastical state, with full power of assembling an army, and opposing the unjust possessors of the territories of the church. Together with the legate, Innocent sent Nicolas Rienzo, the former tribune, to oppose the designs of Francis Baroncelli at Rome, who, supported by the favour of the people, had expelled the nobility, assumed the title of tribune

- c II. and Roman consul; and, throwing off the authority of the pope, had invited the Gibelines to an alliance<sup>i</sup>. Not only Rome, but almost all Italy, was at this period desolated by intestine wars. Though the allied cities in Tuscany, being disappointed in their succours from the emperor, had concluded a peace with Vicenti, yet several other cities had formed a new league against him. The Venetians and Genoese were engaged in a most destructive war, which was carried on with great animosity; and, while the pope's legate had assembled an army at Monte Fiascone, against John de Vico, who had usurped a great part of the territories of the church, one frier Moriale, a Provençal, and knight hospitaller, headed an army of freebooters, who acknowledged no faction. This knight had served the king of Hungary in his Neapolitan war, and, after his accommodation with queen Jean, had entered into the service of the church; but, not being able to recover his arrears of pay, he now deserted that party, and, by offering large pay to those who would serve under him, he quickly assembled an army of 2000 men, composed of Germans, French, and Provençals, who were dispersed through different parts of Italy. This army of banditti was called the Grand Company of the March of Ancona, which province was the first scene of their ravaging; and, their numbers continually increasing, they formed themselves into a military society, appointing a council, secretaries, questors, and other magistrates, and put garrisons into several cities which

<sup>f</sup> VILLAN. c. 6, 7.
cent. VI.

<sup>g</sup> HENRIQ. lib. de Eucharist. c. 44. sect 7.

<sup>h</sup> PLATIN. in vit. Innocent. VI.

<sup>i</sup> VILLAN. l. iii. c. 78.

(I) A letter, supposed to be written by the archbishop of Milan, was dropped in the confistory, and addressed to the pope. It was dated from the middle of hell, and, in the name of the prince of darkness, thanked his vicar the pope, and his counsellors and cardinals, for their great services, exhorting them to a steady perseverance in their present course, that they might be intitled to a full reward in his kingdom. Then, mentioning the particular vices of each of them, he chided them for allowing their doctrine to differ from their life, and exhorted them for the future to teach as they lived.

(K) Innocent VI. was born in Limoges in France, and, being bred to the law, he was for some time a proctor or attorney, and then a judge, at Thoulouse. Entering afterwards into orders, he was successively bishop of Meaux, Clermont, and Cambray, and by Clement VI. was created a cardinal priest, and afterwards bishop of Ostia, and major penitentiary.

In an antient chronicle of the Carthusians it is mentioned, that when the majority of the cardinals were determined to elect John Birell, the general of that order, as pope, they were dissuaded by a cardinal of Perigord, who, knowing John to be a man of great justice and sanctity, declared, that, if he were elected pope, their fine mules would in a few days be drawing in the carts, as he was a professed enemy to worldly pomp and ambition. The cardinals, alarmed by his discourse, altered their resolution, and chose Innocent (1).

Rienzo again they made themselves masters of<sup>k</sup>. Mean while the Romans received Nicolas Rienzo with the a createdtribune greatest demonstrations of joy; and Baroncelli, after a government of a few months, being of Rome. put to death, they conferred the tribuneship on Nicolas, and sent deputies to the legate at Monte Fiascone, acknowledging their submission to the church.

DURING these commotions in Italy, Innocent, being informed that a great many heretics had fled from the mountains of Yverdon into Calabria, wrote to the king of Naples, and to the inquisitor, to proceed against them. He likewise sent a cardinal legate to the king of England, exhorting him to a reconciliation with the king of France; and wrote to the bishop of Orvieto, his vicar at Rome, desiring him to oblige the chapter of St. Peter's church to refund three fourth parts of all the offerings presented during the jubilee at St. Peter's altar, as one fourth part, according to antient custom, only belonged to them. As the Christians of b the east were at this time harrassed by the continual incursions of the Turks, Innocent granted the third part of the tythes of the churches of Germany, France, Bohemia, Greece, and other provinces, for their assistance, and ordered the master of the knights of Rhodes to succour the city of Smyrna, at that time attacked by the Turks. Soon after, receiving an embassy from Stephen king of Rascia, complaining that some Greek bishops disturbed the peace of his kingdom, by deposing some bishops and abbots of the Roman communion, and obliging others to repeat their baptism and confirmation, desiring likewise the pope to send some learned and religious men into his kingdom, to reform all abuses, and that the king might be appointed by the holy see captain against the Turks. Innocent thanked the king for his zeal, nominated him captain according to his desire, and appointed the bishop of Traw as his c legate, to extirpate the errors and abuses in that kingdom, particularly their opinion concerning the Holy Spirit, which they affirmed proceeded only from the Father; and their doctrine concerning the wafer in the eucharist, which they denied to be the real body of Christ.

THIS embassy of the king appeared afterwards to be only a pretence, to prevent his being invaded by Lewis king of Hungary, who had formed pretensions to his kingdom<sup>l</sup>. About this time also Abdalla, one of the kings of Mauritania, wrote to the pope, offering to embrace the Christian faith; but the professions in his letter, as appeared afterwards, were not sincere, but designed only to procure him the assistance of the Christians against some of his neighbouring princes, with whom he was at war. Innocent wrote to him to persevere in his good intentions; and at the same time, hearing that Peter king of Castile had prevailed with d two of his bishops to grant him a divorce from his queen, and had married the widow of one of his nobles, he wrote to the king, reproaching him with the heinousness of his crime, and ordered his nuncio in that kingdom to oblige the king to recall his queen, and, in case of his refusal, to proceed against him by ecclesiastical censures. Mean while two Franciscans being brought prisoners from Montpelier to Avignon, for disputing concerning the poverty of Christ and his apostles, contrary to the definition of John XXII. Innocent ordered them to be examined; and as they refused to recant their doctrine, and affirmed, that the opinion of pope John was a heresy, they were delivered to the civil magistrate, and publicly burnt<sup>m</sup>.

Soon after the pope received an embassy from the emperor Charles, who, in the beginning of November, had entered Lombardy with a small army. As the ambassador made a demand e of the imperial crown for his master, Innocent wrote a long letter to Charles, excusing himself from going to Rome on the occasion of his coronation, but promising to commission some of the cardinals to perform that ceremony. He likewise wrote to his legate Ægidius to assist the emperor with the troops of the church, and to dispose the Romans to receive him in an honourable manner, they having a few months before revolted against their tribune Rienzo, and put him to death. Charles, in the mean time, residing at Mantua, tried to conclude a peace betwixt the confederates of Tuscany, and the nephews of the archbishop Vicenti, whom that prelate, who died a few weeks before, had left heirs of his extensive conquests. As he had no forces to compel the parties to agree to an accommodation, his endeavours were ineffectual;
 however, having granted several articles unworthy of his dignity, he procured a truce betwixt f them till the month of May following. Proceeding then to Milan, he was crowned with the iron crown in that city on the 6th of January; and receiving some money from the Vicenti, for confirming to them the vicariate of the empire in the territories they then possessed, he went from thence with great dispatch for Pisa. Innocent, in consequence of the embassy of the emperor, appointed the cardinal bishop of Ostia to perform the ceremony of the consecration, together with two other cardinals who solicited that office. As the conclave refused to bear the expences of the cardinals, and Charles was not able, those two who were so earnest in soliciting the deputation refused to go, on which account the pope appointed the legate Ægidius to assist Bertrandi bishop of Ostia, who, having received his commission in the beginning of February, set out for Italy, and joined the emperor at Pisa<sup>n</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> VILLAN. c. 81, & 89.<sup>l</sup> BZOV. an. 1356.<sup>m</sup> REEDORFF in Annal. WALING. in Edw. III.<sup>n</sup> VILLAN. l. iii. c. 103. l. iv. c. 71.

- a CHARLES, soon after leaving Pisa, arrived in the neighbourhood of Rome with an army of 5,000 Germans and 10,000 Italians; and, having appointed Easter for the day of his coronation, he, on Good Friday, with some of his nobles, entered the city in the habit of pilgrims, and took a view of the principal edifices and churches. Two days after he marched into the city in a grand procession; and, being received with the greatest demonstrations of joy, he was crowned emperor by cardinal Bertrandi, in the church of St. Peter. According to his promise to the pope, he marched out of the city the same day, and refused to accept of the government of Rome offered him by the Romans. It appearing from this proceeding, and from his after-conduct, that he quite abandoned all the rights of the empire in Italy, he quickly lost his reputation, and was treated with great indignity by those, who, if he had asserted his own rights, would have been his firmest friends. At Sienna he held a long conference with the pope's legate; and, instead of accepting of the allegiance of the Gibelines, granted some troops to Ægidius, to assist him in quelling that faction. In consequence of these proceedings, finding himself odious to the Italians, he quitted that kingdom, and in the month of July retired with about 2000 men into Germany.<sup>o</sup>

Receives the imperial crown from cardinal Bertrandi at Rome.

- WHILE the emperor was thus dishonouring himself by his conduct in Italy, the grand company of Ancona having lost their chief, Moriale, who was surprised and executed by the tribune Rienzo at Rome, they conferred the command on the count di Lando; and, after having served several months in the pay of the Lombard states, marched into Romagna, demanding a contribution of 30,000 florins of gold; but, upon receiving 12,000, they were prevailed upon to quit that province, and marched into Ancona. From thence they sent and demanded a contribution of 40,000 florins of gold from Lewis king of Naples, and, upon his refusal, they entered his kingdom, and immediately took Pescara, Villa Franca, and San Fabiano, and threatened to join the duke of Durazzo, who was then in rebellion<sup>p</sup>. Mean while great disorders happened at the pope's court at Avignon, the cardinal Perigort, upon a contest about precedency, having raised a tumult, in which some persons were killed, while other young cardinals took some young married women from their husbands by violence, and kept them publicly in their houses. Innocent, being informed of their infamous proceedings, reproved them in the consistory, and threatened to transfer his court to Rome.<sup>q</sup>

The grand company of Ancona ravages Italy.

- ABOUT the same time he received an embassy from John Paleologus, who, by the voluntary abdication of his governor Cantacuzenus, had at length obtained the possession of the empire of Constantinople. The emperor solicited earnestly the assistance of the pope and the western princes against the Turks; and, in order to obtain his request, he promised an intire submission to the apostolic see, to send his eldest son to Avignon, as a security for his fidelity, and to assign a palace in Constantinople for the residence of the pope's nuncio, and three colleges for masters to teach the Latin tongue, which the sons of the Greek nobles should be compelled to learn. Innocent, the following year, sent two bishops to Constantinople, and wrote to the emperor to make the same confession before them, in the presence of the patriarch and a full assembly, in one of the chief churches, as he had wrote in his letter. The emperor agreed without difficulty to this proposal of the pope, who thereupon wrote to the kings of Cyprus and Hungary, to the doge of Venice, the senate and people of Genoa, and to the master of the knights of Rhodes, desiring them to assist the Greek emperor with arms, men, and money<sup>r</sup>.

The Greek emperor solicits the assistance of the pope. A.D. 1356.

- ABOUT the same time, being informed that the king of France had been defeated by the English at Poitiers, and taken prisoner, with his son, and several of his nobles, he sent the abbot of Cluny, and the cardinal of Perigort, to the emperor Charles, desiring him to intercede for the liberty of the king, and to offer his mediation to conclude a peace betwixt France and England. In consequence of the pope's endeavours to procure a reconciliation, some English deputies arrived at Metz, and were present at a diet held in that city at Christmas, but nothing was concluded on with regard to a peace.

- f MEAN while the kingdom of Italy continued still to be desolated by intestine wars, the grand company, under the command of Lando, ravaging and plundering Naples; while the two Vicenti at Milan, having poisoned their elder brother, still continued their wars against the other princes or tyrants of Lombardy. At the same time Ægidius the legate having recovered by arms almost all the patrimony of the church, except Forli and Faenza, which were held by Francis Ordellaffus and John and Richard Manfred, he ordered them and their adherents to be excommunicated, and condemned as heretics, publishing a crusade against them, with the same indulgences as were given to those who fought against the Saracens. Having by this means greatly increased his army, he soon obliged the two Manfreds to surrender; but Ordellaffus still refused to submit, and, in contempt of his fulminations, made effigies of the pope.

Great confusions in Italy;

<sup>o</sup> Idem, l. v. c. 14. 15. 20. 29.

<sup>p</sup> VILLAN. l. iv. c. 15. 19. 23. 40. 58. 79.

<sup>q</sup> Idem, c. 86.

<sup>r</sup> BZOV. & WADDING. hoc an.

which is ravaged by the troops of the Visconti.

who gain a victory over the confederates.
Italy likewise ravaged by the Turks.

and cardinals, whom he excommunicated; and, having apprehended some of the crusaders, a he imprinted the figure of a cross with a red-hot iron, upon the soles of their feet. He was encouraged in his opposition by the Visconti, who were jealous of the growing authority of the legate; and, seizing the priest, whom he had sent to publish the crusade in Milan, ordered him to be inclosed in an iron grate, and roasted to death, expelling likewise the bishop of Parma, who had granted his protection to the priest. Their troops at the same time ravaging their neighbouring states, several cities of Lombardy entered into a league against them, and took into their pay the grand company of Lando, who, having received a large sum from the king of Naples, had quitted that kingdom, and were then ravaging the territory of Ravenna. The emperor also, being desirous of humbling the Visconti, had left the bishop of Augusta at Pisa, with a secret commission, as his vicar in Italy, ordering him not to act unless he saw a probability of success. The bishop, who had a great reputation in military affairs, thought proper at this time to publish his commission; and, being appointed general of the grand company, and the other troops of the confederates, he summoned the Visconti to answer for the many outrages they had committed against the empire and the church. They despising his citation, he advanced with his troops, and ravaged the territory of Milan; but, being surprised by the Visconti, he was, after a desperate engagement, intirely defeated, and taken prisoner, together with Lando, and several other chief officers*. To complete the devastation of Italy, this year, according to Villani, the Turks first invaded that kingdom, at the invitation of one of the nobles of Romagna. Having landed their troops from seventy vessels, and a great many smaller barks, they ravaged the country in a miserable manner, and reembarked without meeting with any disturbance<sup>c</sup>.

A. D. 1337.

THE pope, in the mean time, being informed that Peter king of Castile had seized the revenues of cardinal Ægidius in his kingdom, from a persuasion that that prelate had been the chief adviser of the ecclesiastical censures that had been denounced against him, Innocent reprehended the king for his proceeding, and declared, that, as the cardinals were employed together with the pope in governing the universal church, they ought to be reputed as residing upon their benefices<sup>b</sup>. As Peter was likewise at war with the king of Arragon, and they had both called in the Moors to their assistance, Innocent sent a cardinal as his legate into Spain, who concluded a truce betwixt the two kings for fifteen months. But, the truce being quickly violated by the king of Castile, the legate denounced a sentence of excommunication d against him, and laid his kingdom under an interdict.

Innocent fortifies Avignon against an army of robbers.

DURING these proceedings of the legate in Spain, Innocent was alarmed with a progress of a numerous troop of banditti, commanded by one Arnold of Gascony, an arch-priest, who, in imitation of the grand company in Italy, ravaged the southern parts of France, and raised contributions upon the people. As they approached Avignon, the pope caused the city to be fortified against their attempts; but he was freed from his alarms by a message from Arnold the captain, declaring that he had no intention of invading his territories<sup>e</sup>. About the same time Innocent recalled his legate Ægidius from Italy, and sent Androinus abbot of Cluny as his successor; but as Ægidius had provided every thing for the attack of Ordelauffus, he was prevailed upon by the abbot to continue with the army for several months, during which time he reduced Cesena, with several other towns; and having, by money and ecclesiastical censures, prevailed upon the grand company of Lando, which was sent against him, to return to Lombardy, in the month of August he laid siege to Forli, and, leaving the management of the rest of the war to Androinus, he returned to Avignon, where he was received with great honours by the pope and the cardinals. Androinus, having continued the siege for some time after the departure of Ægidius, was at length obliged to raise it by the approach of winter, and the vigorous defence of the besieged. In the beginning of the spring he again invested the city; but Ordelauffus, during the winter, having strengthened the garrison with part of Lando's company, his efforts to gain the place were rendered ineffectual.

The legate
Ægidius quits the command of the pope's army in Italy.
1358.

The grand company are defeated.

WHILE his army was engaged in the siege of Forli, the grand company, intending to pass f into Tuscany, contrary to a treaty that they had made with the Florentines, were defeated in the passes of the Appennines by the inhabitants of those mountains, and Lando himself taken prisoner. The two peasants, who had seized Lando, being prevailed upon by a promise of 2000 florins to set him at liberty, he immediately repaired to the remains of his company in Romagna, and, being greatly exasperated against the Florentines, he used all means to reinforce his company, with the intention of invading Tuscany, and ravaging the territories of Florence. Androinus in the mean time being obliged to raise the siege of Forli, and being unsuccessful in several other attempts, Innocent again sent Ægidius into Italy. About the same time the bishop of Ely in England arriving at Avignon, and complaining that he had been tried and imprisoned by the king's judges, contrary to the privileges of ecclesiastics,

Difference between the pope and the king of England.

* VILLAN. l. vi. c. 23. 28. 75.
c. 87, & 96. l. viii. c. 8. 54. 96.

* VILLAN. c. 30.

* BZOV. hoc ar.

* VILLAN. l. vii.

a the pope ordered the whole process to be transmitted to him by the judges, under pain of excommunication if they refused. The judges not only refused to obey the pope's mandate, but one of them even imprisoned his nuncio; which Innocent being informed of, he immediately excommunicated them, ordering the bishop of Lincoln, and some other prelates, not to allow the bodies of the judges, if they should die, to be buried in consecrated ground. This proceeding of the pope greatly offended the king; and soon after, having apprehended some persons who had delivered an apostolic letter to his treasurer, he ordered them to be put to death*.

THE usurpations of the see of Rome this year likewise met with an opposition in Germany, where Innocent had sent the bishop of Cavaillon, as his nuncio, to raise the tythe of all the ecclesiastical revenues for the use of the apostolic see. This extraordinary subsidy was refused by the clergy of Triers, Mentz, and Cologne; and the following year the emperor held a diet of the princes of the empire at Mentz, to deliberate upon the demand of the pope. With the consent of the princes, Charles declared to the nuncio, that the clergy of Germany could not submit to the proposed tax; and at the same time asked the bishop, with some warmth, why the pope was so earnest in demanding money, and so negligent in reforming the pride and dissoluteness of the clergy? He then addressed himself to the archbishop of Mentz, and strictly ordered him to reform his clergy according to the canons, especially with regard to their luxurious living, and the vanity of their dress; and if any ecclesiastic should prove refractory, he ordained that the revenues of his benefice should be confiscated, and disposed of according to the pleasure of the pope†. Innocent, by the return of the nuncio, being informed of the determination of the diet, dissembled his resentment for the denial of the tythe, and sent other nuncios into the provinces of the empire, with orders to collect the half of the revenue of all vacant benefices for two years, for the use of the apostolic see. But, thinking the ecclesiastical liberty violated by the endeavours of the emperor to reform the clergy, he wrote to Charles, commending him for his zeal, but at the same time desiring him to desist from the secular sequestration of benefices, and to restore those that were already confiscated, contenting himself with desiring the prelates to chastise their irregular clergy. Innocent likewise wrote to all the archbishops of Germany, ordering them to correct and punish their clergy who were guilty of irregularities. In consequence of these letters of the pope, the emperor soon after published a bull, annulling all that had been done against the ecclesiastics, and confirming to them, under the notion of privileges, a great many exemptions, incompatible with the welfare of society‡. Having thus gratified the pope, he sent to him, desiring him to cancel some bulls in the Clementine constitutions, that were derogatory to the honour of the empire. It was not the temper of the court of Rome to part with any usurpation; accordingly Innocent replied, that as those bulls were part of the canon law, and publicly taught in the schools, he could not suppress them§.

MEAN while Androinus, abbot of Cluny, having returned from Italy, was sent as legate to reconcile the kings of France and England; which he at last effected, a peace being concluded by his mediation on the 8th of May, and confirmed by the apostolic see the 10th of October following. By this peace, the king of France obtained his liberty, on condition of paying three millions of gold; but, as his kingdom was greatly exhausted by the long and destructive war, to raise part of this money he condescended to contract an alliance with the Vicenti of Milan, giving his daughter Isabel to John the son of Galeas Vicenti for 600,000 florins of gold. While Galeas was thus employed in aggrandizing his family by an alliance with France, his brother Bernabo was besieging the city of Bologna, which, notwithstanding the treaty lately concluded betwixt his uncle and the pope, the legate Ægidius had made himself master of. As the forces of Bernabo were very numerous, the pope solicited the assistance of the emperor against him; he likewise invited the king of Hungary to succour the church; and denounced a sentence of excommunication against the two Vicenti, and their adherents. Galeas Vicenti, declaring that he did not approve of his brother's proceedings, was quickly absolved from the sentence; but Bernabo, despising the pope's fulmination, to shew his own superiority, ordered three other places belonging to the church to be besieged at the same time; by which means he obliged the pope to an accommodation, and to consent to pay him a tribute of 20,000 florins for five years. This peace was quickly broken by Bernabo, who again besieged Bologna, and renewed his hostilities against other places of the ecclesiastical state. The pope, finding himself still too weak to oppose his arms, again solicited the emperor to interest himself in the affairs of Italy, in behalf of the church; while his legate Ægidius went over into Hungary, to procure assistance from that kingdom. Charles, at the solicitation of the pope, published an imperial edict, ordering Bernabo to desist from hostilities, * WALSHING. in Edw. III. HARPSFIELD, secul. 14. c. 29.

† Mag. Chron. Belg. sub Carol. IV. Tom. rer. Germ. Lindenburg.

‡ NAUCLER. Gen. 46. SPOND. Annal.

§ RAINALD. ad an. 1359.

under pain of being deprived of all the dignities he had received from the empire. But as a this edict was not supported by any troops, it was despised by Bernabo; however, Galeot Malatesta, soon after, having entered Bologna with a strong reinforcement, made a successful ally against the enemy, and obliged him to raise the siege.

Great commotions in Rome.

DURING these disturbances in Lombardy, the city of Rome was again divided into factions, occasioned by the fickleness and instability of the people in the change of senators, who were neither contented with nobles nor plebeians in that dignity. To put an end to those divisions, the pope ordered his legate to appoint a stranger as their senator; accordingly, that dignity was conferred for six months on Raimund of Siena. The Romans were quickly disgusted with this form of government, and chose for themselves seven reformers of the commonwealth; but the pope, disapproving of their proceeding, appointed the king of Cyprus as their senator, b who had come into Europe to demand assistance against the Turks. The king dying soon after, the bishop of Fermo was appointed rector of Rome, and the count of Fondi was ordered to quell the seditious by arms<sup>b</sup>. Mean while the kingdom of France being ravaged by great troops of robbers, who plundered the provinces under different leaders, Innocent being apprehensive lest they should attack Avignon, ordered a crusade to be preached against them, and appointed the bishop of Ostia as general of the crusaders<sup>c</sup>. The following year the plague again appeared in several places in Europe, and in Egypt and Syria. In Milan it raged with great violence, and, according to Villani, it carried off eleven cardinals and a great number of people at Avignon<sup>d</sup>. Innocent himself did not long survive, but died the next year, on the 13th of September. A few months before his death, the Romans having revolted against c their governor, and chose one Lelius Bonadota, a shoemaker, as their senator, he, by the assistance of the people, expelled the greatest part of the nobility and gentlemen from the city. But, as the exiles assembled an army to revenge themselves on the opposite faction, the Romans again submitted to the pope, on condition that cardinal Ægidius should not have any authority over them<sup>e</sup> (L).

Innocent dies
at Avignon.
A. D. 1362.

Urban V.
is elected pope.

A few days after the death of Innocent, the cardinals, to the number of twenty, entered the conclave, to chuse a successor. Fifteen of them gave their votes for a cardinal of the order of St. Benedict; but he refusing to accept of the pontificate, the cardinals, on the 28th of October, unanimously chose William Grimoaldi, a Benedictine, and abbot of St. Victor, of Marseilles. As the abbot was then absent in Italy, the cardinals wrote to him to come d immediately to Avignon, but concealed his election till his arrival; a few days after which, on the 7th of November, he was consecrated pope, and took the name of Urban V. Having, according to custom, informed the emperor, and other kings and princes, of his promotion, he immediately ordered all the bishops at Avignon to return to their own sees, and published severe edicts against luxury in dress, as he himself continued to wear his monastic habit underneath his pontifical ornaments, and never laid aside the hard bed and parsimonious living proper to his order. He likewise abolished a privilege which the cardinals claimed, of affording a sanctuary in their houses to those who fled thither, after committing any atrocious crime. A few weeks after his promotion, he received a visit from the king of France; together with that prince came the deputies of Bernabo of Milan, who desired a peace with e the holy see. Urban refused to grant their request, unless Bernabo restored all the territories that he had usurped from the see of Rome, and, by a true penitence, declared his submission to the church. Continuing firm in his resolution, notwithstanding the intercession of the king of France, that prince departed dissatisfied from Avignon; and Urban soon after published a bull against Bernabo, accusing him of heresy and schism, and many other horrid crimes; ordering him, under pain of excommunication, to justify himself before the first of March. This bull was sent to the patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops, of Italy, and, according to Villani, was published at Florence on the 29th of January; but, Bernabo neglecting the citation, Urban, on the 4th of March, held a public consistory, in which he declared him ex- f communicated, and deprived, together with all his posterity, of all honour and jurisdiction<sup>f</sup>. He likewise freed his wife, as being a Christian woman, from the bond of marriage, absolved his subjects from their allegiance, and granted indulgences to all those who would take up the cross against him. By this proceeding Urban greatly offended the king of France, who had

He excommu-nicates and de-poses Bernabo.
1363.

<sup>b</sup> BLOND. D. ii. l. x. VILLAN. l. ix. c. 87. BZOV. hoc an. i. c. 214, 215. WALSING. in Edw. III. <sup>d</sup> VILLAN. l. ix. c. 107. l. x. c. 38. 46. l. xi. c. 57. <sup>e</sup> Idem, l. xi. c. 25. <sup>f</sup> VILLAN. c. 31. 41. 44. SPOND. Annal.

<sup>c</sup> VILLAN. l. ix. x. xi. FROSSARD lib. <sup>e</sup> Idem,

(L) Innocent, before his promotion to the pontificate, was persuaded by the insinuations of some people, that the famous Petrarch was addicted to magical arts; but, being afterwards undeceived, he solicited him by letters and presents, to come to Avignon to be his secretary. Petrarch excused himself from accepting of that honour on account of his great age, and his love for a retired life (1).

(1) Petrar. l. i. Senil. 3.

a returned to Avignon to intercede for Bernabo; he likewise disgusted several cardinals, who received secret pensions from the Vicenti, to support their interest at the court of Avignon<sup>g</sup>. Bernabo, in contempt of this sentence, marched with an army into the territory of Modena, against the confederates; but his troops, from too great security, allowing themselves to be surprised, were defeated with great loss.

ABOUT the time he received this check in Italy, the king of France, with Peter king of Cyprus, and Waldemar III. king of Denmark, being at Avignon, mutually bound themselves to undertake an expedition against the Turks within two years, and, together with many other nobles, received the cross from the hands of the pope. This crusade was owing to the solicitation of the king of Cyprus, whose kingdom had been several years ravaged by the Turks; and the pope, being desirous to interest the German princes in his defence, wrote to the emperor and the German nobles, exhorting them to undertake an expedition against the infidels; but his letters had no effect upon Charles, who was threatened with a war from the king of Hungary. As both parties were preparing for hostilities, Urban sent a nuncio into Bohemia and Hungary to prevent a rupture, by whose mediation Charles was prevailed upon to give satisfaction to the king of Hungary, and promised to marry his cousin Elizabeth, daughter of Bogestas duke of Pomerania. Accordingly, the following year, the peace being confirmed by the pope's legate sent for that purpose, the marriage was celebrated at Cracow with great magnificence.

DURING these transactions in Poland, a peace was likewise concluded betwixt the pope and Bernabo Vicenti, owing chiefly to his defeat at Modena, and an edict of the emperor, who, from his usual complaisance to the pope, had ordered all the vicars of the empire to join their arms to those of the legate. The kings of France and Cyprus likewise acting as mediators, Androinus, lately created a cardinal, was sent to Milan, and concluded a treaty in the beginning of March, by which Bernabo ceded all the forts which he possessed in the territories of Bologna, Modena, and Romagna, to the holy see; and the pope absolved him from the sentence of excommunication, and, in consideration of the forts lately built, promised to pay him 500,000 florins of gold within eight years<sup>h</sup>. Mean while the grand companies of robbers still increasing in France, Urban renewed his menaces and fulminations against them; in consequence of which several parties of them were routed; and the rest, to the number of 30,000 of various nations, were prevailed upon to march into Spain to the assistance of Henry, who had rebelled against his brother the king of Castile<sup>i</sup>.

THE following year Urban sent a legate to the emperor of Constantinople, to exhort him to an union with the Roman church, and to preach up a crusade against the Turks and Saracens. As John Lusignan, a relation of the king of Cyprus, at this time raised pretensions to the kingdom of Armenia, which he claimed by hereditary right, Urban also wrote to the prelates and nobles of that kingdom in favour of John, and exhorted them to reject the errors of the Nestorians, and others, and to embrace the purity of the catholic faith<sup>k</sup>. A few weeks after, the emperor Charles arrived at Avignon, and was most honourably received by the pope, with whom he had several private conferences. According to Corius, Urban likewise crowned Charles king of Arles, in the city of that name, and promised the empire to his son Wenceslaus<sup>l</sup>. Upon their return to Avignon, the pope held a solemn assembly, at which were present, besides the emperor, Peter king of Cyprus, and several other princes. Peter proposed to attack the infidels in Egypt; but the emperor opposed his opinion, and offered to march at the head of an army against Amurath, emperor of the Turks, who, by the assistance of the Genoese, had passed the Hellepont, and entered Thrace with an army of 100,000 men. This proposal was opposed by the count of Savoy, who declared, that it was more necessary to retake Gallipoli, and by that means cut off supplies from those Turks that had already entered Europe. The different opinions of the princes prevented any general enterprise from being concluded upon: Charles, however, promised to march into Italy at the head of an army, to reduce the Vicenti; in consideration of which engagement the pope granted him the tythes of the ecclesiastical revenues in Bohemia and Germany.

THE princes retiring from Avignon to their different dominions, Urban soon after published a bull, ordering all the patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops, in Christendom, to hold provincial councils for restoring ecclesiastical discipline; and, for that purpose, ordered all prelates, under pain of excommunication, to reside in their proper dioceses, and to apply themselves diligently to the pastoral charge. He likewise prohibited any ecclesiastic from joining in marriage Edmund the son of the king of England, with Margaret the heiress of Flanders, although she had been betrothed to him by her father. This prohibition was owing to the pope's attachment to his native kingdom; for he soon after granted a dispensation for the marriage of the heiress with the duke of Burgundy, brother of the king of France<sup>m</sup>. About

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>h</sup> VILLAN. l. xi. c. 64.

<sup>i</sup> FROSSARD. l. i. c. 230. PETRAR. Senil. l. vii.

<sup>k</sup> Bzov. hoc an.

<sup>l</sup> CORIUS, Par. iii.

<sup>m</sup> TIL. de reg. Franc. MEYER. an. 1368.

who promises to submit to the Roman church.

A. D. 1366.

the same time, having received letters from the emperor of Constantinople, who promised to accomplish the union of the Greek and Latin churches, on condition of receiving assistance from the western princes against the Turks, Urban wrote to him, informing him, that Lewis king of Hungary was marching with a strong army to his assistance; and that the king of Cyprus, who, after his departure to Avignon, had sailed from Venice with a considerable army of crusaders, and taken Alexandria, intended to sail from Thrace against the Turks: he then exhorted him not any longer to delay the union from false pretences, but speedily submit to the Roman church, otherwise he would look upon him and the Greeks as heathens, and would give them no farther assistance. This letter was carried by the count of Savoy, who besieged Varna, the capital of Bulgaria, where the emperor was imprisoned, and took Gallipoli by assault. The emperor, having recovered his liberty, went to the king of Hungary at Buda, to whom he promised with an oath, that both he and his sons Manuel and Michael would submit to the Roman church, and fulfil whatever the pope should think necessary for their reconciliation. Urban, being informed of his submission by his chancellor and the bishop of Nitria, wrote to the emperor to persevere in his resolution; and sent him the form of the profession of faith, and abjuration of schism, formerly used by the emperor Paleologus on a like occasion. When the Greek chancellor returned, he likewise sent with him two legatees, to complete the union, and to exhort the king of Hungary to a sacred expedition<sup>n</sup>, and to give his assistance in putting an end to the schism. Lewis seems to have been very zealous in the service of the Roman church; for, having conquered Bulgaria, he sent for 2000 Franciscans to convert his new subjects. The vicar of Bosnia sent him eight, who in fifty days baptized upwards of 200,000 people<sup>o</sup>.

Urban proposes to return to Rome.

1367.

He embarks at Marseilles.

Is received in Italy with great joy.

URBAN, before he arrived at the pontificate, had expressed a great desire that the residence of the popes might be again transferred to Rome. After his promotion, continuing in the same sentiments, which were confirmed by a letter from Petrarch, he this year wrote to the doges of Venice and Genoa; desiring their galleys to conduct him to Rome, it being impossible to enter Italy by land, as the Vicenti then guarded the passes of the Alps, by several troops of the banditti who had entered into their service<sup>p</sup>. In the mean time he sent a legate into Spain, to reconcile the kings of Castile and Arragon; but his journey had no effect, for besides the war with Arragon, Peter of Castile was attacked by his rebellious subjects, who, being assisted by the banditti from France, obliged him to fly the kingdom. In consequence of the pope's desire, in the beginning of the following year, several galleys arrived at Marseilles from Naples, Venice, Genoa, and Pisa; which Urban being informed of, he left Avignon on the last day of April, not without a great many reproaches from his court, who had no inclination to return to Italy<sup>q</sup>. Having embarked at Marseilles, he arrived four days after at Genoa; and, proceeding next day on his voyage, on the 4th of June he landed at Corneto in Tuscany, where he was met by cardinal Ægidius, and received an embassy from the Romans, with the keys of the castle of St. Angelo. A few days after he went to Viterbo, the inhabitants of which city received him with great respect; but they soon changed their disposition, and attacked the French cardinals, who were obliged to fly for refuge to the pope's palace. They quickly repented of their rashness; and, having obtained pardon from the pope, ordered the chiefs of the tumult to be put to death. Urban, after continuing four months at Viterbo, proceeded to Rome, where he was received by the clergy and the people with the greatest honours. Before he left Viterbo, he concluded an offensive and defensive alliance for seven years with the king of Hungary, the dukes of Austria, and several Italian princes, with the design of opposing the ambition of the Vicenti, and securing the quiet possession of the conquests of Ægidius; in consequence of which he was now regarded not as an imaginary, but as a real temporal prince. In that city he likewise received another embassy from the Greek emperor; to which he returned an answer after his arrival at Rome, writing to the Greek patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, commending them for their intention of finishing the schism, and inviting them to come to Rome, together with their emperor. Urban received also a letter of congratulation from Petrarch, praising him for his return to Rome, and earnestly exhorting him to restore the church to its antient purity<sup>r</sup>. To this end, according to Spondanus, the pope this year confirmed the order of Jesuits, so called from their frequent mention of the name of Jesus (M).

<sup>n</sup> SPOND. Annal.
<sup>q</sup> PETRAR. ut sup.

<sup>o</sup> Idem, ex Chron. minor.
<sup>r</sup> Idem ix. Senil. i.

<sup>p</sup> VILLAN. l. xi. c. 26. PETRAR. Senil. l. vii.

(M) This order was instituted a few years before by John Colombino, a nobleman, who, separating himself by consent from his wife, embraced a life of austerity, and, by his fervent discourses, quickly made many profelytes. Having attended the pope from Corneto to Viterbo, he obtained from him the confirmation of his order, and the regulation of the dress of the monks who professed the rule of St. Augustin, and were called the Jesuit friars of St. Jerom (1).

(1) Bergom. l. xiv.

a ABOUT the same time, being informed that Peter king of Castile, after defeating the re- Difference bebels, had again got possession of his kingdom, and exercised great cruelty towards the eccle- twixt him and siastics, he sent a legate to Spain, who, drawing the king to a conference upon the bank of a the king of river, read the pope's letter, and, from a boat, declared him excommunicated; immediately Castile.
after which he sailed down the river, and escaped. The king was so greatly exasperated at this proceeding of the legate, that he pursued him into the water on horseback; but, returning from his pursuit, he declared, that he would shake off the yoke of the pope, and persuade the kings of Navarre and Arragon to do the same: he threatened likewise to revenge the insult by a war, and made great preparations by sea and land; which Urban being informed of, he thought proper to take off the former censures, and sent a cardinal to Spain, who accom-
b modated all differences, upon certain conditions not very honourable for the holy see<sup>s</sup>. Mean A. D. 1368.
while the pope caused several churches of Rome to be repaired; and prohibited, under severe penalties, the concealing or stealing of relics. In the beginning of the spring he received a visit from Jean queen of Sicily, and from the king of Cyprus, who were both treated with great honours. Soon after, to avoid the great heats, he retired to Monte Fiascone, where he published a bull against Bernabo Visconti, who continued to ravage Lombardy with great inhumanity and cruelty.

As the pope had long solicited the emperor to enter Italy, and had concluded his bull with The emperor imploping his assistance against Bernabo, Charles informed him, that he had assembled an confirms the army with an intention of passing the Alps. The pope, being still apprehensive of a visit rights of the c from the Germans, immediately desired his nuncio to ask an imperial confirmation of the rights church, of the church, which was granted without any hesitation by the emperor, in a very ample manner. This security being given, Charles entered Italy with a considerable army, and and enters joined that of the pope, consisting of 20,000 men. Verona and Vicenza were quickly obliged Italy with to surrender, which determined Bernabo to sue for peace. A treaty was accordingly con- an army.
cluded, by which Bernabo agreed to evacuate all the places that belonged to the holy see, or to the Italian nobles, who were vassals and allies of the empire; to give no protection to the banditti that served in his troops; and to appear personally before the pope, to ask pardon for his crimes, and to receive absolution. This treaty being confirmed, the emperor published an edict, revoking the privileges of the cities and nobles who had adhered to Bernabo; however, d upon receiving considerable sums of money, he made no difficulty of restoring them their ancient rights, with several new ones. All differences in Lombardy being thus accommodated, Charles proceeded to Viterbo, where he had an interview with the pope, who was then returning to Rome. Upon the pope's arrival in the neighbourhood of that city, the emperor led his horse by the bridle as far as the church of St. Peter. A few days after, the empress arriving at Rome, the pope crowned her at the altar of St. Peter; after which ceremony the emperor retired to Tuscany, where he continued several months; but, finding himself despised by the Italians, he appointed the bishop of Porto as his vicar in Italy, and returned to Germany.

AFTER the departure of the emperor from Rome, Urban published a bull, confirming the Urban pub-e liberty of ecclesiastics, prohibiting under pain of excommunication and interdict, all laymen lishes a bull in from punishing the clergy, under any pretence whatever. The following year he again left favour of ec-the city, on account of the heats; and, while he continued at Viterbo, the Greek emperor clesiastical arrived at Rome, where, in the presence of the bishop of Ostia, and three other cardinals liberty.
commissioned by the pope, besides many other witnesses, he made a profession of all the ar- 1369.
ticles of the Roman faith, which doctrine he swore upon the holy gospels always to acknowledge and believe. Urban, being informed that the emperor had confirmed the union, immediately hastened to Rome. He was met without the city by Paleologus, who, after having The Greek kissed his feet, led his horse by the bridle as far as the Vatican church, where he held the stir- emperor ar-rup while his holiness alighted, and afterwards renewed his profession before the altar of St. rides at f Peter. In consideration of these concessions, when the emperor began to talk of receiving Rome, and succours, Urban recommended him to the Venetians and Genoese, and gave him leave to treat abjures the with John Hawkwood, an Englishman, who, after the death of Lando, had succeeded to the schism.
chief command of the banditti, and had rendered his name respected in Italy by his military exploits, but was then under a sentence of excommunication on account of the assistance he had given to Visconti, who had again renewed his hostilities<sup>t</sup>. The emperor's negotiations with Hawkwood had no effect, for that captain preferred the plunder of Italy to the honour of fighting against the Turks. What was his success with the Venetians and Genoese, is uncertain(N); but we find he did not quit Italy till the following year, as there is a bull extant, dated

<sup>s</sup> MARIAN. l. xvii. cap. 10, & seq.<sup>t</sup> SPOND. Annal. VILLAN. l. 9—11.

(N) Chalcondyles, mentioning the emperor's journey but says, when he went to Venice to ask assistance, he to Italy, is quite silent as to the transactions at Rome; could obtain nothing but a loan of money from the usurers:

A. D. 1370: dated at Rome the 20th of January, wherein he confirms his former profession<sup>a</sup>. After his departure, Urban created William of Prato, a Franciscan, archbishop of Cambalu, and sent him with twelve other Franciscans to preach the gospel in the kingdom of Catbay. He afterwards commissioned sixty other friers of the same order, and wrote to the Great Khân, and to the princes and people of Tartary, exhorting them to embrace the Christian faith. He likewise invited the Vaivode of Walachia to forsake the schism; and wrote to the Greek prelates and clergy, exhorting them to follow the example of their emperor. By the mediation of the emperor, he again granted a peace to Bernabo; but he prohibited Frederic, the possessor of Sicily, from contracting an alliance with the Viconti, by a marriage betwixt their children<sup>w</sup>. About the same time he threatened to summon the king of England to answer at Rome, for neglecting to pay the allegiance and tribute due to the holy see, according to the concession of his predecessor king John. The bishop of Ely, the chancellor of the kingdom, informing the parliament of these menaces of the pope, they unanimously decreed, that the king was not bound by that extorted concession of John; and that, if the pope should proceed any further in his demand, they would oppose him to the utmost of their power. The parliament likewise renewed the former acts against the conferring of benefices upon foreigners, and the king prohibited any one from paying the tax of St. Peter<sup>x</sup>. This vigorous opposition of the parliament of England obliging the pope at that time to desist from his pretensions, he confirmed the order of St. Salvator, instituted by St. Bridget, a noble lady of Sweden<sup>y</sup>; and, at the solicitation of the cardinals, having determined to return to Avignon, he appointed two cardinals as his legates in Italy, and embarked at Corneto for Marseilles. He arrived at that city on the 16th of September, and a few days after entered Avignon, having published, as a reason for his returning, that he intended personally to reconcile the kings of France and England. This accommodation, however, he was prevented from effecting; for, quickly after his return, being seized with sickness, he died at Avignon, on the 19th of December.

Gregory XI. is chosen pope. TEN days after the death of Urban, the cardinals unanimously chose cardinal Peter Roger de Maumont, who had been created a cardinal at seventeen years of age, by his uncle Clement VI. As Peter was of a tender constitution, and not then forty years of age, he refused for some time to accept of the pontificate; but at length allowing himself to be persuaded by the other cardinals, he was ordained priest on the 4th of January, and consecrated the day following, assuming the name of Gregory XI. On the day of his election, he wrote to the emperor, and the other sovereigns of Europe, informing them of his promotion; and, after his consecration, he sent two legates to the kings of France and England, to treat of peace; but those princes, being still inflamed with mutual resentment, could not be prevailed upon to hearken to an accommodation. Gregory, being likewise desirous of reconciling the kings of Spain, sent cardinal Bertrand thither as his legate, to assist the nuncios who had been commissioned by his predecessor Urban. Legates and nuncios were also sent into Italy and Sicily, to take care of the affairs of the church, and to prevent disturbances in those kingdoms. Mean while the pope having received complaints from Eymericus, the inquisitor of the faith in Arragon, against some friers, who publicly preached opinions not authorized by the church, he prohibited any one from discoursing publicly upon those doctrines, under pain of excommunication. The friers complained of asserted, that if the consecrated wafer was lost, or devoured by a beast, it ceased to be the body of Christ, and returned to the substance of bread; and that even when taken by a communicant, the real body went to heaven, during the chewing of the wafer; which opinions were believed by several great men before the decree of Gregory, who did not absolutely condemn them as heretical, but only prohibited them from being publicly discoursed of<sup>z</sup>. Gregory about the same time received an embassy from the king of Denmark, desiring his assistance against the Jutlanders, who had revolted from their allegiance, and chosen another prince. But deputies likewise arriving from the rebels, and representing the oppressions and exactions they suffered from the king, they found means to justify themselves to the pope, who wrote to Waldemar, and threatened him with excommunication if he did not alter his conduct with regard to his subjects. This unexpected message

<sup>a</sup> SPOND. Annal.<sup>w</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>x</sup> HARPSFIELD, secul. 14. c. 5.<sup>y</sup> ONUPHR. in

Chron. Vit. Brig. ap. SUR. t. 4.

<sup>z</sup> Direct. Inquis. EYMER. par. i. WADDING. hoc anno.

usurers: that from thence he went to France, where his solicitations were ineffectual. He then returned to Venice, with the intention of sailing to Constantinople; but, being thrown into prison by his creditors, he wrote to his eldest son Andronicus, to remit the money which he owed. This prince, from a desire of retaining the sovereignty, wrote to his father, that it was impossible to raise the money: however, Emanuel, the younger son, hearing of his father's necessity, immediately raised what money he could, and went and offered himself as a hostage for his father till the payment of the whole sum. As this story is not mentioned by any other author, and, as Chalcondyles is frequently inaccurate and inconsistent, we think it deserves but little credit (1).

- a from the pope greatly exasperated the king, who immediately returned an answer in these terms: “Waldemar the king, to the pope, wisheth health. We hold our life from God, “our kingdom from our subjects, our wealth from our ancestors, and our faith from your “predecessors; if you are not our friend, we restore you the faith by this present writing.”
- b GREGORY did not think proper to resent this contempt of the apostolic see by any ecclesiastical censures; but, being solicitous to repress the growing authority of the Vicenti, who again attacked the territories of the see of Rome, he published a bull, prohibiting any princes or nobles from contracting marriages with them or their children. At the same time having assembled a considerable army, he gave the command of it to Amadeus count of Savoy; and
- c wrote to the emperor, the princes of Germany, and the king of Hungary, intreating their assistance in behalf of the church. His solicitations had no effect upon the king of Hungary or the German princes; but the emperor published a bull, granting a full power to the pope over all the lands and possessions of the Vicenti, which they held of the empire, under any title whatever. By this bull the pope was appointed imperial vicar in Italy for ten years, with a power of conferring that dignity to others<sup>b</sup>. The pope, having thus strengthened his authority in Italy, applied himself to put an end to the disputes betwixt Naples and Sicily; accordingly, by his means a treaty of peace was concluded, whereby Frederic was allowed the title of king of Trinacria, and Jean that of queen of Sicily; but Frederic and his successors were bound to render homage to the kings of Sicily, to pay an annual tribute of 3000 ounces of gold, and to furnish ten galleys and 100 armed knights in case of an invasion of the kingdom of Naples<sup>c</sup>. Among other conditions, the pope added, that both the kings of Sicily and Trinacria should pay homage to the holy see, and that the immunities of the clergy should be confirmed by Frederic. The articles added by the pope being ratified the following year by Frederic and Jean, the apostolic nuncio went over into Sicily, and took off the sentence of excommunication and interdict from that island. In the mean time Gregory having received an embassy from the queen of Armenia, intreating the assistance of the European princes against the Turks, he wrote to her uncle, the prince of Tarento, to the master of the knights of Rhodes, to the king of Hungary, and the doges of Venice and Genoa, in her behalf. At the same time, being solicitous to stop the progress of the infidels, he exhorted the above-mentioned
- d princes, and the Greek emperor, with the king of Trinacria, and the bishops and prelates of Greece, to assemble the following October at Old Thebes, to enter into a league against the enemies of Christendom<sup>d</sup>; and, to supply the expences of the war, he sent collectors into all the provinces of Europe, to raise the taxes due to the apostolic see. Gregory, being no less earnest for the extirpation of heresy, animated the emperor and the princes of Germany against the heretics called Begardi and Bequini, who began to appear again in the empire. He likewise ordered the apostolic legate in Sicily, and the prelates of that kingdom, to repress the boldness of the Fratricelli, the Dulcini, and other heretics, who made a great shew of penitence in their lives, and worshipped relics as saints. He wrote to the count of Savoy to assist the inquisitors in suppressing the Turlupines, so called on account of their immodest tenets, and the depravity of their lives<sup>e</sup>; and he ordered the inquisitors in Arragon to punish those who taught the doctrines of Raimund, a convert from Judaism, who asserted, that the devils ought to be worshipped: that, during tortures, it was lawful to deny God by the mouth, provided he was still adored in the heart; and that it was more perfect to be a schismatic than a catholic. In consequence of these orders of the pope, the doctrines of Raimund were condemned, and his books committed to the flames. The Turlupines were also intirely suppressed, great numbers of that sect having been burnt at Paris, and elsewhere<sup>f</sup>.
- e THE following year, Gregory, in imitation of his predecessor, by circular letters, advised all the bishops and prelates in Christendom to hold provincial and diocesan councils for the reformation of manners, and the restoring the discipline of the church. At the same time he
- f exerted himself in behalf of ecclesiastical liberty, and, on that pretence, refused to grant the demands of the king of England, who, in consequence of an act of his parliament, had sent messengers to Avignon, requiring the pope to desist from conferring of benefices in England; and to leave, according to antient custom, the election of bishops to the clergy, and their confirmation to the metropolitans. The pope sent back the messengers to England; and made some demands upon the king, which he required to be granted, before he would hearken to those proposed by the parliament; and in the mean time, by his own authority, supplied the vacancies of some of the chief bishopricks in that kingdom<sup>g</sup>. A few months after, the pope, being informed that one Militzius, a canon of Prague, had raised a sect in Bohemia, which maintained that antichrist was already come, and that there was no truth in

He is insulted by the king of Denmark.

He sends an army against the Vicenti;
A. D. 1372.

and concludes a peace betwixt the king of Trinacria and the queen of Naples.

The pope labours to extirpate heresy.

and reform the discipline of the church.
1373.

<sup>a</sup> PONTAN. rer. Dan. l. viii.
& WADDING. Annal.
20; & 27.

<sup>b</sup> Cod. Eccles. Burdegal.
<sup>c</sup> Contin. Nangii.

<sup>g</sup> Bzov. hoc an.

<sup>d</sup> Bzov. an. 1372, 1373.

<sup>e</sup> MEYER. l. xiii. EYMER. Direct. Inquis. par. ii. q.

the pope, cardinals, or bishops, but that the way of salvation was only to be found among a them, he wrote to the archbishop of Prague to reprove Militzius as a heretic, and to punish his followers. About the same time he condemned to the flames an heretical book, intituled, The Mirror of the Saxons; and wrote to the archbishops of Germany, ordering them to publish his sentence of condemnation.

He concludes a peace with the Visconti, and proposes to return to Rome.

A. D. 1375.

MEAN while his army in Italy having gained several advantages over the Visconti, they again proposed an accommodation with the holy see; which was accordingly concluded, to the satisfaction of the pope, by the mediation of the dukes of Austria. Gregory, believing the peace solidly established in Italy, proposed to return to Rome, and fixed the time of his departure for the month of September, informing the emperor, and the kings of Hungary, Sicily, and Trinacria, and other princes, of his resolution. In the mean time he sent some Dominicans b as his nuncios to the Greek emperor, to treat with him about the means of prevailing with the Greeks to embrace the union with the Latin church. He likewise sent the bishop of Treviso, with other bishops and Dominicans, into Armenia; and as the Walackians, who had lately abjured the schism, had no proper bishop, he committed the care of them to the archbishops of Strigonia and Kolotza, and to the king of Hungary<sup>h</sup> (O). The pope, however, deferred his Italian journey; and the following year, being informed by the bishop of Treviso, who, in his way to Armenia, had stopped at Constantinople, that Cantacuzenus, formerly emperor, had been prevailed upon by the Dominicans to acknowledge the supremacy of the Roman church, he wrote to Cantacuzenus, inviting him to Rome, and exhorting him to use his authority with the other Greeks to embrace the union. To the same purpose he wrote to Emanuel, the emperor's younger son, and cautioned him from trusting to the Turks, with whom his father had concluded a truce, in consequence of which a great number of infidels had entered Constantinople<sup>i</sup>.

A general revolt in Italy against the authority of the pope.

MEAN while the great superiority which the pope had acquired in Italy, by the inactivity of the emperor, and the success of the arms of his legates, was in great danger of being wholly ruined, by a general revolt of the cities subject to the holy see, occasioned by the tyrannical government of the legates, who not only oppressed their new subjects by grievous subsidies and exactions, but likewise built strong forts in each of their towns. The Florentines, at that time very rich and powerful, were the first who rose against the church, alleging, that the legates had prevented their city from receiving a supply of provisions during a great dearth; and that John Hawkwood, then in the service of the see of Rome, had ravaged their territory at the head of an army<sup>k</sup>. Under pretence, therefore, that their liberty was in danger, they determined upon a war, the chief management of which they committed to a council of eight citizens. They imprisoned the pope's nuncio, destroyed the prison of the inquisition, and erected a standard, on which was written, in large letters, the Latin word LIBERTAS, declaring, at the same time, that whoever would revolt from the church should be comprehended in the league. In consequence of these proceedings, the cities of Bologna and Perugia immediately revolted, and were followed by more than sixty cities in Romagna, Campania, the March, and the duchy of Spoletto, who concluded an alliance with the Florentines and the Visconti; and wrote to the emperor, and the king of Hungary, and other princes, in justification of their league, declaring, that though they refused to be governed by the church, yet they would still pay the usual tribute to the holy see<sup>l</sup>. Gregory, thinking to stop the progress of the revolt, offered to enter into a negotiation for peace with the Florentines; and in the mean time he sent two legates to Bruges in Flanders, to reconcile the kings of Eng-

<sup>h</sup> SPOND. Annal. ANTON. tit. xxii. c. i.

<sup>i</sup> BZOV. & WADDING. hoc an. COR. Partiii.

<sup>k</sup> ARETIN. l. viii. Pogg. 2: <sup>l</sup> Annal. Mediol. ap. MURATOR. t. xvi. p. 759.

(O) This year died the famous Francis Petrarch, in the 70th year of his age. He was born at Arezzo in Tuscany, his parents having been banished from Florence by the faction of the Guelphs. After he had learned grammar, rhetoric, and logic, at Carpentras, he applied himself to the study of the law four years at Montpelier, and, after that, three years at Bologna. At the age of 22 years, hearing that his parents had died of the plague at Avignon, he went to that city; but soon after, to avoid the contagion, he retired to Vaucluse, in the neighbourhood of Avignon, where he first saw his mistress Laura, whom he has so greatly celebrated in his writings. He received a letter on the same day from Rome, and the university of Paris, inviting him to come and receive the crown, with the honours due to a prince. Upon his arrival at Rome, the laurel crown was conferred upon him, with great solemnity, in the capitol. He afterwards was created archdeacon of Parma; and, having visited Verona, Parma, Venice, and Milan, where Galeas Visconti made him a councillor of state, he stopped at Padua, and there received a canonicate, though he had formerly refused several benefices. He then bought a house at Arqua, where he lived five years, and received a favour from the Florentines he had formerly solicited in vain, namely, the restitution of all his paternal effects, and the revocation of the sentence of banishment against him; but their favour came too late, for he died a few years after at Arqua. He composed a great many treatises, and was esteemed by all the princes and great men of his time, being no less conspicuous for piety than for his eloquence and learning (1).

(1) Pet. Pogg. Boccac. Placide Cantanusi.

a land and France; and, being informed that the Waldenses were again become so numerous in Dauphiny, Savoy, and Provence, as to rise in rebellion against the inquisitors, he wrote to the prelates and rectors of the provinces, accusing them of negligence, and, having desired the princes of those provinces to give their protection to the inquisitors, he sent the bishop of Mussa to assist them in extirpating the heretics <sup>m</sup>.

Soon after, being alarmed with the strength of the confederacy in Italy against the church, he published a sentence of excommunication and interdict against the Florentines, depriving them of all their privileges, ordering their property to be seized, and their persons to be enslaved, in whatever country they should be found. In consequence of this censure, all the subjects of that state in England, Germany, and other kingdoms, were immediately declared slaves, and all their possessions seized, which obliged the Florentines to think of an accommodation with the holy see. They accordingly sent Catharine of Sienna to Avignon, to intercede for them with the pope, promising to send deputies to confirm whatever articles should be agreed to. The deputies, after several delays, at length arrived, but, instead of ratifying the articles, they spent the conferences in accusing the legates and commanders of the church. Gregory, finding that they had no real desire of a peace, but intended to delude him with vain promises, raised an army of six thousand horse and four thousand foot in Britany, and other provinces of France, which he sent under the command of a cardinal into Italy, proposing himself to return to Rome. But, before he left Avignon, he granted a bull, allowing the electors to chuse Wenceslaus, the emperor's eldest son, king of the Romans; and sent two nuncios into Germany, to be present at the election <sup>n</sup>. Having afterwards received an embassy from Wenceslaus, informing him of his election, he allowed him to be crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, by the archbishop of Cologne; and, leaving Avignon on the 13th of September, he embarked at Marseilles for Italy, and landed at Corneto on the 5th of December. After resting himself for some weeks from the fatigues of his voyage, he re-imbarked, and arrived at Rome on the 17th of January, where he was received with great demonstrations of joy.

b The Florentines are excommunicated, and declared slaves. A. D. 1376.

c The pope returns to Rome. 1377.

d By his presence at Rome, Gregory expected to re-establish the authority of the holy see in Italy, and to prevail with the rebels to submit; but he quickly found himself greatly mistaken; for though the Romans, upon his return, had suppressed the twelve captains of the wards, who were called bannerets, yet they soon after restored them, and resumed the government of the city, in opposition to the remonstrances of the pope: The rebels likewise were so far from returning to their allegiance, that even some cities, that had hitherto continued in their obedience, now entered into the league with the Florentines <sup>o</sup>; and Hawkwood, with his English troops, deserting the party of the church, made an alliance with Bernabo Visconti, who gave him his natural daughter in marriage <sup>p</sup>. Gregory, greatly affected with the bad state of his affairs, sent for the deputies of the Florentines, and admitted them to a kiss of peace, and a participation of the sacred ordinances; but he could not prevail with them to consent to any honourable terms of peace for the holy see: however, in the month of June they agreed to a cessation of arms for a few months. The pope in the mean time going to Anagni, from thence wrote to the emperor, the king of France, and other princes, complaining bitterly of the Florentines, who, in contempt of the interdict denounced against them, had compelled their priests to perform divine service, and protected a heretic, who explained the apocalypse, and other parts of Scripture, in the vulgar tongue <sup>q</sup>. Returning to Rome in the beginning of November, he wrote to Bernabo and Hawkwood, intreating them to hearken to a reconciliation. Bernabo, upon his repeated solicitations, at length declared his willingness to enter into a negotiation; and the Florentines, beginning to be weary of the expences of the war, which had cost them upwards of 3,000,000 of florins, a congress was appointed to be held at Serazane in Tuscany.

e A truce agreed to betwixt the pope and the confederates.

f During these commotions in Italy, Gregory, being informed of the heresies published in England by John Wickliffe, wrote to the chancellor and university of Oxford, reproving them severely for allowing those erroneous doctrines to be published, and ordering them forthwith to deliver John as a prisoner into the hands of the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London, to whom he sent nineteen articles taken from the propositions of Wickliffe, which he condemned as heretical. He wrote also to those prelates to examine the doctrines of Wickliffe, and to keep him prisoner in irons; but, if they could not seize him, to summon him publicly to appear before the apostolic see within three months. The king of England likewise received a letter from the pope, exhorting him to use his authority in extirpating heresy; but Richard, who, a few months before the arrival of the pope's letters in England, had succeeded his grandfather Edward III. being then a boy, his uncle the duke of Lancaster, and several other Gregory orders the chancellor of Oxford to imprison Wickliffe.

<sup>m</sup> WADDING. hoc an. Mediol. ut supra, c. 139. <sup>n</sup> SPOND. Annal. <sup>o</sup> ARETIN. l. viii. ANTON. tit. xxii. c. 1. <sup>p</sup> Annal. nobles,

The papal authority is opposed in Germany.

A. D. 1378.

Gregory dies at Rome.

The Romans violently compel the cardinals to chuse an Italian pope.

Urban VI. is elected.

The French cardinals retire to Anagni, and proceed to a second election.

Clement VII. anti-pope.

nobles, afforded their protection to Wickliffe; so that the archbishop of Canterbury, and the archbishop of London, being prohibited by the nobles, and threatened by the citizens of London, dropt the prosecution, and excused themselves, by alleging, that Wickliffe declared, that he would submit his doctrines to the judgment of the church of Rome (P). The authority of the pope was at this time also opposed in Germany, where several princes and magistrates had decreed, that no temporal possessions ought to be transferred to ecclesiastics; that no clergyman ought to be admitted as an agent or witness in civil affairs; that excommunicated persons ought not to be deprived of the benefit of the laws. But the emperor, zealous for aggrandizing the power of the popes, published a bull, ordering those decrees to be revoked, and prohibiting, under severe penalties, any one from molesting the clergy. Mean while Gregory, not depending greatly upon the pacific intentions of the confederates, wrote to the archbishop of Rouen, his nuncio, to solicit the king of France and the emperor to assist the church, and to send deputies to the congress. The king, receiving soon after a letter from the pope, sent four deputies to Serazane, where the congress was opened on the 12th of March; but, as Gregory died on the 27th of the same month, the conferences were immediately broke off, and the deputies returned home.

BEFORE the death of Gregory, the bannerets consulted about the means of retaining the apostolic see in Italy, and, by the advice of the Italian prelates, they unanimously agreed to use their utmost endeavours, upon the death of the pope, to procure a Roman, or at least an Italian, to be elected as his successor. After Gregory's death, they accordingly exhorted the cardinals singly to chuse a Roman or Italian, otherwise they threatened them with an insurrection of the people. When the cardinals entered the conclave, the tumult increased, and the common people having expelled the nobles, and brought a great many country people into the city, with great violence rushed into the conclave, and surrounded the palace, loudly demanding a Roman or Italian pope. At length, at the persuasion of the bannerets, the mob quitted the conclave, and the doors were shut; however, they continued all night round the palace, with great tumult and noise; and in the morning, when they heard the celebration of the mass, they rung the alarm bells, and, having obliged the cardinals to open the windows of the conclave towards the street, they declared, that unless they immediately chose a Roman or Italian, they would put them to death. In this extremity, the French cardinals, who were three fourths of the whole college, protesting that they only consented to an election from the fear of immediate death, they then named Bartolomew archbishop of Bari, a gentleman of Naples. As this gentleman was remarkable for his modesty and humility, and for his skill in the canon law, the cardinals were persuaded that he would acknowledge his election to be null, and would therefore abdicate the pontificate. They were, however, greatly disappointed; for the archbishop, who assumed the name of Urban VI. obliged the cardinals, six of whom had fled to the castle of St. Angelo, to come to the palace, and perform the ceremony of his coronation. The day after they wrote to those cardinals that remained at Avignon, informing them of the election of Urban, which they declared to be free and unanimous. To the same purpose they wrote to the princes and prelates in Europe. However, Spondanus, from a Vatican code, asserts, that one of the cardinals wrote secretly to the French king, desiring him to give no credit to their letters that were dated from Rome. The French cardinals having thus in appearance acknowledged the validity of the election, they behaved with the usual obsequiousness for three months; but, under pretence of avoiding the heat, they obtained leave to retire to Anagni, Urban himself, with the four Italian cardinals, about the same time going to Tivoli. At Anagni they immediately took the troops of Britany into their pay; and, having summoned the four cardinals that were at Tivoli, they wrote to Urban to resign the pontificate. Urban, having then received a guard of 200 spearmen, and a considerable body of foot from the queen of Naples, sent three cardinals to Anagni, to exhort their brethren to return to their duty, but without effect; for on the 9th of August the French cardinals published a sentence against Urban, by the title of the archbishop of Bari, accusing him of being an apostate and antichrist. Soon after, having prevailed with queen Jean, and her husband Otho of Brunswick, to abandon Urban, they went to Fondi, where, on the 21st of September, they chose cardinal Robert, who took the name of Clement VII.

† WALSING. HARESFIELD. I. i. ANTON. tit. xxii. c. 2. FROSSARD, I. ii. c. 12.

• BZOV. hoc an.

† SPOND. Annal.

▪ THEOD. de Niem.

W SPOND. Annal. hoc an.

* Idem ibid.

(P) The doctrines of which Wickliffe was accused were not all published at once. The chief of those which he at first advanced were, "That the wafer in the eucharist, after consecration, is not the real body of Christ, but its figure only; that the Roman church has no right to be the head of all churches; that the pope has no more authority than any other priest; that lay patrons may and ought to deprive a delinquent church of its temporal possessions; that the gospel was sufficient to direct any Christian; that no prelate of the church ought to have prisons for punishing delinquents" (1).

a Thus a violent schism arose in the church, to the great disturbance of several kingdoms in Europe, which were thereby involved in the miseries of war (Q). The emperor, with the king-b doms of Portugal, Hungary, Poland, England, Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden, and the Italians, Flemings, Saxons, and Westphalians, acknowledged Urban; France, Spain, Scotland, Cyprus, Sicily, and some princes, submitted to the authority of Clement; while others continued in a neutrality, till the dispute should be determined by a general council. Mean while the two popes persecuted each other with mutual anathemas, and by offering plenary indulgences to all those who would take the cross in defence of their cause. What the one bound, the other loosed; and what the one granted, the other annulled; in consequence of which a great corruption of manners quickly prevailed; the good were not honoured, and the bad were protected by c either party; rapines and murders became frequent, the laws were despised, discipline abolished, and simony established as a public merchandize. Urban, before the schism, had concluded a peace with Bernabo, the Florentines, and the confederates<sup>y</sup>, confirmed the election of Wenceslaus, without receiving any embassy from Germany, and threatened to excommunicate the king of Arragon, if he did not desist from his pretensions to the crown of Sicily (R). But finding himself abandoned by all the cardinals excepting one, and by the greatest part of the prelates and officers of his court, he began to be sensible of his imprudent conduct in acting too arbitrarily before his authority was established; and, having returned to Rome, created twenty-nine new cardinals, chiefly Romans and Neapolitans. Clement likewise about the same time created six cardinals; and sent the troops of Britany and Gascony, and the Roman nobles
 d that adhered to his party, to take possession of Rome; but, after several skirmishes, they were obliged to retire with considerable loss. Finding his arms unsuccessful, the following year he retired to Naples, where he was received by the queen with all the veneration usually paid to a pope; but the Neapolitans raising a tumult in favour of Urban their citizen, Clement was obliged to quit the city, and, as he had few followers in Italy, about the middle of June he embarked with his cardinals for Marseilles, and was received with great joy at Avignon. A. D. 1379.
The antipope retires to Avignon.

URBAN, being now secure in Italy, resolved to revenge himself upon the queen of Naples, by declaring her excommunicated, and absolving her subjects from their allegiance; and as the emperor and the king of Hungary had jointly published a letter in his favour, he wrote to the king, inviting him to punish the queen for the murder of his brother, and to send Charles of d Durazzo with an army to take possession of the kingdom of Naples. Charles, who at that time commanded the Hungarian army in the Trevisan against the Venetians, after some difficulties was prevailed upon to accept the offer of the pope, and made secret preparations for his expedition. Urban accordingly published a sentence of excommunication and deposition against Jean, who, to avert the storm with which she was threatened, took the grand companies into her pay, and, as she had no issue, adopted the duke of Anjou, the French king's brother, as her heir<sup>z</sup>. But the year after, Charles of Durazzo arriving with an army of Hungarians at e Rome, Urban conferred upon him the crowns of Sicily and Jerusalem, under the same conditions as the kings of Naples had formerly bound themselves to the holy see (S); and as Charles was in great want of money, the pope melted down and sold a great many gold and silver chalices, crosses, and images of saints, for the expences of the war. Charles, immediately after his coronation, marching for Italy, by a successful battle made himself master of the whole kingdom, and got the queen and her husband into his power; while the legate, whom Urban had sent to accompany him, having apprehended two cardinals and several prelates of the party of Clement, obliged them to abjure the antipope, and to throw the ornaments of

<sup>y</sup> THEOD. de Niem, l. i.

<sup>z</sup> JUVEN. in reb. gest. Car. VI.

(Q) This schism continued upwards of forty years, and, according to several authors, was owing to the ill-timed severity of Urban, who took no pains to sooth the exasperated spirits of the cardinals; but, in a public discourse immediately after his coronation, reprehended them severely for their pomp and luxury, and threatened to punish those who should be guilty of simony, or receiving of bribes, adding reproaches against some of the college for privately corresponding with the enemies of the church. This unseasonable rigour, together with his kindness to the Romans, provoked the French cardinals to think of a second election, justifying themselves on account of the violence the conclave had suffered at Rome, a particular relation of which they published after their arrival at Anagni. Some authors greatly extenuate the violence offered by the Romans, while others are at as much pains to represent it in the worst light, every one writing in favour of the party he had espoused. The great number of treatises written on the occasion of this schism are collected in the Vatican library, and consist of thirty-two volumes (1).

(R) Urban, in opposing the pretensions of the king of Arragon, seems to have been actuated by motives of personal interest; for, according to Theodoric de Niem, and others, he intended a match betwixt his own nephew Francis Prignano and Mary heiress of Sicily.

(S) The same author relates, that before Charles was crowned by the pope, he was forced to promise to his nephew, Francis Prignano, the duchies of Capua and Amalphi, and several other counties in the kingdom of Naples.

(1) Spond. Annal.

Disturbances at Paris, on account of the exactions of the antipope.

their dignity into the fire. Mean while great disturbances were raised in France by the exactions of the antipope, who not only conferred the richest vacant benefices on his cardinals, but appropriated others by grants of reversion; and, as he had no other kingdom to supply the expences of his court, great sums of money were raised under the name of tythes and arrears due to the apostolic chamber. As, upon these accounts, the students, who were cut off from all hopes of preferment, deserted the university, one Ross, a doctor of divinity, went to the king, and represented their grievances with great freedom. The duke of Anjou, who was then regent, and supposed to be a sharer with the antipope in his exactions, being highly offended with this representation, imprisoned the doctor; but the whole university going in a body, and complaining of the outrage, the doctor obtained his liberty, and immediately after went to Urban, who wrote to the university, exhorting them to persevere in their opposition to the antipope. Urban soon after was alarmed at Rome by an insurrection of the Romans, who were offended with him for denying a petition that they had presented; however, the pope opposing their fury with constancy and firmness, they quickly laid down their arms, and asked pardon <sup>b</sup>. About the same time Charles of Durazzo having caused the queen of Naples to be put to death, the duke of Anjou, whom she had adopted as her son and heir, arrived at Avignon, and was crowned king of Sicily by Clement. After reducing the Provincials, who had refused to acknowledge him as their sovereign, he passed the Alps with a numerous army, and entered the kingdom of Naples, where he was immediately joined by many of the nobles, and took several towns in Apulia and Calabria; but as his troops were not accustomed to the climate, and his convoys were frequently intercepted by the enemy, before the return of the spring, his army was greatly lessened, and inferior to the forces of Charles.

A. D. 1381.

1382.
who confers the crown of Sicily on the duke of Anjou.

1383.

Urban goes to Naples, where he is treated with indignity by king Charles.

MEAN while Urban, having left Rome to avoid the heats, after residing some time at Tivoli, resolved to go to Naples, to settle the commotions in that kingdom, and to obtain the confirmation of the promises of Charles in favour of his nephew. Though he was dissuaded from his journey by several letters from Naples, and by many of his cardinals, he nevertheless proceeded, and arrived at Aversa in the beginning of October, where he was received with great respect by Charles, who led his horse into the city. The pope took up his residence at the bishop's palace; but the following night he was conducted by force into the castle, where he was compelled to revoke all the conditions upon which he had granted the kingdom of Naples to Charles. Proceeding from Aversa to Naples, he was again lodged in the castle; but after some time, at the intercession of the cardinals and nobles, Charles was reconciled to him, asked pardon for what he had done, and set him at liberty, promising likewise to fulfil what he had promised to his nephew<sup>c</sup>. Urban, soon after his promotion, had desired the assistance of the king of England against the French, granting him, for that purpose, the tythes of all ecclesiastical revenues in his kingdom. In consequence of frequent letters from Rome, the bishop of Norwich at length assembled an army of 17,000 crusaders; and, about the time that Urban was preparing for his Neapolitan journey, transported his troops to Calais, with an intention of attacking the French as schismatics; but, after his arrival upon the continent, he altered his design, and invaded Flanders. The Flemings, who acknowledged Urban, being surpris'd by the English, lost several towns; but the king of France approaching with a formidable army, the crusaders dispersed, and the bishop returned in a disgraceful manner to England<sup>d</sup>.

He publishes a crusade against the duke of Anjou.

1384.

A rupture between the pope and the king of Naples.

THE following year Urban, still residing at Naples, excommunicated the duke of Anjou, and published a crusade against him, appointing Charles standard-bearer, and general of the crusaders. After the king's departure for the campaign, he himself went to Nocera, which had been granted to his nephew. As an edict had been published, prohibiting any one to buy victuals, or even salt or candles, unless from the king's warehouses, his court was quickly in great want of provisions, on which account a great many cardinals returned to Naples; but the pope recalling them, they all, except one, came back to Nocera, and shared in the indignities which he suffered in that city for several months. The king, in the mean time, being freed from his competitor by death, and having obtained the quiet possession of the kingdom, returned in the month of November in a triumphant manner to Naples. Though Nocera was within a day's journey of his capital, he neglected to visit the pope, but sent to him in a disrespectful manner, demanding why he left Naples, and desiring him to return immediately, as he had matters of importance to communicate to him. The pope, provoked to the last degree with his arrogance, replied, that Christian kings and princes did not use to call the popes to them, but thought themselves honoured by coming to the feet of the popes;

<sup>b</sup> WALSHING. KRANTZ, Metrop. 14. Hist. Car. VI.

<sup>c</sup> THEOD. de Niem.

<sup>d</sup> FROISSARD, l. ii. JUVEN. in a and that, if he desired to see him as a friend, he must take off the heavy taxes with which he oppressed a kingdom that was a fief of the holy see<sup>c</sup>. This answer greatly offended the king, who declared, that the kingdom was his own by conquest, and by right of his wife, and by his own authority he would raise what taxes he thought proper. The difference betwixt Urban and the king was chiefly fomented by cardinal Realì, who, in contempt of the pope's message, had remained at Naples, b This cardinal, for what reason is uncertain, had resolved upon the ruin of Urban, and, by corresponding secretly with the cardinals at Nocera, had persuaded them, that it was the opinion of divines, and those that were skilled in the canons, that when a pope acted imprudently, or despised the advice of the cardinals, it was lawful to appoint several curators to assist in the administration of the universal church. The cardinals, having once assented to this opinion, proceeded further; and having alleged against the pope the crimes of heresy, ambition, avarice, and ingratitude towards the king, they formed a design, not only of deposing him, but of murdering him. The conspiracy being discovered by one of the cardinals, Urban immediately held a consistory, and, laying before them the proofs he had received of the plot, he ordered six, some authors say seven, of the cardinals to be seized and put in irons. Having by tortures wrested from them a confession of their guilt, he confined them to separate dungeons; and a few days after, to supply their places, he made a promotion of seventeen cardinals, among whom were the three ecclesiastic electors of Germany, the bishops of Liege and Wratistaw, and a priest of Bohemia of a noble family, which six refused to accept of the dignity that was offered them<sup>f</sup>. Immediately after these proceedings, he assembled the clergy and people of Nocera, and, giving them a particular account of the conspiracy, he erected a cross, and, with lighted candles, excommunicated the king and queen of Naples, cardinal Realì, with the other convicted cardinals, and the antipope, with all his adherents. The king and queen were also deposed, the cardinals deprived of their dignities, and the city of Naples laid under an interdict.

The cardinals convicted of a conspiracy against Urban; A. D. 1385.

c CHARLES, highly exasperated at the pope's fulmination, imprisoned all the prelates and clergy that favoured Urban at Naples; and, marching with his army against Nocera, took and plundered the city, the pope having saved himself in the citadel, from whence thrice a day he denounced anathemas against the king's army, with bell and candles<sup>e</sup>. Urban, after suffering for some time the miseries of a siege, at length, by means of two generals of the party of the late duke of Anjou, he escaped from the citadel, and arrived with his cardinals, and those that were degraded, after a dangerous journey, at Benevento. From thence proceeding to Barletta, he embarked on board some Genoese gallies, and arrived on the 23d of September at Genoa, where he again committed his degraded cardinals to prison, excepting Adam, an Englishman, who, at the intercession of king Richard, was allowed to return to England (T). Immediately after the departure of Urban, Charles crossed the Adriatic, and went into Hungary, where, in prejudice of the rights of the daughters of the late king, he was crowned by a faction on the 31st of December, but was murdered a few weeks afterwards by the party of the queen. The news of his death arriving at Naples, the queen immediately crowned his son Ladislaus, or Lancelot, then a boy of ten years of age. But as the party of the duke of Anjou likewise crowned his son Lewis, who was supported by the antipope Clement, the queen solicited the assistance of Urban in the most submissive and pressing manner. Though it was the interest of the pope to support the party of Ladislaus in opposition to that of Lewis, yet, as the resentment for the injuries he had received from Charles had not yet subsided, it was with great difficulty he was prevailed upon to give assistance to his son. At length he sent a few troops; but, before their arrival, the Clementine party had taken possession of Naples, and gained several other advantages. Mean while Urban received an embassy from Jagello duke of Lithuania, who had renounced his idolatry, and, after his baptism, married the queen of Poland, and, by the name of Uladislaus, ascended the throne of that kingdom, to which he had annexed his hereditary dominions.

who is besieged in Nocera.

He escapes by sea to Genoa.

1386.

f Soon after the pope, having rejected all intercessions in behalf of the degraded cardinals, ordered them to be put to death, as his own life was again in danger from the designs of their friends, who had more than once endeavoured to poison him, and had even assaulted his where he puts the degraded cardinals to death.

<sup>c</sup> SUMMONT. l. iv.

<sup>f</sup> GOBEL. PERS. ap. rer. Germ. scriptor. t. i. p. 316. THEOD. de Niem, l. i. c. 42.

<sup>e</sup> THEOD. c. 49.

(T) This is the account of Theodoric de Niem, Gobelinus Persona, Walsingham, Krantz, Summontius, and others; however, Niem adds, that, while the pope was on his journey from Nocera to the sea-coast, he ordered the bishop of Aquila, who was one of the conspirators, to be put to death, and left unburied, imagining he wanted to escape, as he was mounted on a bad horse, and, on account of sickness, occasioned by his long imprisonment, was unable to keep up with the rest of the company (1).

(1) Niem, c. 56.

A. D. 1387.

palace<sup>a</sup>. As he made diligent inquiry to find out the authors of the assault, two cardinals fled a from his court, and went to Avignon, where they were promoted to the same dignity by other titles. Urban, not being able to prevail with the doge of Genoa to punish those that had been guilty of the assault, left that city, and in the end of December arrived at Lucca, where he resided nine months. Clement, in the mean time, finding his party strengthened by the accession of the kings of Navarre and Arragon, and by some successes of his adherents in Italy, that he might, by an appearance of moderation, reconcile the minds of others, he sent legates through the different provinces of Christendom, to desire a general council, declaring, that he was willing to submit to the decision of the church, without whose determination he could not with a safe conscience resign the pontificate: that, if he was confirmed, he would create Urban a cardinal of the first rank, and, if the council should decide against him, he would submit to Urban<sup>b</sup>. Clement, by this proceeding, gained a great many friends in Germany, from whence the princes and prelates sent an embassy to Urban, desiring him to consent to a general council, in order to procure the unity of the church, offering a place of security, and to defray the expences necessary on that occasion. The solicitations of the ambassadors were ineffectual; for Urban insisted, that there was no necessity to examine the justness of his title to the pontificate<sup>c</sup>. About the same time he published a crusade against the Clementines that had seized Naples; and having had some disputes with the Florentines, he left Lucca, and went to Perugia.

He marches from Perugia with some troops to recover Naples.
1388.

DURING his residence in that city, a division arose among the chiefs of the party of the duke of Anjou at Naples, who employed their troops in revenging their private quarrels. Urban, in hopes of recovering his interest in that kingdom, assembled a considerable body c of horse, and, in the month of August, leaving Perugia, marched for Naples. But, having a fall from his mule, he was obliged to be carried in a litter to Tivoli, where he received an embassy from the Romans, inviting him to Rome. Urban, distrusting their fidelity, advanced with his troops to Ferentino; but they having almost wholly deserted for want of pay, he was obliged, in the beginning of October, to return to Rome, having been informed that the city of Bologna had revolted to the party of Clement. The following year, according to Boninsegnius and Antonius, he had a dispute with the Romans, on account of some senator he had appointed, whom they suspected to be their enemy. To quiet the people, who threatened an insurrection, he published a bull for the celebration of a jubilee the following year at Rome; which solemnity he ordered for the future to be observed every thirty-three years, d according to the number of years of our Saviour's life<sup>1</sup>. He hoped by this festival to enrich both the Romans and himself; but he died before the time arrived for its celebration: Niemus, who was present at his death, relates, that, after a sickness of twenty-eight days, he died on the 12th of October, and that it was generally believed he was poisoned<sup>m</sup>.

Dies at Rome.

Boniface
elected.

A FEW days after the death of Urban, the cardinals who were at Rome, to the number of fourteen, entered the conclave, and, after some disputes, unanimously chose Peter Tomacello, a Neapolitan, and cardinal priest, of the title of St. Anastasia. He was consecrated and crowned on the feast of St. Martin, by the name of Boniface IX. and immediately after published circular letters, informing all the christian princes and prelates of his promotion (U). The news of his election no sooner reached Avignon, than Clement denounced a sentence of e excommunication against him, the same anathema having been fulminated by Boniface against the antipope. Soon after, in consequence of the bull for the jubilee, great numbers of pilgrims arrived at Rome; but as they were not so numerous as at the former jubilees, Boniface sent the indulgences into the different provinces of Christendom, to be conferred on those who, instead of the pilgrimage, would undertake other pious works. Those who were intrusted with the disposal of the indulgences, were ordered to return a third part of their offerings to the pope. But as great abuses were committed in that sacred merchandize, the collectors were not only maltreated by the people, but also imprisoned by Boniface, who, at the persuasion of Adam the English cardinal, whom he had restored to his dignity, declared, that a confession without penance did not intitle any one to the benefit of the indulgence, un- f less at the point of death<sup>n</sup>. About the same time the pope having received an embassy from the queen of Sicily and her son Ladislaus, desiring to be absolved from the sentence of excommunication denounced against them by Urban, and to receive the investiture of the kingdom, he sent cardinal Acciaioli to Gaeta, where they then were, who crowned the young Ladislaus, with his wife Constantia, king and queen of Sicily and Jerusalem. Mean while the antipope having received an embassy from the knights of Rhodes, informing him of the danger of Smyrna,

A jubilee celebrated at
Rome.
1390.

<sup>a</sup> GOBELIN. PERSON. ut supra, p. 309, 310.
c. 66. ANTON. tit. xxii. c. 2.
c. 69.

<sup>1</sup> MUTII Chron. Germ. lib. xxvi.
<sup>1</sup> NIEM, c. 68. BONINSEGN. lib. iv. ANTON. tit. ut supra.

<sup>k</sup> NIEM,
<sup>m</sup> NIEM,

<sup>n</sup> WALRING. in Rich. II.

(U) Boniface was born of a noble though poor family, five days after he had come to Rome as a poor and unbe-and, according to Niem, was created a cardinal twenty- neficed clergyman.

a from the incursions of the Tartars under the command of Tamerlane, he published a bull, promising a plenary remission of sins to all those who would furnish money to the assistance of the Christians in Asia <sup>o</sup>.

THIS bull was soon after followed by a letter of Boniface, addressed to all the faithful, exhort- A D. 1391.
ing them to the obedience of the pope, and to defend the apostolic see. As the antipope was chiefly supported by France, Boniface exclaimed against that kingdom. He compared the residence of the popes on the banks of the Rhone to the captivity of the Jews at Babylon. He asserted, that the king of France had been deceived by false letters, as though Urban VI. had designed to deprive him of the kingdom of Arles; and that he engaged in defence of the schism, upon a promise from the antipope of obtaining the universal monarchy, and the tythes in perpetuity <sup>p</sup>. Boniface seems to have published this letter from his apprehension of an expedition of the king of France into Italy, according to a rumour which then prevailed <sup>q</sup>. He was likewise soon after alarmed by the proceedings of the parliament of England, who ordered all English subjects then at Rome, soliciting preferment, to return immediately, under pain of losing their benefices. The pope, apprehensive lest England should declare for the antipope, sent an abbot into that kingdom, to declare, that he had no intention to infringe the king's prerogative, but would nevertheless defend the ecclesiastical liberty. The abbot had orders also to inform the king, that the antipope and the king of France had entered into a treaty to invest the duke of Tours, that king's brother, with all the dominions of the church in Italy, to confirm the young duke of Anjou in the kingdom of Sicily, and to create some other person king of Lombardy and Iuscany; on which account the pope intreated the king of England to undertake the defence of the church, as the French, if they were once masters of Italy, would easily conquer England <sup>r</sup>.
The pope informs the king of England of the ambitious views of the French;

WHILE his nuncio was representing these things in England, Boniface, at the request of the German prelates, published a bull, confirming the edicts of the emperors Frederic II. and Charles IV. for the immunity and jurisdiction of ecclesiastics. He likewise canonized St. Bridget, and sent legates to mediate a peace betwixt the Vicenti and the Florentines, which was accordingly concluded the following January. Not long after, the pope, on account of the many indignities and hardships he suffered from the bannerets of Rome, was obliged to quit the city, and retire to Perugia, where, at the intreaty of the queen dowager of Sicily, he granted a divorce betwixt her son Ladislaus and his young queen Constantia, for no other reason pretended, than because a report prevailed, that Constantia's mother had been debauched by Martin duke of Monablanca <sup>s</sup>. He likewise sent two nuncios with a letter to the king of France, desiring him to give his assistance in restoring the union of the church. The two nuncios went first to Avignon, where they were injuriously treated, and detained prisoners by the antipope; but, at the request of the university of Paris, the king of France ordered them to be set at liberty. Upon their arrival at Paris the king admitted them to an audience, and desired them to inform Boniface, that he would endeavour to the utmost to promote the union of the church, for which purpose supplications and processions were then begun to be made at Paris. Clement, perceiving the inclinations of the Parisians, pretended likewise to desire the union, and added a peculiar office to the mass, granting great indulgences to those who celebrated it. But it appears that his real intention was otherwise; for he soon after sent a master of the Carmelites to excite the Parisians against Boniface. The following year the pope, having received only the verbal answer of the king of France, again wrote to that prince; but as Charles was then in a state of lunacy, his letter was neglected by those who had the administration of the kingdom. Mean while the books of John Wickliffe having been carried into Bohemia by a young nobleman of that kingdom, who had studied at Oxford, his doctrines were embraced by great numbers of people at Prague; and, being publicly preached by John Hufs, they were received likewise in several cities of Germany, particularly at Augsburgh, where one Henry, a priest of Bamberg, having received authority from the magistrates of the city, made enquiry after those who professed heretical doctrines, many of whom this year he ordered to be burnt, and commanded those who recanted their opinions to wear upon their breast and back a yellow cross for twelve months <sup>t</sup>.
and publishes a bull for the liberty of ecclesiastics.
1392.
The followers of Wickliffe's doctrines are persecuted in Germany.

DURING these proceedings against the heretics in Germany, Boniface returned to Rome; but he continued but a few months in the city, when his life was in danger, from a violent insurrection of the Romans, who broke open the doors of his bed-chamber, and dragged from thence some canons of St. Peter's church, who had refused to agree to an alienation required of them by the bannerets. The king of Naples, who had come to Rome to demand succours from the pope against his competitor, immediately assembled some troops; and, hav-

<sup>o</sup> BZOV. hoc anno.
Rich. II.

<sup>p</sup> Epist. Bonifac. apud SPOND.

<sup>q</sup> FROISSARD.

<sup>r</sup> WALSINGHAM in

<sup>s</sup> SUMMONT. l. iv. c. 2.

<sup>t</sup> CRUSII Annal. Suev. par. iii. l. vi. c. 4.

The university of Paris proposes a means to put an end to the schism.
A. D. 1394.

The antipope
dies,

and is succeeded by Benedict
XIII.

A council of divines at Paris propose the method of resignation, to put an end to the schism.
1395.

The kings of England and France solicit both popes to resign.

ing repulsed the mob, effected a reconciliation betwixt the Romans and his holiness. About a the same time the university of Paris, having obtained leave from the king to consult of means to put an end to the schism, had concluded upon three expedients for that purpose, namely, either the resignation of both the pretenders, or a mutual compromise of both parties to elect a certain person, or, lastly, the determination of a general council. Notwithstanding the great opposition of the duke of Berry, the king's uncle, and Peter de Luna, the legate of the antipope, the university presented their resolutions in form of a letter to the king; which were graciously received by his majesty, who appointed a day for the further deliberation of that affair. At length, however, the intrigues of the antipope's legate prevailed, and the chancellor, by order of the king, prohibited the university from any further proceedings on that subject. Clement dying a few months afterwards, on the 16th of September, the b king of France immediately wrote to his cardinals to delay the election of a successor, till he should send special messengers to treat of the means of an union. The cardinals likewise received letters to the same purpose from the university of Paris, from the king of Arragon, and other princes. Boniface also sent two legates to Avignon, and wrote to the king of France and university of Paris, exhorting them to use their utmost endeavours to put an end to the schism. The cardinals at Avignon, however, paid no regard to the solicitations of the king of France, but, ten days after the death of Clement, entered the conclave, and chose Peter de Luna, who took the name of Benedict XIII. and wrote to the Christian princes, that he had been elected against his inclination, and would even willingly resign to procure the union of the church". c

IN consequence of these professions, the king of France assembled the prelates and doctors of his kingdom at Paris, in the beginning of February, to consult about the means of an union. The council, after mature deliberation, decreed, that the method of resignation was the most convenient; and that Benedict and the king ought first to inform the princes of their own party; and that the king alone should then acquaint the princes of the opposite party with the means proposed for the union; and that, after those princes should have persuaded Boniface to agree to a resignation, they should then consult about the manner of the future election. The king of France being informed that Benedict and his cardinals, before his election, had taken an oath, whereby they had bound themselves to endeavour to the utmost of their power to put an end to the schism, he sent to Avignon for a copy of the oath; but d receiving only evasive answers from the antipope, he sent his brother and his three uncles, with several other eminent nobles, prelates, and doctors, to Avignon, to urge Benedict to remember his oath, and give peace to the church. This solemn embassy had no influence with the antipope; however, all his cardinals, except three, subscribed their assent to the method of resignation". During these transactions in France, the Lollards or Wickliffites in England expressed their contempt for both popes, by writings affixed to the doors of St. Paul's and St. Peter's churches; while the university of Oxford, at the desire of the king, examined the method of resignation proposed by the Parisians, which they condemned by numerous arguments, and proposed the way of a general council, which they proved to be preferable, on account of its authority and dignity. Boniface, being informed of the outrages committed e by the Wickliffites, the following year wrote to the king of England, desiring him to assist the prelates of the church against the Lollards, and to condemn those who were declared heretics. About the time the king received the pope's letter, the archbishop of Canterbury held a council at London, which condemned eighteen propositions taken from the books of Wickliffe. Soon after the kings of England and France having an interview in the neighbourhood of Calais, Richard was married to the French king's daughter in that city; and, disapproving of the opinion of the university of Oxford, agreed that the method of cession was most proper to put an end to the schism. Accordingly, the year after, ambassadors were sent in the name of both kings to the two competitors for the pontificate, desiring them to consent to a resignation. Both Boniface and Benedict refused to give a determinate answer to this proposal. Boniface likewise, having received another embassy from the diet at Frankfort f to the same purpose, evaded giving a positive answer as to the cession, but treated the ambassadors with great respect, and granted particular favours to them and their friends*.

1398. Soon after the emperor Wenceslaus, who had neglected to appear at the diet at Frankfort, sent deputies to Rome, to inform the pope, that he proposed an interview with the king of France at Rheims, to consult of the means for terminating the schism; and therefore desired his holiness to send two of his cardinals thither, with full power to treat upon that subject. Boniface wrote to the emperor, dissuading him earnestly from that journey; however, his letter had no effect, and Wenceslaus arrived at Rheims in the month of March, where he was treated with great magnificence by the French king. At his * SURIT. Indic. lib. iii. Monach. DIONYS. & JUVEN. in Car. VI. FIELD, Hist. Wicliff. c. 14.

* SPOND. Annal.

* HARPS-

- a persuasion the emperor agreed to the means of cession; and the bishop of Cambray went as deputy from both princes, to desire Boniface to consent to a resignation. The pope, being informed by the bishop, that the emperor and the French king had determined to withdraw their obedience from that pope who refused to agree to the means of cession, declared, that if they could prevail with Benedict to abdicate, he would likewise satisfy both princes. The emperor, being informed at Coblentz, by the bishop, of this declaration of the pope, desired the king of France to oblige his pope to abdicate, and that he would then compel Boniface to resign. In consequence of this representation of the emperor, a general council of the nobles, prelates, and doctors, of France, was held at Paris, which determined, that Benedict should be desired to resign; and, if he did not voluntarily agree to an abdication, he should be compelled to it by force. The bishop of Cambray accordingly went to Avignon; and Benedict absolutely refusing to abdicate, he quitted the city, which was immediately after invested by marshal Boucicaut, who, being admitted by the citizens, took possession of the palace, in which he confined the antipope under a guard of 100 men<sup>y</sup>. Upon Benedict's refusal to abdicate, nineteen of his cardinals left Avignon before the place was invested. Froissard likewise relates, that he continued a prisoner for five years; and that the king of France, having withdrawn his obedience from him, solicited the king of England to refuse obedience to Boniface, and to agree to a neutrality; but though that prince inclined to hearken to the proposal of his father-in-law, yet the clergy of England would not consent<sup>z</sup>. The French king likewise wrote to the emperor, informing him of what had been done to Benedict, and desiring him to act in the same manner towards Boniface; but Wenceslaus excused himself, by alleging, that he must consult with the kings of Poland and Hungary, and with the princes of the empire<sup>a</sup>.

THE pope, in the mean time, residing undisturbed at Affisi, published a bull, by which he reserved, for the use of the apostolic chamber, the first year's revenues of all vacant bishopricks and abbeys, under the name of annates, or first-fruits<sup>b</sup>; so that whoever wanted to be promoted to the dignity of archbishop, bishop, or abbot, should before hand be obliged to pay a yearly revenue of his church or abbacy. This bull was soon submitted to by the clergy in all the provinces of Christendom, except in England, where the bishopricks were only allowed to be taxed<sup>c</sup> (W). Mean while, as the beginning of a new century approached, when the Romans expected another jubilee, they sent deputies to Boniface, intreating him to return to Rome, being afraid, lest, if he should absent himself, the resort of pilgrims to their city would be greatly lessened. Boniface refused to consent to their request, unless they admitted the city to be governed by a senator of his own appointment. The Romans, not willing at that time to disoblige the pope, not only took the government from the bannerets, but received Malatesta of Pesaro as their senator, at the appointment of Boniface, to whom they sent money to defray the expences of his journey to Rome. Upon his return to Rome, Boniface fortified the castle of St. Angelo, the capitol, and the bridges, and by degrees made himself absolute master of the city, so that he is reckoned the first pope who intirely transferred the authority from the people<sup>d</sup> (X). Though it does not appear that Boniface appointed a jubilee

<sup>y</sup> FROISSARD. l. iv. c. 97.
Annales.

<sup>z</sup> Idem, c. 99.

<sup>a</sup> BZOV. hoc an.

<sup>b</sup> NIEM, l. ii. c. 7.

<sup>c</sup> SPOND.

<sup>d</sup> PLATIN. in Bonif. IX. BLOND. D. ii. l. x.

(W) This is the first bull for establishing perpetual annates; yet, if antiquity can give authority for that exaction, the payment of the first-fruits is mentioned by Hosliensis, who wrote about 130 years before this period; and in the council of Vienne, held under Clement V. it was decreed, that annates should be abolished; and that, in their stead, the 20th part of the revenues of the priests should be paid to the apostolic see. John XXII. the successor of Clement, published a bull, whereby he reserved the first years fruits of all ecclesiastical benefices that continued vacant for three years, archbishopricks, bishopricks, and abbeys, being exempted; but by degrees the first fruits were exacted, without observing whether the benefices were vacant three years or not. The same pope afterwards published a bull, reserving for his life all benefices that became vacant in his court. Benedict XII. who succeeded John, followed his example, which was also imitated by some succeeding popes; but the authority of their bulls extended no further than their own life. What was before local and particular, Boniface decreed to be universal and perpetual. Before the schism, annates are said to have been collected at different times after the incumbent had taken possession, and frequently great part of the tax was never raised: but after the schism, a large part of the tax was raised before the delivery of the bull confirming the collation, and bonds were given for payment of the rest. Soon after the whole first fruits were exacted beforehand; and, lastly, the tax under the name of annates was not only imposed at pleasure, but frequently doubled, tripled, and quadrupled (1).

(X) Theodorice de Niem and Antoninus describe a scene of devotion in Italy this year, to which they were eyewitnesses. Niem says, it first arose from some seducers that had come into Italy from Scotland, one of whom pretended that he was Elias the prophet, and that the world would quickly perish by an earthquake. Antoninus is uncertain where that kind of devotion first appeared, as, he says, some asserted, that it came from Spain, others from Scotland or England, and some from France, from whence, according to Sigonius and Platina, a priest arrived in Italy, cloathed in white, with great appearance of modesty, and seduced infinite numbers of people of both sexes and all ages. The penitents, among whom were several cardinals and priests, were cloathed in white linen down to their heels, with caps on

(1) Spond. ex Cod. Victor. Niem, de Schismatic.

A jubilee celebrated at Rome.
A. D. 1400.

jubilee to be held in the beginning of the century; and Victorellus affirms, that he searched the register of that pope, without finding the least mention of that ceremony; yet the following year great numbers of people flocked to Rome from different nations of Europe, particularly from France, although the year before the king of France, that he might not seem to acknowledge Boniface, and in consideration of the poverty of his kingdom, had published an edict, prohibiting any one from going to Rome. As the plague raged this year in Italy, and especially at Rome, where, according to Boninsegnius*, 7 or 800 people died daily, very few of the pilgrims returned home, and great numbers of them were robbed, and the women ravished by the pope's soldiers in the neighbourhood of the city†. A great many foreigners had an opportunity of escaping these dangers; for Boniface granted indulgencies to the Danes, who should visit the cathedral church of St. Laurent at Lunden, and allowed the emperor to celebrate the jubilee at Prague after the Roman fashion.

The pope confirms the election of the duke of Bavaria, as emperor.

A few months after, the electors of Germany, having deposed Wenceslaus, on account of his bad government, and chosen Rupert or Robert, duke of Bavaria, and count palatine of the Rhine, as emperor, Boniface confirmed his election, and invited him to Rome, to receive the imperial crown. Robert being also invited by the Florentines to oppose the progress of Galeas Visconti, who had conquered almost all Lombardy, and four years before had purchased the title of duke of Milan from Wenceslaus, he assembled a considerable army, and the following year entered Italy about the end of autumn. As the troops of Galeas were accustomed to war, they put the Germans to flight in a skirmish near Brescia, so that the emperor was obliged to retire to Trent, where the greatest part of his army left him, and went back to Germany. However, at the intreaty of the Florentines, who promised him a reinforcement, he advanced with the remains of his army to Padua, where he continued some months in expectation of succours from the Italians, whose interest it was to humble Galeas. But as they did not exert themselves so much as he expected, he left Italy in the month of April, and returned to Germany.

1402.

MEAN while in France the party of the antipope began to revive; the duke of Orleans, the king's brother, and the university of Toulouse, professed their obedience to Benedict; the kings of Castile and Aragon supported his cause, and several treatises were published condemning the proceedings of the council of Paris. On the other hand, the university of Paris, supporting its former decrees, declared, that whoever asserted that the withdrawing of obedience was unjust, were abettors and promoters of the schism. About the same time the cardinals who had seceded from Benedict, and who resided at Senlis, together with the patriarch of Alexandria, and some other prelates, declared, that, as the withdrawing of obedience from Benedict had not succeeded in putting an end to the schism, a general council should be called of those that adhered to Benedict. But this method was not followed; for great disputes arose, whether the antipope should not first be restored to his liberty, and be obeyed as formerly; which propositions were condemned by the majority, who published a great many reasons, justifying their opinion‡.

The duke of Milan dies while he was proposing to assume the title of king of Italy.

DURING these disputes in France, the duke of Milan had marched with an army against Bologna; and having taken that city, with Pisa, Perugia, and Siena, had provided a crown, with the intention of assuming the title of king of Italy, and sent his army to invest Florence, which was reduced to the utmost despair. In the midst of these successes he was seized with a fever, and died on the 3d of September, leaving his possessions to his two sons. Boniface seized the opportunity of his death to recover several cities of the ecclesiastical state which he had usurped. Bologna, Perugia, and Ferrara, voluntarily submitted, and some other places that resisted were taken and dismantled. About the same time, being informed that the Hungarians had imprisoned their king Sigismund, and offered their kingdom to the king of Naples, the pope encouraged Ladislaus to take possession of Hungary, and ordered cardinal Acciajoli to accompany him in the expedition as his legate. Ladislaus accordingly sailed to Dalmatia, and, at the intreaty of the Hungarian nobles, proceeded to Javarin, where he was crowned in the

A. D. 1403.

* BONIN. l. 4.

† NIEM de Schism.

‡ Vide SPOND. Annal. hoc an.

on their heads which covered their whole faces, except their eyes. They went in great troops of 10, 20, and 40,000 persons, from one city to another, calling out for mercy, and singing hymns in the Latin and vulgar tongue. Where ever they came, they were received with great hospitality, and joined by the inhabitants of those places, as those who did not follow their processions were looked upon as heretics (2). They fasted, or lived on bread and water, during the time of their pilgrimage, which continued generally nine or ten days. At night they slept in churches, monasteries, and churchyards, men and women without distinction, or false suspicion. Sigonius and Platina relate, that the pilgrims stopped at Viterbo; and Platina says, that Boniface, afraid lest the priest intended, by their assistance, to seize the pontificate, sent a body of troops thither, who apprehended the false prophet, and carried him to Rome, where he was burnt (3).

(2) Annal. Mediol. ap. Murator.(3) Platina, Sigon. de Episc. Bonon. Anton. tit. xxii c. 3. Niem, lib. ii. c. 16.

a month of August by the cardinal legate. But he was immediately obliged to quit the kingdom; for Sigismund, who some time before had escaped from his confinement to Germany, had assembled an army in his brother's kingdom of Bohemia, and returned to Hungary, where he was joyfully received by the greatest part of his subjects. Boniface, by countenancing the claims of Ladislaus to Hungary, and confirming the election of the duke of Bavaria to the empire, lost the obedience of Sigismund and Wenceslaus, who from that time both acknowledged the antipope<sup>h</sup>.

BENEDICT a few months before had made his escape from Avignon, and was again acknowledged by the king of France, upon his declaring he would consent to resignation, on condition either of the death, abdication, or deposition, of his adversary. This submission, however, was of very short continuance; for the antipope, notwithstanding the intreaties of his most zealous adherent the duke of Orleans, absolutely refusing to confirm the elections and collations that had been made during his confinement, the king, towards the end of December, published an edict, declaring, that he would defend the possessors, and prohibiting all his subjects from paying any money, under any pretence, to the antipope, or receiving any of his bulls<sup>i</sup>. The following year likewise the university of Paris made a grand procession to the church of St. Catherine, for the extinction of the schism; but they were attacked by the servants of the duke of Orleans, who still adhered to Benedict. The antipope soon after sent two bishops, with some others, to Boniface, to treat of the means of a union. They arrived at Rome, on the 21st of September, and, upon promising to pay the accustomed honours to the pope, they were admitted to an audience, in which they declared, that Benedict was most willing to treat of an union, and desired Boniface to appoint a safe place where conferences might be held betwixt the two popes for that purpose. As Boniface was then afflicted with a fit of the gravel, the nuncios of the antipope were desired to wait a few days. They accordingly had a second audience on the feast of St. Michael, when, instead of agreeing to a conference, both parties mutually reproached each other. Boniface survived this contest only two days; for, being seized with a fever, he died on the first of October. The nuncios were immediately after imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, in breach of the safe-conduct that had been granted them by the pope, and were not set at liberty until they paid 5000 florins<sup>k</sup>.

At the death of Boniface there only remained 12 cardinals of his party, and, four of them being absent from the city, the other eight entered the conclave; and having bound themselves by an oath, that, whosoever of them should be elected pope, he might freely abdicate, if the antipope would do the same, they unanimously elected Cosmato Melcorato, of the kingdom of Naples, a cardinal of the title of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem, who, having assumed the name of Innocent VII. was consecrated on the 4th of November. Immediately after his promotion, great disputes happened in Rome betwixt the Guelphs and Gibelines, about the government of the city. The families of Colonna and Savelli, with some other nobles and chiefs of the Gibelines, endeavoured to restore the government of the bannerets; but they were opposed by the Ursini, and other Guelphs. Several skirmishes ensued, till Ladislaus king of Naples, at the intreaty of the Gibelines, arriving with a large body of troops at Rome, settled the government on a footing not very advantageous for the church, as he left the power in the hands of the people, in hopes of usurping it afterwards himself<sup>l</sup>. In consequence of this settlement, Innocent was greatly harrassed with the impudent demands of the new governors, who had received some troops from Ladislaus. In his own defence, he was obliged to hire 2 or 3000 men as a guard; but, being of a mild disposition, he endeavoured to appease the Romans by offices of kindness, and created 11 cardinals, five of whom were Romans, and one of them of the family of Colonna. However, soon after, the Gibeline faction attacked his guard upon Ponte Molo; but, being repulsed, they made an unsuccessful attempt upon his palace. A few days after, some of the chief citizens came to the pope, to treat of a reconciliation. They were attacked upon their return, without his knowledge, by order of his nephew, and eleven of them, being apprehended, were cruelly put to death. The city, upon the news of their murder, was immediately in an uproar, and the friends of the deceased seized Adrian's bridge with a large body of troops, and prepared to attack the castle. Innocent, dreading the resentment of the Romans, so highly irritated, immediately left his palace, and fled with his army to Sutri, and from thence to Viterbo<sup>m</sup>. Upon his departure the Romans broke into the palace, where they destroyed a great many books and registers; and a considerable reinforcement of troops arriving from Ladislaus, John Colonna admitted them into the city and castle<sup>n</sup>. Innocent, before he left Rome, had summoned a general council to be held in that city, for the extinction of schism.

<sup>h</sup> Magn. Chron. Belg.<sup>i</sup> SPOND. Annal.<sup>k</sup> DIONYS. Monach. JUVEN. in Car. VI.<sup>l</sup> ANTON.

tit. xxii. c. 4. NIEM, c. 34, 35.

<sup>m</sup> Comment. LEONARD. ARETINI, ap. Murator. t. xix. p. 923.<sup>n</sup> NIEM, de Schism. ANTON. tit. xxii. c. 24. f. 1.

MEAN while Benedict arrived by sea at Genoa, where he was received with great demonstrations of joy: but as he brought a large body of troops along with him, which was daily increasing, the Genoese, afraid of their liberties, took an opportunity, when the forces were reviewing, to shut them out of their city. The antipope was greatly offended at their proceeding; and soon after returned to Nice in Provence; but, while he continued in Italy, he sent to Innocent, desiring letters of safe conduct for some persons whom he intended to send to him to treat of a union. Innocent, believing his professions were not sincere, refused his request; upon which denial his adversary triumphed, and published the transaction to the world, accusing the pope of having no inclination to terminate the schism. Innocent endeavoured to refute the assertions of the antipope; but Niem accused them both of mutual altercation, with a design to protract the schism<sup>a</sup>. During these disputes, Innocent being informed that the king of England had caused the archbishop of York to be executed, on account of an insurrection that he had headed, he excommunicated all those who were concerned in the prelate's death; but, as he himself did not long survive, the anathema was disregarded in England. The following year, the Romans, taking umbrage at the Neapolitan troops, and understanding that the pope was innocent of the murder of the deputies, intreated him to return to the city. He accordingly arrived in the beginning of Lent; and soon after excommunicated and deposed *Ladislau*s, for having attacked the territories of the church. The king of Naples, struck with this unexpected fulmination, immediately solicited an accommodation, which was concluded by the mediation of the pope's nephew and Paul Ursini. Niem, however, affirms, that Innocent intended to renew the processes against the king, but was prevented by death, which happened to him on the 7th of November. b

He returns to Rome, where he dies.

A. D. 1406.

Gregory XII. is chosen pope.

He promises to abdicate, and exhorts the antipope to resign.

A. D. 1407.

He alters his resolutions.

UPON Innocent's death, his cardinals deliberated for some time whether or not they should omit to elect a successor, as the French had bound their pope by solemn promises to abdicate, on condition that the other pope would resign, or that his cardinals would supersede the election of a successor. At length the cardinals at Rome, being afraid of a sedition in the city, determined to proceed to an election; but previously bound themselves by an oath, that, which soever of them should be elected, he should abdicate the pontificate, on condition that the antipope would resign. Angelus Corrarius, a Venetian, and cardinal of the title of St. Mark, was elected pope, and took the name of Gregory XII. but before his coronation, he renewed the former oath, and wrote to the antipope, exhorting him to resign, and appoint a place where the cardinals of both parties might unanimously agree to the election of a pope; which letter was answered by Benedict almost in the same terms<sup>p</sup>. Letters likewise passed between the cardinals of both parties. On the 15th of March, Gregory sent other nuncios to Benedict, and, after much dispute, it was agreed, that the popes, with their cardinal, should meet at Savona, on the Genoese coast, at the feast of St. Michael, or at All Saints. The Genoese, being informed of this determination, offered hostages for the security of both parties, and promised to furnish all necessaries during the congress. The king of France likewise sent ambassadors to the popes, to exhort them to persevere in their intentions, who, arriving at Rome about the beginning of July, found Gregory averse to the congress at Savona, to which he raised several objections; and, notwithstanding all their remonstrances, insisted upon a change of place for the conferences. His objections gave great joy to Benedict, who wanted a fair pretence to delay the union; he therefore insisted upon standing to the former agreement, and obstinately refused to agree to any alterations in the preliminary articles. Gregory had some excuse for refusing to go so far from Rome; for, a few weeks before the arrival of the ambassadors, *Ladislau*s, with the Gibeline exiles, had surprised the city, and obliged the pope to save himself in the castle of St. Angelo; they were however again expelled with considerable loss by Paul Ursini. c

IN consequence of the preliminaries agreed to, Gregory at length, with great reluctance, quitted Rome on the 9th of August, and in the beginning of September arrived at Siena, where he offered to resign the pontificate, on condition of enjoying during his life the patriarchate of Constantinople, some benefices in the republic of Venice, and the churches of York or Oxford, which were then said to be vacant, and that some territories in the ecclesiastical state might be conferred on his three nephews and their heirs. Though his cardinals agreed to this proposal, yet he found excuses for delaying his abdication; and let the time for the congress elapse without removing from Siena. Mean while Benedict, with his cardinals, had arrived at Savona on the 24th of September, and, after continuing there upwards of three months, he advanced in the beginning of January to Portus Veneris, that he might seem to take away all objection from Gregory for delaying the conferences. As the pope still continued at Siena, Benedict sent the archbishops of Rouen and Taragona to him, desiring him to agree to some intermediate place. Their journey was without effect; however, in the end of the month he advanced to Lucca. About the same time the king of France published a letter, addressed to f

A. D. 1408.

<sup>a</sup> NIEM, c. 38.

<sup>p</sup> ARETIN. NIEM, ut supra.

- a all the faithful, declaring, that if the schism was not quickly terminated, he would withdraw obedience from Benedict at Whitsuntide, and exhorting all other princes to reject the authority of both popes. Mean while the popes pretending a distrust of each other's intentions, all hopes of a conference vanished; and on the 9th of May Gregory created four new cardinals, contrary to the opinion of the college, who refused to associate with them, and deliberated among themselves about deserting the pope<sup>a</sup>. Accordingly, two days after, they all, except four, left Lucca, and went to Pisa, where they published a writing, appealing from Gregory, first to Christ, then to a general council, and lastly to a future pope. About the same time Benedict having sent letters to Paris, prohibiting the withdrawing of obedience, under pain of excommunication, the parliament ordered the letters to be burnt, and on the 25th of May
- b published a neutrality with regard to both popes; and orders were sent to Bussicard, governor of Genoa, to seize Benedict. The antipope, having notice of these orders, immediately quitted Italy, and fled to Elne, on the coast of Catalonia; but, before his departure, his cardinals had likewise deserted him, and retired to Leghorn, where they entered into a correspondence with the cardinals at Pisa.

Is deserted by his cardinals.

The cardinals likewise desert Benedict, and join those of Gregory at Leghorn.

- THE cardinals of both parties soon after uniting at Leghorn, on the 24th of July, published letters, addressed to all the prelates of Christendom, appointing a general council to be held at Pisa the following year, on the 25th of March. The popes, being informed of this proceeding of the cardinals, likewise appointed general councils; Benedict summoned the council to assemble at Perpignan in November, while Gregory appointed it to be held the following Whitsuntide in the province of Aquileia, or exarchate of Ravenna, the particular place to be mentioned afterwards<sup>c</sup>. Gregory at that time had arrived at Siena, where he continued several months, and in September created nine new cardinals, five, or, according to Niem, twelve cardinals being likewise created by the antipope at Perpignan. From Siena the pope went to Rimini, where he wintered, the Romans refusing to admit him into their city, as he had agreed to deliver up the ecclesiastical state to the king of Naples, in consideration of an annual pension in money<sup>d</sup>. Mean while the French king, having assembled the prelates of France, by their advice, on the 13th of October, published an edict, depriving all the adherents of Benedict of their benefices and dignities in his kingdom; and a few days after articles were drawn up for regulating the government of the Gallican church during the time of the neutrality, thereby demonstrating, even before the times of the reformation, that a church could subsist without acknowledging any pope. During these transactions in France, Benedict opened his council at Perpignan; but as there were but very few prelates, it was prorogued to the 14th of the month, when about 120 prelates assembled from Castile, Aragon, Navarre, Provence, and Savoy. It was continued, by eight sessions, to the first of February, before which time the greatest part of the prelates had left Perpignan. Those who remained exhorted the antipope to a resignation, and proposed some means for terminating the schism, to which Benedict subscribed.

A. D. 1409.

- A FEW weeks after the general council was opened at Pisa, at which were present 22 cardinals, three patriarchs, 180 archbishops and bishops, 300 abbots personally or by their proxies, and 282 doctors of theology, besides deputies from the kings of France, England, Poland, and several other princes. This council having, in two or three sessions, cited the two popes to appear, at last declared them contumacious; after which sentence it adjourned to the 15th of April, when deputies arrived from the emperor, desiring the assembly to be transferred elsewhere; but, as their petition was rejected, they appealed in their master's name, affirming, that a council could not be held without the emperor's authority. After the transactions in several other sessions, all regarding the unity of the church, the council, on the 5th of June, published a sentence of deposition against both the popes, as obstinate schismatics and heretics, publicly convicted of perjury and breach of vows. A few days after the cardinals produced a writing, with their subscriptions, whereby they promised, that if any of them was elected pope he should prorogue the council till a reformation of the universal church should be effected. They then entered the conclave, on the 23d of June; and three days after elected Peter Philargi, a cardinal priest, of the title of the twelve apostles, a Greek by nation, who took the name of Alexander V. The new pope immediately presided at the council, confirmed their decrees, and annulled all the processes and sentences denounced by the popes against any persons, communities, kingdoms, &c. since the beginning of the schism. He likewise decreed, that a general council should be convened within three years afterwards; and in the 23d and last session, which was held on the 7th of August, he ordained that the Pisan council should be prorogued till the other general one should assemble.

A general council assembles at Pisa;

and deposes the two popes.

Alexander V. is elected.

<sup>a</sup> ARETIN. NIEM, ut supra.

<sup>c</sup> Rer. Germ. Script. t. i. p. 326.

<sup>d</sup> Monach. DIONYS.

As Ladislaus king of Naples had seized Rome, with several other cities of the ecclesiastical state, and was daily making new conquests in Tuscany, the Florentines, Siennese, and cardinal legate at Bologna, made an alliance with his competitor Lewis duke of Anjou, who arrived at the council of Pisa, where he was received with great honour by Alexander. The pope confirmed to him the crown of Sicily, and appointed him standard-bearer of the church; after which ceremony he marched against Ladislaus, and quickly recovered the city of Rome, and several other places in the ecclesiastical state. Mean while Gregory held his council in the diocese of Aquileia, but there is no mention of any of its proceedings; only Niem relates, on the 5th of September he published a writing, as from his council, declaring his willingness to abdicate; but the conditions which he proposed were so impracticable, that it might easily be perceived he had no inclination to a union<sup>b</sup>.

He confers the crown of Naples on the duke of Anjou.

John Hufe publishes the doctrine of Wickliffe at Prague.

Alexander dies.
A. D. 1410.

John XXIII. is elected.

1411.

His troops gain a victory over the king of Naples;

As neither Gregory nor Benedict quitted their pretensions to the pontificate, the church was at this time provided with three popes; but Gregory was now acknowledged only by Ladislaus and a few cities of Italy; and Benedict by the king of Scotland, the count of Armagnac, and the kings of Spain, Portugal excepted. All the rest of Christendom submitted to Alexander, who, after dismissing the council at Pisa, went from thence, first to Pistoria, and then to Bologna, from whence he wrote to Subinco, archbishop of Prague, ordering him to prohibit any one from discoursing either publicly or privately upon the doctrines of Wickliffe, and to allow the preaching of sermons in churches and church-yards. By this order the pope intended to prevent the Bohemians from any further examination of Wickliffe's doctrines, which had been embraced by great numbers in Prague, and a few years before been preached by John Hufe. As the university of Prague, which consisted chiefly of Germans, had the former year condemned 45 of Wickliffe's propositions, John Hufe and his party had prevailed with Wenceslaus to deprive the foreigners of their privileges; on which several thousands of Poles and Germans left Prague. After their departure, John, being elected rector of the university, and appointed a preacher in one of the chief churches of the city, began to translate the writings of Wickliffe into the vulgar tongue, and in his discourses, without any reserve, exclaimed against the authority of the pope, purgatory, prayers for the dead, and several other doctrines of the Roman church. Upon hearing of the mandate of Alexander, he declared, that it was contrary to the actions and words of our Saviour and his apostles, who used to preach every-where; and he appealed to the pope himself, when better informed<sup>c</sup>. Alexander was prevented by death from proceeding any further in that affair, as he died on the 3d of May in the 11th month of his pontificate<sup>d</sup>.

Upon the death of Alexander, the 17 cardinals who were at Bologna chose cardinal Balthasar Cossa, a Neapolitan, who is said by some authors to have been elected by force, as he was legate in the city, and had the command of a great number of troops; however, Niem only alleges, that it was at the recommendation of Lewis king of Naples, who was on the neighbouring coast with a powerful fleet. His promotions gave great scandal, as he was more remarkable for his military than religious disposition; however, on the 25th of May he was consecrated, and took the name of John XXIII<sup>e</sup>. Immediately after, being informed of the death of the emperor Robert, he sent nuncios to the electors, exhorting them to chuse Sigismund king of Hungary; and sent a legate into France, to demand the tyths, the revenues of vacant benefices, and the spoils of deceased clergymen, which he asserted belonged by natural and divine right to the apostolic chamber<sup>e</sup>. The university of Paris opposed this demand with great vigour, and proposed to appeal to a general council, and to deprive all those of the degree of master of arts who should submit to the payment of the subsidy required. Soon after John went to Rome, where, on the 23d of April, being the feast of St. George, he consecrated several standards, and a few days after appointed Lewis king of Sicily, and Paul Urfini, generals of his troops against Ladislaus, who obliged the kingdom of Naples to acknowledge Gregory XII. whom he retained at Gaeta. The pope's army, advancing to Campania, on the 19th of May, entirely defeated Ladislaus, who fled in despair to St. Germain's. But, notwithstanding the pressing instances of king Lewis, Paul Urfini refusing to pursue the victory, Ladislaus had leisure to repair his loss; upon which Lewis returned to Rome, and, dissatisfied with the conduct of the Italians, soon after went back to France. On the same day Ladislaus was defeated in Campania, the city of Bologna revolted from the church, two butchers having headed an insurrection and seized the government, which they held for more than a year. John being informed of the loss of Bologna, reinforced the troops with new levies, and, on the 16th of June, created fourteen new cardinals. About the same time he received an embassy from the king of Poland, with very rich presents, desiring that he would approve of the war that he had with the Teutonic knights, and would declare that the sacred vessels taken out of the Prussian churches, and distributed in Poland, were lawful prizes<sup>f</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> NIEM, c. 45 & 46.

<sup>b</sup> COCHLEII Hist. Hussit. l. i. c. 6. GOBELIN. PERSON. ap. rer. Germ. Script. t. i.

<sup>c</sup> ARETIN. ut supra. ANTON. tit. xxvi.

<sup>d</sup> MONSTRELET, l. i. c. 67, & 70.

a prizes. The pope granted these two requests, but refused a third demand made by the ambassadors, namely, that the king might have leave to cause a crusade to be preached against the Tartars. The pope refused to grant a crusade against the Tartars, because he intended to make use of those sacred soldiers in defending the ecclesiastical state. He accordingly, in the beginning of the following year, published a crusade against Ladislaus, who was thereupon induced to agree to an accommodation, although the terms were not very honourable to the holy see; for the pope engaged to pay a tribute to the king, on condition that he ceased hostilities, and refused to acknowledge Gregory<sup>v</sup>. against whom he causes a crusade to be preached. A. D. 1412.

THE preaching of this crusade at Prague gave a new opportunity to John Huss and his party to exclaim against the errors of the church: accordingly three of his followers, in three different churches, during the reading of the papal bull, called out that the pope was anti-christ, who caused a crusade to be preached against Christians. These three were immediately apprehended and imprisoned, which Huss was no sooner informed of, than he came at the head of 2000 men to the magistrates, demanding the liberty of the prisoners, offering to answer himself for their crime, if it was any crime to speak the truth. The senate dismissed the mob, by promising that nothing should be determined against the prisoners: however, next morning, they ordered them to be executed. Their friends, among whom were a great many students, immediately assembled, and wrapping the dead bodies in linen, carried them with great solemnity through the streets of the city, calling out, These are the saints who have given their bodies for the testimony of God. Soon after the administration of the church of Prague was given to the bishop of Olmütz, who, by the advice of several members of the university, proposed some articles to the regent and nobles, as proper to put a stop to the disorders. The other party likewise presented nine propositions, about preserving the rights and liberties of the kingdom of Bohemia, and against defaming John Huss and his followers as heretics, without examining their cause. The articles proposed by the bishop were approved by an edict of Wenceslaus; in consequence of which John Huss was banished the city: however, the disturbances did not cease; his followers rather turned more outrageous, and censured the edict by public writings, which were again answered by the catholic doctors<sup>2</sup>. The Hussites, on account of this crusade, exclaim against the pope.

d DURING these commotions in Bohemia, the pope celebrated a general council at Rome, which assembly was not very numerous, and, on that account, was prorogued. However, by their advice, on the 6th of January, John published a decree against the Hussites, ordering the books of Wickliffe to be searched for by the ordinaries, and to be burnt; and commanding all his followers to appear before the apostolic see within nine months, otherwise they should be convicted of heresy<sup>2</sup>. Soon after Ladislaus again commenced hostilities, by surprizing the city of Rome, where he committed great barbarities, the pope and his cardinals, with much difficulty, escaping to Sutri, and from thence to Florence. The king quickly after made himself master of all the ecclesiastical state, as far as the frontiers of Sienna and Florence, while the pope earnestly solicited the assistance of the emperor Sigismund, who had entered Italy to terminate his differences with the Venetians. Though the emperor was desirous of putting a stop to the progress of Ladislaus, yet he would not consent at that time to engage in a war against him; but by frequent letters prevailed upon the pope to agree to a general council, as the most proper means to procure the peace of Italy. John accordingly sent legates to the emperor, with full power to determine the place and time for holding the council, but cautioned them, in the most earnest manner, not to agree to any place under the power of the emperor<sup>b</sup>. The legates, for what reason is uncertain, agreed to hold the council at Constance, an imperial city, in the diocese of Mentz; and the emperor published a letter, addressed to the prelates, inviting them to come to the council, to be opened in that city on the 1st of November, in the following year, promising them a safe conduct both in their coming and returning, and full security during their residence. A general council is held at Rome. A. D. 1413.

f THE pope, upon being informed of the proceedings of his legates, was greatly afflicted, as he foresaw that he would not be master of the deliberations of the council. But as there was no means of receding, he went to Placenza, where he had a conference with the emperor; and proceeding from thence to Lodi, on the 10th of December he published a bull, appointing a general council to be held at the time and place above-mentioned, not having been able to prevail with the emperor to agree to the nomination of any other city. Sigismund, before he left Italy, wrote to the two antipopes, exhorting them to appear at the council, but both Benedict and Gregory protested against that assembly, and used their utmost endeavours to prevent its meeting. Mean while John, having returned to Bologna from thence, wrote to the king of France, and to the university of Paris, desiring them to solicit the Bohemian Hussites to forsake the heresy of Wickliffe. But the intreaties of the university The emperor enters Lombardy. Conferences betwixt him and the pope. A. D. 1414.

<sup>v</sup> SPOND. Annal. <sup>2</sup> ÆN. SYLV. C. 25. DUBRAV. l. 23. COCHL. l. i. NARD ARET. ap. Murator. t. 19.

<sup>a</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>b</sup> LEO-

were without effect, for the Hussites every day more and more detested the Roman church; and Peter of Dresden, having been obliged to quit his native country on account of his religious principles, insinuated to Sacobellus, one of their preachers, eminent for his learning and probity<sup>c</sup>, that the church of Rome deceived the people, by denying them the use of the cup in the sacrament of the eucharist, contrary to the words of our Saviour, who says, Except ye eat the flesh of the son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you<sup>d</sup>. This new opinion, of the necessity of communicating under both kinds, was received by the Hussites with great applause, as they now thought they could plainly convict the Roman church either of ignorance or wickedness.

Ladisllaus dies at Naples. WHILE the most inveterate enemies of the apostolic see were strengthening their party in Bobemia, the tranquillity of Italy was, in some measure, restored by the death of Ladisllaus,<sup>b</sup> he having died at Naples, on the 6th of August. By his death John was delivered from a formidable enemy, and had now no great inclination to attach himself to the emperor; however, as every thing was settled for the meeting of the council at Constance, and as he was pressed to go thither by the cardinals, on the 1st of October he set out for that city, the magistrates having previously sworn to and signed some articles that he had proposed to them for his security. John arrived at Constance on the 28th of October, accompanied with nine cardinals, and all his court; and, on the 1st of November, after the celebration of mass by the pope and cardinal of Florence, read a schedule concerning the celebration of the council, as a continuation of that of Pisa, for the reformation of the state of the church, to be opened on the 30th of the month. The council however was not opened till the 5th of November,<sup>c</sup> when the first session was appointed to be held on the 16th. On that day the pope made a discourse to the synod; after which the same cardinal of Florence read the pope's admonition, concerning the moderation to be observed in the assembly, and about the consideration of those things that regarded the peace of the church, and the extirpation of the errors of Wickliffe; and, to prevent any disturbance about precedency, he declared, that, with regard to the order of sitting in the assembly, no prejudice should arise to any person or church. The ministers and officials of the council were then appointed; namely, four prothonotaries to inspect and commit to writing all that should be done in the synod, under whom were four notaries, one for each of the four principal nations of Italy, France, Germany, and England. The guard of the council were committed to Berthold Ursini a Roman. Besides, there were appointed<sup>d</sup> four searchers of the votes, four doctors of the law as advocates of the council, two procurators, and, lastly, four masters of the ceremonies; after which proceedings the council was prorogued till the 17th of December.

John Huss arrives at that city, and is imprisoned. Two days before the opening of the council, John Huss arrived at Constance, having left Prague in a triumphant manner, on the 15th of October, and being received every-where with great honour during his journey, not in consequence of the safe conduct of the emperor, for that was not granted till the 18th of the month, and could not reach him till a few days after. Upon his arrival at Constance, he employed his time in preaching to the people; and refusing to desist at the desire of the pope, he was apprehended and shut up in one of the chambers of the palace. The emperor being informed of this proceeding by one of John's<sup>e</sup> followers, sent orders to enlarge the prisoner; but they were not obeyed by the pope, who insisted that he himself had not given John a safe conduct. However, his confinement was in some measure relaxed: he was committed to the keeping of the bishop of Lausanne; and four cardinals, with the generals of the Dominicans and Franciscans, and six archbishops and bishops, were commissioned to examine him (S). During these transactions the emperor received the crown at Aix-la-Chapelle; and having with great expedition prepared every thing for his journey, arrived in the evening of the 24th of December at Constance, with a grand retinue, and immediately went with the pope to the church, where, during the celebration of mass by his holiness, he assisted in the habit of a deacon, according to custom. As the second session, on account of the emperor's absence, had been prorogued to the month of March,<sup>f</sup> he in the mean time convoked a general congregation of the members of the council, and laid before them his negotiations with the antipopes, in order to terminate the schism. He then regulated what regarded the liberty, security, and subsistence, of the strangers at that time in Constance, the number of whom amounted to about 100,000<sup>g</sup>: he likewise, at the request of the members, left the council at full liberty to deliberate and determine in matters of faith, thereby exposing John Huss to the resentment of the fathers, in violation of his own safe con-

The emperor comes to the council.

A. D. 1415.

<sup>c</sup> Æn. ut supra.

<sup>d</sup> John vi. 53.

<sup>e</sup> VONDER HARDT. l. ii.

(S) Spondanus affirms, without mentioning his authority, that John Huss, finding his adversaries ready to prosecute him, attempted to make his escape from a dust (T). Soon after some cardinals arrived from the antipopes, in quality of nuncios, and, after a dispute, it was resolved to admit them with the ornaments of their dignity. The nuncios of Gregory proposed to prosecute on his part the means of cession, and desired that John might not preside in the council, to the decrees of which they promised all obedience. But those of Benedict only proposed a conference with the emperor and Ferdinand king of Arragon, to be held in the city of Nice, on the Genoese coast<sup>f</sup>.

Constance, by concealing himself in a cart loaded with straw; but that he was discovered, brought back to the city, and committed to prison.

DURING the month of February several congregations were held, in which it was determined, contrary to the inclination of the pope, that the lay deputies of the kings, republics, and universities, should be admitted as members of the council, and that in the public sessions the votes should be given not by particulars but by nations. About the same time a memorial was presented; containing a long accusation of John XXIII. which, according to Niem, was thought to have been presented by an Italian, and included all the mortal sins, and an infinite number of abominations<sup>g</sup>. The pope, terrified with this accusation, proposed to confess himself to the council; but he was in some measure freed from his apprehensions; for it was resolved to suppress the memorial. However, it was agreed among all the nations, that the abdication of the pope was the most proper means to terminate the schism: accordingly John, finding the council unanimously fixed in that resolution, with great reluctance, and after many subterfuges, accepted of a form of resignation presented to him by the patriarch of Antioch. The next day, being the 2d of March, was held the second session of the council, in the cathedral church, where the pope, after the celebration of mass, read aloud the form of his abdication; by which he promised, vowed, and swore, before God, the church, and the council, to give peace to the church, by his resignation of the pontificate, on condition that the two antipopes would do the same, or in any case wherein his abdication might be of service to the church. He had no sooner read this form, than the emperor took off his crown, threw himself on his knees, and embraced his feet: the patriarch of Antioch likewise thanked him in the name of the whole council. Then, according to Spondanus, Sigismund and the whole council promised, that, if the other two popes did not likewise resign, they would stand by him, and assist him against them with all their temporal forces<sup>h</sup>.

SIGISMUND having agreed to a conference with Benedict at Nice, in the month of June, mean while assembled another congregation; and, on the 15th of March, by their advice, demanded of the pope, 1. That the council should not be dissolved till the union was effected: 2. That it should not be transferred elsewhere: 3. That the pope should not leave Constance: 4. That he should name a proxy, who should abdicate in his name: 5. That he should confirm the above propositions by his bulls: and, lastly, That the prelates and others, summoned to the council, should not depart, unless on account of sickness or poverty. The pope granted the first demand; as to the second, he declared, that it seemed more convenient to transfer the council to some place in the neighbourhood of Nice; to the third, that it would be more expedient that both he and the council should go towards Nice; to the fourth, that he chose rather to abdicate personally than by proxy; and to the last he returned no answer. The council were not at all satisfied with these answers; and being apprehensive lest the pope should delay his abdication under various pretensions, they again solicited him to name the emperor, and those prelates that were to accompany him to Nice, as his proxies. John still refused to consent, as being sensible that, if he once named proxies, he had then no opportunity to recede; and finding that the council was resolved to oblige him to abdicate, he asked leave of the emperor to quit Constance, pretending that the air of the city was prejudicial to his health<sup>i</sup>. Sigismund, who had placed guards at the gates of the city to prevent any one from leaving the council, was so far from giving him liberty to depart, that he obliged him to promise not to quit the city till the council was dissolved. John, however, having concerted his retreat with the duke of Austria, notwithstanding the vigilance of the emperor, on the 20th of March escaped from Constance, disguised in the habit of a groom, and fled to Schaffhausen, about four miles distance, from whence he wrote to Sigismund, declaring that he had not retired with the intention of avoiding to fulfil his promise of abdication, but that he might execute it with liberty and security.

THIS sudden flight of the pope occasioned great disputes among the members of the council; some affirming, that, as he had retired, the council was thereby dissolved, while others maintained,

<sup>f</sup> SPOND. Annal. ex act. Victor & Diarii cerretani. P. 41, 42.

<sup>g</sup> SPOND. ex act. Victor.

<sup>h</sup> NIEM, ap. Vonder Hardt. t. ii. p. 291, & t. iv. Roohist. Aufl. l. iv. p. 136. STUMPHIUS, p. 38.

(T) Naucler relates, that Sigismund was assured he could not be accused of breaking his word, because the council, which is above an emperor, not having given any safe conduct to John Huss, the emperor himself had no right to grant him his protection, especially in matters of faith; and that Sigismund, as a true son of the church, acquiesced in this decision (1).

(1) Naucler, p. 1049.

The council
continues.

that the authority of a council, in the necessities of the church, was superior to that of a pope. These last were supported by Sigismund, who, with the nobles of his court, went through the city, and with great prudence and firmness quieted the disturbances; and calling the four different nations together, assured them that he would protect the council, and, with the hazard of his life, would procure the union of the church. Accordingly, to support the authority of the council in the third session, which was held on the 26th of March, it was decreed, that as the council had been legally assembled in Constance, it was not dissolved by the retreat of the pope or any other prelates; that it ought not to be dissolved till the church was reformed in faith and manners, both in the head and members; nor ought it to be transferred elsewhere without mature deliberations; and that no members ought to retire till it was dissolved, unless their reasons for removing were approved by the council, and that then they should be bound to leave their proxies with those who remained. The next day three cardinals that had been to the pope returned to Constance, with a letter and mandate from him, declaring that he was willing to appoint proxies for his abdication, and desiring that the king of the Romans and the council would provide for his security, and that of the duke of Austria, who had been put to the ban of the empire for assisting him to make his escape. What reception these offers of the pope met with does not appear; but two days after he protested, before a notary and several witnesses, that he was not bound to perform what he had promised and sworn at Constance, as he was influenced by fear and force. He then left Schaffhausen, and proceeded, in the midst of a heavy rain, to the castle of Louffenberg. The fourth session of the council was held the next day, which was the 30th of March, in which it was decreed, that the council, having been legally assembled, represented the catholic militant church, and received its authority immediately from Christ; and that every one, of what dignity soever, the pontifical not excepted, was bound to obey its decrees, regarding the faith and extirpation of schism; that all the censures of the pope against any prelates or ecclesiastics should be null and void; and that none should be accounted cardinals, but those who were acknowledged such before the succession of John<sup>k</sup>.

Its authority is declared superior to the pope.

IN the fifth session, which was held on the 6th of April, the council explained and confirmed their former decrees: they then resolved, that John was bound to resign, in any case whatever, that would promote the union of the church; that if he refused, he should be reckoned deposed; and if he would not return to Constance, the council should proceed against him as a person suspected of heresy, and author of schism. After these determinations, some overtures were read, regarding the condemnation of Wickliffe's doctrine, and for regulating the manner of proceeding in discussing the cause of John Huss; to examine which several doctors of divinity and law were appointed. Mean while the pope retired from Louffenberg to Friburgh; but before he left that castle he wrote to the different princes of Europe, and to the university of Paris, excusing his flight from Constance, alleging that the emperor had deprived the council of liberty, by shutting the gates of the city, and that he had presumed, on different occasions, to preside at their deliberations; that although in general councils no difference of nations ought to be observed, yet it had been ordained, that each nation should have but one voice, although from France and Italy there were present 200 prelates, and only three from England, with nine other ecclesiastics; and that in the assemblies, laymen as well as clergymen had been admitted to give their votes, although by the canons the right of voting in general councils only belonged to cardinals, patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops. The council, in their own justification, published a letter, addressed to all the faithful, wherein they declared, that the pope had prohibited any one to leave the council, under pain of excommunication; that, nevertheless, the city being daily deserted, he had desired the emperor to provide against the evil, who thereupon had not shut the gates, but only guarded them for part of a day; that, for dispatch of business, the council had appointed the form of deliberating by nations, but, nevertheless, in the sessions every member had a liberty of speaking what he pleased; that John had acted contrary to the example of former popes, particularly of Symmachus and Sixtus, who did not seek to diminish the authority of the council by their flight, but submitted humbly to its decrees: they then concluded with testifying their desire that John would return to their council.

ON the 17th of April, a few days before they published this letter, the sixth session of the council was held, wherein it was decreed, that John should be obliged to appoint proxies for his resignation, according to a form then read, and that an honourable embassy should be sent to him to inform him of this decree, and to invite him to return to the neighbourhood of Constance. Jerome of Prague, the associate of John Huss, was likewise summoned to the council, and a safe-conduct granted to him; but, according to Spondanus, it was mentioned as an exception, in as far as the catholic faith admitted. A few days after the ambassadors of a the council found the pope at Brisac, from whence, after their arrival, he fled to Neuenburgh, with the design of putting himself under the protection of the duke of Burgundy. But he was prevailed upon to return to Friburgh, where he had a conference for three days with the ambassadors, and promised to resign, on condition of impunity for his past and future proceedings, and that he should still continue cardinal, and be appointed legate à latere for his life in Italy, with several other extravagant articles. The legates giving an account of their embassy in the seventh session, held on the 2d of May, the council then summoned the pope to appear at Constance within nine days, to answer for his flight and other matters, and granted him a safe-conduct, which was confirmed by the emperor. Jerome of Prague was likewise declared contumacious, for not having appeared according to his former citation. Two days after was held the eighth session, wherein the writings of Wickliffe were prohibited; and ordered to be burnt; a great many of his propositions were condemned, and his bones were ordered to be dug up and thrown into profane ground. The day following, by the advice of the council, Sigismund was reconciled to the duke of Austria, who finding himself unable to preserve his dominions, in consequence of the ban, came and submitted in a most humble manner, promised to bring the pope back to the council, and as a security resigned, by a solemn act, all his possessions into the hands of the emperor. Immediately upon this agreement, Sigismund sent two archbishops, and a body of 300 men, to Friburgh, to seize the pope, who seemed not displeased to return to Constance, but, while he protracted the time, he sent a proxy to two cardinals to plead his cause before the council. This bull, however, was rejected at the ninth session, which was held on the 13th of May, the council insisting that proxies could not be admitted, as the citation was personal. Accordingly the next day, in the tenth session, John with his followers were declared contumacious, and a sentence of suspension from the pontificate was denounced against him, as guilty of simony and many other scandalous vices. A few days after the pope arriving, under a guard, at Ratoffcell, within two leagues of Constance, five cardinals were sent to him to inform him of the proceedings of the council; to which he declared his submission, but wrote to the emperor and the council, intreating them to have some regard to his honour, his person, and his estate. In the following session, which was held on the 25th of May, fifty-four articles were read against the pope, accusing him of various crimes, for the proof of which the witnesses were mentioned: three other articles were likewise added, concerning his poisoning his predecessor; and denying the resurrection of the dead and a future life; but for these no witnesses could be produced. The articles for which there was proof were carried to the pope, and he was desired to answer them; but he still declaring his willingness to submit to the council, on the 29th of May, in the twelfth session, a definitive sentence of deposition was denounced against him, which he next day confirmed by a public instrument, and immediately laid aside all the pontifical ornaments.

A. D. 1415.

The council
deposes the
pope.

This affair of the deposition of the pope being terminated, to the satisfaction of the council, they proceeded next to decide the cause of John Huss. On the 7th of June he was called before a private assembly, where the emperor was present, who exhorted him to submit to the authority of the council, and promised, from a regard to his brother Wenceslaus and the kingdom of Bohemia, he would dismiss him safe; otherwise, instead of being a protector to him in his errors, he would, with his own hands, light the fire to which he would be condemned. John pleaded the safe conduct that he himself had given him, and declared, that he came to the council not to defend his doctrines with a perverse obstinacy, but to retract them if he should be taught any thing that was better. The next day he was again called before the emperor and several prelates, and desired to abjure twenty-six heretical articles, drawn from his treatise upon the church; John required of them not to be compelled to do any thing against his conscience. He said several of the articles he had never taught, and therefore could not renounce them; the rest he was willing to forsake upon being instructed better. The emperor and the prelates not being satisfied with these conditional submissions, John was reconducted to prison; and in the thirteenth session, which was held on the 15th of June, the proctors of the council desired the condemnation of some errors concerning the eucharist: accordingly it was decreed, that though Christ instituted and administered the sacrament after supper under both kinds, of bread and wine, nevertheless, according to the laudable custom of the church, and the authority of the sacred canons, it ought not to be consecrated after supper, nor received by the faithful, unless when fasting, except in case of sickness, or of any other necessity admitted by the church; and although in the primitive church the same sacrament was received by the faithful under both kinds, yet, to avoid several scandals, the custom had been justly introduced, that the laity should receive it under the bread alone, as it ought to be most firmly believed that the intire body of Christ is wholly contained under each kind separately; and that those who obstinately asserted that the observation of this

John Huss desires his doctrines to be examined.

custom was sacrilegious and unlawful, ought to be punished by the ordinaries and inquisitors of heresy.

Gregory XII.
abdicates the pontificate.

In the next session, which was held on the 4th of July, the emperor presided, till the deputies from pope Gregory read his bulls, approving the council, not as having assembled by order of pope John, whom he stiled Balbazar Cossa, but as summoned by the authority of Sigismund. The emperor then retired to his own place, and the council confirmed all the proceedings of Gregory, during his administration of the pontificate; received his six cardinals, and himself as a seventh, into the sacred college, and annulled all the censures that had been denounced by either party against the other. Charles Malatesta, lord of Rimini, as proxy for Gregory, then made a solemn renunciation of the pontificate in his name; upon which the council sung Te Deum, and decreed, that Gregory should be always accounted next to the pope in dignity and rank, and declared him perpetual legate à latere in the march of Ancona. Two days after, in the fifteenth session, John Hufs was introduced into the council, and placed upon a high seat in the view of the whole assembly, as a person convicted of heresy by those who had been appointed to examine him, altho' his judges had used no arguments to disprove his doctrines, but only insisted that he ought to submit his judgment to a general council. After he was seated, an order was read, enjoining the strictest silence, under pain of excommunication and two months imprisonment: then the propositions of Wickliffe were read and condemned: John Hufs was declared an obstinate heretic; ordered to be degraded, and to be delivered to the secular court; and his writings to be burnt. In consequence of this sentence, he was stripped of his sacerdotal habit, a paper mitre, painted with devils, was put upon his head, and he was delivered to the magistrate of Constance, who the same day ordered him to be burnt alive without the city. Æneas Sylvius, afterwards Pius II. in his history of Bohemia, relates, that he walked to the stake as cheerfully as if he had been going to an entertainment, and, while he was burning, sung an hymn with a loud and strong voice<sup>1</sup>. Though his ashes were thrown into the lake, yet his disciples carried off the earth on which he suffered, which was distributed amongst his followers, and preserved by them as sacred relicks<sup>m</sup>. The news of his death no sooner reached Bohemia, than the nobles and barons, who had embraced his doctrine, wrote threatening letters to the council, and entered into an association for their mutual defence<sup>n</sup>. In the same session the council condemned that opinion, "That it was lawful and meritorious to kill a tyrant, by any means, notwithstanding any alliance with him, or oath of allegiance (U)."

John Hufs is condemned and burnt.

The emperor goes to Fer-pignan, where he has a conference with Benedict;

who refuses to abdicate.

THE council having now removed two popes, in the next session, held on the 11th of July, appointed twelve proxies, to accompany the emperor to the conference with the king of Arragon and Benedict XIII. which was now to be held in Spain. Four days after, in the seventeenth session, the emperor received the benediction of the council, and anathemas were denounced against any who should interrupt his journey, and indulgences granted to those who prayed for his success. On the 18th Sigismund quitted Constance, with an escort of 4000 horse, and arrived soon after at Narbonne; but, being obliged to delay his journey on account of the sickness of the king of Arragon, he did not reach Perpignan before the 18th of September. Benedict, or Peter de Luna, at first refused to come to the conferences, unless the emperor would honour him as pope; but Sigismund absolutely rejecting that demand, he at last arrived at Perpignan. However, he still refused to abdicate, and insisted that, as he had now no competitors, the only way to terminate the schism was to acknowledge him as pope. The emperor, highly offended at this obstinacy, threatened to compel him to a resignation, and left Perpignan. After he had returned to Narbonne, being informed that Benedict had fled to the strong city of Peniscola, on the coast of Valentia, he invited him to return to Perpignan, but without effect. By this obstinacy Benedict lost all his adherents; the clergy of Scotland acknowledged the authority of the council of Constance, and the kings of Arragon, Castile, and Navarre, and the count of Armagnac, sent deputies to the emperor at Narbonne, where a capitulation was concluded, under twelve articles, whereby it was agreed, that the prelates at Constance should write circular letters to the princes and prelates hitherto in the obedience of Benedict, inviting them to the council; and that, upon their arrival, they should consult

<sup>1</sup> ÆN. hist. Boem. c. 63.

<sup>m</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>n</sup> In Paralip. ad Ursperg.

(U) The acts of council do not mention what it was that gave occasion to this decree; but Spondanus, with great probability, refers it to the dispute raised in France, on account of the murder of the duke of Orleans by his cousin the duke of Burgundy, in 1407. One John Parisius, a Parisian divine, had justified this murder in eight articles he had published, alleging, that, as the duke of

Orleans was a tyrant, above the reach of the laws, it was lawful and meritorious to kill him. These articles were condemned by the bishop of Paris, and by the inquisitor; and, the affair being carried before the council, it was debated there with great warmth, and some of those, who held the affirmative, were in hazard of their lives (1).

(1) Spond. Annal. hoc an.

a with the rest about the union and reformation of the church, and the election of a new pope.

DURING these transactions of the emperor, the council assembled on the 17th of August, and appointed some bishops from each of the nations to judge the causes and complaints that should be brought before the council. In the next session, which was held on the 23d of September, Jerome of Prague, a layman, and master of arts, publicly abjured the errors of Wickliffe, and acknowledged himself exposed to the severity of the canons if he should ever teach any thing contrary to the catholic doctrine; which abjuration and profession he delivered to the council written with his own hand. He, however, afterwards retracted, and endeavoured to escape; but was brought back from the confines of Bohemia by John duke of Bavaria, and shut up in a dark and loathsome dungeon in the bottom of a tower, in which situation he continued several months. In the same session the council confirmed the decrees of the emperor Frederic II. and Charles IV. concerning immunity of ecclesiastics; and in the twentieth session, held on the 29th of November, a monitory was published against Frederic duke of Austria, for his invasion of the privileges and possessions of the church of Trent. There are no other proceedings of the council mentioned during this year; but on the 31st of January, in a general session, the capitulation of Narbonne was confirmed, and a few days after letters of convocation to the Spanish princes and prelates were published, according to the form agreed to betwixt the deputies. Mean while Ferdinand king of Arragon prohibited, by a public edict, any of his subjects from obeying Benedict; who, in return, assembled his friends at Peniscola, and demanded a sentence of deposition and excommunication against Ferdinand. After the publication of the citation for the Spanish prelates, the deliberations of the members of the council were not so frequent, as they waited for the arrival of the emperor, who had proceeded to France, and from thence to England, to reconcile these two kingdoms, and to ask succours against the Turks, who were then ravaging Hungary. In the twenty-first session, which was held on the 29th of May, Jerome of Prague, after having, with great eloquence and intrepidity, defended his doctrines in several private audiences, was introduced into the council, and condemned as an obstinate and relapsed heretic. He was then delivered to the secular magistrate, who ordered him to be burnt alive; which punishment he suffered with the greatest constancy and firmness. When the executioner was going to light the fire behind him, he called out to him to light it before his face; for if he had been afraid of burning he never would have come to Constance (W).

ABOUT the same time the duke of Austria, having refused to obey the monitory, and having fled from Constance, the council informed the emperor of his flight; who immediately put him to the ban of the empire. A few months afterwards the twenty-second session was held, on the 15th of October, in which was regulated the order of sitting to be observed by the deputies of Arragon and Naples, who had arrived at the council; and it was decreed, that the votes of the deputies of Arragon, together with those of the deputies of Portugal, Castile, and Navarre, should have the same authority as if all the bishops of those kingdoms were present: by which means a fifth nation was added to those already appointed by the council. In the following session, held on the 5th of November, twelve commissaries were nominated to determine the manner of proceeding against Peter de Luna; and in the next session, which

(W) Poggio of Florence, secretary of John XXIII. who was then at Constance, gives an account of the behaviour of Jerome before the fathers, in an elegant letter to his friend Leonardo of Arezzo, and says, that, tho' he was shut up in a dark and nasty dungeon for 340 days, where he could not even see, yet, upon his trial, he cited so many learned and wise men, and so many doctors of the church, in defence of his opinions, that it would have appeared extraordinary, even tho' the whole time of his imprisonment had been spent in leisure and study. He declares, that he had never seen any whose eloquence approached so near to that of the ancients; that he answered his accusers with the greatest wisdom and confidence; and that, if his faith was the same with what he professed, there could not be found against him the least cause of offence: that he frequently answered the reproaches and railings of his opponents by a jest or sarcasm, which obliged many of the assembly to smile. On the last day of his audience, having with difficulty obtained leave to speak, he mentioned many upright men that had been unjustly condemned by wicked judges, particularly Socrates, Plato, Anaxagoras, Zeno, Rutilius, Boethius; then, proceeding to the sacred scriptures, he mentioned Joseph, almost all the prophets, Susannah, John Baptist, our Saviour, Stephen the Martyr, and all the apostles, he said, had been condemned, not as being good men, but as despisers of God, and seditious ringleaders of the people; that the most holy and learned fathers, Augustine and Jerome, had differed from one another without being suspected of heresy. He then mentioned his friend John Huss, whom he praised as a good, just, and holy man, who had never preached against the doctrines of the church, but against the abuses of the clergy, and the pride and pomp of the prelates, who wasted the patrimony of the church, designed for the support of the poor and strangers, upon whores and dogs, and in feasting, gluttony, and vain apparel. As his discourse was frequently interrupted by the captious objections of his opponents, there was none whom he did not answer, and either obliged all to blush or to be silent. When a noise arose in the assembly he stopt, without being disconcerted, and sometimes even reproved the authors of the disturbance, and intreated for leave to speak, as it would be the last time they would ever hear him (1).

(1) Pog. Flor. epist. ex rer. Boem. script.

was held on the 18th of the same month, a form of citation was read, summoning the same Peter, as a schismatic and heretic, to appear within seventy days after intimation made to himself, or the publication of the summons in any church of the diocese wherein he resided. In the two following sessions, which were held on the 14th and 24th of December, the deputies of the count of Foix and of the king of Navarre were admitted into the council; and a decree was made, ordaining, that no honour or detriment should accrue to any nation by the order of sitting, debating, or subscribing.

The emperor returns to Constance.
A.D. 1417.

Benedict
XIII. is deposed.

A FEW weeks after, the emperor returned to Constance; and in the twenty-seventh session, held on the 20th of February, the duke of Austria was declared guilty of contumacy; and in the next session, held on the 3d of March, Frederic and his adherents were excommunicated, for having invaded the possessions of the church of Trent, and violated his oath to the emperor. The twenty-ninth session was held on the 8th of March, the day appointed for the appearance of Peter de Luna; but, as he had not obeyed the summons, the council declared him contumacious; and two days after, in the thirtieth session, the deputies that had been sent to Spain, informing the assembly that they had cited the said Peter personally, and received from him an evasive answer, the council immediately approved the withdrawing obedience from him. In the next session, held on the 31st of March, a monitory was published against Philip Viconti count of Virtu, who had thrust the bishop of Asti into prison; and the bishop of Bayonne, in Guienne, tho' appointed by Benedict, was confirmed by the council, because his competitor, who had been nominated by John XXIII. was lately dead. The five following sessions were wholly employed in the cause of Peter de Luna, who, after several citations, and examinations of witnesses against him, on the 26th of July, in the thirty-seventh session, was solemnly deposed, and all Christians were absolved from yielding him obedience. Before this definitive sentence was published, the emperor, with the princes of Germany, and the English deputies, had endeavoured to prevail with the council to proceed to the reformation of the church; and the marquis of Brandenburgh particularly proposed, that the clergy of Germany should be prohibited, by a canon, from purchasing any immoveable possessions. This motion for a reformation was, however, strenuously opposed by the cardinals and the other nations, who urged that it was first necessary to elect a pope; and, each party defending their opinion with great warmth, the council was on the point of being dissolved. The emperor at length calmed their spirits, and, after two sessions spent in frivolous disputes about precedency, in the thirty-ninth session, which was held on the 9th of October, a perpetual decree was made, that, fifteen years after the dissolving of the council of Constance, another should be held, and, within seven years after that should be dissolved, a third should be held, and for ever afterwards councils should be held every ten years; the place of meeting to be appointed by the pope, who should have liberty to contract, but not to lengthen, the term for their convocation; and if a schism should arise in the pontificate, within a year after the dissolution of the council, it should then assemble the year after without any citation. In the fortieth session, held on the 30th of October, it was decreed, that the future pope, before the dismissing of the council, should reform the church in the head and members; they then proceeded to regulate the form of the election, and ordained, that six deputies of each of the nations should enter the conclave, together with the cardinals; and whoever should be chosen by two-thirds of the cardinals and deputies, should be accounted a true pope. Accordingly in the forty-first session, held on the 8th of November, thirty deputies were nominated, and entered the conclave with twenty cardinals of the three obediences. After great disputes, Otho Colonna, a Roman, and cardinal deacon of St. George, was chosen pope on the 11th of November; who, in honour of the saint whose feast was then celebrated, took the name of Martin V. Historians remark, that the emperor might have seized this opportunity to recover the right which his predecessors enjoyed, of confirming the popes before their coronation; but he dropt that pretension for the peace of the church; and when the conclave was opened he entered, and prostrated himself at the feet of the pope, who was afterwards conducted to the cathedral church with the greatest solemnity, the emperor and the elector of Brandenburgh holding the reins of his horse, and a hundred princes, the ambassadors of twelve kings, and a whole council, following him.

Martin V.
is elected pope
by the deputies and cardinals.

The doctrines of the Hussites approved by the university of Prague.

MARTIN having notified his election to the Christian princes, on the 28th of December presided at the forty-second session, in which Sigismund and the duke of Bavaria petitioned to be freed from the keeping of the late pope John. During these transactions of the council, the Hussites in Bohemia, in resentment for the death of John Huss and Jerome, having destroyed a great many monasteries of the Dominicans, prevailed with the university of Prague to approve their doctrine of communicating under both kinds. Accordingly John, cardinal rector of the university, published a declaration in the name of the whole body, professing, that they did not decide presumptuously against the catholic apostolic Roman church, nor seek to introduce any novelty, but rather adhered to the assertion of the council of

Constance,

- a Constance, which had approved the communicating under both kinds, as instituted by our Saviour, and long practised by the primitive church : they therefore exhorted all those, who were concerned for their salvation, to prefer the institution of Christ to any edict of men. Wenceslaus being unable, by his own authority, to quell the commotions raised by the Hussites, wrote to his brother Sigismund for his assistance.

MEAN while Martin sent the cardinal of Pisa as his legate to Peter de Luna, to exhort him A. D. 1418. to resign the pontificate ; but Peter, tho' he was likewise solicited by some of his own cardinals to abdicate, would not consent, but declared that he would confer with Martin about the means of restoring peace to the church<sup>o</sup>. The council again assembling on the 21st of March, published some decrees concerning exemptions, first fruits, dispensations, simony, tythes, and other ecclesiastical grievances, and concerning the lives and dress of the clergy ; by which, and by some agreement with each of the nations which is not mentioned, the pope decreed, that the former statute of the council, about reforming the church, was fully executed (X). According to Platina, the pretence used for delaying to proceed to the reformation was the long continuance of the council, therefore, in the forty-fourth session, held on the 19th of April, according to a former decree, a future council was appointed to be held at Pavia. Three days after was held the forty-fifth and last session of the council, in which the deputies of the king of Poland, and of the waiwode or duke of Lithuania, having desired the pope to condemn a certain book containing a great many heretical doctrines, Martin took occasion from thence of declaring, that he held, and would firmly observe, all the decrees of the council in matters of faith. This his declaration he ordered to be repeated by the advocate of the council, thereby, according to Spondanus, intending to elude giving his consent to those decrees made in the fourth and sixteenth sessions, concerning the superiority of a council above a pope, and its authority of reforming the church in the head and members ; which doctrines, according to that writer, ought only to be admitted during a schism, when it is uncertain which of the pretenders to the pontificate is the real pope<sup>p</sup>. A bull, condemning the errors of Wickliffe, John Hus, and Jerome of Prague, was then read, together with a form of examining their adherents, and receiving the penitents. Lastly, Martin granted a plenary absolution to all those who had attended at the council, both masters and servants ; after which it was dissolved by cardinal Rainald, who, by the order of the pope, pronounced these words, Go in peace ; to which the whole assembly answered, Amen.

MARTIN soon after quitted Constance, and went to Geneva, where he continued till the month of September. He then passed the Alps, and was received with great honour by Philip duke of Milan, whom he reconciled to Pandolphus Malatesta, lord of Brescia. From thence he proceeded to Mantua, where he continued four months, and sent several legates to the cities of Italy, to reconcile their differences, and facilitate his own journey to Rome. In the beginning of February Martin left Mantua, and went to Florence, by Ravenna and Forli, to avoid Bologna, which had then revolted from the church. He was received by the Florentines with great honour, and continued upwards of eighteen months in that city, till he had established his authority in Italy, and recovered the greatest part of the territories of the church ; for, at his arrival, the castle of St. Angelo, Ostia, and Civita Vecchia, were garrisoned by the Neapolitans, and the Romans had submitted to Brachius lord of Perugia, who had reduced that city and a great part of the ecclesiastical state ; and, as he had served several years under Balthasar Cossa, the late pope John, was a great enemy to Martin. Brachius was soon after expelled from Rome by Sfortia Visconti, then constable of Naples ; but, still refusing to submit to the church, he was excommunicated by Martin. However, the authority of the pope was at that time so weak, that Brachius and his adherents, in their turn, excommunicated his holiness, who was likewise exposed to the scoffs of the common people (Y). By the intercession of the Florentines, Brachius soon after submitted, and came and threw himself at the pope's feet ; who appointed him vicar over several of the cities he had formerly

The council of Constance is dissolved.

The pope returns to Italy,
and 1419.

resides at Florence.

<sup>o</sup> PLATINA.

<sup>p</sup> SPOND. Annal. an. 1418.

(X) Gobelinus Persona relates, that, before the election of Martin, several learned men of each of the nations, by the appointment of the council, drew up a form of reformation of the church, which, after the election of the pope, some nations desired to be confirmed ; but as they were not all equally zealous, and the cardinals appeared very backward in that affair, the French nation went to the emperor, and desired him to urge the pope to proceed to a reformation. Sigismund answered, that, while he was earnest that the reformation should precede the election of a pope, they opposed him ; therefore, as he had not now the same authority as when the apostolic see was vacant, they ought to apply to the pope (2).

(Y) Papa Martino non vale un quattrino, pope Martin is not worth a farthing (3).

(2) Gobel. Person. æt. vi. c. 69. Edit. Meibom. t. i.

(3) Leon. Aret. ap. Murator. t. 19.

usurped. The queen of Naples likewise restored the places which she had seized, and sent her a seneschal to Florence, desiring the pope to send a cardinal to Naples, to perform the ceremony of her coronation. Martin granted her request, on condition that she set her husband at liberty; who had been long confined in prison, while she indulged herself openly in lasciviousness<sup>9</sup>. About the same time four cardinals, who had deserted Benedict, came and submitted to the pope; and soon after Balthasar Cossa, who had escaped from the guards that were conducting him into Italy, came and threw himself at his feet, and acknowledged him true pope, and canonically elected. His submission was very acceptable to Martin, who created him cardinal bishop of Tusculum, and dean of the sacred college; however, he did not long enjoy this return of prosperity, but died a few months after, and was most honourably interred at the expence of his friend Cosmo de Medicis; who, by his means, had raised his fortune b to such a degree, as to be accounted, not only the richest citizen of Florence but of the whole world<sup>r</sup>.

The Hussites commit great outrages in Bohemia.
A. D. 1420.
A crusade
preached against them.

DURING these transactions in Italy, the catholics in Bohemia were miserably oppressed by the Hussites, who had expelled them from Prague, and several other cities of the kingdom, and, since the death of Wenceslaus, had refused to acknowledge his brother Sigismund as their king; because he had previously refused to confirm to them liberty of conscience (Z). Martin being informed of their horrid outrages, at the intreaty of Sigismund, published a crusade against them on the 1st of March, with the usual indulgences<sup>s</sup>, and sent legates into Germany to attend the emperor; who, being delivered from his apprehensions of the Turks in Hungary, had raised an army of 200,000 men, with which he entered Bohemia, and besieged c Prague. But, notwithstanding the great superiority of his numbers, he was obliged to raise the siege, and was defeated in five engagements, with the loss of his baggage, provisions, and artillery<sup>t</sup>. About the same time, the pope, having received an embassy from Manuel the Greek emperor, with an offer of embracing the Latin faith and rites, if reasonable conditions were proposed, he appointed cardinal Fonseca as his legate a latere to go to Constantinople; but he first sent the general of the Dominicans to sound the real disposition of the emperor. Soon after, having recovered Bologna, he erected the church of Florence into a metropolitan, in return for the kind reception he had met with from that city; which he quitted on the 9th of September, and proceeded to Rome, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy<sup>u</sup>, the Romans appointing the day of his arrival to be observed as a holiday. d Martin immediately caused the city to be repaired and decorated, and applied himself to humanize the Romans, who were become almost barbarous; he was, however, in some measure interrupted in these designs by Brachius of Perugia, who again revolted, and renewed his hostilities in the ecclesiastical state.

They publish a letter in justification of their proceedings.

In the mean time the Hussites, to justify their proceedings, published a letter, accusing the emperor of having violated their privileges, alienated the marquise of Brandenburgh, without the consent of the states, plundered the churches, and carried off the archives of the kingdom: they then proposed four articles, from which they declared they would never recede; namely, concerning the freedom of communicating under both kinds, the preaching of the gospel without constraint, depriving the clergy of all superfluous endowments, and extirpating, by a reformation, all mortal sin in every rank and dignity. This letter was signed by Conrad archbishop of Prague, who had espoused their party, and by a great many barons and deputies of the cities; who a few months afterwards held a diet, or holy synod, as they called it, at Prague, in which they published twenty-two articles explaining their faith. e Ambassadors were likewise sent to Poland to make an offer of their crown to Uladi-slaus, or Jagellon; but he rejecting the offer, the Hussites applied to the duke of Lithuania, who, being offended at Sigismund, sent his brother Coribut, with a large body of Lithuanians and Poles, to the assistance of the rebels, at the same time informing the pope of the reasons 1422.

<sup>9</sup> SUMMONT. Hist. Neap. l. iv. c. 3.
l. vii. p. 652. See also the History of the German empire.

<sup>r</sup> PLATIN.

<sup>s</sup> COCHLÆ.

<sup>t</sup> AVENT. Annal. Boior.

<sup>u</sup> LEON. ARET. ap. Murator. PLATINA.

(Z) Besides the Hussites, who were divided into two sects; namely, those who denied transubstantiation, and those who were called Calixtins, and communicated under both kinds, the sect of Adamites was at this time introduced into Bohemia, by one Pikard, from Holland, who quickly made a great many proselytes of both sexes; and, having taken possession of an island surrounded by a river, called himself Adam, the son of God, and asserted that all others, who were not of his sect, were children of the devil. His followers walked naked, and lived promiscuously; but, as they were obliged to plunder others for their subsistence, Zisca, the general of the Hussites, attacked their island, and put them to the sword. There was likewise another sect, who called themselves Orebites, from the mountain Oreb, on which Moses received the law from God. Tho' they did not entirely agree with the Hussites, yet they were equally zealous enemies to the catholics, plundering and destroying the monasteries, and burning the monks and priests, or exposing them naked in the middle of winter to the rigours of the season (4).

a why he had taken them into his protection. A few weeks afterwards Martin sent cardinal Branda, bishop of Placenza, as his legate into Germany, to prosecute the war against the Hussites, and wrote to the waiwode, desiring him to recall his troops from Bohemia; which request was, after some time, complied with, in consequence of a new accommodation betwixt the emperor and his cousin the king of Poland.

Soon after Martin received a letter from the emperor of Constantinople, expressing his desire of an union with the Roman church, but refusing to embrace that union by submitting to the faith of the Latin church, as the nuncio declared his ambassadors had asserted at Florence. He requested only that an universal council might be called, after the manner of the seven ancient ones; that it should assemble at Constantinople, as the Greeks were unable to go elsewhere on account of the incursions of the Turks, and the poverty of the empire; that the pope should furnish the expences of those who attended at the council, as the emperor, at whose charge they formerly assembled, was not able; and lastly, that his holiness would compel those under his obedience, by severe censures, to assist the Greeks in their extremity. What was the consequence of this letter is not mentioned; but the following year, according to Onuphrius, Martin celebrated a jubilee at Rome; however, as Italy, Germany, and France, were then the scenes of destructive wars, this solemn festival seems to have been but little attended to. Mean while, as the time for celebrating the council of Pavia now drew near, the pope, with the advice of the cardinals, sent four prelates to that city; who, in the month of May, opened the assembly; at which were present only three other ecclesiastics, namely, two abbots from Burgundy, and a Carmelite friar from the clergy of England<sup>w</sup>. As the plague raged in Pavia, and the fathers did not attend, after two months the pope transferred the council to Siena, where the first session was opened on the 8th of November. The four prelates, that were first sent to Pavia, presided in the name of the pope, and, with the consent of the fathers, confirmed the sentence of condemnation published against heresy at Constance, and likewise made some additions to the bull of Boniface VIII. concerning heretics, ordaining, that whoever expelled them from their territories, or delivered them into the power of the ordinaries or inquisitors, or, when desired, punished them with the secular arm, should enjoy the same indulgences as those who personally visited the Holy Land. As very few prelates came to this council, it was dissolved in the month of February, another being appointed to be held seven years afterwards at Basil, and the necessary reformati-
The Greek emperor desires a general council to be held at Constantinople.
A general council at Pavia;
it is transferred to Siena.

d held seven years afterwards at Basil, and the necessary reformati-
The pope joins in a war against the Florentines. A.D. 1424.

e According to Platina, Martin dissolved the council to prevent the intrigues of Alphonfus king of Arragon, who, being offended that his pretensions to the kingdom of Naples were rejected, had sent a deputy to Siena to renew the cause of Peter de Luna.

ABOUT the same time, a war arising betwixt the duke of Milan and the Florentines, Martin, in resentment for the assistance given by that republic to Brachius of Perugia, declared for the duke. A few months after, having sent an army to assist the queen of Naples against Brachius, who was besieging Aquila, in an engagement, fought on the second of June, Brachius was entirely routed, and mortally wounded. In consequence of this victory queen Jane, and her adopted son Lewis III. duke of Anjou, remained in the quiet possession of Naples; Martin recovered Perugia, and the other places in the ecclesiastical state that had been usurped by Brachius, and the Florentines were deprived of their chief support against the arms of duke Philip. Not long after the antipope Benedict died at Peniscola, in the 30th year of his pontificate, having, on his death-bed, bound his followers to elect a successor, under pain of eternal damnation. Accordingly the two cardinals of his obedience, after his decease, chose Ægidius, a canon of Barcelona, who was compelled by the king of Arragon to accept of the mock dignity, and assumed the name of Clement VIII. Martin, upon hearing of his intrusion, immediately denounced an anathema against him and his adherents, and cited them all to appear at Rome.
Peter de Luna dies, and is succeeded by Clement VIII.

f MEAN while his legate cardinal Branda, having gone with the emperor and several other princes to Presburg, to be present at the coronation of queen Sophia, prevailed with Uladislaus to grant 5000 horse to Sigismund against the Hussites, and to confiscate the possessions of Coribut, who had again entered Bohemia. Eric king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, and Peter, brother of the king of Portugal, who were both present at the coronation, likewise granted succours to the emperor; but, notwithstanding all these reinforcements, the Hussites were every-where victorious, and not only repulsed the imperialists and crusaders, but, in their turn, invaded Misnia, which they ravaged in a terrible manner*. They, however, this year suffered a considerable loss in the death of their blind and valiant general Zisca, who died of * SPOND. Annal. ex. act. Victor. PITHÆ de script. Angl.

* COCHLÆ, l. v.

Alphonfus is intreated to desert the antipope.
A. D. 1425.

the plague, after he had agreed to a personal conference with the emperor. Martin in the mean time earnestly solicited the German princes to a new expedition against the Hussites, and wrote to the emperor, exhorting him to act with vigour against them. Being desirous likewise to extirpate the remains of the schism, he sent the cardinal of Foix as his legate a latere into Arragon, to prevail with Alphonfus, who was his relation, to desert the antipope. The cardinal, having sent a nuncio to inform the king of his commission, set out on his journey; but at Charpentiers he received a letter from Alphonfus, who declared he could not acknowledge him as a legate, till Martin had granted him some things which he demanded of him by a special messenger. After two other prohibitions to enter his kingdom, the king at last allowed him to act as legate, but under such restrictions as were rejected by the cardinal; who left Arragon, and retired to the territories of his brother the count of Foix; from whence the following year he sent frequent messengers to the king, desiring a conference, and with propositions for an accommodation. The messengers returned without receiving any satisfactory answer from the king, who still kept up his resentment against Martin, and published an edict, prohibiting the prelates of his kingdom from receiving any apostolical letters, or from executing them or those of the legate, under the penalty of forfeiting all their possessions. The cardinal legate protested against this edict, and informed the pope of the king's proceedings; who, on the 15th of July, published a most severe sentence against him and his kingdom. About the same time he sent cardinal Nicolas Albergatus, bishop of Bologna, to mediate a peace betwixt Philip duke of Milan and the Florentines and their allies, who prevailed with each of the parties to send deputies to Ferrara; where, after three months spent in negotiating, a treaty was concluded on the 1st of January.

The Hussites
ravage several provinces of Germany.

1427.

MEAN while the several sects of the Hussites, namely, the Calixtins, Taborites, Orphans, and Orebites, having, since the death of Zisca, conferred the chief command upon one Procopius, a priest, and for that reason called the Shaven, this general, no less intrepid than his predecessor, gained a signal victory over the duke of Austria in his own dominions, and a few months afterwards entirely defeated an army of 100,000 Germans, commanded by the counts of Veiden and Schwartzenburgh; after which he made himself master of some places on the borders of Moravia, and ravaged Austria in a terrible manner, as far as the Danube. The pope, greatly affected with the miseries which the catholics suffered in Bohemia and Germany, and finding his endeavours to assist them hitherto ineffectual, on the 16th of March created cardinal Henry, bishop of Winchester, and uncle of the late Henry V. of England, his legate in Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, with full power of causing a crusade to be preached everywhere against the Wickliffites and Hussites, with the same indulgences as the crusards against the Saracens had formerly enjoyed. As Henry had great authority in England, the pope expected large succours from that kingdom; accordingly the cardinal, after some dispute, having obtained leave from the regent of the kingdom to exercise his legatine authority<sup>2</sup>, published a crusade against the Hussites; in consequence of which he raised a considerable body of forces, with whom he marched the following year into Bohemia.

The pope's le-
gate treats with the king of Arragon about abandoning the anti-pope.

1428.

WHILE the crusade was preaching in England, the king of Arragon, influenced by the censures of the pope, at length invited the cardinal of Faxi to enter his dominions; and, upon his arrival at Valentia, received him with the greatest honour and respect, conducting him bare-headed into the city. Although two days after he opposed some proceedings of the legate by a public edict, yet he was prevailed upon to enter into a negotiation with him, in which several articles were drawn up, containing the mutual demands of both parties; and it was agreed, that the legate should carry them himself to the pope, and return afterwards to Arragon to terminate the differences. Accordingly, two galleys being provided, the cardinal embarked for Rome, where he arrived on the 8th of January. Immediately after, the demands of Alphonfus were taken into consideration, and answers to each of them were drawn up and sent to the king; which were not approved by him. As the plague at this time raged in Rome, and the cardinals were dispersed, the accommodation of the differences was delayed, and the whole year was spent in reciprocal messages and objections<sup>3</sup>. Martin in the mean time published a bull, prohibiting lay officials from usurping any authority over ecclesiastics<sup>4</sup>; and, as the Bolognese had again revolted from the holy see, he sent an army against them, and laid their city under an interdict. In the beginning of the following year, he again sent the cardinal of Tibisci to Arragon, who arrived at Barcelona about the middle of May, where he was received by the king and the prelates with great honours. Alphonfus nevertheless delayed the conferences upon various pretences; but, at the intreaties of his brother the king of Navarre, he at length condescended to treat. However, after several dif-

<sup>1</sup> POG. Hist. Florap. Murat. t. xx. p. 344.
Hist. Polon. l. iv. c. 52.

<sup>2</sup> Act. Leg. ap. Bzov. hoc an.

<sup>3</sup> Bzov. hoc an. HARPS. sec. 15. c. 10 & 20.

<sup>4</sup> SPOND. Annal.

<sup>5</sup> MICHOV.

a putes, the legate refusing to publish his absolution, till he reversed the decrees against the authority of the see of Rome, the conferences were broken off; and the king next day proposed to set out on an expedition against the kingdom of Castile. On the morrow, the legate having obtained an audience, the king at last consented to his demands; and his brother and himself, having received the benediction of the cardinal, immediately departed. Next day the revocation of the king's decrees was published; and two of his counsellors, being appointed to act according to the directions of the legate, went to Peniscola, where, on the 26th of July, the antipope Clement or Ægidius, in the presence of his cardinals and court, voluntarily abdicated the pontifical dignity, confirming his abdication by a bull, and exhorting his cardinals to elect another. They accordingly proceeded to an election in the usual manner, and unanimously chose Otho Colonna, or Martin V. to whom, in the person of his legate, all the adherents of the late antipope submitted, excepting two cardinals, who, for their obstinacy, had been thrust into prison before the election; however, they soon after acknowledged their fault, and asked pardon.

THE schism being thus terminated, after it had continued fifty years and ten months, the legate, before he left Spain, held a council at Tortosa for the restoring of discipline, the sessions being prorogued to the beginning of the following year. Martin soon after sent one of the cardinals as his legate a latere to be present at the general chapter of the Franciscans, held at Assisi, with a full authority of reforming the order in the head and members, and to repress the power of the Hussites; who, at different times, had made irruptions into Misnia, Silesia, Moravia, Lusace, and Franconia. The following year he created cardinal Julian his legate a latere in Germany, with a full authority of carrying on the sacred war. As this cardinal was remarkably eminent for his prudence, eloquence, and learning, a few weeks afterwards Martin published another bull, appointing him to preside, in his name, at the council to be held at Basil, in consequence of the decrees of those of Constance and Siena. This bull was dated on the 1st of February, and twenty days after the pope was seized with an apoplexy, of which he died in the 63d year of his age, and 13th of his pontificate.

END of the NINTH VOLUME.